INTRODUCTION

TO

THE FORMER EDITIONS.

IT has ever been acknowledged in all Christian countries, and by all Christian persons, that a just understanding of the Bible, which is the foundation of Christianity, is a most invaluable acquisition; it is an acquisition, in pursuit of which, numbers of learned men in all ages, since it has been given to mankind, have cheerfully passed their lives and engaged their learning; and numbers in all countries throughout Christendom are constantly employed in the present day, no less than former ages were, in illustrating and enforcing the doctrines and the precepts of this important volume. But this volume is important, not to men of learning only, or principally to those whose professional pursuits lead them to more intimate acquaintance with it,—it is of equal consequence to the unlearned, as to the learned; to the simple, as to the wise. The duties it enjoins, the doctrines it delivers, are of universal concern; no one is so exalted in rank or station, as to be above a knowledge of the Bible; no one is so humble, so depressed, as to be condemned to ignorance of its interesting contents.

It may be justly said of Holy Scripture, that it ennobles the noble, and enriches the rich; it supports the poor, it guides the ignorant; and by exhibiting the bright prospects of immortal happiness, it consoles the mind of man, under the inevitable evils, which, in this state of probation, he is called to endure.

The Bible is addressed to every man's bosom; it appeals to every man's sense and conscience; it calls on every individual, and enforces its call, by the most awful sanctions; it proposes no trifle, no unnecessary levity; but it offers life or death, a blessing or a curse, heaven or hell.

We cannot wonder, that a volume of such consequence to the happiness and welfare of mankind, should have employed many in the study of it: whom it has amply rewarded, both by pleasure and profit, as their knowledge of it has increased: and so copious is this volume in its nature, that it will still continue to be studied, and still continue amply to reward its students.

The Bible has this remarkable character belonging to it, its doctrines and its precepts are clear as light; open at once to the unprejudiced understanding; and approved at once by the unbiassed mind. Even though delivered in distant ages of the world, by different persons, and on various occasions, its principles are wonderfully uniform and consistent, wonderfully energetic and impressive. But though the character of the Bible as to doctrines and precepts be clearness and plainness, yet we cannot be surprised if some of its historic relations, and accounts of local matters, appear, in some degree, confused. It certainly would be infinitely surprising if they were not so; especially when we reflect that many of them date very early in the history of the world, and some of them from the birth of time itself; the very antiquity of these may render them difficult to the present day, without any imputation on the original writer. Others refer to customs familiar to the people to whom they were addressed; these may be obscure in Britain, though entirely free from obscurity to the inhabitants of the countries where their authors wrote. Others refer to persons of whom it is necessary to know more than these volumes have recorded, in order to judge by the whole of such persons' character, of the propriety of so much as they incidentally offer; the sacred accounts may be perfect for the purpose to which they were designed, while imperfect in respect to what may be obtained from collateral authorities. Others refer to cities, once great and populous, now ruined and deserted; of these we wish geographical and historical information, more, perhaps, than the Bible affords. In short, it is notorious that Empires, Kingdoms, and States—that Emperors, Kings, and Statesmen, have flourished, and have ceased to flourish; they have risen to greatness, and sunk to oblivion; during the course of the Bible history: by the further knowledge of their story, as collected from ancient authors, who incidentally or purposely mention the same subjects, we clear many particulars, which, in the Bible being only glanced at, appear intricate or perplexed to the Reader.

The prophetic parts of this book contain many predictions which relate to particular Persons and States; the fulfilment of these is not always recorded in the Bible; but we know from other histories that they were fulfilled; and a knowledge of when, or how the facts took place, directs us to the confidence due to others of the same kind; and justifies our regard to the Sacred Oracles in general.

There are many persons and characters of whom we desire to know more than is related in the Bible; and of whom more may be known, by diligent study: I suppose there never was a Christian who read his Bible, who did not wish to know the end of CAIAPHAS, of PONTIUS PILATE, of HEROD, of the PHARISEES, the SADDUCEES, &c. all concerned in the crucifying of JESUS, our Lord: or, who would not wish to know the particulars of that punishment which fell on the Jews, and on Jerusalem, for their rejection of the MESSIAH: or, who would not feel a satisfaction in reading the history of the accomplishment of our Lord's predictions, respecting that Holy Place which was to be trodden down by the Gentiles: or, on another subject, I suppose every Christian, without exception, must feel a pleasure in tracing the progress of the Gospel among all nations, and its influence in reforming, humanizing, and blessing mankind.

Now, if on these comparatively recent events, we solicit instruction, and exert our industry to acquire it; if these, to be properly understood, must be studied, what shall we say of events which date thousands of years before them; which, in consequence, are liable to more considerable ambiguity, if not obscurity; and from the manner in which they are related, are difficult to us now, though perfectly easy to their original readers? If we find it necessary, by perusing history, to transport ourselves eighteen hundred or two thousand years back, into past ages of time, surely it cannot be less necessary, that on articles of double that antiquity, we should use all means of information, and embrace every possible method of obtaining a competent acquaintance with them, of understanding them, and of viewing them in their true light.

Add to these considerations, the different languages in which the Sacred Books are written, and the necessity of intimate knowledge with the things they describe, in order to comprehend correctly the descriptions given of them, and we shall readily acquiesce in the conclusion, that however an attentive perusal of the Bible may make a Christian reader spiritually wise, yet there will remain many things on which he must desire additional knowledge; many things will appear uncouth, which he could wish were regulated; many will seem difficult, which he could wish were explained; and many on which his judgment is capable of receiving further satisfaction, even while his admission of them is frank and ready.

The manners, and customs, and modes of life, are so various in various countries, that with great difficulty they are explained to each other respectively, and with still greater difficulty, their propriety is respectively admitted. The common and ordinary occurrences of life are, in their relation, extremely embarrassing to those accustomed to a domestic economy, entirely different, perhaps directly opposite; in a cold country, that anxiety for shade, which animates the inhabitants of a hot country, appears perfectly ridiculous; in a country almost daily watered by showers, the mention of rain twice a year (the first and second rain, or the early and the latter rain) is quite unintelligible; in a country of houses, every allusion to the properties of tents is lost; or, not infrequently, is misunderstood and misemployed.

The same reasoning may be applied to the Natural History of the Bible:—the LEVIATHAN and BEHEMOTH may be very finely described; but who, in England, is the wiser for the description? who ever saw either of these creatures, to judge of its properties? and, for want of information on this subject, what impertinent remarks have been made!—what false opinions have been vented! Some have called BEHEMOTH the Elephant; some the Hippopotamos (creatures equally foreign to us); some have called him the Buffalo; the Wild-ox; the——; and some have called him the devil!!! Amid such uncertainty, it is most important to obtain, if possible, a just understanding of the Natural History of the sacred Scriptures: and to demonstrate the proper application of descriptions to the subjects described.

Without pursuing this train of argument further, (there is no need to support by numerous particulars the proposition, that a clear and concise illustration of Holy Writ is desirable) it is sufficient, that it must be acknowledged, that, however clear and express the Scriptures may be on their principal subjects, yet on others, information is absolutely indispensable, to enable the reader to understand them, according to their original intent, and to the gratification of his own wishes.

Now, though notes on passages of the Bible, where these or other difficulties occur, may have their use, yet, to demonstrate their general insufficiency, it is enough to reflect, in the First place, that notes cannot illustrate an article (though appertaining to the Bible) unless it be expressly mentioned in the passage they are designed to explain. Secondly, that they can never allow the room, the proportion, to certain subjects, which is due to their importance; and, Thirdly, they are of necessity unconnected in their nature, and never present the whole of a subject together.

large, and afterwards this Dictionary. As the present Edition of it is an entire revision of the Work, let us hear the sentiments of the original author, extracted from his own Preface.

“When we engaged in this undertaking, we considered these two things; first, the general duty of one employed about a Dictionary; and, secondly, what it is that distinguishes a Dictionary of the Bible from all other works of the like nature. As to a Dictionary in general, whoever would succeed in writing one, should take care, that the notions given of the terms and things spoken of should be clear and distinct; that an account should be inserted of their Etymologies, Definitions, Descriptions, and Divisions; that confusion, a too great enlargement upon things, and an excessive brevity, are avoided; that what is advanced, be maintained by good and succinct arguments; and, because it is not proper that things should be discoursed on at their full length, such authors should be directed to, as have written best upon them, and the readers referred to the originals. Lastly, though in works of this kind, a world of things are heaped together, and facts very different from one another, yet it should be so managed, that the same system of Chronology, Geography, Divinity, and Philosophy, should visibly prevail throughout; and, particularly, that conjectures should not be offered as certainties; for the first idea of a Dictionary supposes it to be a standard of language, and a rule whereby to judge of the truest and most common notions.

“As the matter of the Bible is almost infinitely extensive, it either might be entirely comprehended in a Dictionary, or some part of it only may be reserved for such a design. The Hebrew Dictionaries are Dictionaries of the Bible, inasmuch as they explain the Hebrew words which are to be found in the original text of the Old Testament. Pasor's does the same for the Greek text of the New.

“The several Hebrew, Greek, and Latin Concordances of the Old and New Testaments, may be reduced to the same class, since they severally include all the words of these texts in alphabetical order.

“We proposed, therefore, to publish a Dictionary of the Bible, after the method of our Comment upon Scripture; that is to say, we confine ourselves principally to the Letter, History, and Criticism of the Bible; we explain difficult terms, compare the text of the Vulgate with the Hebrew, show exactly the situation of such Provinces, Cities, Towns, Mountains, and Rivers, as are spoken of in Scripture; we settle the true Chronology of the most Memorable Events, and endeavour to explain the names of Plants, Precious Stones, Animals, and Fruits; to relate what we know of the Customs, Festivals, and Ceremonies of the Hebrews; of their Coins, and Measures of length and capacity; so that this Dictionary may be looked upon, not only as an Abridgment of our Comment, but even as a Supplement to it, and may serve instead of Prolegomena and Introduction to the Scripture, and supply the want of those books which treat of the Chronology, History, and Geography of the Sacred Writings; of the Polity, Commonwealth, Laws, Manners, and Ceremonies of the Jews; of their Plants, Precious Stones, Animals, and Diseases. Hence this Work may be considered as a Library for those in meaner circumstances, and a very useful Repertory for all others who would read the Scripture with advantage. Men of learning will find here, an epitome of what they have read in different authors; and they who have not many books, will see here a summary of what is generally said on every subject.

“In that part which belongs to History, we have given the Lives of the chief Persons, whose names occur in Scripture and Josephus; and this, as much as possible, in the very words of the sacred and original authors, without omitting any considerable circumstance. Experience hath taught us, that this way of relating things is both the shortest and most certain. By following this track, the whole Work is interspersed with historical passages taken from the books of Oriental authors, which relate to the history, and the sacred antiquities of the Old Testament; also with traditions from the old Arabians, descended from Abraham and Ishmael, who preserved some traces of the truth, though in many circumstances altered and disguised.

“The authors of Dictionaries generally do no more than shew in gross, at the end of each article, the chronological marks of such facts as they report, without giving themselves the trouble to fix these marks to every particular fact. To avoid this inconvenience, we thought ourselves obliged, as the history requires it, to cite the authors in the margin, from whom we borrow what we relate; and to note at the same time, not only the year of the world, but the years likewise before Jesus Christ, and before the Vulgar

Vulgar Æra. We not only relate what we learn from Scripture, of the Patriarchs, but have added what we find concerning them in apocryphal authors; not forgetting to say something of the books, whether genuine or spurious, that are attributed to them.

"When we speak of the Bible in general, we treat of the texts, and several versions of it; and when we consider every Book of Scripture in particular, we give a summary of each, with an account of the authors of them; of their being received into the canon of Scripture, of the difficulties started concerning the persons, time, and other circumstances of the Work. We have explained at large, whatever relates to the Hebrew text, the Polyglots, Septuagint, Vulgate, Targums, and Talmud; and we have said enough on them to afford a competent knowledge of these matters to those who have not leisure to go so far as the spring-head in their enquiries. We have been exact in the constant citation of authors, that others might be able to compare or see those things at length, which the compendiousness of a Dictionary engages us to abridge. When any thing has appeared to us to be of consequence, we have at the end of the article relating to it, expressly named the books and authors that are more particular upon it.

"In treating on the Festivals, Laws, and Ceremonies of the Jews, we have not only shewn what is to be found in Scripture on these articles, but likewise, what both Jewish and Christian authors say of them; and farther, we have given some account of the Customs of the present Jews.

"We have included in this Work, the substance of many dissertations and particular treatises; we have inserted lists of the several Judges of Israel, of the Kings of Israel and Judah, of the Princes of the Asmonæan race, of the Governors of Judah under the Romans, of the Kings of Egypt and Syria, from the time of Alexander the Great, and of the Jewish High-priests; with the Genealogical Table of Herod's descendants, Tables of the Coins and Measures of the Hebreux, and reductions of them to the standard of our own coins, weights and measures.

"We have chiefly followed the chronology of Usher, which hitherto hath been esteemed the most accurate that we have, and has been followed by the generality of modern writers. With this, we have all along joined the years of Jesus Christ and those of the Vulgar Æra, that the reader at one view might discern the relation that these epochs have to one another. At the end of all, we have added a Hebrew Calendar, wherein we have observed, the principal Feasts, Fasts, and Solemnities that are taken notice of, not only in common Calendars, but likewise in the most ancient that the Jews have. Many things also concerning Chronology, may be seen in the body of the Dictionary, under the articles, Years, Months, Days, Jubilee; beside the list of Kings, Priests, and Princes already spoken of, which have some relation to Chronology, we have further prefixed to this Work, a Universal Chronological Table, from the beginning of the World, to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; and wherever the dates have been omitted, that defect may be supplied by this Table.

"One thing whereof we have been particularly careful in this Work is, to clear the Geography of Holy Scripture, the knowledge of this being, as we are persuaded, indispensibly necessary, in order to the making any progress in the study of the Scriptures. But as we have very few lights on this article, and ignorance is preferable to error, we have set down so much only as we know, and may pronounce certain. The Geographical Maps, Plans, and Description of Places, here inserted, have their proofs with them, under every article of the Dictionary. We are very much obliged to the labours of M. Reland, who has written two volumes in quarto on the Geography of Palestine. When the places we describe are famous and considerable, we give a kind of history of every thing remarkable which hath happened to them, and of the revolutions to which they have been subject; examples of this are to be seen in Jerusalem, Samaria, Tyre, &c. But as the design of this Dictionary is only to facilitate the understanding of the Bible, we have generally confined ourselves to represent the condition of such places and cities only to the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans, and to the end of the first century.

"Very little concerning Morality will be expected here. Preachers have their common Latin Concordances, and their Moral Dictionaries, which, in this particular, will abundantly supply them. The Letter, History, and Criticism of Scripture, are the principal objects of our care. There are few names of places or persons that are passed by unobserved; if some have been omitted, it was because there was nothing to be said concerning them, the Scriptures having transmitted only their names. We have seldom said any thing of the etymologies and signification of proper names, having chosen to reserve that for a distinct Dictionary, which we have placed at the end of this.

"Lastly,

"Lastly, That pleasure and profit may be joined together in this Dictionary, several persons of consideration have obliged us to represent the Antiquities of the Hebrews, and Ceremonies of the Jews, in figures; so that let the explanation of them be what it will, the Prints will be sure to make things more sensible and clear, and by this means, contribute to the better understanding of holy Scripture, and satisfy the reader's curiosity.

"We, therefore, employed the ablest masters in delineating and engraving the principal Antiquities of the old Hebrews, and of the modern Jews; such as Noah's Ark, the Tower of Babel, the Tabernacle and Utensils of it, Solomon's and Ezekiel's Temples, the same rebuilt by Herod the Great, the House of Cedar, built by Solomon for his queen; Monuments, Habits, and chief Ceremonies; Plans and Views of the most celebrated Places in the Holy Land; and many other things besides, which we have represented according to the descriptions given of them in Scripture, or the Jewish writers.

"As to those things whereof there is either no mention at all in Scripture, or not a very clear one, we have taken our account of them from the old historians, particularly Josephus, from Travellers and Commentators, supplying this way what to us appeared to be most probable, and most agreeable to truth, relating to the Times, Countries, Manners, and Customs of the Ancients. We do not therefore affirm every thing which we have had thus represented in figures to be absolutely certain; but we hope at least that we have come as near to truth as is possible in matters so remote and obscure, and that we have, in some degree, cleared and explained the Jewish Antiquities. And though all that has been thus engraved by our direction be not new, the public, notwithstanding, is obliged to us for collecting in this Dictionary, not only many things that are new, but almost every thing besides that is most curious, and is elsewhere to be met with on this subject."

First, As the original, by CALMET, was intended for the service of those who used the Vulgate Latin Version, the author had introduced perpetual references to that version; and had paid more attention to it, than it can justly demand, considered simply as a version: these references, and that attention, are in this edition diminished; and instead of passages of Scripture being given in Latin, they are, for the most part, given in the words of our English translation. In some places, indeed, a few words are exchanged for others esteemed more correct; and in many more places, for the sake of conciseness, the general sense is given, without a minute attention to the very words.

Secondly, Considerable retrenchments are made from the Author's relations of certain stories; it might be proper in him, writing in a country where Bibles were not in such plenty as they are in England, to suppose his reader little, if at all, acquainted with Scripture; and he did right to counteract, in some degree, the scarcity of Bibles, by enlarging on some of the contents of that sacred volume. But we have supposed that no such management was necessary to us, that most of our readers were not now for the first time perusing these accounts, but that they desired farther satisfaction, rather than initiatory information; and indeed, it seemed an unnecessary incumbrance to include in this Work, the verbatim relation of a story which may be purchased in its proper place in the Bible, and with so much important accompaniment, at whatever rate (from cheapness to splendor) may be desired. Nevertheless, in justice to ourselves, we must remark, that we have not cancelled any story; we have only abridged it; neither have we omitted any of its peculiarities, if it have any; we have neither, to our knowledge, flinched from its difficulties, nor shrunk from an endeavour to explain them; on this particular, we must, however, suggest that many things may seem difficulties to those, to whom the consideration of these subjects is new; which, being being familiar to us, are so easy, we perceive no necessity of explanation; just as a person visiting a foreign country, observes immediately on his arrival, a variety of little peculiarities, which vanish from his notice after he has resided there a time. This we have experienced, and this, if our readers will bear it in mind, will oftentimes excuse a seeming omission, while it encourages the reader to prosecute his enquiries, in expectation that, ere long, what he now considers as an omission, his better knowledge would have regarded as a superfluity.

Thirdly, We have transposed many of the original articles under other words, and into other places, from their original situation; this we have done in conformity to the genius and course of our language, to the expressions used in our translation, to the familiar phrases which are common to the Christian world, and to our opinion of general propriety; this has been a great labour; but it will be found by the reader a great improvement.

Fourthly, We have wholly transposed the Hebrew and Greek names, with their explanations, and have inserted them, and those of some other words, in the regular alphabet, instead of forming a division by themselves: hereby a reader may obtain very useful information by accident, while no injury is done to one who is seeking a particular subject, as the word still preserves its alphabetical order.

Fifthly, As the Author had cursorily admitted certain notions which Protestants in general justly reject, we have endeavoured, uniformly, to omit all such; and while we would not willingly either neglect or impair truth, we have thought it our duty not to insert opinions for the sake of confuting them, (unless on account of some peculiarity, whether whimsical or plausible,) but rather, by offering what we esteem to be the genuine, undisguised, unmingled, representations, doctrines, or inferences of the Bible, to render THAT Standard more intelligible, more familiar, more easy, and in consequence, more pleasant, to whoever wishes to read it with understanding, and to profit.

We regret the necessity which the present times have laid us under, to add, that such a work as this Dictionary is peculiarly requisite, when the doctrines, the histories, the principles, and the authority of the Bible, have been perversely misunderstood, and violently misrepresented, both as to their nature and their influence. We say no more on this subject, it is too painful; but the reader will give it its due importance.

But the principal object, and what has engaged most of our concern, is, the ADDITIONS which it has been thought necessary to make, and which have been made, in innumerable places: for these we are altogether responsible; and upon these, we have exerted our best judgment, and we hope to good effect. These might have been very much enlarged, but, not being willing to extend them too far under their articles, or at least, supposing that many of them would be more acceptable in another form, we have allotted a separate division of our Work, under the title of FRAGMENTS, as a kind of Miscellaneous Repository, for articles of several kinds, such as the following:

1. For those which assume more the appearance of DISSERTATIONS, than of articles for a Dictionary; which yet we thought we could not alter without injury.

2. For those on which we had doubts; or, at least, had not formed a decisive opinion; and on which we request the sentiments of Correspondents, by way of further elucidation.

3. For

3. For those sent us by Correspondents, whose assistance, and whose remarks, we solicit, and to which we shall pay all proper respect ; for, however any individuals may use their utmost endeavours and skill, in conducting so copious a work as the present, some slips will escape, and some deficiencies may strike a stranger, (a fresh eye) which, hereby, may be corrected as the work proceeds.

4. For a number of little accounts, hints, explanations of phrases, &c. &c. which will not easily range under any head in a Dictionary ; yet, which it is pleasing to know, if they are not absolutely necessary to be known.

5. For attention to the relations of Travellers, in a manner distinct from what is possible in the regular order of the Dictionary ; here they may be referred to repeatedly, and here a single account may illustrate five or six articles in the Dictionary : now it would be improper to repeat this, five or six times, and equally improper to give the reader the trouble of so many references, and most of all improper to omit it, if it may be avoided, and we hope it will be avoided by this part of our plan ; while yet we must own the pleasure to be enjoyed in the perusal of these extracts, (no small object to the younger part of our readers) and the satisfaction testified by the public with those on the same plan, by the late Mr. HARMER, have been principal considerations in inducing us to adopt this mode of disposing of them.

In mentioning Mr. HARMER, we embrace the opportunity of paying a tribute of respect to that gentleman's memory ; he has done much toward turning the attention of the Public into a right channel ; we desire to be understood as very sensible of his merit, and under obligations to him ; nevertheless, we flatter ourselves we may have corrected some things in him, and have set other things in a clearer light than he has done ; nor will this appear presumptuous, we hope, when we hint that, before we had seen his works, we had for our private use, adopted the same idea, and had noticed to what advantage the Scriptures might be illustrated by the accounts of Travellers ;—How far we are worthy of being his successors, the Public will determine.

As to our Plates they shall speak for themselves ; Father CALMET was a man of learning, but no artist ; his plates are ill-chosen, and for the most part, void of authenticity : they are not to be depended on. He saw the propriety and utility of Plates, but knew not from whence to procure them ; and he confesses, he could not warrant their genuineness. Mr. HARMER has no Plates of any kind. We claim the merit of first offering to the British public, a set of Plates, capable of illustrating and embellishing the Bible : to say more on what must be seen to be judged of would be useless ; to say less, would be injustice to the Artist who has the direction of this part of our undertaking. This department has been engaged in, under a very great expence, as indeed has the whole of the Work, and we now call on the Public, on the Professors of Religion, and on the Christian world at large, to honour this work with their support, if they consider its subject as worthy their esteem, and if the execution of it meets their approbation.

PREFACE TO THE PRESENT EDITION.

THE general Design of the former Editions of this undertaking, with the measures adopted to accomplish it, is stated in the preceding Introduction: the improvements in the present Edition, will, it is hoped, justify a few words in elucidation. But, we ought previously to inform the Reader, that the reputation and respectability of the performance, had not only excited imitations of various descriptions, more or less defective, but had subjected it to direct plunder and plagiarism. The American press reprinted the whole verbatim, and copied the Plates; while, in a distant part of our own island, proposals were printed, announcing the project of a mutilated Copy, by which the highly respected name of CALMET would have been reduced to the level of ignorance and vacuity. In effect, the parties to this Work found themselves under the necessity of maintaining the superiority of the London Copy, by introducing such improvements as an additional course of more than twenty years' reading might enable them, or of suffering their labours to become the property of others, no less to the injury of the Public than of themselves.

These circumstances determined the present Edition: it has been revised throughout; a more modern air has been given to it, generally; and, more particularly,

In the first place, the Words which formed a SUPPLEMENT to the former Editions, are now brought into their proper places in the body of the Dictionary. They are accompanied by a considerable number of Articles entirely new; and by a still greater number of Additions and Corrections, annexed to others.

In composing these, it has been thought an essential service to readers of the English Translation to mark certain distinctions which are maintained in the Original, but are disregarded in that Translation. This cannot but contribute to that correct knowledge of Holy Writ, which lies at the foundation of all genuine Theology. It is hoped, that, whether critical or historical, these Additions will be found strictly according with the analogy of the Faith; and will detract nothing from the character of those which had already been honoured by the approbation of the judicious.

The Reader will find, also, that most of the NAMES given to Persons and Places, are stated with greater accuracy of interpretation than they were formerly: they are derived from a better selection of roots, and embrace a more extensive variety of languages. The names foreign to the Hebrew, especially, are explained to evident advantage; and though some still continue to baffle the skill of the most expert linguist, yet on the whole, the improvement is considerable. Among these derivations many are submitted to better judgment, as conjectural, and are marked accordingly; for, to affect certainty where conjecture only is practicable, would betray nothing less than entire ignorance of the subject. But, not to diminish the usefulness of preceding Etymologies, the ancient explanations are continued, and the new are enclosed in humble brackets [].

In the GEOGRAPHICAL DEPARTMENT, a greater proportion of names of Places is deduced from the probable nature or character of situation, soil or exposure: for it seems most natural to suppose, that names were usually given from analogy, in Judea, as elsewhere; they were descriptive in most instances, while in others they were commemorative. Many Places have, also, furnished new articles; and, what, it is hoped, will be allowed to possess considerable interest, especially to younger readers—together with more accurate sketches of former events, the histories of the principal cities, &c. are brought down to the latest period. The present conjuncture of occurrences imparts to the history of Athens, of Corinth, of Ephesus, &c. a prominence which strongly affects the Public mind, and which the articles referred to, are intentionally calculated to meet.

A few of the yet lingering observances of Heathenism, extant in various places, have been noticed, under the presumption that they contribute to illustrate the manners of their ancient votaries, and to justify the pages of History, which furnish our chief information concerning them. That they still exist, notwithstanding the prevalence of Christianity, is a fact that ought not to be lost on the zealous inquirer after Truth, and the well-instructed patron of Piety.

The disposition of the Editor to look far beyond Egypt for the cradle of Arts and Sciences, is founded on no Theory, suddenly adopted, but on long continued investigation. It is no other than what has consisted with the conviction of some of the greatest men in the walks of literature; though the medium of proof here employed may differ from what has been usual. It coincides well with Scripture; and the more it is examined the better it will be approved.

It would certainly have been highly gratifying, had it been in our power, to comply with requests from the most respectable quarters, for conforming the NATURAL HISTORY of the Bible, to the order and arrangement of the Linnæan System: the satisfaction would have been great; but the execution is, at present, impracticable. A proportion of the Animals, doubtless, might be ascertained, and properly placed; but many would defy arrangement, so great are the differences of the best informed respecting them. On the subject of Behemoth, for instance, many retain the persuasion that refers him to the Elephant; we have thought him more likely to be the Hippopotamos; Dr. A. CLARKE prefers that very obscure animal the Mammoth. Under these uncertainties, where can we place him in any regular System? The same may be said of the Reem, or Unicorn: Does the real Unicorn exist? perhaps it does: is it, therefore, the Reem of Holy Writ?—We dare not affirm that it is.

Still greater difficulties attend the Systematic Arrangement of the Vegetables mentioned in Scripture, (about two hundred and eighty species,) not one quarter of them could be strictly identified. In truth, the Reader may judge from the attempt submitted mitted in this Edition, and from almost every Article it includes, whether it is not rather an Apology for unavoidable absence of information, than a satisfactory evidence of competent knowledge. Now, to seem to direct the authority of a Work in such repute as CALMET is, to the support of such, or such opinions, would be in many instances to hazard the misconception of future enquirers; the statement would be thought conclusive, from the mere preponderance of deference and opinion. A work to meet what is desired, is much wanted; but, it must first assume a humble form, and be gradually perfected by the combination of various talent, and co-operation. The learned on the Continent have felt the want, and have endeavoured to supply it; but their labours are far from complete.

The satisfaction expressed by the Public with the humble efforts for elucidating Scripture, in the former series of FRAGMENTS, supersedes the necessity of Apology or Explanation in behalf of the additional series which now forms another Volume. It will be found that these enquiries include a much wider sphere of examination than the former; they contain remarks on the latest publications which could be procured; and they are arranged with a view to order, if it may not be said systematically. Most of them are, nevertheless, the proceeds of many years' unremitting Study, and anxious consideration, but accompanied, as is gratefully acknowledged, by advantages not under the command of every Student, however well disposed. It would give infinite pain to the Editor, should any article be found inaccurate, or overweening. They are offered with the most sincere simplicity, to the judgment of the learned and the liberal; from such they have every thing to hope.

The PLATES to this Edition have been carefully revised and improved; some are re-engraved, and some are entirely new. The principal addition to the series is formed by those which comprize the MEDALS or COINS of the ancient cities and provinces. They are evidences not to be impeached, and the Public may safely rely on their authority; but, as they form a medium of proof, and are connected with a course of Study, not usually called to contribute evidence on Biblical enquiries, they may demand a few explanatory remarks.

Whoever is in the habit of contemplating the writers of ancient days, has strongly felt the difficulty of completely understanding them. The modern Reader, whatever energy of mind he may possess, and however diligent and determinate his application, finds it little short of impossible to transport himself, as it were, two thousand years backward into distant ages of the world, into the midst of things, as they then stood. But, without this power, how shall he fully comprehend writers who wrote for those ages, not for him; not for modern times, but for the immediate instruction of immediate readers?—For instance, the absolute, the universal, prevalence of Idolatry, is beyond the conception of general readers: they can form no idea of the immense extent of public patronage it commanded, or of the minute particularities to which the system condescended. Idols are, happily, unknown among us; equally unknown, of course, are the rites of idolatry, and the bigotry of idolaters. Now, Graphic memoranda of those ages, while they evince the prevalence of that system, habituate the mind to a lively contemplation of it, in its various parts. They not merely bring us acquainted with the Deities worshipped in every town, every village and every house, with their symbols, their altars, their temples, but we gradually acquire a familiarity with them, without guilt, and become intimate with their penetralia, without pollution. They are evidences evidences of the truth of history: for, it will be observed, that the latest of those introduced, which date in the second or third century after the promulgation of Christianity, demonstrate the public power—the power of the sword, and of magistracy---to be still in the hands of the Heathen. Not one bears any impress of Christianity; ---and yet, we know from other authorities, that the doctrine of the risen Saviour was rapidly spreading throughout these countries. It was prevailing, against the opposition of prejudices, supported by the sanction of the deepest antiquity;---for, we trace the worship of the principal deities,---of Baal, for instance, from the days of Moses to the reign of Heliogabalus;---of Ashtarothe, from the time of Solomon, to that of her representative in the comparatively modern Astarte. Nor was it only against the long established religion of the people, that Christianity prevailed, it was against the solemn and argumentative disquisitions of the philosophers and the schools; against the ridicule, the sneer, the sarcasm, of the wittlings of the day: the bitterjest, the caustic laugh opposed it—but, in vain. What are the puny efforts of modern infidelity to those? Nevertheless, in spite of opposition in every form, the Christian doctrine continued to extend its influence; the Oracles ceased, and the Temples were closed. The subject well deserves the most penetrating investigation; for, if the system that disappeared before this new competitor, was ruined by its own imbecility and worthlessness, it affords a striking instance of the futility of Human Wisdom in the Article of Religion: or, if Christianity triumphed by its intrinsic excellence, then this very triumph becomes evidence of its more than Human Character. In this Department of our Work, then, as on a thousand other occasions, it has been our endeavour to place the Reader, as far as was possible, in Gospel times, and to surround him with the circumstances which then surrounded the Gospel. Without this advantage, the allusions of the New Testament writers are liable to misconception, and to misinterpretation.—Can a greater infelicity be imagined? Nor let the Reader think little of the Historical, or Geographical information connected with them; for, if St. Paul, writing to the Galatians, found it necessary to insert a marginal note—“This Hagar is Mount Sinai, in Arabia,”---to distinguish it from Agara, or Petra, [the city newly discovered,] Metropolis of another Arabia, our duty in the present day, is obvious. Nor will the titles assumed by various cities pass unnoticed: we find many of them called Sacred, answering to the Hebrew Kadesh; many are Asylums, answering to the Cities of Refuge: many are marked Free; and many are marked Metropolis. Now, we never find the city of Jerusalem marked Free (after the days of the Maccabees) nor Metropolis: she was in bondage to the Roman power, and to the Idumean Herods. Hence, the Apostle, in the place already referred to, speaks of “Jerusalem which is above as Free, and as being the Metropolis, Mother city, of all our establishments. This allusion to a circumstance common at the time, is abundantly elucidated by the inscriptions on our Medals. Nor will the titles given to Persons, be found without instruction. When we read of such an one “King of Kings,” the memory immediately adverts to the “King of Kings, and Lord of Lords.” We know—and our Medals prove it—that the Heathen had Divinities, each distinguished as possessor of one attribute of Deity, singly ---in the God of Christianity all attributes are combined---all perfect---all infinite! He is not only “the blessed and only Potentate, King of Kings, and Lord of Lords,” but---“He only hath Immortality ---dwelling in light which no man can approach unto---which no man hath seen, or can see”---to this inscrutable Being, therefore, “be honour and glory, everlasting!”

To

To various friends who have favoured us with communications expressing their wishes for the introduction of particular subjects, personal or local, our apology in reference to such as are omitted, must rest on the propriety, and indeed, the necessity, of comprizing the work within reasonable compass; this is evident from many considerations which are obvious to reflection; not to say, that we have refrained from repeating the contents of works already, or expected soon to be, before the Public.

We adhere to our opinion, that Providence is gradually bringing to light evidence from quarters which may justly be described as closely shut up, till very lately, from the researches of Biblical Students, and the inquisitive observation of travellers.

Our Second Volume of FRAGMENTS contains unquestionable instances in proof of this; while the greater facilities now afforded by various public institutions recently established among us, not only encourage the pursuits of the liberal enquirer, but contribute essentially to bring their objects within reach of a much greater number, than formerly could become acquainted with them. And this may be allowed to furnish additional strength to our apology: we have every reason to conclude that by exciting the attention of our countrymen on their travels, and of others resident in our numerous settlements abroad, who communicate with the Public by means of the press, a mass of information applicable to Biblical Subjects, is in a course of preparation for extensive benefit. Truth cannot but derive advantage from the variety of such communications; and from the different views of the writers, whose opportunities have seldom been the same, and consequently, their remarks have the merit and force of independent evidence. But, though we have not been able to comply with every request that has reached us, we have kept the more important in view as much as possible; and we venture to hope, that the general gratification will be found essentially promoted, by our attention to them, though in certain instances our desire to meet particular wishes has been obliged to give way.

The INDEX of TEXTS and SUBJECTS illustrated in the course of the Work, is given in obedience to the request of the Reverend the Clergy, unequivocally expressed. It comprizes chiefly those passages which are incidentally, or indirectly, illustrated; for to have registered the multitude of texts quoted in the direct Articles, would have been equally useless and endless: and, after all, it would not have superseded the necessity of application to a Concordance. But, the reader will observe, that a leading term of the passage, or of the illustration, being annexed, it forms a kind of "catch-word" to the memory, and will recall the ideas attached to a previous perusal, sufficiently to determine whether the passage refers to any subject under investigation.

It may also be observed, that by casting his eye down this column a reader may generally discover whether any subject of which he is in search, has been introduced; this answers the purpose of an extensive Table of Matters, and with the other Tables of Contents, and the Indexes, will, it is hoped, completely obviate the complaint formerly made on the difficulty of reference to Articles, when convenience required immediate consultation.

This would be a proper place to pay a just tribute of acknowledgment to, that friendly judgment, by assistance of which the work has been greatly improved: it will easily be supposed that the lapse of nearly thirty years has removed a number of our original coadjutors: the names of some of them appear in this Edition; and were evidences of the truth of history: for, it will be observed, that the latest of those adduced, which date in the second or third century after the promulgation of Christianity, demonstrate the public power—the power of the sword, and of magistracy--- to be still in the hands of the Heathen. Not one bears any impress of Christianity;

 ---and yet, we know from other authorities, that the doctrine of the risen Saviour was rapidly spreading throughout these countries. It was prevailing, against the opposition of prejudices, supported by the sanction of the deepest antiquity;---for, we trace the worship of the principal deities,---of Baal, for instance, from the days of Moses to the reign of Heliogabalus;---of Ashtarothe, from the time of Solomon, to that of her representative in the comparatively modern Astarte. Nor was it only against the long established religion of the people, that Christianity prevailed, it was against the solemn and argumentative disquisitions of the philosophers and the bitterjest, the caustic laugh opposed it—but, in vain. What are the puny efforts of modern infidelity to those? Nevertheless, in spite of opposition in every form, the Christian doctrine continued to extend its influence; the Oracles ceased, and the Temples were closed. The subject well deserves the most penetrating investigation; for, if the system that disappeared before this new competitor, was ruined by its own imbe-cility and worthlessness, it affords a striking instance of the futility of Human Wisdom in the Article of Religion: or, if Christianity triumphed by its intrinsic excellence, then this very triumph becomes evidence of its more than Human Character. In this Department of our Work, then, as on a thousand other occasions, it has been our endeavour to place the Reader, as far as was possible, in Gospel times, and to surround him with the circumstances which then surrounded the Gospel. Without this advantage, the allusions of the New Testament writers are liable to misconception, and to misinterpretation.—Can a greater infelicity be imagined? Nor let the Reader think we at liberty to mention more explicitly those who remain, it would be found that they comprize names of distinguished eminence in Biblical Literature. This general acknowledgment is all that propriety allows, at present: it is a duty, that we must discharge, though it can be but imperfectly.

This Edition is now submitted to the Reader with a due sense of the obligations it will lie under to the exercise of his candour. In a work so extensive some slips are inevitable, whether of the pen or of the press: but, it is hoped, that none of any consequence have escaped that diligence with which the duty incumbent on the Editor has been discharged.

ERRATA.

In the DICTIONARY. "Sidon the master of Tyre," read "mother of Tyre." Article SIDON. Add.

In the EXPLANATIONS OF THE PLATES, under the article "Egyptian Pyramids," &c. instead of attributing the clearing the great Pyramid, and Sphinx, to Mr. Belzoni, read Capt. Caviglia, under the auspices of Mr. Salt, the British Consul, in Egypt.

In FRAGMENTS, No. DLXXVII. p. 183, Capt. Light is corrected, for describing Dr. E. D. Clarke as "a divine of the Church of England;" the correction should have been limited; Dr. Clarke, after his return to England, took orders, and became Rector of Harlton, and of Great Yeldham. He died March 9, 1823.

A

A

A Ἀ Α. This letter is the first, or leader, in most, if not in all Alphabets. At present, we only remark, that it is first in those of the Hebrews, and the Greeks; which explains Rev. i. 8; xxi. 6; xxii. 13. where our LORD says, he is (ἁ Ἀ) THE Alpha, and (ἁ Ω) THE Omega, the beginning and the ending (of the Divine dispensations), and so, in a sense analagous to the first, and the last, letter of the Alphabet, "A and Ω." In chap. i. ver. 11, the repetition of these words is omitted in some MSS., in the Vulgate, and other versions; and some editors reject them.

Beside this, the Hebrew Ἀ Aleph (rather the word Aleph, vide ALEPH), signifies chief, or leader (Gen. xxxvi. 15, 16.); a guide, or conductor (Mic. vii. 5.); a friend on whom reliance may be placed, Prov. xvi. 28. Taking it in the former, which is the most general and usual sense, it applies very expressively to our LORD, CHRIST. (Moreover, as it is an idea after the Jewish manner, it forms one of the arguments for the Revelation having been written by a person of that nation; as such a thought would not perhaps have occurred to a stranger attempting a forgery. The Greeks sometimes distinguished persons of rank by calling them Alpha; but there is no instance in which they included Omega (the last letter of the Alphabet) in designating such a character). Vide ALPHIA.

The Jews had mysterious significations, derived from, or applied to, every letter of their Alphabet; and this formed no inconsiderable part of what was called the Cabbala, or cabbalistic science. (Vide CABBALA.) The numbers expressed by letters, the words which expressed the powers of letters, and many other fanciful combinations, arose from this science. Such science (falsely so called) is the foundation of the following apocryphal tale; which may serve as a specimen of the nature of such inventions:

The spurious "Gospel of the Infancy of Jesus Christ," (apud Fabricium, published in Jones' Apoc. Canon.) but not written till some centuries after Christ, relates, that the schoolmaster who had solicited for our Saviour as his scholar, was preparing to shew him his alphabet, but JESUS repeated it entire to him, before he had learned it of him; and began even to explain to him the prophets. Another copy of the same gospel imports, that his master having pointed out to him the letter Aleph, JESUS desired to know of him what the letter Aleph meant, that is, the mysterious signification of it; his master reproving him with threats, JESUS discoursed to him concerning the several letters of the alphabet, of their figures, powers, and significations, in a manner which so much surprised him, that he sent him back to his parents, as beyond his instruction.

(This story is evidently imitated from the history of JESUS among the doctors, Luke ii. 46. It shews how anciently that account was misunderstood. Thus have the omissions in the history of our LORD's life, which Divine Providence has permitted, been supplied, and ill supplied, by the invention of men.)

AARON; אהרן, lofty, or mountainous, from אר, har, a mountain. According to St. Jerom, mountain of strength. (Perhaps, greatly exalted; or, as a man, of elevated sentiments or expressions.)
VOL. I. B

AARON, son of Amram and Jochebed, of the tribe of Levi (Exod. vi. 20.), born A. M. 2430, ante A. D. 1574. He was three years older than his brother Moses (ch. vii. 7.), being born the year before Pharaoh's edict, which enjoined the destruction of the Hebrew male infants, ch. i. 22. God having appeared to Moses in the burning bush, and directed him to deliver the Israelites from their oppression in Egypt, Moses would have excused himself, by representing the natural impediment in his speech: but God, in reply, referred him to his brother Aaron as his prophet and interpreter, who should deliver what they had to say. Of this God gave Moses a sign, which he accomplished by inspiring Aaron at this very time with the desire of meeting Moses. Aaron advanced as far as the mount of God (ch. iv. 27.), where Moses related to him all that God had said; after which both went together into Egypt. A. M. 2513, ante A. D. 1491.

Being arrived, they assembled the elders of Israel, and communicated to them the will of God, to deliver them from their bondage, Exod. iv. 29—31. Afterwards, they presented themselves before Pharaoh, declared to him the orders they had received, and wrought several miracles, according to their commission from God. But that prince hardened himself, drove them from his presence, and commanded his officers to withhold the straw used by the Hebrews in making bricks for him. Overwhelmed with despair, the Hebrews bitterly complained to Moses and Aaron; who, in the name of God, encouraged them, assuring them he would overcome the opposition of the Egyptians and the obstinacy of Pharaoh, by so many plagues and prodigies as should eventually compel them to dismiss the Hebrews; which in effect he accomplished, chap. v. Vide MOSES.

After the Exodus of Israel, and during their stay in the wilderness, Aaron and his sons were appointed by God to exercise in perpetuity the office of priests in the Tabernacle, Exod. xxix. 9; compare also ch. xix. 22, 24. Aaron was respected in Israel as next in dignity after Moses.

When the Amalekites attacked Israel, Moses went up a hill, with Aaron and Hur, and while Joshua was engaging the enemy below, Moses on the hill was lifting up his hands, which Aaron and Hur supported, to prevent his being tired: the Israelites were victorious, Exod. xvii. 8—16.

Moses having gone up the mountain to receive the law of God, after the ratification of the covenant made with Israel, Aaron, his sons, and seventy elders, followed him, but not to the top; here they saw where the Lord was present, without receiving any injury, Exod. xxiv. 1—11.

During the forty days of Moses' continuance in the mount, the people, becoming impatient, tumultuously addressed Aaron, saying, 'Make us gods which shall go before us: for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him,' Exod. xxxii. 1. et seq. Aaron bade them bring their pendants, and the ear-rings of their wives and children; which being melted down, were formed into a golden calf; before this, Aaron built an altar and the people sacrificed, danced, and diverted themselves around the idol, saying, 'These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt.' Vide FRAGMENTS, No. 1. p. 6.

The Lord having informed Moses of the sin of the Israelites (Exod. xxxii. 7.); he immediately descended, carrying the tables of the law, which, as he approached the camp, and observed what passed there, he threw on the ground, and broke (ver. 19.), reproaching the people with their transgression, and Aaron with his weakness. Aaron was penitent, humbled himself, and was pardoned.

After the Tabernacle was built, Moses consecrated Aaron with the holy oil, and invested him with the sacred ornaments, Exod. xxviii.; xl.

Aaron and his sister Miriam murmuring against Moses on account of his wife, who was (an Ethiopian, in our translation; but rather) a Midianite, a Cushite (vide CUSH), Miriam was immediately struck with a leprosy; which punishment having convinced Aaron, he acknowledged his fault, and intreated forgiveness for himself and his sister, Numb. xii.

Some time after, Korah, Dathan, and Abiram revolted against Moses and Aaron, Numb. xvi.; A. M. 2515, ante A. D. 1489. Korah insisted that the priesthood belonged to him as much as to Aaron, both being of the tribe of Levi; and Dathan and Abiram being of the tribe of Reuben, aspired to share the sovereign authority with Moses. God discovered his indignation against these rebels in a remarkable manner; for the earth opening, swallowed up them and their faction, chap. xvi. 1—35.

The next day, the people accusing Moses and Aaron of this slaughter, the Lord sent a plague among them, which consumed many; but Aaron running with his censer, placed himself between the living and the dead, and the plague was stayed, Numb. xvi. 41—50.

Another miracle God wrought to secure the priesthood to Aaron: Moses took a rod or small twig, of an almond tree, from each of the princes of the twelve tribes, and one from Aaron also, and placed them in the Tabernacle, having written on each the name of the person or tribe to which it belonged. The next day, when the rods were inspected, Aaron's rod appeared bearing leaves, blossoms, and fruit at the same time, while the rest were barren. This rod was placed within the most holy place, to perpetuate the remembrance of the miracle, Numb. xvii.

Aaron married Elisheba, the daughter of Amiinadab, of the tribe of Judah (Exod. vi. 23.), by whom he had four sons, Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar. The first two were killed by fire from heaven, for presuming to offer incense with strange fire in their censers, Lev. x. 1, 2. From the other two the race of the high priests was continued in Israel.

Aaron and Moses not sufficiently expressing their confidence in God, when he commanded them to strike the rock at Kadesh, He declared they should not enter the promised land; and soon after, the LORD ordered Aaron to ascend Mount Hor, at the foot of which the Hebrews were encamped, there to be gathered to his fathers. Here he divested himself of his pontifical ornaments in the view of all the people, and put them on Eleazar, his eldest son and successor in the high-priesthood: this done, he died, aged a hundred and twenty-three years, and was buried by Moses and his son Eleazar in a cave of that mountain. Israel mourned thirty days for him, Numb. xx. 22—29.

For further particulars of the life of Aaron, consult Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers to the twentieth chapter and twenty-fourth verse, where we have a relation of his death. The author of Ecclesiasticus enlarges greatly on his character, ch. xiv. ver. 7. The Hebrews fix the day of his death, and the feast observed in relation to it, to the first day of the fifth month, Ab, which answers nearly to July, O. S. supposing the year to begin at Easter. Vide JEWISH CALENDAR, vol. iv. p. 5.

Aaron's sepulchre has continued unknown. We read (Deut. x. 6.), that Aaron died at Mosera; and elsewhere (Numb. xxxiii. 38.), that he died on Mount Hor; Mount Hor being near the encampment at Mosera. Eleazar and Moses concealed the place of his interment from the knowledge of the Israelites; probably fearing lest in after-ages they might pay superstitious worship to him. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. DLXIII.

REMARKS ON THE HISTORY OF AARON.

I. In reviewing the life of Aaron, the first article deserving notice is, the manner of his introduction into the history. He at once appears as a kind of assistant, and so far an inferior, to his brother Moses; yet Aaron had some advantages which seem to have entitled him to prior consideration. He was the elder brother, was an eloquent speaker, and was likewise favoured by Divine inspiration. Why he was not preferred to Moses in respect of authority, we have no cause assigned; and it is not for us now to assign any other cause than the Divine good pleasure.

II. Among the most confirming signs given by God to Moses, no doubt we must reckon the interview with his brother Aaron at Mount Horeb; which being predicted by God, and directly taking place, was very convincing to Moses. (See something similar in the case of Jeremiah, ch. xxxii. 8.) It should seem also, that Aaron would not have undertaken a journey of two months, from Egypt to Mount Sinai (as Dr. Shaw informs us in his Travels), at great hazard and expence, unless he had been well assured of the authority which sent him; neither could he have expected to find Moses where he did find him, unless by Divine direction; since the place, afterwards called the Mount of God, was then undistinguished and unfrequented. Inasmuch, therefore, as Aaron was a sign to Moses, by meeting him there, so Moses was a sign to Aaron. No doubt he informed Moses of the events in Egypt, the death of the former Pharaoh, the oppressed state of the Israelites, &c.

III. It should seem that Aaron was, in Egypt, in circumstances above those of the lower class of people. One from among such as were kept to their daily bondage, could ill have spared time and cost for a journey to Horeb: his family and his task would have missed him too much. May we not then suppose, that although the family of these brothers had no pretension to sovereign authority by descent, yet they were of consideration among the Israelites, either by property, or by office, or by some other way?

It seems altogether probable, that Aaron was a governor over the Israelites, while labouring on the Pyramids of Egypt. Whether he were a chief ruler, or whether subordinate, cannot be determined: perhaps the former: he was certainly under the authority of Pharaoh's officers, yet he might be head of his own people; it being customary in the East, for all societies, trades, &c. to have a head, who is responsible to government. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXXVIII. 1. And more probably, something of this kind was the fact, because we do not read of any intrusion of Aaron into office, or any election by the people, or any charge of assuming undue powers brought against him by Pharaoh; but both Moses and Aaron seem to be acknowledged by Pharaoh himself, and evidently by many of his servants, as persons of great consideration, and as proper agents for transacting business, remonstrating, &c. between the Israelites and the King.

Aaron performed the miracles before Pharaoh (such as that of changing his rod into a serpent), without any (recorded) wonder expressed by Pharaoh how a person, kept to his daily labour, should acquire such skill, such eloquence, &c. If Moses and Aaron had been merely private persons in the estimation of Pharaoh, a prison had punished that intrusion and impertinence.

IV. Aaron was left in charge of Israel, in conjunction with Hur, while Moses was in the Mount receiving the law; and while invested with this character, we find him guilty of a crime, which certainly his authority should have been exerted to prevent. His violation of his duty is not to be palliated; yet, that it might not be so gross as some represent it, vide Art. CALF. But it may be asked, as to Aaron's personal concern in this matter—was his own faith or patience exhausted? If so, and if he also supposed Moses to be dead, then there could be no collusion between them. Would Aaron have dared to have done as he did, had he expected the return of Moses—his immediate return? It is true, he lays the fault on the people; but, if he had received any late information respecting Moses (by Joshua, or otherwise), would he have ventured on what he knew would certainly be punished? The activity of Aaron in building the altar to the calf, renders his subsequent submission to Moses utterly inexplicable, had not a Divine conviction been employed on this occasion: a whole revolting nation obedient to a single returning ruler! Nevertheless, though blameably active, Aaron seems more to have suffered and tolerated the evil, than to have promoted it. The expression is remarkable (Exod. chap. xxxii. 35.): ‘The Lord plagued the people because THEY made the calf, which Aaron made.’

It is to be remarked, that nothing is said of Hur, the coadjutor of Aaron in the government of the people, respecting his interference in this affair; perhaps he thought it not his business; but Aaron should have engaged Hur's (and the elders') authority also, in a decided refusal of the people's request. He seems to have shrunk with unholty timidity from his duty of resistance to the proceedings of the people, fearing their disposition, as “set on mischief,” which he pleads in excuse, Exod. xxxii. 22—24.

V. The quarrel and sedition of Aaron and Miriam against Moses (Numb. xii. 1.), affords another argument against the supposition of collusion between Moses and his brother. Aaron, it is true, assumes at first a high tone, and makes high pretensions to no less gifts than his brother; but afterwards he owns his folly, and, with Miriam, submits. Aaron was not visited with the leprosy, but he could well judge of its reality on his sister: it was his proper office to exclude her from the camp for seven days; and by his expression of ‘flesh half consumed,’ it should seem that this was a very inveterate kind of the disease, and, therefore, the more signal. Aaron's affection, interest, and passion, all concurred to harden him against any thing less than full conviction, in this case, of an interposition from above; as he must have well known it could not be in the personal power of Moses to inflict this disease in so sudden and decided a manner.

For the Priesthood of Aaron, vide PRIEST. Vide also, MOSES, CALF, EGYPT, and the Disquisition on the PYRAMIDS, FRAGMENTS, Nos. DXXI.—DXXIII.

VI. The departure of Aaron for death, has something in it very impressive and singular. In the sight of all the congregation, he quits the camp for the mountain, where he is to die: on the way thither, Moses, his brother, and Eleazar, his son, divest him of his pontifical habits; thither they attend him to the last, there they bury him, and that so privately, that his sepulchre continues unknown. We view, in imagination, this feeble old man ascending the mount, to a convenient height, there transferring the insignia of his office to his son, then proceeding beyond the sight of the people, and giving up the ghost, with that faith, that resignation, that meekness, which became one who had been honoured with the HOLY SPIRIT, and with the typical representation of the great HIGH PRIEST himself.

VII. The general character of Aaron has in it much of the meekness of his brother Moses: he seems an easy, good-natured man, willing to serve his brethren, too easily persuaded against his own judgment, as appears when the people excited him to make the golden calf, and when Miriam urged him to rival his brother; for it should seem to have been principally Miriam's intermeddling, as well from no uncommon characteristic of her sex—dislike to a foreign woman, as from her being named before Aaron—‘Miriam and Aaron spake against Moses’—and from the disease which afflicted her, while Aaron was less punished; probably, because he was less guilty, and because he was punished by sympathy with his sister; as well as on the commonly suggested reason—the importance of his priestly office.

VIII. On the whole, we may add to the express history of Aaron, the following ideas: 1. That he was in authority before the return of Moses to Egypt. 2. That part, at least, of his authority, was overseeing the Israelites at work on Pharaoh's buildings; though it does not appear that he was among the officers beaten (Exod. v. 14.), it not being his turn to be at work. 3. That he greatly assisted in ordering the people at the Exodus, and perhaps was general inspector (or rather treasurer) to the caravan. 4. That he was a good writer, as well as an eloquent speaker. 5. That he had his particular department in the camp; and that his authority extended little or nothing beyond that department. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. 1. 6. That although he received the ear-rings from the people, yet, whether the calf were made by his own hands, or under his express direction, may be doubted, from the order of the relation, which stands thus (Exod. xxxii. 3, 4).— he took the ear-rings, &c. bound them in a bag or bags (or valued and placed them as purses, according to the present Turkish phrase): then he made that a calf by fusion (compare ver. 35. 'THEY made the calf'); then, THEY said, these be thy gods — 'and when Aaron saw it' — (the image of the calf; for it was that to whose face [Heb.] he built an altar; which appears to be the same object which he saw) — now had Aaron made it himself, personally, he must have seen it BEFORE the people saw it. It should seem, therefore, that Aaron had given the gold of which he had the custody, to a workman appointed by the people; that he followed the people throughout this transaction; and, that he endeavoured to guide (perhaps, even to control) their opinion, in varying and appointing to the honour of JEHOVAH what many, at least 'the mixed multitude,' would refer to the honour of the gods they had seen in Egypt. In this view, his expression deserves notice — to-morrow is a solemnity to JEHOVAH ('a feast to the LORD,' Eng. Trans.): not to Apis, or to any other false god, but to JEHOVAH. Such was the sentiment of Aaron, whatever sentiments some of the people might entertain; and his confession to Moses (ver. 24.) may be so taken: 'I cast it,' that is, I gave it to be cast. Certainly, the making of the calf was a work of time: it was not cast in a moment, nor in the midst of the camp, but in a proper work-shop, or other convenient place; and even perhaps was forwarded more rapidly than Aaron knew, or wished. He might use all means of delay, though he sinfully yielded at last to a prevarication, or to a worship of JEHOVAH by an image; an impure medium of worship; which was explicitly forbidden in the second commandment, Exod. xx. 4. St. Augustine says, Aaron demanded the personal ornaments of the women and children, in hopes they would not part with those jewels; and consequently, the calf could not have been made. What means of resistance to the people he might possess, we cannot tell; nor whether the people were so excessively guilty as some have supposed (vide CHERUBIM); perhaps the people satisfied themselves by fancying, that, in referring this image to God, they avoided the sin of idolatry. — Did Aaron imagine the same? not understanding the commandment already given as a prohibition of worshipping God by mediatorial representations, or public symbols of his presence.

IX. When we consider the talents of Aaron, his natural eloquence, and his probable acquirements in knowledge (for certainly he knew much, if not so much as Moses), that GOD often spake to him as well as to Moses, and that Egyptian priests were scribes, as a duty of their profession; is it very unlikely, that he assisted his brother in writing some parts of the books which now bear the name of Moses? or, at least, that he also kept journals of public transactions; that he transcribed, perhaps, the orders of Moses, especially those relating to the priests? If this be admissible, then we account at once for such difference of style as appears in these books, and for such smaller variations in different places, as would naturally arise from two persons recording the same facts; we account for this at once, without, in any degree, lessening the authority, the antiquity, or the real value of these books. It accounts also for the third person being used when speaking of Moses: (perhaps too, for some of the praise and commendation of Moses, which is most remarkable where Aaron is most in fault, vide Numb. xii. 3.) In Deuteronomy, Moses uses the pronouns, I, and me, 'I said,' — 'the LORD said to me,' which are rarely or never used in the former books. The remarks on the CARAVAN, its orders, officers, &c. illustrate much of the history of Aaron. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. 1.

AARONITES, Levites of the family of Aaron; the priests who served the sanctuary. Eleazar, the son of Aaron, was their chief, Numb. iv. 16. Vide LEVITES.

AB. The eleventh month of the civil year of the Hebrews; the fifth of their ecclesiastical year, which began with Nisan: it has thirty days, and nearly answers to the moon of July. On the first day of this month the Jews fast, on account of Aaron's death; and on the ninth, because on this day the temple of Solomon was burnt by the Chaldeans, and the second temple by the Romans. The Jews also believe, that on this day the spies returning to the camp, engaged the people in rebellion. They fast likewise on this day, in memory of the Edict published by Adrian, wherein they were forbidden to continue in Judea, or even to look back from a distance on Jerusalem, with intent to lament its ruin. On the eighteenth they fast, because the lamp in the sanctuary was that night extinguished in the time of Ahaz. Vide JEWISH CALENDAR, vol. iv. p. 5.

ABADDON, אַבְדֹן, the Destroyer: from אָבַד abad, to destroy.

ABADDON, the king and head of the Apocalyptic locusts, under the fifth trumpet, Rev. ix. 11. 'There came out of the smoke locusts upon the earth; — and they had a king over them, which is the angel of the bottomless pit, whose name in the Hebrew tongue is Abaddon, but in the Greek tongue he hath his name Apollyon.' Vide APOLLYON, and FRAGMENTS, No. XLIV.

ABAGARUS, or AGHARUS, king of Edessa. (Although this prince be not strictly entitled to a place here, because his name does not occur in the Bible, yet as there is something curious in the story, and as it is, at least, one of the reports current in early ages concerning our LORD, we shall insert it. There were anciently many such histories some of which, though justly held apocryphal, yet might have some foundation in truth; and when they do not offend against the analogy of faith, or the rules of good morals, they may be viewed with the sensation of simple curiosity only. To build any argument upon them, would be highly pernicious; as, on the other hand, to avoid altogether an acquaintance with them, seems to be unnecessarily scrupulous, as well as incurious.)

This king, it is said, being afflicted with a grievous disease, for which he could find no remedy, was informed of the miraculous cures performed by JESUS CHRIST in Judea: hereupon he sent to him a messenger, named Ananias, with a letter, conceived in these terms:

"Abagarus, king of Edessa, to JESUS, the merciful Saviour of mankind, who has appeared clothed with human flesh, in the country of Jerusalem, wishes health. I have been made acquainted with the prodigies and cures wrought by you, without the use of herbs or medicines, and by the efficacy only of your words. I am told that you make cripples and the maimed to walk: that you force devils from the bodies of the possessed; that there is no disease, however incurable it may seem to be, which you do not heal; and that you restore the dead to life. These wonders persuade me, that you are some God descended from heaven, or that you are the Son of God: for this reason, I have taken the liberty to write this letter to you, beseeching you to come and see me, and cure me of the indisposition under which I have so long laboured. I understand that the Jews persecute you, murmur at your miracles, and seek your destruction. I have here a beautiful and agreeable city, which, though it be not very large, will be sufficient to supply you with every thing that shall be necessary."

To which letter, it is said, JESUS CHRIST returned an answer in these terms:

"You are very happy, Abagarus, thus to have believed in me without having seen me: for it is written of me, that they who shall see me will not believe in me, and that they who have never seen me shall believe and be saved. As to the desire you express of receiving a visit from me, I must tell you, that all things for which I am come must be fulfilled in the country where I am; when this is done, I must return to him who sent me. And when I am departed hence, I will send one of my disciples to you, who shall cure you of the disease which you complain of, and give life to you and those that are with you."

Eusebius says (Hist. Eccl. lib. i. cap. 13.), he took these letters out of the records of Edessa; and adds, that Thomas, after the resurrection of our Saviour, sent Thaddæus, one of the seventy disciples, to preach JESUS CHRIST in that city, and to heal king Abagarus of his malady.

D'Herbelot (Bibl. Orient. article ABAR) says, the city of Edessa, where Abagarus reigned, goes generally by the name of Orfa; and that it is a tradition among the eastern people, both Christians and Mahometans, that this prince wrote a letter to our Saviour, and received an answer from him together with a handkerchief having the impression of our LORD'S face upon it.

Many difficulties are alleged to destroy Eusebius' story, and they are without doubt very solid; but though they oblige us to reject both the history and the letters, yet, perhaps, there may be some truth at the bottom of this relation. To me, says CALMET, it seems out of all dispute, that a certain king of Edessa was converted in the earliest years of Christianity by one of the seventy disciples, and that after his example the whole city embraced the faith. As to other circumstances, people, if they please, may consider them as merely embellishments, and as popular traditions.

It is related that Abagarus king of Edessa, who had contributed to the defeat of Crassus, was obliged to submit by Augustus, who deprived him of the title of king, and left him only that of Topharch, or governor, and carried him to Rome, to secure his fidelity. Abagarus, weary of abiding in that city, bethought himself of a stratagem, which might induce Augustus to suffer his return to Edessa. When hunting, he caught several wild animals alive, and having directed some of the earth to be taken from the holes where each had been used to inhabit, he caused each parcel to be spread separately in different places of the amphitheatre. On letting loose these animals, each went immediately towards the earth belonging to his own den. The emperor easily understood Abagarus' meaning, and sent him back to his little kingdom. Procopius, de Bello Persico, 2 cl. 12. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. DCI.

ABAGTHA, אבגתה 'Aḇayaṭhā. In Hebrew, it may signify, father of the press, or the press of the father; from אב ab, a father, and גת gath, a press: it is more probably a Persian word, and if so, of unknown import.

ABAGTHA, an officer of king Ahasuerus Esth. i. 10.

ABANA, אבנא, stony, or a building; from אבן aben, a stone, or from בנה bana, he built. (The rocky river; or river from the rock. Some think Abana is a variation of Amana, which they take for a part of Lebanon, whence this stream descended: 'Come with me from Lebanon—look from the top of Amana, from the top of Shenir and Hermon.' Cant. iv. 8. Eng. Trans. In this case Abana would be congenial to Lebanon, or Libanus. Vide AMANA, I. It was called Chrysorroas by the Greeks. Vide ABELA.

The Aruch, in Kirmion, says, Kirmion is a river in the way to Damascus, and is the same with Amna, or Amana: Pigah is Pharpar. The Talmudists say, in Parah (cap. viii. hal. 10.), that "the waters of Kirmion and Pigah are not fit (to sprinkle the unclean), because they are muddy waters."—meaning, probably, that by running through a chalky soil, or over chalky rocks, they are sullied by the particles they carry with them. The river Amana is mentioned in the Targum on Cant. iv. 8. "They that dwell on the river Amana shall offer thee a gift." Vide ABILENE.)

Naaman, the leper, on being directed to wash in the river Jordan, says (2 Kings v. 12.), 'Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?' Probably this river is a branch of the Barrady, or Chrysorrhoas, which derives its source from the foot of mount Libanus, eastward; runs round Damascus, and through it, and continues its course till lost in the wilderness, four or five leagues south from that city. Vide Maundrell's Journey to Jerusalem.

ABARIM, עבריים, passages, or passengers, from עבר abar, or avar, to pass: or the passes. (These mountains might take their name either from the passengers which crossed them, in their way from Damascus, southward: or from a passage over the Jordan being hereabouts; or they may imply, simply, "the OVER (Jordan) mountains.")

ABARIM, mountains extending far into the tribe of Reuben and the country of Moab, on both sides of the Arnon. They were composed of many little hills, under different names. It is impossible to define exactly their extent: Eusebius and Jerome speak of them in several places. Eusebius fixes them at six miles west of Heshbon, and seven east of Livias. The mountains Nebo, Pisgah, and Peor, were parts of the Abarim.

ABARON, the surname of Eleazar, fourth son of Judas Maccabæus. Josephus calls him Auran, or Avran, and 1 Macc. vi. 43. calls him Sauran. He obtained great renown by his death, being crushed under an elephant, which he slew by piercing him with his sword. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 9.

ABBA, אבא, father. This is a Syriac word; the Hebrew is אב ab, father.

ABBA: St. Paul says, 'Ye have received the Spirit of Adoption, whereby we cry Abba, Father,' Rom. viii. 15. It deserves notice, that the title Abba was not allowed to be used by slaves, when addressing the head of the family; nor the corresponding title Imma, mother, when addressing the mistress; which adds great force to the Apostle's expression. Jesus, praying in the garden, says, 'Abba, Father, all things are possible unto thee,' Mark xiv. 36. It also deserves notice, that both St. Paul and the Evangelist Mark, writing to foreigners, and in a foreign language, have translated these terms from the Syriac, their natural language, in which they were used. The Hebrew אב ab, a father, is derived from a root which signifies acquiescence, or satisfaction, a natural parental emotion. Isaiah seems to use this title in its utmost simplicity (chap. viii. 4.): 'Before the child shall know to cry ab, and am,' ('my father, and my mother,' Eng. Trans.) as if imitating the lisping accents of infancy: the Pa and Ma of our own days.

ABDA, עבדא, (Aubda, or Obda) servant, or servitude; from עבד abad, or avad; or obed, a servant.

ABDA, father of Adoniram, one of Solomon's officers, 1 Kings iv. 6.

ABDI, עבדי, (Aubdi, or Obdi) he is my servant; from עבד obed, a servant, and the pronoun I, my.

ABDI, son of Malluch, a Merarite, 1 Chron. vi. 44.

ABDIEL, עבראל, (Aubdial, or Obdial) servant of God; otherwise, cloud of the abundance of God, from עב ab, a cloud; די di, sufficiency; and אל el, God.

I. ABDIEL, son of Guni, of the tribe of Gad, 1 Chron. v. 15.

II. ABDIEL, father of Shelemiah; spelt Abdeel in Jer. xxxvi. 26.

ABDON, עבדון, (Aubdon, or Obdoo) servant, or cloud, of judgment; from עבד obed, a servant, or עב ab, a cloud, and דון dun, judgment.

I. ABDON, son of Hillel, of the tribe of Ephraim; tenth Judge of Israel. He succeeded Elon. He judged Israel eight years, and was buried at Pirathon, in the land of Ephraim. He left forty sons and thirty grandsons, Judg. xii. 13. 15. He died A. M. 2848, ante A. D. 1156.

II. ABDON, of Benjamin, son of Jehiel, and Maachah, 1 Chron. ix. 36.

III. ABDON, son of Micah, sent by King Josiah to Huldah the prophetess, to ask her opinion concerning the book of the law, lately found in the temple, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 20. Some think him to be the same as Achbor, son of Micah, 2 Kings xxii. 12.

IV. ABDON, a city of Asher, given to the Levites of Gershon's family, Josh. xxi. 30: 1 Chron. vi. 74.

ABEDNEGO, עבד נגור (Aubednegoo, or Obednegoo), servant of light; from עבד obed, a servant, and נגור nagor, to shine, to be bright; otherwise, servant of Nego, which is thought to have been a deity of the Babylonians, perhaps the sun, or the morning star.

ABEDNEGO, a Chaldee name given by the king of Babylon's officer to Azariah, one of Daniel's companions, Dan. i. 7. Abednego was thrown into the fiery furnace at Babylon, with Shadrach and Meshach, for refusing to adore the statue erected by command of Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. iii. (Daniel was perhaps at that time absent from Babylon, or probably in no public employment (vide DANIEL), for no mention is made of him.) The condemnation of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, redounded to the Divine glory; for God did not suffer them to be injured by the flames, but sent his angel to protect them. Some have supposed this Azariah to be Ezra.

ABEL, אָבֶל, or Hebel: spelt in Hebrew with הָ. H. Breath, vapour, vanity.

I. ABEL, the second son of Adam and Eve, born in the second year of the world. Some have thought that Abel and Cain were twins; others, that Abel was the younger brother; born fifteen years after Cain; others say, thirty years after him.

Cain and Abel having been instructed by their father Adam, in the duty of worship to their Creator, each offered the first fruits of his labours. Cain, as a husbandman, offered the fruits of the field; Abel, as a shepherd, offered fatlings of his flock. God was pleased to accept the offering of Abel, in preference to that of Cain. What marks of preference God gave to Abel is not known, whether by fire from heaven, which consumed his offering, or by any other means; but we know, that Cain, regretting this distinction, sank into melancholy, and giving himself up to envy, formed the design of killing Abel: and at length having invited Abel to go with him into the field, he there murdered him, Gen. iv. 8, 9. (It should be remarked, that in our translation no mention is made of Cain inviting his brother into the field: 'Cain talked with Abel his brother: and it came to pass when they were in the field, that Cain rose up against Abel his brother, and slew him.' Eng. Trans. But in the Samaritan text, the words are express, and in some Hebrew copies is a kind of chiasm, thus—"and Cain said unto Abel his brother,"—"and it came to pass, &c." without inserting what he said to his brother.)

Thus at once died Abel, and all the posterity which he might have begotten: a murder surely of the most atrocious nature! including a great person, and part of the then human race. Some have explained what is said of Abel's blood crying unto God from the ground, as meant of his offspring: others suppose he died before he was married: and hence, under the emperors, Arcadius and Honorius, certain heretics arose in Africa, who condemned marriage, and called themselves Abelites, or Abelonites, from Abel; not that they thought the married state in itself sinful; but they condemned the use of wedlock, and abstained from commerce with their wives, saying they would not bring creatures into the world polluted with original sin. That their sect might not perish, they adopted the sons and daughters of their neighbours. This sect was not of long continuance.

St. Paul, speaking in commendation of Abel tells us (Heb. xi. 4.), 'that by faith he offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain; by which he obtained witness, that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts; and by it he being dead yet speaketh,' even after his death: but, comparing the voice of Abel's blood to that of Christ, he observes how much better the latter is than the former. Our Saviour places Abel at the head of those saints who had been persecuted for righteousness sake, and distinguishes him by the title 'righteous.' 'That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel, unto the blood of Zacharias, the son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar,' Matt. xxiii. 35. (Certainly, he may be properly reckoned the first martyr to truth and piety; but this will not justify the invocation of him in worship, or the recommendation to him of souls deceased, as in the church of Rome: in fact, the worship of him does not appear to be of any great antiquity; and his name is not in any of the martyrologies of the Latins before the tenth century.) Some calendars commemorate him on March 25, the day of our Saviour's death, as many have fixed it; others, January 2; others, July 30. It is said he is honoured among the Ethiopians, December 28.

ABEL, אָבֶל, spelt in Hebrew with א. A. mourning, or grief; but a valley, or plain, according to Pagninus.

(If this name signifies rather, "a waste, unproductive, piece of land," as we suppose, it appears most likely to have been compounded in that acceptance into the names of places. Michaëlis supposes it may be, occasionally, a play of words on Aben a stone; as 1 Samuel, vi. 18. Aben, or Abel, "the stone," or "the stone of weeping:" but there is in the original no mention of a "stone."

The Arabic root implies, watery, which is not unlike the Hebrew, grief; hence Simon thinks the Abels were moist or humid situations; or running streams. We shall, however, find reason to dismiss this idea. Vide ABILA.)

II. ABEL, אבִּילָא, Hoba, or Hoba. Abel-beth-maacah, or Abel-maim, a city in the tribe of Manasseh, N. W. of Damascus, between Libanus and Antilibanus: the same with Abila, under the government of Lysanias, Luke iii. 1. Joab besieged it during the revolt of Sheba, 2 Sam. xx. 14, 15. Eusebius places this town between Paneas and Damascus, (therefore, rather S. W. of Damascus.) Antoninus, in his Itinerary, fixes it between Damascus and Heliopolis. Josephus and others call it sometimes Abila in Libanus. We are not to be surprised at finding the same place described under different names; many examples of that nature will be noticed in the course of this work.

ABELA, אַבְלָה, mourning, or THE mourning. (Perhaps, 'the town on the WASTE,' or wild heath.)

ABELA, a city in Persæa, or Batanæa, the land of Bashan, beyond Jordan, in the half tribe of Manasseh, twelve miles from Gadara, east. Eusebius and Jerom observe, that it was remarkable for its good wines, 2 Sam. xx. 14.

ABEL BETH MAACHAH, אַבְל בֵּית מַעֲכָה, Abel near the house (or temple) of Maachah, 1 Kings xv. 20; 2 Kings xv. 29. Vide ABEL.

ABEL CARMAIM, or Abel of the vineyards, אַבְל כַּרְמַיִם, in our translation, the plain of the vineyards (Judg. xi. 33.), was, according to Eusebius, six miles from Philadelphia, otherwise Rabbath, capital of the Ammonites. It is probably the same with Abela, between Jabez and Gadara, near Pella. Eusebius mentions an Arbela, subject to Pella. (This town being evidently named from the abundance of vines in its neighbourhood, and the vine not requiring streams, but delighting in a poor soil, encourages the idea of waste as being the proper acceptation of Abel, rather than streams.)

ABEL the Great, a large stone, in a field belonging to Joshua, a Bethshemite, on which the ark was placed, when sent back by the Philistines, 1 Sam. vi. 18, 19. A. M. 2888, ante A. D. 1116. It was called by this name, which signifies great mourning, probably, on account of the number of Bethshemites smitten on that occasion. Vide ABILA, and BETHSHEMESH.

ABEL-MAIM, אַבְל-מַיִם, Ἀβελμαΐμ, mourning of the waters; or, valley of waters. (Perhaps the low waters, or ABEL at the waters. Rather, 'the waste at the waters:' or 'the waste about the waters:' or streaming waters.)

ABEL-MAIM, a city (2 Chron. xvi. 4.), called Abel-beth-maachah in 1 Kings xv. 20. In Judith iv. 4. it seems to be called Bel-men, or, "Baal in the character of Men," the lunar deity; but in chap. vii. 3. some copies read Belmain, probably, for Abel-maim. Eusebius (Onom.) reads Beel-Meon, which seems to favour the former interpretation. Vide ABEL.

ABEL-MEHOLAH, אַבְל-מְחֹלָה, Ἀβελμολά, mourning of weakness or of sickness; from חֹלָה, chalah, to be weak, or sick; otherwise, mourning of the chorus of singers or dancers, from מְחֹלָה, machool: or of the pipe or flute, from חֲלִיל, chelil, a pipe, or flute. (Rather 'the tiresome waste;' or, 'the waste causing debility,' or sickness. This seems more probable than associating the dance, or music, with the idea of grief. But some, taking the word Abel in the sense of streams, would render, 'stream of the dance,' i. e. a stream by whose side dances were performed.)

ABEL-MEHOLAH, or ABEL-MEA, was Elisha's country, 1 Kings xix. 16. It could not be far from Scythopolis, chap. iv. 12. Eusebius places it in the great plain, sixteen miles from Scythopolis, south. Not far from thence, Gideon obtained a victory over the Midianites, Judg. vii. 22.

ABEL-MIZRAIM, אַבְל מִצְרַיִם, the mourning of the Egyptians, previously called the floor of Atad, Gen. i. 11. Jerom, and others, believe this to be the place afterwards called Bethagla, at some distance from Jericho west.

ABEL-SHITTIM, אַבְל-שִׁטִּים, Ἀβελσιτῖμ, mourning of the thorns: otherwise, prevarications: from שָׁטָה shatah, to decline. (Perhaps, 'the waste of the Shittim trees;' i. e. in which a number of those trees grew. This cannot mean, as we have seen suggested on other Abels, the stream of Shittim trees; because this tree is a native of the driest deserts, where streams do not flow: and this remark has its influence on the general import of the name Abel. Nevertheless, it might be named 'the mourning at the Shittim trees,' by reason of the idolatry, and slaughter of the Israelites, near this place: which mourning would be performed on a void plat of ground.)

ABEL-SHITTIM was in the plains of Moab, beyond Jordan, opposite Jericho. Josephus says (Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 7. § 1; de Bello, lib. v. cap. 3.), Abel-Shittim, or Abela, as he calls it, was sixty furlongs from Jordan. Eusebius (in Στρατών) says, it was in the neighbourhood of mount Peor. Moses encamped at Abel-Shittim before the Israelites passed the Jordan, under Joshua, Numb. xxv. 1; xxxiii. 49. Here, seduced by Balak, they fell into idolatry, and worshipped Baal Peor; on account of which God severely punished them by the hands of the Levites, chap. xxv. It is often called Shittim only.

ABEN-BOHAN, אֲבֶן-בֹּהָן, Ἀθός Βοάν: the stone of strength. A boundary stone between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin eastward, in the valley leading to Adummim (Josh. xviii. 17.), named from Bohan, descendant of Reuben: it might be rendered, 'the stone of Boan-ben-Reuben.'

ABEZ, אֲבֵץ, Ἀεβίς, an egg, from בֵּץ bitj; otherwise muddy, from בָּץ botj; otherwise, bys-sus, cotton, from בִּץ butj; which, in the Chaldee and Syriac, signifies tiresome labour; cotton being mostly wrought by night.

(Perhaps this should be divided; Ab, father, betj, soft mud, or mire; "the father of mire," referring to the period after the deluge, when the whole surface of the earth was covered with muck. (Vide ARARAT.) If under the idea of an egg it referred to the old principle omnia ex ovo, it would commemorate the same period. This is supposing that it was a temple, or other sanctuary, and had its emblematical image.)

ABEZ, a city of Issachar, Josh. xix. 20.

ABIHOR, To, signifies (1.) to loathe or detest, Deut. xxxii. 19. (2.) to despise, or neglect, Psalm xxii. 24. (3.) to reject, or cast off, Psalm lxxxix. 38.

ABI אבִי, my father; from אב, ab, a father, and the pronoun ׀ my, or mine.

ABI, mother of Hezekiah, king of Judah, (2 Kings xviii. 2.); called Abijah, 2 Chron. xxix. 1. Vide ABIJAH, III.

ABIAH אבִיָּה, father of the Lord, or the Lord is my father; from אב, ab, a father, and יָה, Jah, the Lord: or, from אָבִיָּה, abah, or abeh, will; the Lord is my will, or the will of the Lord.

I. ABIAH, the same as Abi, 2 Chron. xxix. 1.

II. ABIAH, second son of Samuel, entrusted with the administration of justice, behaved ill, and induced the people to require a king, 1 Sam. viii. A. M. 2909, ante A. D. 1095.

ABI-AL, אבִי־אֵל, God my father, or my God the father; from אבִי abi, my father, and אֵל, el, God. Vide ABIALBON.

ABI-AL, son of Zeror, (1 Sam. ix. 1.) called Abialbon, 2 Sam. xxiii. 31.

ABI-ALBON, אבִי־עֵלְבֹן, most intelligent father; from אב, ab, a father, the preposition עַל al, over, and בֵּן ben, intelligent: or, father over the building; from בָּנָה banah, to build.

ABI-ALBON, a gallant man in David's army (2 Sam. xxiii. 31.) called Abi-al, 1 Chron. vi. 32.

ABIASAPH, אבִי־אַסַּף, a gathering father; or my father gathers; from אבִי abi, my father, and אַסַּף asaph, to gather.

I. ABIASAPH, son of Korah, Exod. vi. 26; spelt Ebiasaph, 1 Chron. vi. 37; ix. 19.

II. ABIASAPH, son of Elkanah, one of the Levites set over the singing, 1 Chron. vi. 23.

ABIATHAR, אבִי־יָתֵר, excellent father; from אב, ab, a father, and יָתֵר, yether, to excel, be excellent: or father of him that survived, from יָתֵר, yeter, to remain or survive.

I. ABIATHAR, son of Ahimelech; the tenth high-priest of the Jews, 2 Sam. viii. 17; 1 Chron. xviii. 16. When Saul sent his emissaries to Nob, to destroy all the priests there, Abiathar, who was young, fled to David in the wilderness (1 Sam. xxii. 11. et seq.), with whom he continued in the quality of high-priest; while Saul, from aversion to Ahimelech his father, who, as he thought, had betrayed his interests, transferred the dignity of high-priest from Ithamar's family, into that of Elcazar, by conferring this office on Zadok. Thus there were, at one time, two high-priests in Israel; Abiathar with David, and Zadok with Saul. This continued from the death of Ahimelech, till the reign of Solomon; when Ahimelech, following Adonijah, was deprived by Solomon of his priesthood (1 Kings ii. 27. A. M. 2990), and the race of Zadok alone exercised this ministry during the reign of Solomon, excluding the family of Ithamar, according to the prediction made to Eli; the high-priest, 1 Sam. iii. 11, &c.

II. ABIATHAR. This name is sometimes given to Ahimelech, the father of ABIATHAR, in the preceding article. Mark ii. 26. (So says CALMET; but the probability is, that the expression in the Evangelist is merely one of the short modes of quotation used by the Rabbins; and is equivalent to 'in Abiathar,' 'in the history of Abiathar'; or, in that section of the history in which Abiathar is the principal person. This mode of quotation was requisite, as chapters and verses were not then in use. Vide ABIMELECH.)

ABIB, אֲבִיב, green fruit, or ears of corn.

ABIB, the name given by the Hebrews to the first month of their ecclesiastical year; afterwards called Nisan. It answered nearly to our March, O. S. but not altogether. So say the Rabbins, and after them our commentators and critics: but it will be found to synchronise better with April. Vide Economical Calendar of Palestine, FRAGMENTS, CCCCLIV. et al. Abib signifies green ears of corn, or fresh fruits, according to Jerom's translation (Exod. xiii. 4.) and to the LXX. It was so named, because corn, particularly barley, was in ear at that time.

It was an early custom to name times, such as months, from observation of nature; and the custom is still in use among unlettered nations: thus the Hurons, and other American nations, give the name Worm-Month to our March, because then the reptiles begin to shew themselves: April they call plant-moon; and May, swallow-moon. The same was a custom of our Saxon ancestors; and, perhaps, the same idea gave names to the signs of the Zodiac, which certainly are very ancient. See MONTH, and JEWISH CALENDAR, p. 3.

ABIDA, אבִידָע, father of knowledge, or knowledge of the father; from יָדַע jadah, to know, and אב, ab, a father.

ABIDA, son of Midian, son of Abraham, Gen. xxv. 4.

ABIDAN, אבִידָן, Ἀμίδαν, father of judgment, or my father is judge; from דָּן dun, to judge, and אב, ab, father.

ABIDAN, son of Gideoni, of Benjamin, (Numb. i. 11.), prince of his tribe, when the Tabernacle was built. His offering was similar to that of other chiefs of the tribes, Numb. vii. 60.

ABIEL (or Jehiel), father of Kish and Ner; and grandfather of Saul, the first king of Israel, 1 Sam. ix. 1. For the etymology, see ABIAL.

ABIEZER, אבִי־עֶזֶר, father of help, or help of the father, or my father is my help; from אב, ab, a father, and עָזַר ezar, to help or assist.

I. ABIEZER, son of Manasseh, Josh. xvii. 2.

II. ABIEZER, of Anathoth, of Benjamin, one of the thirty gallant men of David's army. 2 Sam. xxiii. 27; 1 Chron. xi. 28. There is also another mentioned, Judges vi. 34.

ABI-GABAON, אבִי־גִבְעֹן, Πατρις Γαβαών, father of the hill; from אב, ab, a father, and גִּבְעוֹהַ gibboah, a hill: otherwise, father of the cup, or chalice; from גָּבַע gabah, a cup: otherwise, father of Gibeon, i. e. the first of the Israelites who inhabited Gibeon.

ABI-GABAON, otherwise called Ner, father of Abdon and Kish, ancestor of King Saul, and husband of Maachah, 1 Chron. viii. 29.

ABIGAIL, אֲבִיגַיִל: joy of the father; from אֲבִי ab, a father, and גַּיִל gil, or גִּל gil, to rejoice.

I. ABIGAIL, was, first, the wife of Nabal of Carmel, and after his death, of David. Hearing of the ingratitude of Nabal to David, (for the history, vide NABAL, or 1 Sam. xxv. 15, &c.) she hastened to repair his fault: she loaded several asses with provisions, and, attended by some of her domestics, went to meet David. Her presents, and her discreet conversation, so won upon the king, that he conceived a great esteem for her, accepted her presents, and returned peaceably. Nabal died ten days after. When this was known to David, he sent to demand Abigail for his wife; and when the days of mourning for her husband were over, she went to David's camp, and was married to him. The issue of this marriage was two sons, Chileab and Daniel (1 Sam. iii. 3. and 1 Chron. iii. 1.): but it may be, that Chileab and Daniel are but one and the same person; for 2 Sam. which speaks of Chileab, says nothing of Daniel; and 1 Chron. which mentions Daniel, says nothing of Chileab. Daniel signifies a mighty judge; and Chileab, an imprisoner: so that very possibly, the idea of these names is the same; especially, if one were a popular name given for some particular reason, or on some particular occasion.

II. ABIGAIL, sister of David, wife of Jether, or Ithra, and mother of Amasa, 1 Chron. ii. 17.

ABIHAIL, אֲבִיהַיִל, Ἀβιχαΐαλ, or ABICHAIL, father of strength; from אֲבִי ab, a father, and הַיִל hail or chail, which signifies valour, riches, defence, army, fortifications: or father of trouble, from הִיל hil or chil.

I. ABIHAIL, son of Huri and father of Michael, Meshullam, &c. 1 Chron. v. 13, 14.

II. ABIHAIL, father of Zuriel, of the family of Merari, Numb. iii. 35.

III. ABIHAIL, father of queen Esther, and brother of Mordecai, Esth. ii. 15.

IV. ABIHAIL, daughter of Eliab, David's brother, and wife of Rehoboam, king of Judah, 2 Chron. xi. 18.

ABIHU, אֲבִיהוּ, he is my father, or his father; from אֲבִי ab, a father, and the pronoun הוּ hu: otherwise, father of the Lord, abridged from אֲבִיהוּוָה ab-Jehovah.

ABIHU, son of Aaron the high-priest, was consumed, with his brother Nadab, by fire from God. Some believe that this fire came from the altar of burnt-offerings; others, that it proceeded from the altar of perfumes; because they offered incense with strange fire, instead of taking it from the altar of burnt-offerings. Lev. x. 1, 2.

This occurred within eight days after the consecration of Aaron and his sons, and the dedication of the Tabernacle. Many commentators, as the Rabbins, Lyran, Cajetan, et al. are of opinion, that Nadab and Abihu being overcome by wine, neglected to take the sacred fire in their censers. This conjecture is founded on the command of God delivered immediately afterwards to the priests, forbidding them the use of wine all the time they were employed in the temple service. If it were perverseness, it was a heinous crime, especially under their recent consecration.

ABIJAH, אֲבִיהָ, the Lord is my father; from אֲבִי ab, a father, and יָהּ jah, the Lord.

I. ABIJAH, son of Jeroboam, who was the first king of the ten tribes of Israel. This young prince being seized with a very dangerous disease, his mother disguised herself, to inquire of the prophet Ahijah, whether he might recover? Ahijah answered, 'he would die; and he would be the only person of his family who should receive funeral honours, and be lamented by Israel; whereas all other descendants from Jeroboam should be either eaten by dogs, or devoured by birds, as a punishment of his impiety and ingratitude,' 1 Kings xiv. 1—18.

II. ABIJAH, king of Judah, successor to Rehoboam: (he is called ABIJAM, 1 Kings xv. 1. where his mother is described as Maachah, daughter of Abishalom; but, 2 Chron. xiii. 1. he is called ABIJAH, and his mother is described as daughter of Uriel, of Gibeah.) Abijah succeeded his father, A. M. 3046, ante A. D. 958. He reigned three years, and followed the impiety of his father, 1 Kings xv. 2, 3. See FRAGMENTS, No. XVI.

Abijah, king of Judah, and Jeroboam the first king of Israel, being at war, the former having assembled an army of 400,000 men of Judah and Benjamin, encamped on mount Zemaraim, on which Samaria afterwards was built. Jeroboam marched against him with 800,000 men, collected out of all his dominions, 2 Chron. xiii. (Many MSS. and printed Bibles, read only forty and eighty thousand, instead of 400 and 800 thousand men, as in our translation: but the Heb. LXX. Josephus, the best Latin Bibles, both MS. and printed, agree in this place with the larger number. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXXVI.) Abijah harangued the enemy's army, in hopes of reviving their loyalty to the house of David, and to the worship of the Lord: while he was speaking, Jeroboam ordered part of his troops to file off behind the mountains, without Abijah's perceiving it, designing to inclose his army, which was much inferior in numbers. Abijah and his people discovering this, began to cry to the Lord for assistance. The priests sounded the holy trumpets; God struck the hearts of the Israelites with terror; and the army of Judah attacked them with so much fury, that they killed 500,000 men. Abijah pursuing his victory, took several cities; and the Israelites were humbled under the hand of Judah. The Rabbins reproach Abijah with neglecting to destroy the profane altar which Jeroboam had erected at Bethel; and with not suppressing the worship of the golden calves there.

III. ABIJAH, wife of Ahaz, and mother of Hezekiah, king of Judah (2 Chron. xxix. 1.); called ABI, 2 Kings xviii. 2. Some have thought she was daughter of Zechariah, who was killed by command of Joash, between the temple and the altar, 2 Chron. xxiv. 21.

IV. ABIJAH, a descendant of Eleazar, son of Aaron, was chief of one of the twenty-four companies of priests which David distributed into classes, 1 Chron. xxiv. 10. Zechariah the father of John the Baptist, was of the course of Abia, or Abijah, which was the eighth of the twenty-four, Luke i. 5.

V. ABIJAH, king of the Parthians, who made war against Izates, king of the Adiabeniens, at the solicitation of his grandees, who were in arms against him, because he had embraced the Jewish religion. Abijah was routed, and compelled to shut himself up in a castle, where, in despair, he killed himself, to prevent falling into the enemy's hands. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 2.

ABIJAM, אֲבִיָּא, Ἀβιάμ: father of the sea; from יָם jam, the sea; and אָב, ab, a father. Vide ABIJAH, II.

(ABILA, or ABELA, capital of Abilene. It should appear that there were more than one town of this name in Syria: each of which was called by the Greeks Leucas, WHITE.)

I. The ABILA of Lysanias (Luke iii. 1.), situated in a valley, adjacent to the river Chrysorrhoas, the channel of which river was extremely rocky (Vide Maundrell); and if these rocks were whitish in colour, as those of Lebanon are, they would furnish the Greeks with a cause for bestowing the name of Leucadia (White-rock town) on ABILA. (Vide ABANA). This name also would suit other places, of whose situation whiteness was descriptive. Most of the rocks in Judea are of a kind of grey-white colour: as are many near Jerusalem.

II. ABILA of Coelo Syria, was in the mountains of Gilead.

III. ABILA, in Hebrew, Abel Satim, was near Mount Phogor, according to Jerom.

IV. ABILA, Abel Carmaim, and,

V. ABILA, Abel Meholah, were probably on mountains also; and, very probably, some part of the surface adjacent to them was characterised by whiteness. Vide ABEL-CARMAIM, and ABEL-MEHO-LAH.

Possibly Abel, Abila, imports 'the wild, or waste, of places to lodge at;' 'the wild containing settlements,' or, 'the settled wild,' as distinct from that inhabited by the roving Arabs who dwelt in tents, and were not settled.

But, certainly this district of country called Abilene was named from a town called Abel or Abileh. In the Explanation of the Plates, the reader will find some account of those evidences which induce us to place the Abilene of Lysanias on the Chrysorrhoas, which issued from Mount Hermon, or part of Lebanon, and from thence ran to Damascus; in its course passing by the city Abila or Leucas, and in consequence marking the district called Abilene.

We may observe on this subject, that the name Abila signified a mountain in the Punic (Phoenician) language; and a rock, as some think, in the Hebrew. In the description which remains of the sea coasts, by Avienus, we read,

ABILA vocant
Gens Punicorum, mons quod altus Barbaro est,
Id est, Latuno.

That the word Abel in Hebrew, signifies a rock, is inferred from 1 Sam. vi. 18. where we read literally, 'they set down the Ark on great Abel,' LXX. λίθος μέγας 'great stone,' and our translation inserts 'the stone of Abel.' Strabo also, speaking of the city Leucadia in Acarnania, says it was so called because of a great white rock in its neighbourhood. The same distinction would influence the Greeks in giving the name Leucadia to the Abila of Lysanias.

The reader will observe that this interpretation of Abel is not inconsistent with that already proposed. We may understand the passage in Samuel, as implying, that the Ark was placed on a spare piece of ground, on a rising UNPRODUCTIVE (i. e. waste) of corn. To this agree the circumstances of the story: The men of Bethshe-mesh were reaping in the corn fields, they therefore took the Ark aside to a place not occupied by growing corn, but where the surface was bare, i. e. a rock: and this height, thus sanctified by the reception of the Ark, was easily distinguished by future generations, because it formed no part of the cultivated land. See the Plates, Medals of ABILENE, with their Explanation.)

ABILENE, Ἀβιλήνη, the father of the apartment, from אָב, a father, and לֵין, to lodge: or of murmuring, from לוּן, to murmur. It is thought this word comes from Abela, mourning or weeping.

ABILENE, a small province in Coelo-Syria, between Libanus and Anti-libanus, whereof Lysanias was some time tetrarch, (Luke iii. 1.) Abela or Abila, the capital of ABILENE, was north of Damascus and Paneas, and south of Heliopolis.

ABIMAE, אֲבִימָאֵל, Ἀβιμαήλ: a futher sent from God, or my father comes from God; from אב ab, a father, the preposition מן men, from, and אל el, God.

ABIMEAEL, son of Joktan, according to some, dwelt in Arabia: according to others, in Armenia, and the neighbouring countries. It is certain that many tribes in Arabia at present derive their descent from Joktan.

ABIMELECH, אבי-מלך, father of the king; from אב ab, a father, and מלך melech, king; otherwise, my father the king, taking י jod to be the affix of the first person.

I. ABIMELECH, king of Gerar, having taken Sarah from Abraham, with design to make her his wife, God, in a dream, threatened him with death, unless he restored her to her husband. Abimelech pleaded ignorance, saying, he took her as the sister, not as the wife of Abraham. Early the next day, therefore, he sent her back, and complained of the deception. Abraham acknowledged her as his wife, but as his sister also, being of the same father, by another mother. Abimelech made him presents, and gave to Sarah, through her pretended brother Abraham, a thousand pieces of silver, directing her to purchase a veil with this money, for a covering to her face; by which generous and polite behaviour, Sarah was reproved, and Abraham was interested in the restoration of Abimelech's family to health, and the wives of that prince to their fertility. Gen. xx. It appears from verse 17, compared with verse 6, that Abimelech himself was seized with some indisposition, which produced impotency. A. M. 2084, ante A. D. 1920. Vide Additional Remarks on ABRAM; also FRAGMENTS, No. VII.

II. ABIMELECH, king of Gerar, son of the former; but some interpreters think this to be the same Abimelech, which is not absolutely impossible; yet it is every way more probable that this is his son. This prince, having accidentally seen Isaac sporting with his wife Rebekah, whom he called sister (as Abraham his father had formerly called his wife, Sarah), Abimelech sent for him, and said to him, 'Behold, of a surety she is thy wife: and how saidst thou, she is my sister?' Isaac answered, 'because, I said, lest I die for her.' Whereupon, Abimelech, highly offended, as if the honour of his people were insulted by such suspicion of their misbehaviour and cruelty, forbade any communication with Isaac and his wife, saying, 'He that toucheth this man, or his wife, shall surely be put to death.' (Vide Additional Remarks, ABRAM.) Afterwards, as Isaac increased in riches and power, his prosperity excited the envy of the Philistines; and Abimelech said to him, 'Go from us, for thou art much mightier (or much wiser) than we.' Isaac retired to the valley of Gerar, and afterwards to Beersheba, where Abimelech, with Ahuzzath, his favourite, and Phicol, his general, visited him. Isaac said, 'Wherefore come ye to me, seeing ye hate me, and have sent me away from you?' Abimelech replied, that observing how much he was favoured by God, he was come to make a covenant with him. Isaac entertained them splendidly, and the next day concluded a treaty with them, Gen. xxvi. 8—31. A. M. 2200, ante A. D. 1804.

III. ABIMELECH, son of Gideon, by a concubine, at Shechem, Judg. ix. 18. A. M. 2708, ante A. D. 1236. After the death of his father, he assumed the government, and procured himself to be acknowledged king; first, by the inhabitants of Shechem, where his mother's family had an interest; afterwards, by a great part of Israel. The Shechemites made him a present of seventy shekels of silver; with this money, he levied a troop of vagabond followers. At Gideon's house in Ophrah, he killed his father's seventy sons, now orphans, on one stone; only the youngest, Jotham, remained, who was concealed from his cruelty. Soon after, the people of Shechem, with the house, that is, the garrison of Millo, being assembled near the oak of Shechem, to inaugurate Abimelech, Jotham appeared on mount Gerizim, and reproved them by his celebrated fable of the trees. (Vide JOTHAM.) Discord soon arose among the Shechemites, who, reflecting on their injustice, and detesting the cruelty of Abimelech, revolted from him in his absence, and laid an ambuscade in the mountains, designing to kill him on his return to Shechem. Of this Abimelech received intelligence from Zebul, his governor of Shechem. The Shechemites invited Gaal to their assistance, with whom, at a great entertainment, they uttered many imprecations against Abimelech; who having got troops together, marched all night towards Shechem: in the morning Gaal went out of Shechem, and gave battle to Abimelech, but was defeated, and as he was endeavouring to re-enter the city, Zebul repulsed him. Afterwards, Abimelech defeated the Shechemites, destroyed the city, and burnt their tower. At the attack of Thebez, a town about three leagues to the east, a woman, from the top of the tower, threw an upper millstone on his head, and fractured his skull, so that his bruises issued from it. He immediately called his armour-bearer, and said, 'Draw thy sword and slay me, that men say not of me, a woman slew him,' Judg. ix. 1—54. A. M. 2771, ante A. D. 1233. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CIX.

IV. ABIMELECH, priest of the Lord, who gave Goliath's sword to David, when he fled from Saul, 1 Sam. xxi. 9. Several Latin copies read Abimelech; the LXX. read the same; but in the Hebrew it is Achimelech, אחימלך, and this is the true reading. Vide ACHIMELECH. (In Mark ii. 26, this is quoted as part of the history of Abiathar; which has been a difficulty: but to explain this, we need only consult any copy of the Hebrew Bible, which has the subjects noted in the top of the margin; it will directly appear, that the words (אָבִי אֲבִיָּאֵל) are a reference to such a title, which indicates the history in the column or page below, where it would naturally signify, 'concerning Abiathar;' consequently, it is not a name given to Abimelech, as has been improperly supposed.) Vide ABIATHAR.

ABINADAB, אֲבִינָדָב, 'Αβινάδab: father of willingness; from אָב ab, a father, and נָדָב nadab, he was willing: or, my father is a prince; from נָדִיב nadib, a prince.

I. ABINADAB, David's brother, 1 Chron. ii. 13.

II. ABINADAB, son of Saul. Vide AMINADAB.

III. ABINADAB, a Levite, of Kirjathjearim. Vide AMINADAB.

ABINOAM, אֲבִינוֹאֵם, 'Αβινωῆμ: father of beauty, or comeliness: or, my father is beautiful; from אָב ab, a father, and נֹאֵם noam, handsome, agreeable.

ABINOAM, father of Barak, leader of the army, Judg. iv. 6.

ABIRAM, אֲבִירָם: father of elevation, from אָב ab, a father, and רָם ram, high: otherwise, of fraud; from רָמָה, ramah, to cheat, to deceive.

I. ABIRAM, eldest son of Hiel the Bethelite. Joshua having destroyed the city of Jericho, pronounced this curse: 'Cursed be the man before the Lord, that riseth up and buildeth this city, Jericho: He shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born; and in his youngest son shall he set up the gate of it,' Josh. vi. 26. About 537 years after this imprecation, Hiel, of Bethel, intent on rebuilding Jericho, while laying the foundation of the city, lost his eldest son Abiram; and Segub, his youngest son, when they hung up the gates of it (1 Kings xvi. 34.): a remarkable instance of a prophetic denunciation fulfilled, perhaps, on a person who would not credit the report, or the truth of the prediction. It has been questioned whether, if he had many children, they all died, from the eldest to the youngest, during the time of his building; or whether only his eldest and his youngest son died, at the commencement and at the termination of his undertaking. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. v.

II. ABIRAM, one who conspired, with Korah and Dathan, against Moses in the wilderness. Abiram was son of Eliab, and grandson of Phallu, of the tribe of Reuben. God inflicted a terrible punishment on these rebels, they being swallowed up alive by the earth, Numb. xvi.

ABISHAG, אֲבִישָׁג: my father has seized, has taken, is arrived; from אָב ab, a father, and נָשָׂא nashag, to seize, to take possession of.

ABISHAG, a young woman of Shunam, in the tribe of Issachar. David, aged about seventy, finding no warmth in his bed, was advised by his physicians to procure some young person, who might communicate the heat he wanted. To this purpose, Abishag was presented to him, who was one of the most beautiful young women in Israel. The king made her his wife, but did not know her: she continued with him a year. After his death, Adonijah demanded her in marriage; but Solomon perceiving in this a design to obtain the secret intelligence of the palace, and to propagate reports concerning David's final disposition of the crown, which might affect the succession, and title, had him put to death, 1 Kings ii. 17—25.

ABISHAI, אֲבִישַׁי: the present of my father; or, the father of the present; from אָב ab, a father, and שַׁי shai, a present: otherwise, the father of the sacrifice, or the sacrifice of my father.

ABISHAI, son of Zuri, and of Zeruiah, David's sister, one of the most valiant men of his time, and principal general in David's armies. Abishai vanquished Ishbi-ben-oh, a giant descended from the Rephaim, who bore a lance, the head whereof weighed 300 shekels of brass. This giant was on the point of killing David, when Abishai slew him, 2 Sam. xxi. 16. Abishai, with David, having one night entered Saul's tent, and finding him asleep, Abishai would have pierced him with his sword, but David forbade him, 1 Sam. xxvi. 7. When David, flying from Absalom, was obliged to leave Jerusalem, Abishai expressed an inclination to kill Shimei, who insulted David in very offensive language; but David checked his zeal, 2 Sam. xvi. 9. Abishai commanded the third part of David's army against Absalom: also, part of the army when his brother Joab engaged the Ammonites. It is said, he lifted up his spear against three hundred enemies, and slew them (xxiii. 18.); but it is not known on what occasion: neither do we know the time or manner of his death.

ABISHALOM, אֲבִישָׁלוֹם: father of peace; or, peace of the father; from שָׁלוֹם shalom, peace, and אָב ab, a father; or the accomplishment, or recompense of the father.

ABISHALOM, father of Maachah, who was mother of Abijah, king of Judah, 1 Kings xv. 2.

ABISHUA, אֲבִישׁוּא, 'Αβισσοῦ: father of salvation; or, the salvation of my father; from אָב ab, a father, and יְשׁוּעָה yeshuah, salvation; or father of clamour, from שׁוּעָה shuah, one that cries, or clamours.

ABISHUA, son of Phinehas, fourth high-priest of the Hebrews (1 Chron. vi. 50.), was succeeded by Bukki. The Chronicon of Alexandria places Abishua under Ehud, judge of Israel, Judges iii. He is called Abiezer, in Josephus, Antiq. lib. v. cap. ult.

ABISHUR, אֲבִישׁוּר: father of the wall, or of the bull; from אָב ab, a father, and שׁוּר shur, or sur, a wall or bull: or father of uprightness: or my father is upright, by deriving it from ישר yashar, to be upright.

ABISHUR, the son of Shammai, of Judah, 1 Chron. ii. 28.

ABITAL, אֲבִיטָל: father of the dew; from אב ab, a father, and טל tal, dew, according to the Hebrew: or, father of the shadow, according to the Syriac. In this language, the letter צ tzadde is often changed into ט teth.

ABITAL, sixth wife of David, 1 Chron. iii. 3.

ABITUB, אֲבִיתוּב: father of goodness; or my father is good; from טוב tub, good, and אב ab, father.

ABITUB, the son of Hushim, a Benjamite, 1 Chron. viii. 11.

ABIUD, אֲבִי הוד 'Αβιούδ: father of praise; or, glory of my father; from אב ab, a father, and הוד hud, glory.

ABIUD, son of Zorobabel; one of our Saviour's ancestors, Matth. i. 13.

ABNER, אֲבִנֶר, or ABINER, 'Αβενέρ: father of light; or, lamp of the father; or, son of the father; from אב ab, a father, and נר nur, or נֶר ner, a lamp, light, a son.

ABNER, son of Ner, general of Saul's armies: he preserved the crown to Ishbosheth, son of Saul, and supported him at Mahanaim, beyond Jordan, seven years, against the forces of David, who then reigned at Hebron, in Judah. There were several skirmishes between the forces of David and Ishbosheth, wherein David had the advantage. The two generals, Joab and Abner, the first commanding the troops of David, the other those of Ishbosheth, marching at the foot of Gibeon, sat down on each side of the pool: Abner said to Joab, 'Let the young men (the soldiers), arise and play before us.' Joab said, 'Let them arise.' Immediately, twelve men of Benjamin, in the service of Ishbosheth, and twelve of the servants of David, fought together and slew each other; this brought on a general engagement, and Abner was beaten before the servants of David. The three sons of Zeruiah, David's sister, Joab, Abishai, and Asahel, were in the battle. Asahel being extremely swift, pursued Abner, who persuaded him to attack some other person, but finding him obstinate, he struck him with the hinder part of his spear and killed him. The pursuit continued till sunset; when Abner's army being gathered about him on an eminence, he called to Joab, and said, 'Shall your sword be never satisfied with blood and slaughter?' Don't you know it is dangerous to make an enemy desperate?—Joab replied, 'As the Lord liveth, if you had not spoken, the people had continued the pursuit till morning.' He then sounded a retreat,—2 Sam. ii. 8. et seq.

Some time after, Ishbosheth accusing Abner of a connection with a concubine of Saul, the late king, Abner was so offended, that he sent messengers to David, promoted his party, and visited David, who received him with open arms; made him a great entertainment, and bade him go and endeavour to reduce all Israel, as he had promised. He had scarcely quitted Hebron, when Joab and his people returned thither from an expedition. Being informed that Abner had been with David, who had made an alliance with him, Joab immediately applied to the king, saying, 'What have you done? why have you let Abner go? do you know what sort of a man he is, and that he came only to deceive you, and to observe your motions?' After this interview with the king, and without the king's knowledge, he sent after Abner, desiring his return. Abner being returned to Hebron, Joab took him aside in the gate, as if desirous of speaking to him privately, and stabbed him there; to revenge, by this crime, the death of his brother Asahel. (Vide FRAGMENTS, No. xciii.) King David being informed of this murder, shewed publicly his concern at it, made a solemn funeral for Abner, attended it himself in person, composed a mournful song to his honour, and fasted, in token of grief, till the evening, 2 Sam. iii. 6. et seq. A. M. 2956, ante A. D. 1048.

ABOMINATION signifies (1.) a thing hateful and detestable, as shepherds were to the Egyptians (Gen. xliii. 32.); or, as the sacrifices of the Hebrews must have been to the Egyptians (Exod. viii. 26.), who could not but have beheld with anger those creatures which they venerated as symbols of deity, slain and consumed.

(Observe, the superstition of the Egyptians was so strong, that even to kill by accident one of their sacred animals, was not to be expiated but by the death of the offender. Egypt was divided into parts, each of which had its peculiar representative deity: in one district a bull, in another a goat, in another a cat, in another a monkey, &c. &c. Undoubtedly, these were strange creatures to receive public worship, to be adored as deities, or as symbols of deity; the choice of such has in it, certainly, something abominable to human nature and feelings.) (2.) Moses calls those animals abominable, whose use was prohibited to the Hebrews, Lev. vii. 21; xi. 13, 42. (3.) Sin in general, Isaiah lxvi. 3. (4.) Evil doctrines and practices, Rev. xvii. 4. (5.) An idol, 2 Kings xxiii. 13.

Scripture generally terms idolatry and idols, abomination, not only because the worship of idols is, in itself, abominable; but because the ceremonies of idolaters were almost always attended with licentiousness, and infamous and abominable actions. Vide ASTARTE, CHAMOS, FRAGMENTS, No. cviii. cclxxxii.

ABOMINATION of desolation, foretold by Daniel (chap. ix. 27.), according to the best interpreters, may denote the image of Jupiter Olympius, erected in the temple of Jerusalem, by command of Antiochus Epiphanes, 2 Mac. vi. 2. and 1 Mac. vi. 7. But principally, by the Abomination of desolation seen at Jerusalem, during the last siege of that city by the Romans, under Titus, is meant the ensigns of the Roman army, with the images of their gods and emperors upon them, which surrounded the city, and which were lodged in the temple when that and the city were taken. The evangelists, Matthew (xxiv. 15.) and Mark (xiii. 14.), add, 'whoso readeth let him understand;' hereby intimating, that this event was approaching, though yet future, and that the reader would do well to retire speedily from a city, which was thus threatened with the execution of the divine anger. Certainly, therefore, these passages were written before Jerusalem was destroyed, and no doubt, were instrumental in warning many believers, and perhaps unbelievers too, to escape the coming wrath.

ABRA, or HABRA, Ἀβρα, a general term used to signify a maid of honour, waiting gentlewoman, or maid-servant of a woman of quality. By this name are called the young women of Rebekah's retinue (Gen. xxiv. 61.); those of the daughter of Pharaoh, king of Egypt (Exod. ii. 5); those of queen Esther (Esth. ii. 9; iv. 4); and Judith's waiting woman, Judith viii. 33. Abra is said to signify properly, a milliner, dresser, or tire-woman.

ABRAM, אַבְרָם: father of elevation, or high-father; from רם ram, exalted, and אב ab, a father.

ABRAM, afterwards called ABRAHAM, son of Terah, was born at Ur, a city of Chaldaea, A. M. 2008, ante A. D. 1906. Gen. xi. 27. He spent his early years in his father's house, where idols were worshipped. Many have supposed, that he himself at first adopted this error, but that God giving him a better understanding, he renounced it; and on that account, suffered a severe persecution from the Chaldeans, who threw him into a fiery furnace, from which God miraculously saved him; while Haran, whose faith failed, perished in it. The Vulgate rendering (2 Esd. ix. 7.) expresses that he was delivered from the fire of the Chaldeans, and this the Jews generally teach. But this opinion seems to be founded only on the ambiguity of the word Ur, which signifies fire; and the city of Ur, was the place from whence God directed Abraham into the land of promise. It is very likely, that his father also was convinced of the vanity of idolatry, since he accompanied Abraham from Ur, where he was settled, to that place whither the LORD had called him. They first came to Haran, in Mesopotamia, where Terah, Abraham's father, died. From thence Abraham went into Palestine, at that time inhabited by Canaanites. Here God promised to bless him, and to give him the property of the country. The patriarch, however, did not acquire landed property here, but lived and died, a stranger. Some time after his settlement in Canaan, a great famine obliged him to go into Egypt; where, fearing that the Egyptians, struck with the beauty of Sarah, might not only force her from him, but take away his life too, if they knew she was his wife, he desired her that he might call her sister. Sarah consented; and when in Egypt, her beauty being reported to Pharaoh, he took her forcibly away, designing to make her one of his wives; but God afflicted him with great plagues, and obliged him to restore her. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. vi. After the famine, Abraham returned to Canaan, accompanied by his nephew, Lot; there he pitched his tents, between Bethel and Hai, where he had previously raised an altar. Now, as both Abraham and Lot had large flocks, they could not conveniently dwell together; therefore they separated; Lot retiring to Sodom, and Abraham to the plain of Mamre, near Hebron, Gen. xii. 13. A. M. 2084.

Some years afterwards, Lot being taken prisoner, by Chedorlaomer and his allies, then warring against the kings of Sodom, &c. Abraham with his own household, pursued the conquerors, overtook them at Dan, near the springs of Jordan, defeated them, and retook the spoil, together with Lot. At his return, passing near Salm (supposed to be the city afterwards called Jeru-salem), Melchisedeck, king of that city, and priest of the Most High God, met him and blessed him, and presented him with bread and wine for his own refreshment and that of his army; or, as some have thought, offered bread and wine to God, as a sacrifice of thanksgiving on Abraham's behalf.

After this, the Lord renewed his promises to Abraham, with fresh assurances that he should possess the land of Canaan, and that his posterity should be as numerous as the stars.

As Abraham had no children, and could no longer expect any by his wife Sarah, he complied with her solicitations to marry her servant, Hagar; imagining, that if he should have children by her, God might perform the promises which he had made to him of a numerous posterity: Sarah also designed to adopt such children and educate them as her own; which was a common custom in those times. Under these circumstances, Abraham married Hagar; but she, finding she had conceived, assumed a superiority over her mistress, and treated her with contempt; Sarah complained to Abraham, who told her Hagar was still her servant.

Hagar, therefore, being harshly treated by Sarah, fled; but an angel appearing to her in the wilderness, commanded her to return, and to submit to her mistress: she returned, and gave birth to Ishmael, Gen. xvi. A. M. 2094, ante A. D. 1910.

Thirteen years after the birth of Ishmael, the LORD renewed his covenant and promises with Abraham. He changed his name from Abram, or an elevated father, to Abraham, or father of a great multitude [אברהם Abram, high father; אברהם Abraham, as if רמון of a great multitude] and the name of Sarai, my princess, he changed into Sarah, THE princess: i.e. of many: no longer confined to one. As a token and confirmation of the covenant now entered into, he enjoined him to be himself circumcised, and to circumcise all the males his property; he also promised him a son by Sarah, his wife, to be born within a year, Gen. xvii.

Shortly after, the enormous sins of Sodom, Gomorrah, and the neighbouring cities, brought on them the Divine vengeance. Abraham sitting at the door of his tent, in the heat of the day, saw three persons walking by; he directly ran to them, invited them to take refreshment, washed their feet, and hastened to prepare meat for them, while Sarah made cakes. When they had eaten, they asked Abraham 'Where is Sarah thy wife?' Abraham answered, 'In the tent.' Then said one of them, 'I will certainly return unto thee, according to the time of life, and lo, Sarah thy wife shall have a son.' Sarah, hearing this, laughed. Whereupon he said to Abraham, 'Wherefore did Sarah laugh? Is any thing too hard for the Lord? In a year I will return, as I promised, and Sarah shall have a son, Gen. xviii. 1-19.

When they departed, Abraham attended them, going towards Sodom, whither two of them (who proved to be divine messengers) continued their journey. The third remained with Abraham, and discoursing with him, said, 'The cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and their sin is very grievous; I will therefore go down thither, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which has come up to me.' Abraham, fearing lest his nephew, Lot, should be involved in the misfortune of that city, said, 'Lord, wilt thou destroy the righteous with the wicked? If there be found fifty righteous in the city, wilt thou destroy them with the others, and not spare the city for the fifty righteous that are therein?' The LORD answered, 'I will spare it for their sakes.' Abraham added, 'If there shall lack five of this number, wilt thou destroy all the city for lack of five?' 'No,' said the LORD. Abraham continued to speak, and reduced the number, by degrees, to ten righteous persons, and God promised not to destroy the city for the sake of ten; but there were not ten to be found. Nevertheless, Lot, Abraham's nephew, was preserved from the calamity that involved Sodom, Gen. xviii. xix. Vide Lot.

Sarah having conceived, according to the divine promise, Abraham left the plain of Mamre, and went south, to Gerar, where Abimelech reigned; and again fearing lest Sarah should be forced from him, and himself be put to death, Abraham called her here, as he had in Egypt, sister. Abimelech took her to his house, designing to marry her; but God having, in a dream, informed him she was Abraham's wife, he returned her to him with great presents. This year Sarah was delivered of Isaac; Abraham circumcised him, according to covenant stipulation; and when he was weaned, made a great entertainment. Sarah, having observed Ishmael, son of Hagar, teasing her son Isaac, said to Abraham, 'Cast out this bondwoman and her son, for Ishmael shall not be heir with Isaac. Abraham, after very great reluctance, complied; as God informed him that it was according to the appointments of Providence, for the future ages of the world.

About the same time, Abimelech, king of Gerar, came with Phicol, his general, to conclude an alliance with Abraham, who made that prince a present of seven ewe-lambs out of his flock, in consideration that a well he had opened should be his own property; and they called the place Beer-sheba, or 'the well of swearing,' because of the covenant there ratified with oaths, (vide FRAGMENTS, No. LXIII.) Here Abraham planted a grove, built an altar, and resided some time, Gen. xx. xxi.

More than twenty years after this (A. M. 2133), God directed Abraham to sacrifice his son Isaac, on a mountain which he would show him: Abraham took his son, and two servants, and went towards mount Moriah. On their journey, 'Behold the fire and the wood,' said Isaac to his father, 'but where is the victim for a burnt offering?' Abraham answered 'My son. God will provide one.' When within sight of the mountain, Abraham left his servants, and ascended it with his son only; and there having bound him, he prepared to sacrifice him; but when he was about to give the blow, an angel from heaven cried out to him, 'Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing to him. Now I know that thou fearest God, since to obey him thou hast not spared thine only son.' Abraham, turning to look round him, saw a ram entangled in the bush by his horns; and he offered this animal as a burnt-offering, instead of his son Isaac. This place he called Jehovah-jireh, or the Lord will see,—or provide, Gen. xxii. 1—14.

Twelve years afterwards, Sarah, wife of Abraham, died in Hebron. Abraham came to mourn, and to perform the funeral offices for her. He addressed the people at the city gate, entreating them to allow him to bury his wife among them; for, being a stranger, and having no land of his own, he could claim no right of interment in any sepulchre of that country. He, therefore, bought of Ephron, one of the inhabitants, the field of Machpelah, with the cave and sepulchre in it, at the price of four hundred shekels of silver (about 45*l.* sterling). And here Abraham buried Sarah, with due solemnities, according to the custom of the country, Gen. xxiii.

Abraham perceiving himself to be grown old, sent Eliezer, his steward, into Mesopotamia, with directions to obtain a young woman of his own family, as a wife for his son Isaac. Eliezer executed his commission very prudently, and brought Rebecca, daughter of Bethuel, granddaughter of Nahor, and, consequently, Abraham's niece, whom Isaac married. Abraham afterwards married Keturah; by whom he had six sons, Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah; who became heads of different people, which dwelt in Arabia, and around it. He died, aged an hundred and seventy-five years, and was buried with Sarah, his wife, in the cave of Machpelah, which he had purchased of Ephron, Gen. xxiv. xxv. A. M. 2183, ante A. D. 1821.

REMARKS ON THE HISTORY OF ABRAHAM.

I. Abraham is introduced rather abruptly in the sacred Scriptures:—‘And JEHOVAH said to Abram’ (Gen. xii. 1.); but it may rationally be concluded, that before a man would undertake a long, fatiguing, and uncertain journey, at the command of another, he would be well assured of the authority which commanded him. It seems reasonable, therefore, to infer, that God had previously spoken to Abraham: perhaps often, though by what means we know not. However, in addition to what the Scriptures relate, we learn from other information, that about this time Chaldea became polluted with idolatry (and this we know independent of any reference to Terah, as a maker of idols, which some have deduced from the name Teraphim as related to Terah. Vide ad fin.) It appears in short, to be almost unquestionable, that one principal reason of Abram's quitting his own country, was his dread of this evil. Now this evil was at that time not equally prevalent in Egypt; and the countries which were distant from the great cities, or had but little intercourse with them, were much less infected with it. This also accounts for Abram's going northward, instead of the direct road, which communicated through Canaan, between Babylon and Egypt. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. DXXXXII, DLXXXXIX.

Undoubtedly, the Providence of God called Abraham, for his own personal quiet, and that of his family, to seek a country less polluted than the dominions of Nimrod; and so far, no doubt, he may be said to have had Divine direction; but every thing leads to the conclusion, that he had also a communicated direction to the same purpose. Though long offended with the evils around him, yet probably he waited a considerable time for Divine orders to quit his country.

II. Abram, previous to his journey, was a man of substance. ‘He took Sarah his wife, Lot his nephew, and all his property, (Gen. xii. 5.); so that he was no adventurer for a fortune, but was already rich in worldly wealth; and had many dependants, most of whom, probably, accompanied their master to his new residence, and many of whom were among the ‘servants born in his house,’ i. e. among his possessions.

III. The next circumstance deserving notice, is, his calling Sarai, his wife, ‘sister,’ instead of ‘wife’ (Gen. xii. 13, &c.), and as this incident is liable to ambiguity, and has suffered by being placed in false lights, to the greater discredit of Abraham than is just or necessary,—a few thoughts may be well bestowed on it.

It deserves consideration how far this might be a custom derived from the earliest ages of mankind; for, as in the first, so also in the second, infancy of the human race, the relations of life were so very few, and so very intimate, that it was little short of inevitable for the nearest in blood to intermarry: and it is by no means incredible, that some families had made a point of maintaining themselves distinct from others, by this custom; and that they chose to be thus restricted to the branches of their own family (cousins, &c.), as afterwards among the Jews, the restriction was enlarged to their own tribe.

But, independent of this consideration, it should be recollected, that every nation, and oftentimes every family, has its own manners; which appear not merely singular, but uncouth, to those not accustomed to them, and which, occasionally, are mistaken by casual observers. It is not usual in England, nor does it appear to have been so in Egypt, or in Canaan, for a husband to call his wife—sister; but it seems to have been customary among the Hebrew families, to use this term, and others of near consanguinity, for a more general relation than they strictly import (vide FATHER, BROTHER, SISTER), and also for a wife, a companion. —For example,

We find Abram twice using this mode of speech, and twice experiencing the same inconvenience from it. We find Isaac using the same appellation, with, at least equal apparent art; and under the same apprehension, in the same place where Abram had used it. We recollect no other instances equally ancient; but it is observable, that the Bridegroom, in the poem usually called the Canticles, does not call his Bride—wife, but always—sister. Now, whatever allowances, or of whatever kind, the poetical style may require; or whatever liberties of speech it may take, it must at least possess, as essential to it, a correspondence to the manners it depicts; this mode of address, then, was certainly founded on those manners.—It is a peculiarity of the same nation; and not of the vulgar, but of the king of that nation; and of the wisest king that nation ever had. It seems very probable, therefore, that this address may even be taken as a mark of high breeding and delicacy. In later ages, we find Tobias calling his wife, sister (Tobit viii. 4.); ‘Sister arise, and let us pray:’—and verse 7. ‘I take not this my sister for lust.’ These instances tend to prove, that it was nothing unusual for husbands to express affection for their wives, by calling them sister in familiarity, and in private.

If this be correct, then the emphatic (אִשְׁתִּי hua) ‘THAT my sister,’ used by Abram (Gen. xx. 2, 5.), and by Isaac, (xxvi. 7, 9.), expresses very tender affection. And that this custom continued among the Jews, may be confirmed from the expression of St. Paul (1 Cor. ix. 5.), ‘to be accompanied by—a sister—a wife.’ To say the least, general semblance or probability justifies our translators against the Romanists, who would render γυνῆκα, a “woman:”—could a sister be other-wise than a woman? but she might be a sister without being a wife; an idea, against which the apostle guards by this addition.

To return to Abraham: there seems to be no necessity for supposing, that the use of this appellation commenced when Abram was about to enter Egypt with Sarai. It was his general request long before (Gen. xx. 13.); but he now afresh desired Sarai to use the title brother (as had been customary between them in private) in ordinary discourse, when speaking to him, or of him, to the Egyptian women, with whom she might converse (for, according to the custom of the East, she conversed with no men): and what these Egyptian women reported of her beauty and manners, with such accidental sight of her as might occur to the chief officers of Pharaoh’s house, (for though the women in the East are very reserved, they are not locked up,) induced Pharaoh to take her into his palace (i. e. to give her apartments in his haram); but it does not appear that he ever saw her. Thus Sarai’s calling Abram, brother, was as likely to have been the immediate cause of her being taken from him, as his calling her sister. The original says, ‘The Lord struck the house of Pharaoh with great plagues, because of the word of Sarai, wife of Abram.’ (Gen. xii. 17.) This probably refers to her complaints to God of the detention and violence she suffered; for had she been only Abram’s sister, by what right did Pharaoh detain her, against her consent, and that of her brother, who was her natural guardian? (Vide the instance of LABAN and REBEKAH.) That king’s conduct, or at least the behaviour of his officers, seems too much to justify Abram’s suspicions of the Egyptian manners. On the whole, so far as relates to this transaction in Egypt, while it is admitted, that the fear of Abram induced him to use art and management, it must be equally admitted, that his fear was too well founded: nor does it seem to have overcome his faith, as some have said; nor to have put him out of the regular custom of his life; but to have suggested what he thought a prudential application in public of what had been his custom in private, though, perhaps, by this very prudence, he ran at least as great a risk from the anger of Pharaoh, when he turned him out without delay, as he might have done, had he trusted entirely to the ordinary course of things, and followed the simple path of his duty.

As the same effects seem connected with the same circumstances in the story of Abimelech (Gen. xx. 2.), we shall now advert to that account; observing, that the original will bear the idea, that Abraham said to his wife—my sister: as well as of her—THAT my sister, i. e. my dear sister, emphatically; i. e. in the hearing of some of Abimelech’s people, he thus addressed Sarai. Abimelech thinking to do Abram and himself honour by a near connection, sent and took her. (Vide FRAGMENTS, No. VI.) He behaved differently from Pharaoh; he meant rather good than harm; rather friendship than insult; therefore, he was expostulated with; and to him Abraham apologized, by discovering their true relation, and his general request—‘at every place to which we journey, call me brother.’ Abimelech was not that potent king over a great country, which Pharaoh was, but much more on a level with Abraham; and, therefore, the less likely to think himself degraded by marrying his sister. These circumstances are very different from those suggested of the haughty, the oppressive Pharaoh.

If the custom of women’s wearing veils were not so ancient and so universal, as we know it to be in the East; and if it did not so expressly occur but a little later in time in the story of Rebekah, who came from the country of Sarah, one might be almost tempted to think, that the fashion was not without exceptions in Chaldea, when Sarai left it; or, that she had not been used to adopt this mode of dress. It is certain, that the Arab women, at this day, when at home in their tents, do not wear the veil, though those in the cities do.

(Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XLI. CLXI. CLXV.) Whether they do not on other occasions also lay it aside, vide REBEKAH: and as Sarah had been accustomed to dwelling in tents only, that circumstance should well be considered in explaining this history.

IV. The dignity and power of Abraham is incidentally stated in the story of his rescuing Lot. He must have been a man of no trifling possessions, who had three hundred and eighteen servants born among his property, whom he could entrust with arms (Gen. xiv. 14.); it implies, that he had many not born in his house, but bought with his money; some also, doubtless, were old; some were women, and some children: these together make a considerable tribe. In fact, Abraham appears to correspond exactly to a modern Emir; to possess many of the rights of sovereignty in no small degree; and to be little other than an independent prince; even while dwelling on the territories of sovereign princes, who greatly esteemed him.

V. However customary a plurality of wives might be among the nations around him, Abraham took no other wife than that of his youth; and this, as it should seem, from his very great affection for Sarah. His connection with Hagar was not proposed by himself, but by Sarah; and Abram in that yielded to her wishes rather than to his own. The same we find practised by Leah and Rachel, the wives of Jacob, who gave their handmaids to their husband, and considered themselves as having children by this substitution. Vide ADOPTION. The event of this connexion serves to show, that the personal deficiency, which occasioned the want of issue, was not in Abraham; therefore the miracle which preceded the conception of Isaac, was principally, if not totally, in the person of Sarah. As to Abraham's treatment of Hagar, it may appear, that after she had become his wife, he ought not to have left her so entirely under the power of Sarah; but, it is evident, that the sending away Ishmael and his mother appeared hard to Abraham himself; nor did he comply with the demands of Sarah, till after he had obtained the divine sanction; with a renewal of the promise of divine protection to Ishmael. In his manner of sending them away, there is much caution and management: it was very early in the morning, that is, before Sarah, perhaps, or many of his family, could be spectators; also, before the heat of the day; at the very best time for travelling. Ishmael being about sixteen years old, was well able to carry either the loaves or the skin of water. By this privacy, he avoided farther harshness and bickerings between Sarah and her servant; and did his utmost to ensure the safety of Hagar and her son. Vide HAGAR and ISHMAEL.

VI. The covenant made with Abraham is a subject well worthy consideration, whether as it regards the solemnity, the occasion, or the contents of it. Its history is related in two parts; the first is, previous to the birth of Ishmael; the second, previous to the birth of Isaac. The first foretels, that Abraham should have a numerous posterity, and that he need not make a stranger his heir: the second promises a son by Sarah; a son, with whom the covenant was to be established. For the ceremonies of the covenant, vide COVENANT. For the contents of the covenant, (1.) as they relate to his posterity: the family of this patriarch has, from remote antiquity, been extremely numerous; from him are derived many tribes of Arabs, descending through Ishmael, and others by Keturah: to say nothing of the Jews; neither has there been on the face of the earth, since Noah and his sons, any man whose posterity is equally extensive, any man to whom so many nations refer their origin. Others may have begotten families, but Abraham is the father of nations. (2.) The change of name, Abram into Abraham; and of Sarai into Sarah; vide NAME. (3.) The sign of the covenant, Circumcision. This had reference to posterity; as all the posterity descending from a circumcised parent, must be begotten by that part which bore the sign of obedient ratification of the covenant, so the issue was considered as sacred to God; not because of its relation to a holy or sacred mother, but because it was derived from a part of the father federally holy or sacred, or in a minor sense consecrated, by this sign of the covenant: and it may be conceived, that had the part circumcised been the finger, the ear, or any other part than what it was, the holiness attributed or constituted to the posterity had not been valid: that is, the relation between the sign and the offspring had been neither appropriate, consequential, nor even apparent. Vide CIRCUMCISION.

VII. The history of Abraham's entertaining the Angels, deserves, and is capable of, illustration. We find the patriarch, like a modern hospitable Arab of dignity, sitting in the door of his tent, in the heat of the day; where a stream of refreshing air passed through, and where the shade was comfortable and refreshing. He was not, however, so selfish or so indolent, but what at the sight of strangers, travelling during those sultry hours, he felt for their fatigue; he did not stay till they came up to him; as if he valued his ease more than their entertainment, but ran towards them, invited them, pressed them, then hastily (disregarding the heat of the day, now he could serve his company) accommodated them, and stood by them under the trees, while they ate. He gave them a noble repast, a repast accounted noble, a liberal meal: and that his guests might want for nothing, he himself attended them. Such is still the hospitality, and such the politeness of the East.

So far concerns Abraham; but, to obtain accurate ideas of this story, it may be further observed, that these guests were eating, not in the tent of Abraham, but under the shadow of the oaks: that Abraham's tent was not the same as Sarah's tent, but placed at some little distance from it; as is the custom of those parts (and this is clear in the original; 'Abraham hastened to the tent to Sarah,' that is, he went from the tent, at the door of which he had been sitting, to the tent where Sarah at that time was; there was no need for this, had Sarah's tent been that wherein he had been sitting): also, that his guests gradually open themselves to Abraham. 'Where is Sarah, thy wife?' How should entire strangers know his wife, and her name! and wherefore interfere in his domestic matters? 'Sarah,' says Abraham, 'is in her tent.' No doubt this excited Sarah's attention;—to which purpose it was adapted, and for which it was intended. Then one of them continued, 'When I come this way again next year, I shall find her better engaged; she will not then be so much at leisure, but caressing a son:' such may be thought the import of the expressions freely taken: on hearing this, Sarah laughed, (Gen. xviii. 1—12.) The laughter of Sarah may be supposed to proceed from her conviction that this stranger knew nothing about her: q. d. 'He supposes Abraham has got a wife much younger than I am; he has heard my name by some accident, but he does not know me; if he did, he would not thus talk of a woman of my age.' And now, for the first time, 'the LORD' speaks, reasoning, that the LORD could do any thing; and repeating that Sarah should have a son: thus, by Sarah's detection, a token of some person as the speaker, no ordinary man, was given to her and to Abraham; and the circumstances, though not altogether miraculous as yet, are well calculated to excite attention and apprehension in the minds of those interested; especially, if Abraham, who had so lately received the covenant from God, understood any allusion to it, or any confirmation of it, under these ambiguous expressions, which greatly resemble those used not long before, perhaps but two or three days; perhaps even but one day: if so, then by this time, he might begin to discern somewhat of the dignity of his guests. The words, 'Nay, but thou didst laugh,' are capable of a future sense, 'Aye, but thou shalt laugh!' which was accomplished when Sarah called her son's name Isaac (laughter.) Certainly now, if not before, Abraham regarded his guests as extraordinary personages: but what has passed hitherto, does not demonstrate that they were super-human; they might be prophets. Abraham therefore, pleased and interested with their conversation, probably desirous of farther information, as also of doing honour to his courteous and well-wishing guests, accompanied them part of the way towards Sodom; and about the dusk of the evening (for the preparation of the repast itself, the conversation that followed, &c. must have taken up some hours, subsequent to the heat of the day,) when the day was closing, he perceived on one who staid with him, the others having departed, those splendid tokens brightening as darkness came on, which designated a celestial being. Some have thought, that beside the person spoken to, the Shekinah appeared: it might be so; but it seems more probable, that this person gradually suffered the radiance of the sacred Shekinah to appear, and, without leading Abraham to suppose he had seen JEHOVAH, might yet convince his mind, that he had seen his commissioned messenger. If such honours might be gained by hospitality, the Apostle was right to recommend it, by the example of such as had UNAWARES entertained angels: such an afternoon, such an evening, amply repaid the most liberal hospitality! Heb. xiii. 2.

This kind of ambiguity, brightening into certainty, seems well suited to the circumstances of the subsequent conversation between Abraham and his glorious visitor. Had Abraham conceived that he was speaking immediately to JEHOVAH, that had left no room for reasoning, or representation; and he could not address a mere stranger-traveller, a mere casual undistinguished guest, by such honourable terms as he bestows on the person with whom he discourses. The principle of this manner of representing this part of the history, seems to be confirmed by the accuracy of distinction preserved in the original. The narration says, 'Abraham stood before JEHOVAH' (ver. 23.), 'and JEHOVAH spake' (ver. 26, &c.): but Abraham never uses this term in addressing this person, but merely Adonai, 'Behold I have spoken to Adonai' (ver. 27, &c.) Probably, therefore, here is a farther instance of the 'unawareness' with which Abraham entertained angels; since, though he perceived the dignity of his guest to be great, it was, in reality, much greater than he understood: he saw the human exterior of this appearance fully; but the interior, or super-human, he saw very imperfectly, and ambiguously: as, indeed, human nature could see it no otherwise.

VIII. Abraham's faith, respecting his son Isaac, when commanded to offer him for a burnt sacrifice, has been so often urged and illustrated, as to need no enlargement here.—We may, however, remark, that under the circumstances of Abraham, as having a son in his old age, born after the covenant, and in consequence of that alliance, on whose issue depended invaluable promises, who was now arrived at man's estate, who was his heir, who was his mother's favourite ; he must have been well convinced, that he followed no idle phantasy, no illusive injunction, in proposing to slay him : the common feelings of human nature, the uncommon feelings of the aged patriarch, all protested against such a deed. The length of the journey, the interval of time, the discourse of Isaac, all augmented the anguish of the parent ; unless that parent were well satisfied in his own mind, that he acted in obedience to authority fully and completely Divine. We may here remark, that neither the prophets nor the apostles, the patriarchs nor the saints, have left any description of what was the impulse they felt, or what was the afflatus they experienced ;—but they have left in their actions sufficient proof, that they believed it to be real, and undoubtedly Divine. Had they described it, fancy might have counterfeited the symptoms ; but, as they manifest their sense and conviction of it by their actions only, they evidently decline to occasion any mistakes in others, from whatever cause arising : they did not esteem themselves examples to following ages, though following ages have thus esteemed them.

For other particulars of Abraham's life, which seem capable of farther illustration, vide the articles of the several persons to whom they refer. Also, FRAGMENTS, Nos. VI. XLI. &c.

The Orientals, Christians, Mahometans, Indians, and Infidels, have a knowledge of the patriarch Abraham, and speak with great commendation of him. (Tarik Montekheb, D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 12.) The Arabians, who are descended from this patriarch, relate that Abraham was the son of Azar, and grandson of Terah ; all their historians agree in this. Terah, therefore, whom the Scripture mentions as the father of Abraham, was likewise named Azar ; to have two names is a customary thing in the East ; or, for the same individual to receive and employ different names at different periods of his life (vide NAMES)—we have divers instances in Scripture. If our chronologists, remarks M. D'Herbelot, had been acquainted with this Arabian genealogy, they would never have had recourse to the expedient of Abraham's transplanting himself a second time, to reconcile thereby the date of his departure from Ur with the years of his age ; they might have easily disentangled their difficulties, by admitting two Terahs, one surnamed Azar, the father of Abraham ; the other his grandfather ;—which no ways contradicts the sacred text.

A History of the Life of Abraham might be extracted from the traditions of the East. By way of instancing such traditions, as well as in reference to this patriarch, we present a short specimen.—Nimrod, the celebrated Nimrod, son of Cush, and the mighty hunter, thought to have been the first who assumed royalty after the deluge, resided at Babylon, which was built by him. This prince, in a dream, saw a star rising above the horizon, the light of which eclipsed that of the sun. The soothsayers being consulted, foretold that a child should be born in Babylon, who shortly should become a great prince ; and that he had reason to fear him, though he was not yet conceived. Terrified at this answer, Nimrod gave orders to separate the men from their wives ; and appointed an officer over every ten houses, to prevent their intercourse. Azar, Nimrod's guide, deceived his guards, and lay with his wife Adna. The next day the Magi, who continued their observations incessantly, informed Nimrod, that the child with whom he was threatened, had been conceived that very night : this prince then issued orders, that all pregnant women should be guarded with great care, and all children born of them should be put to death. Adna, whose pregnancy was not apparent, was not put under guard, but was suffered to go into the country, where she was delivered in a cave, the mouth whereof she closed very diligently ; and at her return, told her husband, that she had brought a son, who died immediately after his birth.

Adna, however, went frequently to the cave to her son, to suckle him ; but she continually found him sucking the ends of his fingers, one whereof furnished him milk, the other honey. This miracle surprised her ; but her anxiety for the child's nourishment being thus relieved, and as she saw that Providence had taken this care on itself, she was satisfied with visiting him, from time to time. She soon perceived, that he grew as much in three days as common children do in a month ; so that fifteen moons were scarcely passed, before he appeared to be as large as a boy of fifteen years : hereupon, Adna declared to Azar, that the son of whom she had been delivered, and who was reported by her to be dead, was living, and that God had provided miraculously for his subsistence.

Azar ran immediately to the cave, where he found his son, and desired his mother to convey him to the city, being resolved to present him to Nimrod, and place him about the court. In the evening, Adna brought him forth out of his den, and conducted him through a meadow, where herds of cattle were feeding. This being a sight entirely new to the young Abraham, he was inquisitive to learn their nature of his mother, and by her was informed of their names, qualities, and uses. Abraham continued his enquiries, and desired to know who produced all these ? Adna told him, that all things in the world had their Lord and Creator.—'Who then,' said he, 'brought me into the world ?' 'I,' replied, Adna. 'And who is your Lord ?' asked Abraham. She answered, 'Azar.' 'Who was Azar's Lord ?' She told him, Nimrod. He shewed an inclination to carry on his enquiries, but she checked him, telling him, that it was not convenient to search farther into matters, for fear of danger.

At last, he came to the city, which he saw deeply engaged in superstition and idolatry. After this he returned to his grotto, continually excited by a desire to know his Creator. One evening, as he was going to Babylon, he saw the stars shining, and among others, Venus, which was adored by many: he said within himself, 'Perhaps, this is the God and Creator of the world': but observing some time after, that this star was set, he said, 'This certainly cannot be the Master of the Universe, for it is not possible he should be subject to such a change.' Soon after he noticed the moon at full, and thought this possibly might be the author of all things; but when he perceived this planet also to sink beneath the horizon, his judgment of it was the same as before of Venus. At length, near the city, he saw a multitude adoring the rising sun; he was tempted to follow their example; but, having seen this luminary decline like the rest, he concluded, that it was not his Creator, his Lord, or his God.

Azar presented Abraham to Nimrod, who was seated on a lofty throne, with a number of beautiful slaves of both sexes in attendance. Abraham asked his father who that person was, so much exalted above the rest? Azar answered, 'The king, Nimrod, whom all these people acknowledge for their God.'—'It is impossible,' replied Abraham, 'that he should be their God, since he is not so beautiful, and consequently not so perfect, as the generality of those about him.'—Abraham from hence, took an opportunity of speaking to his father concerning the unity of God; which afterwards drew him into great contests with the principal men of Nimrod's court, who would by no means acquiesce in the truths he declared. Nimrod, informed of these disputes, commanded him to be thrown into a burning furnace, out of which he came without receiving the least hurt.

They relate also another story: Abraham, it is said, distributed all the corn in his granaries to the poor, during a great plague; he also sent to a friend in Egypt, for a supply; who, understanding from Abraham's people the occasion of their journey, told them, a famine was likewise feared in that country: 'Besides,' said he, 'I know that Abraham wants not provisions for his own family; and the corn which he desires is not for himself, but for the poor only; for which reason, I do not think it just to send him that which we may want ourselves, for the subsistence of our own people.'

This refusal, though softened with fair speeches, extremely afflicted Abraham's messengers; and when they approached their master's dwelling, fearing lest the people of the country, seeing in what disappointed condition they returned, might ridicule them, and take occasion to despise Abraham, they determined to disguise their condition by filling their sacks with a very fine sand, which they found in their way. On their arrival at home, the principal of the company related to their master what had happened to them, and what they had done. Abraham, without shewing any concern at it, went into his oratory, to comfort himself with God on this disappointment.—In the mean time, Sarah, his wife, ignorant of what was related, seeing the camels returned, took a sack, which she found full of excellent meal, and made it into bread for the poor. Abraham having finished his devotions, came out of his closet, and perceiving the smell of now-baked bread, he asked Sarah of what meal she had made it? she replied, 'Of your Egyptian friend's, which your camels brought hither.'—'Say rather,' answered Abraham, 'of your faithful friend, God; who never forsakes us in our necessities.' From this time, Abraham was styled 'the friend of God,' a name given him in the prophets, and by which the Mahometans generally call him. Hence Hebron, where he was buried, is termed by them 'the city of the Friend of God.' Nevertheless they place him much below their false prophet, Mahomet: 'Abraham,' says one of them, 'was only an officer in his army: and the Messiah is no more than master of the ceremonies at his court.'

As to the number of angels received by Abraham in his tent, they are not agreed. Demiathi acknowledges three, Gabriel, Arraphel, and Michael; the first was commissioned to destroy Sodom, the second to predict the birth of Isaac to Abraham, the third to preserve Lot. Abraham having received them in his tent, entertained them with a roasted calf, says Mahomet, in his Al-Koran; but observing they did not eat, he was in great consternation, conjecturing they were enemies (for, according to the custom of the Eastern people, there is no greater sign of enmity, than to refuse eating and drinking with one who invites them): the angels, therefore, encouraged him, saying, 'Fear not, for we are sent to Lot's people.' Sarah, who was present, fell a laughing, continues Mahomet (who being unacquainted with the true history of Abraham, relates it after his own manner). His interpreters tell us, that the cause of Sarah's laughing was either her joy to find Abraham delivered from his fears; or the desire of seeing the Sodomites punished; or her admiration to behold angels in a human form. The angels observing her laughter, communicated the good news that she should have a son called Isaac, and that Isaac should be the father of Jacob. To that Sarah answered, 'How can this be, that I who am old, my husband also being far advanced in years, should be delivered of a son? this would indeed be very wonderful!' But the angels replied, 'Why should you be surprised at what is God's doing? This is a blessing to you and Abraham, for you are chosen to be the heads of a great family.' After this, the angels proceeded on their way to Sodom, and Abraham interceded with God a long time, endeavouring to divert the destruction of Lot's people, saying to him, 'You are going to lay several cities in ruins, in each of which, perhaps, there may be a hundred righteous persons.' Such is the history in the Koran.

The story of Hagar and Ishmael is likewise altered in the Koran; where we read this prayer made by Abraham: 'Lord, I have placed one of my sons in a barren valley near thy sacred house.' Those interpreters hereupon relate, that Sarah being unable to endure Hagar, or her son Ishmael, in Palestine, entreated Abraham to send them into the wilderness, where there was no water. This request gave Abraham uneasiness; but the angel Gabriel, convincing him that he ought to acquiesce in Sarah's will, he obeyed; and taking the mother and her child, he transplanted them into the territory of Mecca, which at that time was barren, and destitute of water: but the angel caused a spring to rise under Ishmael's feet; which is now the well Zemzem, so famous among the Turks. At the same time, God poured forth his blessings on the country, and it became so fertile, that we see the fruits of the four seasons growing together in abundance.

There was then no temple at Mecca, but only a large edifice, called Sorah, erected, they say, like a temple, by Seth, ever since the time of Adam. It was respected for its antiquity, and all the inhabitants of the country visited it out of devotion. Abraham and Ishmael rebuilt this temple, which had been destroyed by the deluge. The Mahometans call it the Caabah, or the square house; they are bound to visit it at least once in their lives, out of devotion: and in whatsoever part of the world they be, they turn themselves towards it at their prayers.

There is great probability, that the ancient Arabians and Ishmaelites paid idolatrous worship in this temple to Bacchus, and to Urania or the Celestial Venus. Herodotus (lib. iii. cap. 8.) assures us, that they adored only these two deities, whom they called—Bacchus, Urotalt; and Urania, Alilat. Strabo, says, (lib. xvi.) that they had no other deities but Jupiter and Bacchus. Ammianus describes Coelus and Bacchus as their gods. Philostorgius, in Photius, says, they sacrificed to the sun and moon, and to demons. Nilus, in his history of the massacre of the Monks at Mount Sinai, affirms, that they sacrificed to the sun and morning-star. Maximus Tyrius speaks of a great square stone, to which they paid divine honours; and when the Saracens were converted to Christianity, they were obliged to anathematise this stone, which before had been the object of their worship.

It is related, that the tribe of Arabians, called Gioram, having been obliged to surrender Mecca, and its temple, to the Ishmaelites, the prince of the Gioramides threw the black stone and two antelopes of gold into the well Zemzem, above-mentioned, and closed the mouth of it so carefully, that, for a long time, no one could discover it. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 219. Article CAABAH.

Abdalmotleb, Mahomet's grandfather, drew the stone out of the well, and restored it to its place in the temple, whence it had been taken. It is, at this day, inserted in the wall of the temple of Mecca; and the Mahometan pilgrims would think their pilgrimage defective, if they did not kiss this stone several times; they ascribe a thousand miraculous qualities to it. This black stone is not the only one to which the Arabians pay, or have paid a superstitious worship. The ancient Ishmaelites, who frequented the temple built at Mecca by Abraham, pulled out several stones, which they carried with them, and placed under a tent, towards which they turned at their devotions. As the worship of the temple of Mecca consisted of a diversity of whirlings, or turnings round, they called these stones Dasuar, which signifies the same thing; and they observed the same ceremonies about these, as they did about the temple. Thus an extreme respect for the memory of Abraham, has involved these people in superstition and impiety. All they say of the temple of Mecca, built by Abraham, is probably only a fiction, engrafted on Moses's account of the altar erected by that patriarch at Beer-sheba, and of the grove planted round about it, Gen. xxi. 33. D'Herbelot, voce Hagiar-alassorad. Idem, page 15. Chardin, Voyage de Perse, tom. ii. page 451.

The Koran (chap. 2.), tells us farther, that Abraham one day prayed to God, 'Lord, shew me how thou raisest the dead.' The Lord answered, 'Hast thou not faith?'—'Yes, Lord, but this request I make only for my own satisfaction.' At this moment the devil observing the carcass of a man thrown by the sea on the shore, part whereof had been devoured by birds, wild beasts, and fishes, thought this was a fair opportunity to ensnare men with regard to their belief of the resurrection. Abraham, by God's appointment, approached the shore; the devil assuming the human shape, immediately accosted him, and, affecting great surprise, asked him how it was possible the members of that carcass, dispersed in the bellies of so many different animals, could be re-united at the resurrection? Abraham replied, 'He whose power formed all the parts of our body out of nothing, is sufficiently able to re-unite them from the several places where they are scattered: the potter crushes an earthen vessel, and, at his pleasure, fashions it again of the same clay.' God afterwards says to Abraham, 'Take four birds, tear them in pieces, and lay the divided parts of them on four separate mountains; then call them, and you shall see all these four birds immediately come to you.' This is an imitation of what is said (Gen. xv. 9, 10, 11.) concerning the sacrifice of an heifer, a she-goat, and a ram, each of three years old, of a turtle dove and a young pigeon, which Abraham divided, and placed on different altars; but the Mahometans have added various circumstances. They relate, that the four birds mentioned by Mahomet, were a cock, a pigeon, a raven, and a peacock; that Abraham, after he had divided them, dissected them, then mingled them together: some add, that he even pounded them in a mortar, and composed but one mass of them, of which he made four portions, which he placed on the tops of four different mountains; then holding up their heads, which had been reserved by him, he called them separately by their names; each of them immediately returned, re-joined its head, and flew away. Thus God convinced Abraham of a resurrection.

[It is impossible for us to ascertain what ancient writings Mahomet might use in compiling his Koran (for that parts of it are so compiled, admits of no dispute); it seems not improbable that many fictitious, and other fancy-embellished histories (like those of the spurious gospels of our Lord Jesus) might be in circulation in Mahomet's time, of which Abraham was the hero, and that out of these he selected; but whether the worst, or the best parts, we cannot tell. It might, however, be agreeable, if we could trace enough to ascertain the ideas annexed in that country to the "rising of the star," reported to mark the birth of Abraham; perhaps it might explain the prophecy of Balaam (Numb. xxiv. 17.), or it might elucidate the ready apprehension of the eastern Magi, who when they, in the East, saw a certain star rise in a certain manner and position, and in a certain portion of the heavens, inferred the birth of a remarkable child; indeed no less than the King of Judea; and they journeyed many miles to visit him. How came the rising of a star thus connected in idea with the birth of a child? was the idea ancient? and what might be its origin?]

One of the greatest prerogatives of Abraham, say the Musselmans, is his being the stock from which sprung the glorious Virgin Mary, and her son, whose miraculous conception and birth they acknowledge. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 583.

The Magi, or worshippers of fire (a sect still subsisting in Persia), have equal respect for Abraham with the followers of Mahomet. They believe Zoroaster, their great master, to be the same with Abraham, and that he was called Zerdoust, or Zoroaster, i.e. "the friend of fire," because, when thrown by Nimrod into a fiery furnace, he came out of it unhurt; the fire having caressed and treated him as a friend, instead of injuring him. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. page 16.

It is well worth remarking, and indeed it is our duty to remark, how greatly inferior, in all respects, are the stories told respecting Abraham, by these his Arabian descendants, when compared with the simplicity of the Mosaic narration: however, these accounts serve to show the excellence and eminence of Abraham's character, the certainty of many particulars of his history, his travels, his marriage with Hagar, and his having Ishmael for his son (from whom the Arabs are descended), which with many other facts demonstrate the general history, and the dignity, of this venerable patriarch.

Having given the former as specimens of oriental traditions and tales, we shall give the following as a specimen of Jewish narrations. It is related by Mr. David Levi, in his Lingua Sacra.

"I cannot omit taking notice of what is related in Medrash Berishith, concerning this patriarch; especially, as it shows his fortitude, and firm reliance on the protection of the Supreme Being; and at the same time exhibits the rational method which he pursued in endeavouring to wean mankind from that gross idolatry and superstition into which they were plunged. Terah, the father of Abraham, was an idolater, and likewise a dealer in, and maker of idols. It chanced one time, that Terah went on a journey, and left Abraham to take care of and dispose of the idols during his absence.

"When a man came to purchase an idol, Abraham asked him his age. When the man had answered him,—Abraham replied, "Can it be possible, that a person of your years can be so stupid as to worship that which was made but yesterday?" The man being quite overwhelmed with shame, hung down his head, and departed. In this manner he served several. At length there came an old woman, with a measure of fine flour in her hand, which she told him she had brought as an offering to all the idols. Abraham at this was exceedingly wroth, and took a large stick and broke all the idols, except the largest, which he left whole, and put the stick into his hand.

"When Terah returned and perceived all the idols broken, he asked Abraham how that came to pass? Abraham informed him, 'That there came an old woman and brought an offering of fine flour to the idols: upon which they immediately fell together by the ears for the prize, when the large one killed them all with the stick which he held in his hand.

"Terah feeling the full force of the satire, was greatly exasperated; and immediately accused Abraham before Nimrod, in order to have him punished for the contempt shown to his gods.

"Nimrod commanded him to worship the fire; but Abraham answered him 'that it would be more profitable to worship the water, which extinguishes the fire.' 'Why then,' says Nimrod, 'worship the water.' 'No,' says Abraham, 'it were better to worship the clouds, which furnish the water.' Nimrod bid him worship them; but he told him, 'It would be better to worship the wind, which disperses the clouds.' Nimrod then bid him worship the wind. Abraham answered, 'It would be preferable to worship man, who was able to endure the wind.' 'Well,' says Nimrod, 'I see it is your intention to deride me; I must therefore tell you, briefly, that I worship none but the fire, and if you do not do the same, my intention is to throw you therein; and then I shall see, whether the God you worship will come to your relief; and immediately had him thrown into a fiery furnace.

"In the interim, they questioned his brother Haran concerning his faith, who answered, 'If Abraham succeeds, I will be of his; but if not, of Nimrod's.' Upon which, Nimrod ordered him to be immediately thrown into the furnace likewise, where he was presently consumed; but Abraham came out of the furnace without receiving the least injury.

"This agrees with the 28th verse of the xi. chapter of Genesis: 'And Haran died in the presence of his father Terah, in the land of his nativity, in the fire of the Chaldees; for it was by means of the accusation which Terah exhibited against Abraham, that Haran suffered death; so that he may justly be said to have died in the presence of his father. Here is an admirable lesson for mankind: which clearly points out the difference between those who serve the LORD in truth and sincerity, and those who the lukewarm, and easily turn to that which seems most profitable in this world. This transaction, the author of Shalsheleth Hakabala says, happened in the seventieth year of Abraham."

It is by no means likely that Abraham resided at Babylon, if he ever visited that city; as the course of his journey to Canaan lay much farther north; but this seems to be a misapplied tradition of the deliverance of the three Hebrews from the fiery furnace, recorded by Daniel; and Nimrod is substituted for Nebuchadnezzar. Vide BABYLON.

We are told (Article Ben Scolman, D'Herbelot) that, A. D. 1119, Abraham's tomb was discovered near Hebron, wherein Jacob likewise, and Isaac were interred. The bodies were very entire, and many gold and silver lamps were found in this place. The Mahometans have so great a respect for this tomb, that they make it their fourth pilgrimage (the three others being Mecca, Medina, and Jerusalem). The Christians built a church over the cave of Machpeluh, where Abraham was buried: which the Turks have changed into a mosque, and forbidden Christians from approaching. Quaresm. Elmid. tom. ii. page 772.

The place where Abraham received the three angels, the oak of Mamre, was likewise honoured by Christians, and even by the Jews and Pagans. There is a chapel on mount Moriah, at Jerusalem, on the supposition, that this was the scene of the intended sacrifice of Isaac. Vide Extract from Sandys, FRAGMENTS, No CXXXIX.

Our Saviour assures us that Abraham desired earnestly to see his day, that he saw it, and was glad, John viii. 56. Elsewhere, he represents the happiness of the righteous as a sitting with Abraham Isaac and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven (Matt. viii. 11.); also a reception into Abraham's bosom, as into a place of rest, opposed to the misery of hell, Luke xvi. 22. The emperor, Alexander Severus, who knew Abraham only by the wonders which the Jews and Christians related, conceived so high an idea of him, that he ranked him, with Jesus Christ, among his gods. (Lamprid. in Severo.)

The history of Abraham has been embellished with a variety of fictions. — Some have said that he reigned at Damascus. (Nicol. Damasc. apud Joseph. lib. i. cap. 7. Justin. lib. xxxvi.) — that he dwelt long in Egypt (Artapan. et Eupolem. apud Euseb. Præpar. lib. ix. cap. 17, 18.); that he taught the Egyptians astronomy and arithmetic (Joseph. Antiq. lib. i. cap. 8.); that he invented letters, and the Hebrew language (Suidas in Abraham.) or the characters of the Syrians and Chaldeans (Isidor. Hispal. lib. i. cap. 3. Origen.); that he was the author of several works, among others, of the famous book entitled Jezira, or the Creation; a work mentioned in the Talmud, and greatly valued by some Rabbins; but those who have examined it without prejudice, speak of it with contempt. [This book, attributed to the patriarch Abraham, has been published, with a comment, written by the celebrated Rabbins of the same name. In it there are two-and-thirty ways described, and fifty gates, which lead men to the knowledge of all mysteries.] In the first ages of Christianity, the heretics, called Sethians, published "Abraham's Revelations." (Epiph. Hæres. 39. cap. 5.) Athanasius, in his Synopsis, speaks of the "Assumption of Abraham." (Origen in Luc. Homil. 35.) notices an apocryphal book of Abraham's, wherein two angels, one good, the other bad, dispute concerning the damnation or salvation of Abraham. The Jews (Rab. Selem. in Bava Bathra, cap. 1.) attribute to him the Morning Prayer, the 89th Psalm, a Treatise on Idolatry, and other works (Vide Gemar. Codic. Talmud. Aboda Zarah, cap. 1.). The Magi, or worshippers of fire, affirm he was the author of the books which they call Zend, Pazend, and Vestha, wherein their religion is comprehended. D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. page 16.

Not only the Jews, Magians, and Mahometans, but the Sabians and the Indians claim Abraham to themselves, as the great patriarch and founder of their several sects; each pretending that their religion is the same which Abraham professed, and by his reformation established among them; and that to restore this reformation, was all that Zoroaster, Mahomet, and the author of the Sabian sect, whoever he was, pretended to.

ABSALOM, or Abeshaloom, אֲבִשָּׁלוֹם 'Abeshalón; father of peace; or peace of the father, or, of consummation, or of recompense; from שָׁלוֹם shalom, peace, accomplishment, recompense; and אֲבִי ab, father. (Or, as the term peace is taken in Hebrew for prosperity; the prosperity of his father.)

I. ABSALOM, son of David, by Maacah, daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur, was the handsomest man in Israel, and had the finest head of hair, 2 Sam. xiv. 25. When his hair was cut at a certain time, because it incommoded him by its weight, it weighed two hundred shekels by the king's standard, which might be about thirty-one ounces; this is indeed extraordinary, but not incredible; since it has been affirmed, that some women have thirty-two ounces of hair on their heads. (See Dissert. on the weight of Absalom's hair, by M. Le Pelliter, of Roan. Journal of Trevoux, 1702, page 176.) [It is uncertain after what interval of time Absalom's hair was cut; whether after a vow, as was customary, or whether only when he found it too heavy to be any longer borne: there is no need to suppose it was cut every year; but, that it was of an extraordinary weight, is evident from the notice taken of it.]

Two years after the violence offered to Tamar by her brother Amnon, Absalom invited all the royal family to the sheep-shearing feast, resolving to revenge the injury. When warmed with wine, Amnon, by Absalom's directions, was assassinated. Absalom retired to king Talmi, his mother's father, in the country of Geshur, 2 Sam. xiii. Here he continued three years, during which David made no effort to pursue him; but Joab, Absalom's uncle, observing a fondness in the king's heart for his son, contrived, by the interposition of a woman of Tekoah, to procure his consent for Absalom's return. Absalom came back to Jerusalem, but David forbade him his presence. He continued two years in disgrace; at length he sent for Joab, purposing to use his intercession with the king; but he refusing to come, Absalom commanded his servants to set on fire a field of barley belonging to him: being informed of this, he came and complained to Absalom. Absalom confessed that this was done by his orders, with the hope of an opportunity to request his mediation, to entreat the king's forgiveness. Joab related what had passed to David, who received Absalom into favour as before, 2 Sam. xiv.

Absalom now considering himself as presumptive heir to the crown, set up a magnificent equipage; and every morning came to the palace gate, where, calling to him familiarly, all who had business, and came to demand justice, he kindly enquired into their case, insinuated the great difficulty of obtaining justice, and thus by degrees alienated the hearts of the people from his father, and attached them to himself. When he thought he might openly declare himself, he desired permission from the king to go to Hebron; under pretence of performing some vow, which he had made during his abode at Geshur, a long while ago, 2 Sam. xv. 1—9.

He went, therefore, to Hebron, attended by two hundred men, who followed him without the least knowledge of his rebellious design. At the same time, he sent emissaries throughout Israel, with orders to sound the trumpet, and proclaim that Absalom was king at Hebron. There was soon a great resort of people to him, and Absalom was acknowledged by the major part of the nation. David, therefore, and his officers, fled from Jerusalem, whither Absalom went directly, and was received as king. Ahithophel advised him publicly to abuse his father's concubines, to convince the people that the breach was beyond reconciliation, and also, that troops might be sent instantly in pursuit of David; but Hushai, David's friend, who pretended to follow the popular party, diverted him from complying with this counsel, 2 Sam. xv. 10. et seq.

The next day Absalom marched against David with all his forces, and having crossed the Jordan, prepared to attack the king, his father. David put his troops under the command of Joab: the rebel army was routed, and 20,000 were killed. Absalom, mounted on a mule, fled through the forest of Ephraim, where, as he was passing under a large oak with very thick boughs, his hair became entangled in the branches, and his mule going on swiftly, left him there hanging, unable to extricate himself; so that his beautiful hair proved his destruction. A soldier informed Joab of this, who took three darts, and thrust them through the heart of Absalom: and while he was yet breathing, and hanging on the oak, two young men of Joab's armour-bearers smote him and slew him. His body was thrown into a great pit in the wood, and a large heap of stones was laid over him. David lamented him with excessive grief, 2 Sam. xviii.

Absalom, in his lifetime, erected a pillar in the king's valley, saying, 'I have no son; and this shall be a monument to perpetuate my name, 2 Sam. xviii. 18. There is a monument shown at present east of Jerusalem, in the valley of Jehoshaphat, called Absalom's pillar, but on no decisive authority. Josephus (Antiq. lib. vii. cap. 9.), speaking of Absalom's monument, says, it was a marble column, distant about two furlongs, or 300 paces, from Jerusalem. Travellers assure us, that those who pass by Absalom's pillar throw a stone at it, to show their abhorrence of the son's rebellion against his father. There is so great a heap of stones near it, that they almost hide the lower part of this monument. Vide PLATES: MAP OF JERUSALEM, the margin.

Scripture intimates, that when this prince erected it, he had no son. It is said however (2 Sam. xiv. 27.), that he had three sons, and one daughter of exceeding beauty, named Tamar: but, probably, these children, at least the sons did not live; for some believe that Tamar, his daughter, married Rehoboam, king of Judah. The death of Absalom happened A. M. 2981. ante A. D. 1023.

II. ABSALOM, of Jerusalem, induced Manahem, son of Judas, the Galilean, to think of making himself king of the Jews; in the twelfth of Nero. A. D. 66. Joseph. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 17.

III. ABSALOM, uncle and father-in-law to Aristobulus, king of the Jews; made prisoner by Pompey at the siege of Jerusalem. A. M. 3941. ante A. D. 63. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 4.

ABSALON, ambassador of Judas Maccabæus to Lysias, general of the army of Antiochus, surnamed Eupator, 2 Macc. xi. 17.

ABSTINENCE, forbearance of any thing: generally used with reference to forbearance from food. Many have supposed, that the antediluvians abstained from wine, and from flesh as food, because the Scripture expressly notices, that Noah, after the deluge, began to plant a vineyard, and that God permitted him to eat flesh (Gen. ix. 3. 20.); whereas he gave Adam no other food than herbs and fruits, i. 29. The contrary opinion is supported by other learned interpreters, who believe, that men, before the deluge, abstained from none of the pleasures of wine and good cheer; and the Scripture, in few words, intimates to what excess of profligacy they were arrived, when it tells us, that 'all flesh had corrupted its way upon the earth' (vi. 12.); whence we may reasonably infer, that if God had forbidden the use either of flesh or of wine, they would have taken very little notice of his prohibition.

[Nevertheless, it must be owned, that Scripture seems to represent VIOLENCE as the prevailing crime before the deluge; that is, the unjustifiable taking away of human life: and the precepts given to Noah against shedding of blood, seem to confirm this idea. The reported progress of the ages, also, among the heathen, the Golden Age, the Silver Age, and the Iron Age, appear to be founded on a traditionary admission of the same idea. Perhaps it may be true, that the pious before the deluge used very little, if any flesh as food; while the impious indulged in it ordinarily: and this abstinence may contribute to account for the long lives of antediluvian patriarchs. The Institutes of Menu inform us, that animal food was originally used only after sacrifice, and as a participation consequent on that rite. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXLII.

The Mosaic law ordained, that the priests should abstain from wine during the time of their being employed in the temple service, Lev. x. 9. The same abstinence was enjoined on Nazarites, during the whole time of their Nazariteship, or separation, Numb. vi. 3. 4. The Jews abstain from several sorts of animals, as ordered by the law; as do several other nations. (Vide ANIMALS.) In conformity with such ideas, some among the primitive Christians, abstained from meats prohibited by the law, and from flesh sacrificed to idols:—others disregarded such forbearance, and used their Christian liberty. St. Paul has laid down rules concerning this, 1 Cor. viii. 7. 10; and Rom. xiv. 1, 2, 3.

The council of Jerusalem, held by the apostles, enjoined believers, converted from heathenism, to abstain from blood, from meats strangled, from fornication, and from idolatry, Acts xv. 20.

St. Paul says (1 Cor. ix. 25.), that wrestlers, in order to obtain a corruptible crown, abstain from all things, i. e. from every thing which might weaken them. In his first Epistle to Timothy (chap. iv. 3.), he blames certain heretics, who condemned marriage, and the use of meats, which God hath created. St. Paul requires Christians to abstain from all appearance of evil (1 Thess. v. 22.); and with much stronger reason, from every thing really evil, and contrary to religion and piety.

ABUBUS, father of Ptolemy, by whose procurement his father-in-law, Simon Maccabæus, was assassinated in the castle of Docus, 1 Macc. xvi. 11. 16. A.M. 3869. ante A.D. 135.

ABUMA, a city of Judah, the birth-place of Zebudah, mother of Jehoikim: called Rumah, 2 Kings xxiii. 36. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 8.

ABYSS, or Deep. (1.) Hell is called by this name in Scripture, Luke viii. 31; Rom. x. 7; Rev. ix. 1; xi. 7, &c. (2.) The deepest parts of the sea. (3.) The chaos, which, in the beginning of the world, was unformed and vacant.

[ABYSS, in the New Testament, denotes the common receptacle of the dead; the grave, the deep (or depth) of earth, under which the body being deposited, the state of the soul corresponding thereto, still more unseen, still deeper, still farther distant from human inspection, is, that remote country, that "bourn, from whence no traveller returns." Vide Rom. x. 7. 'who shall descend into the abyss?'

ABYSS, a deep place of punishment. 'The devils besought Jesus, that he would not send them into the abyss,' a place which they evidently dreaded, Luke viii. 31. The same idea arises from Rev. ix. 11.]

The Hebrews were (and the generality of the Eastern people at this day are) of opinion, that the abyss, the sea and waters, encompassed the whole earth; that the earth floated upon the abyss, almost, say they, like a water-melon swimming on and in the water. They believe that the earth was founded upon the waters (Psalm xxiv. 2; xxxiii. 6, 7; cxxxvi. 6.), or, at least, that it had its foundation on the abyss; and under these waters, at the bottom of this abyss, the giants are groaning, and suffering the punishment of their sin. There the Rephaim are confined, those old giants, who, when they were living, made the people round about them tremble; and in these dark dungeons, the prophets describe the kings of Tyre, Babylon, and Egypt, as lying down, i. e. buried, yet suffering the punishment of their pride and cruelty. Vide HELL, GIANTS.

'I saw,' says St. John, 'a star fall from heaven, and to him was given the key of the bottomless pit (the abyss). And he opened the bottomless abyss,' &c. Rev. ix. 1, 2; and ver. 11. 'the angel of the bottomless pit, whose name is the Destroyer.' Accordingly (chap. xi. 7.), the beast is represented as ascending out of the bottomless pit (the abyss), and making war against the two witnesses of God. And chap. xx. 1. 'the angel of the Lord descends from heaven, with the key of the bottomless pit (the abyss), wherein he shuts up the dragon for a thousand years.'

Fountains and rivers, in the opinion of the Hebrews, are derived from the abyss, or sea; issuing from thence through invisible channels, and returning through others, Eccl. i. 7.

ACABARES, or Chabarus: a castle, or city, on a rock, which Josephus fortified, during the war between the Jews and Romans. De Bello, lib. ii. cap. 20. Vitâ, page 1013. Χαράβη.

ACCAD, אַכַּד, 'Aḥḥād: a vessel, a pitcher; from cad: otherwise, a sparkle; from כִּידֹד kidood.

ACCAD, a city, built by Nimrod, Gen. x. 10. [The word cad, signifies not only a jug for liquids, but an earthen jar, in which corn is kept, in the East: such are placed low in the earth or under ground. Probably this name denotes 'a sudden descent,' like the brow of a hill, &c.]

The LXX write this name Arcad: the Syriac writes Achar. Ephraim the Syrian says, Achar is the city Nisibis; in this he is followed by Abulpharagius. Jerom says, Achad is now called Nisibis. The Targum of Jerusalem, and Jonathan, read Nesibin. The antiquity of Nisibis is unquestionable.

Simon thinks the name Accad denotes 'the reins, or bridle;' i. e. of the people around it. This is taking the appellation in a bad sense; and a sense so very impolitic that only necessity could induce its adoption.]

ACCEPT: to take pleasure in; either in whole, or in part.

To meet a favourable reception; as Malachi i. 8. 'if thou offerest the lame or sick to thy governor, will he accept thy person?' will he take the present kindly from thee? Vide FRAGMENTS, No. xcvi. 'No prophet is accepted in his own country, (Luke iv. 24.); his countrymen do not value, or honour him, as they ought; as we say, 'familiarity breeds contempt.' 'Neither acceptest thou the person of any' (Luke xx. 21.); thou hast no partial regard to any in thy decisions: so, Job xiii. 10. 'He will surely reprove you, if ye do secretly accept persons.'

'An acceptable time' (Psalm lxxix. 13.), a time of good pleasures, a favourable opportunity; a time when thou art bestowing favours.

ACCHO, or Auchoo: עָכָה: close, inclosed; from עָקַק ouk, to squeeze; or from עָקַד oukeh, to inclose.

[Rather, straitened, confined, closely pressed. The Arabic signifies, sand exposed to the heat of the sun; as if the beach of this town had been originally a mere gritty surface on the sea shore. Such appears to be the character of Acric, the ancient Accho, at this day.]

ACCHO, a city of Phœnicia, now called Acra, and famous for the repulse there given to the French General Buonaparte, by the English under Sir Sidney Smith, in 1799, is situated on the coast of the Mediterranean sea, north of Mount Carmel, and has a tolerable harbour. It was given to the tribe of Asher, (Judg. i. 31; Josh. xix. 25. in Gr.) One of the Ptolemies enlarged and beautified this city, and called it Ptolemais. The Christians in the holy war gave it the name of Acre, or St. John of Acre. The Arabians call it Acca. The Crusaders gave the name of St. John of Acre to this city, because of a magnificent church which was built there, and dedicated to St. John. When Syria was subjected by the Romans, this city was made a colony by the emperor Claudius. The medals of gold and silver of Alexander the Great, struck in this town with Phœnician characters, call it Aco. We have many of its medals with Latin inscriptions: but the Greek are very rare.

This city was of a triangular form, being washed by the sea on the west and south, surrounded by two strong walls towards the land, at about fifty paces from each other, and fortified by towers at equal distances. On the first wall, eastward, was a tower, larger and stronger than the rest, called the king's tower; at the middle was such another tower, always called 'the cursed tower.' And it proved its right to this name; for by this the Saracens entered the city, and took it, as was observed at that time. This was the last city possessed by the Christians in Syria. The Sultan of Egypt, surnamed Mellemesson, having besieged it in 1291, with 60,000 horse, and 100,000 foot, the knights of St. John of Jerusalem defended it bravely; but it was ultimately taken, and almost destroyed. The city is situated in a plain, but with hills around it. Its situation and boundaries cannot be better expressed than in the words of Josephus, who says, "This Ptolemais is a maritime city of Galilee, built in the great plain. It is encompassed with mountains; that on the east side, sixty furlongs off, belongs to Galilee; but that on the south belongs to Carmel, which is distant from it a hundred and twenty furlongs; that on the north is the highest, and is called by the people of the country, the ladder of the Tyrians, which is at the distance of a hundred furlongs." De Bello, lib. ii. c. 10. s. 2. At two miles distant from Accho is the small river Belus (which flows from Carmel into the Mediterranean sea); near it is the sepulchre of Memnon. Accho was considered as the heathen land of the Jews, and all beyond it, northwards. There was a bath of Venus, of considerable antiquity, here; and, as the Rabbins thought, prior to the reference of it to the goddess: it might therefore be a natural convenience.

Volney thus describes the city of Accho: "Nine leagues to the south of Sour is the city of Acre.

It is situated at the northern cape of a bay, which extends in a semicircle of three leagues, as far as the point of Carmel. After the expulsion of the crusaders, it remained almost deserted; but in our time was again revived, by the industry of Daher; and the works erected by Djezzar, within the last ten years have rendered it one of the most considerable towns on the coast."

It was this Djezzar whom Sir Sidney Smith assisted in defending this town against Buonaparte, who here terminated his Syrian expedition in 1799.

Since the time of its siege by Buonaparte, Accho has been much strengthened, and considerably beautified, and improved. Its present population is estimated at 20,000.

ACCURSED, see CURSE, CHEREM, ANATHEMA.

ACELDAMA, חֶלֶק־דָּמָה, Ἀγρὸς αἱματος: a Syriac word, compounded of חֶלֶק chakel, a field, or inheritance; and דָּם dam, or dama, blood. [ACELDAMA is thought, by some, not to be accurately either Hebrew or Syriac; but an instance of the corruption which the Hebrew language, in our Lord's time, had suffered. The Hebrew is, perhaps, by transposition from חֶלֶק chelek, a portion.]

ACELDAMA, a field, which the priests purchased with the thirty pieces of silver which had rewarded the treason of Judas Iscariot, as the price of Jesus Christ's blood, Matt. xxvii. 8.; Acts i. 19. They, thinking it not lawful to use this money for sacred service, because it was the price of blood, bought the potter's field with it, to be a burying-place for strangers. This field is south of Jerusalem: it is very small, and is partly covered with an arched roof. It was formerly reported, that bodies deposited in it were consumed in less than three or four days. Drutmar, a monk of Corbie, says, that in his time there was an hospital in this place for the reception of French pilgrims in their journey to the Holy land. Vide MAP of JERUSALEM: with the extract from Mr. MAUNDRELL, FRAGMENTS, No. CXXXVI.

ACHAIA, Ἀχαια: grief, sorrow, or trouble.

ACHAIA, a province of Greece, whereof Corinth was the capital. St. Paul preached at Corinth, and in Achaia, Acts xviii. 12. [It is worthy of remark, that Luke (Acts xviii. 12.), calls Gallio deputy (i. e. proconsul) of Achaia; which, indeed, was the title of the superior officer there at the time he wrote, but which had not long been so, nor did it long continue: this accuracy confirms the general tenor and date of his relation, in no small degree.] The Acts of St. Andrew relate that he suffered martyrdom in this province.

Achaia, largely taken, was Hellas, or Greece, now Livadia; bounded north by Thessaly, west by the river Achelous, east by the Archipelago, south by the isthmus of Corinth.

Achaia, in a more confined sense, was a province in the Morea, now called Romania Alta; it is north of the Peloponnessus, and runs westward along the bay of Corinth: its Metropolis was Patræ, Patara, or Patres. Vide PETHOR. Vide Pliny, lib. iv. cap. 5; Strabo, lib. viii; Ptolemy, lib. iii.

ACHAICUS, a disciple of St. Paul, recommended to the peculiar respect of the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xvi. 15, 17. He, with Stephanus and Fortunatus, carried St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians, A. D. 56.

ACHAN, or Aucan, עֶכָן achar; otherwise a snake.

ACHAN, son of Carmi, of the tribe of Judah: he purloined a goodly Babylonish garment, an ingot of gold, and 200 shekels of silver, from among the spoils of Jericho, against the express injunction of God, which had devoted that city, Josh. vi. 17. vii. 26. Some days after, Joshua sent 3000 men to take the little town of Ai, distant three or four leagues; but they were obliged to fly, thirty-six Israelites being killed. At this loss they were much discouraged, and cried to the LORD. The LORD said, 'Israel hath sinned, and transgressed my covenant; hath stolen, and dissembled: I will be with you no more, unless ye destroy the accursed from among you. To-morrow, the lot shall discover this crime, and the guilty shall be burnt, with all that belongs to him,' vii. 3—11.

The next day, Joshua assembled Israel, and the lot fell on the tribe of Judah, then on the family of Zarhi, then on the house of Zabdi, and at last on the person of Achan; to whom Joshua said, 'My son, give glory to the LORD, confess what you have done, without concealing any thing.' Achan replied, 'Having seen among the spoils a handsome Babylonish cloak, and 200 shekels in silver, with an ingot of gold, of fifty shekels' weight, I took them, and hid them in my tent.' These proofs of the crime being produced in the presence of all Israel, Joshua laid them out before the LORD. Then taking Achan, the gold, silver, furniture, tent, and all belonging to him, into the valley of Achor, a place north of Jericho, Joshua said to him, 'Since thou hast troubled us, the LORD shall trouble thee, this day.' Then they stoned him; his family, and all his property, was consumed by fire; and they raised a great heap of stones over him, ver. 16. et seq.: A. M. 2553. ante A. D. 1451.

REMARKS ON THE HISTORY OF ACHAN.

[Such is the manner in which this history is usually understood; but we ought, at least, to observe the following considerations:

I. The sentence passed on the family of Achan, might be justified by reflecting, (1.) That probably he was assisted in this theft by his family; for, if not, (2.) He could never have secreted such articles in the earth under his tent (which implies some trouble in digging), without being observed by his family, and detected by them, who ought to have opposed him, or immediately to have given notice of this transaction to the Elders; which, as they did not do, they became, by concealment at least, partakers of his crime.

II. But, possibly, the sense of the passage should rather be understood to this effect: 'They stoned HIM (Achan) with stones: and burned them (his property) with fire, and (rather, OR) stoned them with stones;' i. e. making a distinction in guilt between his property, and the things stolen, 'and raised over HIM (Achan) a heap of stones.' Observe, (1.) Had his family been stoned, would not the heap of stones have included THEM, ALSO! whereas, it is raised over HIM. (2.) His sons and daughters (nothing is said of a wife), who acted, no doubt, in some degree under his authority, were certainly not punished more rigorously (by burning and stoning) than the principal criminal himself. (3.) Was not the burning applied to such things as might suffer by burning—the tents, garments, and property of that kind; and the stoning to what the fire might have had little or no effect on—the metals, &c.? or, these might have been first burned, and then stoned, as in our translation; but to what effect could the family of Achan be first burned and then stoned? Having suffered the severer punishment by burning, wherefore stone them afterwards! and wherefore exclude them from the monument of this crime? Unbelief of the effect of Joshua's curse, might not be confined to Achan personally; and his family might be punished, in being spectators of his punishment.]

ACHBOR, or Auchoor, עֶכְבֹּר a mouse; otherwise, inclosing the well; from עָכַס okes, to shut up, and בֹּר bor, a well.

I. ACHBOR, father of Baal-hanan, king of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 38.

II. ACHBOR, an officer of king Josiah, sent by him to consult the prophetess Huldah, concerning the book of the law, recently found, 2 Kings xxii. 14.; A. M. 3380. ante A. D. 624.

III. ACHBOR, father of Elnathan, Jer. xxvi. 22.

ACHIAB, brother of my father; from אָח ach, a brother, and אָב ab, a father.

ACHIAB, nephew of Herod the Great, and governor of one of the fortresses of Jerusalem. Herod falling sick at Samaria, Achiab prevented the design of Alexandra, mother of Mariamne, to seize the fortresses of Jerusalem. On another occasion, he hindered his uncle Herod from killing himself, as he attempted, in excess of grief, with a short sword which he held in his hand. He likewise rendered ineffectual the efforts of 2000 men, who sought to attack him. Joseph. Antig. lib. xv. cap. 9.

ACHIM, אָחִימִי, I will confirm; or, I will prepare; from כִּים kim, to confirm; or בִּין chin, to prepare.

ACHIM, son of Zadok, father of Eliud, of the tribe of Judah, and family of David: in the genealogy of our Saviour, Matt. i. 14.

ACHIAUR, אַחִיאוּר, אָחִיאוּר: brother of light; or, light of my brother: from אוּר aur, light; and אַח ach, a brother.

I. ACHIOR, a friend and relation of Tobit; both were of the city and tribe of Naphtali, and carried by Salmaneser to Nineveh.

II. ACHIOR, general of the Ammonites, who joined Holofernes with auxiliary troops, in that general's expedition into Egypt. Bethulia having shut its gates against Holofernes, he called the princes of Moab and Ammon, demanding of them, with great passion, who those people were that opposed his passage! for, he presumed, that the Moabites, and Ammonites, being neighbours to the Hebrews, could best inform him. Achior answered, 'My Lord, these people are originally of Chaldea; and because they would not worship the gods of the Chaldeans, were obliged to leave their country.' He related also, Jacob's descent into Egypt; the miracles of Moses, and the conquest of Canaan; observing, that this people was visibly protected by God, while they continued faithful to him; but that God never failed to take vengeance on their infidelity. 'Now, therefore,' added he, 'learn whether those people have committed any fault against their God; if so, attack them, for he will deliver them up into your hands; if not, we shall not be able to resist them, because God will undertake their defence, and cover us with confusion, Judith v. 2, 3, &c.

The great men of Holofernes's army, moved with indignation, were inclined to kill Achior; and Holofernes, transported with fury, said to him, 'Since you have taken upon you to be a prophet, in telling us that the God of Israel would be the Defender of his people, to show you there is no other God besides Nebuchodonozor, my master, when we have put all these people to the edge of the sword, we will destroy you likewise, and you shall understand, that Nebuchodonozor is lord of all the earth.' They carried him, therefore, near the city, tied his hands behind him, and fastened him to a tree, that the inhabitants might take him into the city, where he declared what had happened. Then the people of Bethulia fell with their faces to the ground, and with great cries begged God's assistance, beseeching him to vindicate the honour of his name, and to humble the pride of their enemies; after which, Ozias, a leading man, received Achior into his house.

When Judith was returning to Bethulia, with the head of Holofernes, Achior was called, and Judith showed it to him, saying, 'Behold the head of that man who insulted the God of Israel, and boasted that he would put you and us to the edge of the sword.' Achior was extremely terrified; but soon recovering, he abandoned the heathen superstitions, was circumcised, and received into Israel.

This war is by some placed in the time of Manasseh, king of Judah, (A. M. 3348, ante A. D. 656): by others, after the return from Babylon. Vide JUDITH.

ACHIRAM, or Ahiram, אֲחִירָם: elevation of my brother; from רָמַם ramam, to lift up, and אַח ach, a brother: otherwise, fraud of the brother; from רָמָה rama, which also signifies, to cast or throw.

ACHIRAM, or Ahiram, of the tribe of Benjamin, chief of a great family, when Israel came out of Egypt, Numb. xxvi. 38.

ACHISH, אַחִישׁ: thus it is; from אַח ach, surely, and יֶשׁ jesh, it is: otherwise, how is this!

ACHISH, king of Gath. David having resolved to withdraw from the dominions of Saul, who sought his life, retired to Gath, a city of the Philistines, (1 Sam. xxi. 10.) The officers of the king asked him, whether this was not that David who was so popular in his own country; and of whom the women said at public dancing, 'Saul killed his thousands, and David his ten thousands?' David hearing of these discourses, and alarmed for his life, counterfeited madness. Then Achish said to his servants, 'Lo, you see the man is mad; wherefore then have ye brought him to me! Have we not mad men enough, without bringing him too hither?' David, by this stratagem, escaped the danger. A. M. 2944. ante A. D. 1060. Vide DAVID. [Some suppose that David was really seized with an epilepsy, or falling sickness; and certain expressions of the LXX, seem to imply that such was their conception of the history.]

After three or four years David desired to be received, for a permanency, either into the royal city, or elsewhere in his dominions. Achish, who knew his valour, and the animosity between him and Saul, willingly received him into Gath, with 600 men, and their families, (1 Sam. xxvii. 2, 3.) After some time, David entreated Achish, for a place of retreat in some town in the country: "for why should thy servant dwell in the royal city with thee?" Achish gave him Ziglāg, and confided absolutely in him, saying, "He has done so much mischief to his own people, that he will never think of returning to them, but will be always engaged closely in my service."

About two years more had elapsed, when the Philistines took the field against Israel; and David received orders from Achish to march with him; he replied, "Surely thou shalt know what thy servant can do:" the king offered to entrust him with the guard of his person. The Philistines being advanced to Apheck, a town in the great plain of Jezreel, David and his people marched in the rear, with Achish. Then said the princes of the Philistines to Achish, "What do these Hebrews here?" and being dissatisfied, they obliged the king of Gath to dismiss them. David did not continue long with this prince after the battle of Gilboa, wherein Saul and his sons were slain. From Ziglāg he came to Hebron in Judah; after which time, Achish is not mentioned.

[ACHMETA. This word in our translation denotes a place, Ezra vi. 2. "There was found at Achmeta a roll,"—some translators suppose it means the register office, or rather, the book-case-closets wherein the official rolls of the government were kept; and this seems very plausible. Others suppose that Achmeta is the same with Ecbatana, the royal city, where, in the palace, the rolls were kept. This agrees with the Vulgate, which reads Ecbatani, and 1 Esdra vi. 22. Apoc. also Josephus Antig. lib. xi. cap. 4. Perhaps it was a part of the palace set apart for this purpose, and known by this name. Col. Vullancey, in Archeologia, vol. vi. p. 284, says, "With respect to the name Ogham, which implies a sacred and secret character, I am of opinion, that, like all other scientific words in the ancient Irish, it is of oriental origin, and derived from the Chaldaic or Phenician, אַחַם, acham; the true and literal meaning of which word is, a court character, appropriated to the records of the church and state." I think there is much probability in this notion of the Colonel, and therefore see nothing amiss in rendering achmeta, (as ACHAMETA from acham) by something like our English word engrossed, as denoting an official character of writing:—"There was found an engrossed roll."—This is much better than in vase fictili, or in vasa ænea, as some would render.]

ACHOR, Aucoor, אַחֹר, trouble: from אַחַר, achar, to trouble. A valley in the territory of Jericho, and in the tribe of Benjamin, where Achan was stoned, Josh. vii. 24. xv. 7. Isaiah

PART I. Edit. IV.

lxv. 10. Hosea ii. 15. The application in the two prophets, the last especially, deserves notice, as implying an extreme, contrary to the primary intention of the name. Vide ACHAN.

ACHSAH, or Ocseh, אַחְסָה, 'Oḡá: adorned: from אָחַס, oches, chains, ornaments for the feet: otherwise, bursting of the veil; from אָחַס, savah, a veil, and אָחַס, casach, to beat down, cut off.

ACHSAH, daughter of Caleb, was promised by her father as a reward [vide DOWRY] to him who should take Kirjath-Sepher, which was fallen to his lot. Othniel, his brother's son, having taken that town, married Achsa. While they were conducting the bride in procession to her husband's house, Othniel having persuaded her to solicit from her father, a particular field that was well watered, she stopped her ass, which impeding the procession, her father desired to know what she would have? she answered, "Father, thou hast given me a south land, give me also springs of water:" and he gave her a field which had upper springs and lower springs: a valuable acquisition, no doubt, to his gift of Kirjath-Sepher. For the importance of wells and water in the East, vide FRAGMENTS, No. lxx. and evi.

ACHSAPH, אַחְסָפָה, poison, tricks; from אָחַס, cheseph: or, one that breaks; from אָחַס, shapha, according to the Chaldee root: otherwise, the lip, or, brim of any thing, אָחַס. [An inchanter, wizard. This word implies intention and attempt to injure, rather by drugs, and spells, than by violence. The A prefixed, denotes, the famous, or skilful wizard. Josh. xix. 25. xi. 1. xii. 20.

Perhaps, some temple, whose priests were adepts in natural magic, might give rise to this name, and to this town. It might, possibly, be rendered properly enough, "Juggler's town." Or, it may be somewhat less dishonourably understood of those who drew omens from natural occurrences, the flight of birds, or the positions of the heavenly bodies; the Arabic root imports, obscurity, concealment, interwoven shade, which aptly enough characterizes the predictions uttered by those affectors of "knowledge, falsely so called." The character of Balaam illustrates this conjecture.]

ACHZIB, אַחְזִיב, liar, and lying: from אָחַז, cazab, to lie: otherwise, that runs: from אָחַז, zub; otherwise, that delays.

1. A town in the tribe of Asher, nine miles from Ptolemais.

2. A town in the south of Judah.

Probably, so called, from a spring or fountain, the waters of which sometimes failed; whereas at other times they gushed out and ran over, in shallow, though glittering streams. The nature of these intermitting fountains is well known to naturalists. Some suppose that this town was the same as Chezib, Gen. xxxviii. 5. which name implies deception, or fallacy.]

ACKNOWLEDGE: (1) an act of the mind, to know, to know appropriately: i. e. to own; to own the knowledge of; sometimes with regret, but generally with pleasure: (2) as an act of the person, to obey.

"I acknowledge my sin;" I admit it is mine, personally, to my sorrow, Psalm xxxii. 5; li. 3.

"In all thy ways acknowledge him," i. e. God. Prov. iii. 6. Admit that you see and own the hand of Providence. "Let him acknowledge the things that I write," let him admit their propriety, and act accordingly. 1 Cor. xiv. 37.

ACKSAPH; a city belonging to the tribe of Asher. The king of Acksaph was conquered by Joshua (chap. xii. 20). Some are of opinion that Acksaph, is the same as Ecdippa, on the Mediterranean, between Tyre and Ptolemais: others, that Ecdippa is inserted in Joshua, chap. xix. 29, under the name of Achzib. The Arabs call a place, three hours north from Ptolemais, Zib, which is the spot where formerly stood Ecdippa. It is probable, that Acksaph and Achzib are but different names for the same town.

ACRA, (Ἀκρά), this Greek word signifies, in general, a citadel. The Syrians and Chaldeans use אַקְרָא, Acra, in the same sense. King Antiochus gave orders for building a citadel at Jerusalem north of the temple, on an eminence, which commanded the holy place; and for that reason was called Acra. Josephus says (Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 7 and lib. xiii. cap. 11.), that this eminence was semicircular, and that Simon Maccabæus, having expelled the Syrians, who had seized Acra, demolished it, and spent three years in levelling the mountain whereon it stood; that no situation in future should command the temple. On mount Acra were afterwards built, the palace of Helena, queen of the Adiabeniens; Agrippa's palace, the place where the public records were lodged, and that where the magistrates of Jerusalem assembled. (Joseph. de Bello, lib. vii. cap. 15. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 7.)

I. ACBATENE, a district of Judæa, extending between Shechem (now Naplosa) and Jericho, inclining east. It was about twelve miles in length. The Acabatene had its name from a place called Akrabbim, about nine miles from Shechem, eastward. Josephus speaks of the Acabatene in several places. (Euseb. in voce Ἀκραβέν. Item in Ἰουδαία. Joseph. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 11.)

Acrabata, says Maasar Sheni, was distant from Jerusalem a day's journey northwards.

II. ACBATENE, another district of Judæa on the frontier of Idumæa, towards the southern extremity of the Dead Sea. This district derives its name from Akrabbim, which, in the Vulgate, is translated the Staircase of Scorpio. (1 Macc. v. 3.)

ACROSTICS: for Acrostic Writings in the Holy Scriptures, vide LETTERS.

ACTS of the Apostles: a canonical book of the New Testament, which contains a considerable part of the History of St. Peter and St. Paul. It begins at the ascension of our Saviour, and continues to St. Paul's arrival at Rome, after his appeal to Cæsar; with his residence of two years in that capital; including about twenty-eight or thirty years. Luke the Evangelist has always been esteemed the writer of the Acts. After he had given the History of Jesus Christ in his Gospel, he resolved to record the Actions of the Apostles, and the wonderful manner wherein the Holy Spirit established that church which Christ had redeemed. Œcumenius (in Acta, page 20.) calls the Acts, the Gospel of the Holy Ghost; Chrysostom (in Acta. Homil. 1.) calls it, the Gospel of our Saviour's Resurrection, or the Gospel of the risen Jesus Christ. This book narrates most miraculous instances of the power of the Holy Ghost, attending the propagation of the gospel; and in the accounts and instances of the first believers, we have most excellent patterns of truly Christian life; so that, though St. Luke seems to give us but a plain narrative of facts in this work, yet herein does this divine physician, according to Jerom's expression, offer as many remedies to heal the soul's diseases, as he speaks words. (Ep. 103.)

It is believed that Luke's principal design in writing the Acts, was to preserve a true History of the Apostles, and of the infancy of the Christian church, in opposition to false acts and false histories, which were beginning to obtain circulation; and accordingly, the fidelity and intelligence of this holy evangelist have been so much valued, that all other Acts of the Apostles have been despised, and his only adopted, by the faithful.

The time when Luke finished the book of the Acts is not known. It is agreed, that it was after his Gospel, and two years after St. Paul's abode at Rome, on his first journey thither: i. e. about A. D. 62, or 63, as he mentions that journey, with St. Paul's residence at Rome for such a time. He might write it at Rome, while he remained with St. Paul during his imprisonment; for Luke stayed with him till his deliverance.

St. Luke wrote this work in Greek, and his Greek is generally more pure and elegant than that of other parts of the New Testament. Epiphanius says (Hæres. xxx. cap. 3. & 6.) that this book was translated by the Ebionites out of Greek into Hebrew (i. e. Syriac, the then common language of the Jews in Palestine;) but those heretics corrupted it with many falsities and impurities, injurious to the character and memory of the Apostles. Jerom (de Script. Eccles.) assures us, that a certain priest of Asia added to the genuine Acts, the Travels of St. Paul and St. Thecla; with a story of baptizing a lion. Tertullian reports, that St. John the Evangelist, having convicted this priest of falsities in his relation, he excused himself, saying, he did it purely out of love and esteem to St. Paul. Mr. Grabe, in his Spicilegium of the Fathers, has given us a History of St. Thecla, which he believed to be the ancient History mentioned by Jerom. [This may be seen in Jones's Apocryphal Canon.]—Tertull. de Baptismo, cap. 17.

The Book of the Acts has always been esteemed canonical (Tertull. lib. v. contra Marcion, cap. 1, 2.): the Marcionites, the Manichees, and some other heretics, rejected it, because their errors were too clearly condemned by it. Austin (Ep. 315.) says, the church received this work with edification, and read it every year. Chrysostom complains, that in his time, this book was too little known, and the reading of it was too much neglected. As for himself, he very much extols the advantages of an acquaintance with it, and maintains, with good reason, that it is as useful as the Gospels. He preached a course of sermons on this subject, of which some remain. Vide LUKE.

[In order to read the Acts of the Apostles profitably, and with intelligence, it is necessary to have a sufficient acquaintance with geography, with the manners of the times and places, and with the leading historical events. The power of the Romans, with the nature and names of the public officers they established, and the distinctions among them, must of necessity be understood; as well as the disposition and political conduct and opinions of the unconverted Jewish nation, which obtained also, too strongly, among the Christianized Hebrews, and maintained themselves as distinctions, and causes of separation, in the church, during many ages. In fact, their consequences are hardly extinct in the East, at this day.]

SPURIOUS ACTS of the Apostles, supposed to be written by Abdias. This impostor represents himself as a bishop, ordained at Babylon, by the Apostles, when they were on their journey into Persia. This work is neither ancient, nor authentic; it was not known to Eusebius, to Jerom, or to any earlier Father. The author says, he wrote in Greek, and that his book was translated into Latin, by Julius Africanus; who is himself a Greek writer. He cites Hege-sippus, who lived in the second century. The lives of the Apostles which he gives, abound with such fables, as proclaim them to be a romance, and that very ill put together.

ACTS of St. Peter, otherwise called Travels of St. Peter (Periodi Petri), extant at present under another title, the Recognitions of St. Clement, are much longer now than they were formerly. This book is stuffed with visions and fables, which came originally from the school of the Ebionites. See what Cotelierius says of these Recognitions, in his Fathers of the First Century. See likewise M. Fabricius's Apocr. N. T. page 759, &c.

ACTS of St. Paul, were composed after his death, as a supplement to St. Luke; continuing his narrative from the second year of St. Paul's first voyage to Rome, to the end of his life. [This book, which is lost, must have been twice as long as the Canonical Acts, since in a MS. cited by Cotelierius, it is said to have contained 4,560 lines, or verses; whereas the same MS. reports the genuine Acts at only 2,500. Eusebius, who had seen this work, calls it spurious.]

ACTS of St. John the Evangelist, mentioned in Epiphanius and St. Austin, contain incredible stories of that Apostle: the Encratites, Manichees, and Priscillianists, used them: it is probable, the author of the Synopsis, attributed to Athanasius, may quote them under the title of St. John's Travels. These are thought to be the Acts of St. John, published among the forgeries of Abdias. (Epiphani. Hæres. 47. Aug. de Fide, cap. 4. and 405. Contra adversar. Legis et Prophet. lib. i. cap. 20.)

ACTS of St. Andrew: mentioned in St. Austin (de Fide, contra Manich. cap. 38. et alibi), and received by the Manichees, were different from those we have at present, under the name of the priests of Achaia. The Manichees, Encratites, and Apotactics, used them. Vide Epiphanius, Hæres. 42, 61, and 62.

ACTS of St. Thomas: St. Austin cites some things out of them: he says, the Manichees, particularly, used them: part of them is in the life of St. Thomas, written by the counterfeit Abdias. M. Simon thought he had found these old Acts of St. Thomas, under the name of Travels, Periodi Sancti Apostoli Thomæ, in a Greek MS. of the French king's library, No. 1832. He gives some fragments of them in his observations on the Text and Versions of the New Testament. (Aug. lib. contra Adimant, cap. 17. & lib. xxii. contra Faust. cap. 79, & lib. i. de Serm. Domini in monte; cap. 20.)

ACTS of St. Philip: was a book used by the Gnostics. Pope Gelasius reckons it among the spurious writings. Anastatius, the Sinaite, has preserved a fragment of them in his work "concerning three lentis." Published by Cotelierus, among his Monuments of the Greek Church, tom. iii. pag. 428.

ACTS of St. Matthias. Some have imagined, that the Jews long concealed the original Acts of St. Matthias, written in Hebrew; and that a monk of the abbey of St. Matthias, at Treves, having obtained them, caused them to be translated into Latin, and published them: but the critics will not allow them to be genuine. It is probable, the Jews abused the simplicity of the person to whom they communicated this pretended discovery. (Vide M. de Tillemont, Eccl. Hist. tom. i. page 1186; and M. Fabricius's Apoc. N. T. page 782)

ADADA, or Ododeh, עֲדָדָה: from עָדָה, edah, an assembly; or, according to the Chaldee, one that passes: otherwise, adorned; from the same word: otherwise, a prey, or booty; from עָדָה, hedved, or one that gives testimony: from עָדָה, hed, a witness: or, in the feminine gender, prey of his prey; or, eternity of his testimony; or, testimony of the throng, or congregation.

[Perhaps, "the witness upon witness," or, repeated witness: but, the duplication of the word, ad-ad, seems to lead to the idea of "continued preservation," in which case, it agrees with the numerous inscriptions of soter, saviour, or preserver, which are applied to Jupiter, Apollo, Diana, &c. &c. "The perpetual preserver," emphatically: i. e. formerly, as well as in time to come.

Some think, ornament of ornaments; i. e. the beauty of the district in which it stood.]

ADADA: a city, in the south of Judah. Josh. xv. 22.

ADAD-RIMMON, אֲדָד-רִמּוֹן: cry of the grana; from הֲדָד hedad, cries, clamours; and רִמּוֹן rimmon, a pomegranate: Rimmon was a God of the Syrians: [the invocation of the God Rimmon: Arab. breach of Rimmon.]

ADAD-RIMMON, or HADAD-RIMMON: a city in the valley of Jezreel. Here was fought that fatal battle, wherein Josiah, king of Judah, was killed by Pharaoh-Necho, king of Egypt. 2 Kings xxiii. 29. Adad-rimmon was afterwards called Maximianopolis, in honour of the emperor Maximian. It is seventeen miles from Cæsarea in Palestine, and ten miles from Jezreel. Jerom. ad Zach. xii. vide et ad Ose. i. Itin. Jerosol. antiq.

ADAH, or Odeh, עֲדָה: from עָדָה, an assembly. Vide ADADA.

I. ADAH: one of Lamech's two wives; mother of Jabal and Jubal. Gen. iv. 19. The names of her other children (for it is presumed she had more) are not mentioned. Vide LANECH.

II. ADAH: daughter of Elon, the Hittite, and wife to Esau; the mother of Eliphaz. Gen. xxxvi. 4.

ADALIAH, or Odieh, עֲדִיָּה: from עָדָה, a witness, &c. (vide ADADA); and יָהּ jah, the Lord; witness of the Lord.

I. ADALIAH: of the tribe of Levi, son of Ethan, and father of Zerah. 1 Chron. vi. 41

II. ADALIAH, of the tribe of Benjamin, son of Shimhi. 1 Chron. viii. 21.

III. ADALIAH, of the priests; son of Jeroham, and father of Maasai. 1 Chron. ix. 12.

IV. ADALIAH, a Jew, who returned from Babylon; one of those who dismissed their wives, taken, contrary to the law, from among the Gentiles. Ezra x. 29

ADALIAH, אֲדַלְיָה: one that draws water; from דָּלָה dala, to draw water: otherwise, poverty; from דָּל dal: otherwise, cloud, vapour, death. As this name is not Hebrew, its etymology ought not to be sought from that language.

ADALIAH: the fifth son of Haman, hanged with his brethren, by command of Ahasuerus. Esth. ix. 8.

ADAM, אָדָם: earthly man, red, of the colour of blood; from אָדָם Adam, red, ruddy.

ADAM, the first man created by God. It is said by Josephus, (Antiq. lib. i. cap. 1.), that he was called Adam, from the reddish colour of the earth of which he was formed: for Adam in Hebrew signifies red: but Adam denotes, likewise, man in general. "God made man of the dust of the earth, breathed into him the breath of life, and gave him dominion over all the creatures." Gen. i. 26; ii. 7. He created him after his own image, blessed him, placed him in a delightful garden, that he might cultivate it, and enjoy its fruits; giving him at the same time this prohibition, "Of the tree of knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat: for in the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die."

God also brought all the beasts, and all the fowls, before Adam, that he might name them; and Adam gave to each its name; such as best suited it, in allusion to its principal properties. Now the animals were created in pairs, male and female, and man only was without a consort. Wherefore God said, "It is not good for man to be alone: I will make a consort for him." God caused, therefore, a deep sleep to overcome him, and while he slept, he took one of his ribs (or a piece from his side), and closed up the flesh; and of the rib (or piece from his side) thus taken from man, he made a woman [WOMB-MAN, Saxon], or man-ess, whom he presented to him when he awoke. Said Adam, "This is now bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called man-ess, because she was taken out of man." (Heb. אִישׁ Aish, man, אִשָּׁה Aisha, man-ess.)

This woman was seduced by the tempter; and seduced her husband to eat of the forbidden fruit. When called to judgment for this transgression before God, Adam blamed his wife, "whom," said he, "thou gavest me;" and the woman blamed the serpent-tempter. God punished the serpent-tempter by degradation and dread: the woman by painful hopes, and a situation of submission; the man by agricultural labour and toil; of which punishment every day witnesses the fulfilment. As their natural passions now became irregular, and their exposure to accidents was great, God made a covering of skin for Adam and for his wife; he expelled them from his garden, to the land around it, where Adam had been made, and where was to be their future dwelling; placing at the east of the garden a flame, which turned every way, to KEEP the way to the tree of life. It is not known how long Adam and his wife continued in paradise: some say, many years; others, not many days; others, not many hours. Adam called his wife's name Eve (general mother), importing her character to all posterity. Shortly after, Eve brought forth Cain. Gen. iv. 1, 2. It is believed, that she had a girl at the same time, and that, generally, she had twins. Scripture notices but three sons of Adam: Cain, Abel, and Seth, and omits daughters; but Moses tells us, "Adam begat sons and daughters;" no doubt many. He died, aged 930, ante A. D. 3074. This is what we learn from Moses: but interpreters do not stop here; they propose a thousand inquiries relating to the first man; and certainly no history can furnish more questions, as well of curiosity, as of consequence.

REMARKS ON THE HISTORY OF ADAM.

[I. Of the name of Adam. It has been usual to derive this name from אָדָמָה, ADeMeH, which signifies vegetable earth, or mould; the chief component of all things; which assumes a wonderful variety in the formation of vegetables, and animals; and is their primary and original principle: but as some other derivations seem equally proper, the reader will not be displeased to find a notice of them.

Protogenos, in Sanchoniatho, apud Euseb. signifies first made; and it seems to be the translation into Greek of the Egyptian title of Adam, taken, as that author professes, from the pillars of Thoth.

MR. BRYANT says, "Ad and ADA signify first; more laxly, a prince or ruler: therefore Ad.ad answers to the Most High, or Most Eminent."—Vol. i. page 23. May not this be referred to Adam?

SIR WILLIAM JONES queries whether Adam may not be derived from Adim? which in Sanscrit means, the first; and is a name of the first Menu. "The first Menu was surnamed Son of the Self-Existent [vide Luke iii. 38.], and it is he by whom the institutes of religion and civil duties are supposed to have been delivered: in his time the Deity descended at a sacrifice; and by his wife, Satarupa, he had two distinguished sons, and three daughters: this pair was created for the multiplication of thy human species, after the new creation of the world, which the Bramins call the Lotos creation." Asiatic Researches.

The Persians, too, denominate the first man Adamah; SALE says, that this word is Persic, and in its primary sense means red earth; and in all the oriental languages, man in general, but eminently, the first man.

MR. PARKHURST supposes the name Adam to be derived from כְּדִמּוּת, BEDeMUT, signifying likeness, q. d. "the likeness of God," Gen. v. 1. It is certain, the name Adam is given to both sexes; but if it be a derivative from any word signifying the first, it may equally apply to Adam and to his wife.

II. The formation of Adam is introduced with circumstances of dignity, superior to any which attended the creation of the animals. It evidently appears (whatever else be designed by it) to be the intention of the narrator, to mark this passage, and to lead his readers to reflect on it.

GOD said, "Let us make man (1) in our image; (2) according to our likeness; and let him rule," &c. Gen. i. 26. These seem to be two ideas:

First, "in our image," בְּצַלְמֵנוּ, BESeLMENU, in our similitude. This could not refer to his figure: (1) Because the human figure, though greatly superior in formation and beauty to animals, is not so entirely distinct from them in the principles of its construction, as to require a special consultation about it, after the animals had been formed. (2) If all the species of monkeys were made before man, the resemblance in some of them to the human form, greatly strengthens the foregoing argument. (3) The Scriptures, elsewhere, represent this distinction as referring to moral excellencies; "in knowledge—after the image of him who created him." Col. iii. 10. "The new man, which, according to God (κατὰ θεόν), is created in righteousness and true holiness." Eph. iv. 24. In other places, also, the comparison turns on his purity, his station, &c. &c.

Secondly, "according to our likeness," כְּדִמּוּתֵנוּ, BEDeMUTeNU:—this is a stronger expression than the former, and is more deter-minate to its subject. If we connect this with the following words, and let him rule—then, perhaps, the import is this: “Man shall have, according to his nature and capacity, a general likeness to such of our perfections as fit him for the purposes to which we design him; but he shall have a still closer resemblance to us, in the rule and government of the creatures; for, though he be incapable of any of our attributes, he is capable of a purity, a rectitude, and a station of dominion, in which he may be our vicergerent.” Thus, then, in a lower and looser sense, man was the image of God; possessing a kind of likeness to him, whereof the creatures were absolutely void: and having also a resemblance to God, as his deputy, his representative, among and over the creation: for which he was qualified by holiness, by knowledge, &c.

As the day when the creation ended was immediately succeeded by a sabbath, i. e. that evening, the first act of man was worship; hence the influence and extent of the custom of setting apart a sabbath among his posterity; since, not in paradise only would Adam maintain this rite; but in after ages, in solemn commemoration of his paradisiacal state, customs, &c. Why this was every seventh day, vide MOON.

III. “Adam became a living soul.” It seems as if the most proper idea expressed by these words is, that Adam became a living person: (1) because such is the import of the original, simply taken: (2) having mentioned that Adam was made of the dust of the earth, is a reason why the sacred writer should here mention his animation: so that if the word Adam be derived from Admah, earth, it might have been simply said, according to this idea, “the earth (Adam) became alive.” But (3) it is very credible, that it implies some real distinction between the nature of the living principle, or soul (not spirit) in Adam, and that of animals: may we suppose that this principle, thus specially imparted by God, was capable of immortality? that, however the beasts might die by nature, man would survive by nature? that he had no inherent seeds of dissolution in him, but that his dissolution was the consequence of his sin, and the execution of the threatening, dying thou shalt die? In fact, as Adam lived nearly a thousand years after eating the fruit, which, probably, poisoned his blood; how much longer might he not have lived, had that poison never been taken by him? We know of poisons now existing, which operate slowly and gradually, lasting for many years:—a lingering mortality! an incessant death! Vide DEATH.

IV. The character, endowments, and history of Adam, are very interesting subjects of reflection to the whole human race: and the rather, because the memorials respecting him, which have come down to us, are but brief, and consequently obscure. In order, therefore, to obtain a tolerable outline of his situation and of his conduct, we are under the necessity of inferring, from what little we read, much that we could wish were explicitly related. As imagination, because called in some degree into activity has but too often assumed the place of understanding on this subject, we shall, by way, of correcting such eccentricities, endeavour to state a few thoughts, confined within the limits of reason and scripture.

In considering the character of Adam, our greatest difficulty is, to divest ourselves of ideas received from the present state of things; we cannot sufficiently dismiss from our minds that knowledge (rather, that subtlety) which, as human life now stands, we have acquired by experience. We cannot truly imagine, that entire simplicity, that total absence of cunning, or wisdom (worldly wisdom), which may adequately express the extreme candour of Adam's mind; for as we must, even in common language, use words drawn from things invented since Adam; so we cannot help referring the knowledge of certain things to Adam, because they are known to us. As we comprehend somewhat of the active nature of the passions of the mind, we cannot conceive of those passions in a state of absolute quiescence; as we know somewhat of the powers of the body, we connect something of these also with our ideas of Adam: whereas the truth is, that though Adam had abundant capacity for such things, yet they formed no part of his actual possessions; they were not called into exercise. As in geography, Adam knew not the globe, its extent, and its properties, though he knew the extent and the properties of his garden;—so in natural history, he knew not what the frozen poles, or the torrid zone produced, but what his garden afforded:—so in science, he knew not a whole Cyclopædia, but what sufficed for the purposes of his life and station; and in morals, he knew not the extent of what the Bible now teaches, but simply the direct course of his duty. To render this more sensible, we reflect,

First, as to Adam's mind, its powers, and its propensities. Some have supposed, that to Adam was imparted, from his very creation, that knowledge which not only placed him above all men, his descendants, but also rendered him a little, and but little, lower than angels. This may be admitted in some respects, and under considerable restrictions; while in other respects, it may be strongly doubted. (1) Adam could not be acquainted with any discovery, or production which has originated since his ume. For instance, if he were familiar with the principles of agriculture, he could know nothing of those of trade and commerce, of handicraft businesses, or manufactures; he could have no idea of a ship; and so of other articles, for which he had, and could have, no need.

(2) Adam, who was created holy and pure, could have no acquaintance with the baneful passions of the human mind; anger, jealousy, grief, &c. nor with any effect deriving from them; neither violent agitation of mind, nor violent exertion of body. (3) Adam could have no knowledge of disease, pain, &c. whether chronic or casual; of the changes of seasons, and their effects; of extreme heat or cold; of tempest, thunder or lightning; of ice, snow, &c.; of the effects of fire, as causing water to boil; of steam and its powers; of underground phenomena, as earthquakes; of aquatic phenomena, as water-spouts, whirlpools, &c. It is inconsistent with the state of Adam's happiness, to suppose he could know any thing which is, in nature, either the cause or the consequence of unhappiness. (4) It appears that Adam did acquire ideas (i. e. knowledge) by experience: for, certainly, his attention to the creatures brought before him for inspection, in consequence of which he was called to exercise his faculty of speech (which, perhaps, otherwise, might have lain dormant,) and to name the creatures, according to their natures, of which he now acquired distinct perception, was experience. It is true, he might perceive, with much greater readiness than we can imagine, the principal characters of a creature, from its form, from its voice, or other peculiarity; but then he must see that form, and hear that voice; which is experience. Besides this, as Adam was placed in a garden, probably on a mountain (vide PARADISE.) he could have no knowledge of great fishes, whales, sharks, and other inhabitants of the deep sea; except by inference from what smaller fishes swam in the lake in that garden, unless it was (as perhaps it was) revealed to him by his Maker. For we can easily admit, that he who revealed the relations of father and mother, might reveal various other instructive articles to Adam. There are also numerous particulars, concerning which it may be concluded, that Adam was little informed, or was totally ignorant; those hinted at may serve as a specimen: but the reasoning might justly be extended.

As the intellectual powers of Adam enabled him to comprehend with great accuracy, and without effort, he doubtless saw more of the fitness and appropriation of things to the end for which they were designed, than has been possible to other men; he, perhaps, also foresaw the effects likely to follow certain causes, more distinctly, and more readily, than we do; he might trace the chain of cause and effect, much beyond what we can; and his memory of past transactions might be infinitely more accurate and tenacious than that of any man. And, indeed, it may well be supposed, that to a mind so capable as Adam's, his Maker would continually furnish occasion for increase both of piety and knowledge:—of piety, as he might more fully reveal himself, his attributes, &c. to his faith or his understanding;—of knowledge, as beside celestial objects and subjects, the kind Former of man might open to his observation, branches of science, very distinct from, and infinitely superior to, any which the wisest of men has imagined; so that as experience by enlarging the mind of Adam, prepared it for farther acquisitions, those farther acquisitions might have been granted him, to a consummation of knowledge, understanding, and intimacy with subjects celestial and terrestrial, inexpressibly beyond what human attainments or conceptions have since known. Paradise, in this sense, might have been a heaven upon earth, constantly receiving accessions of "favour upon favour, grace upon grace."

The glory of Adam's mind, then, was its freedom from any deceptive bias: it had no easy besetting sin, no perverse delusion to injure it. The sensations becoming such a mind, were the amiable passions solely, gratitude, love, veneration toward God; affection, attention toward his partner; kindness toward the creatures, and universal good will.

Secondly, as to the personal faculties of Adam, we can only conjecture; but some of them are discovered in his actions: since whatever is necessary to the performance of an action, is implied, when that action is performed. E. gr.

Without speech, many of the powers of his mind had been useless: but his language, probably, was what would now be called very confined; consisting of few words, simple in sound and sense. For, if Adam had no knowledge of the numerous articles now in use among mankind, occurring in trade, in business, in building, in apparel, and in the arts of life and society, generally; his vocabulary could bear no proportion to that of later ages, which has been almost infinitely increased by the invention and adoption of different names. &c. to express the nature or service of these different things, and the relation they bear to others.—If Adam could express the sense of the word dwelling, yet he could not distinguish different kinds of dwellings,—tents, huts, houses, palaces; much less different kinds of tents or of houses; their parts,—as beams, roofs, rafters, &c. or their combinations—as villages, burghs, towns, cities, &c. Now, present language is greatly composed of sounds and expressions to which Adam could never have occasion to refer; consequently, he could not express them: he who had no diseases, could have no names for their distinctions, nor for their remedies; he who had no war, could adopt no allusions to the art military; and so of others. But this argument evinces, that his acquaintance with language was sufficiently extensive to enable him to comprehend all that was necessary for him to know; and, indeed, how else could he have understood the prohibition respecting the tree of knowledge? He must have been able to distinguish that, and the tree of life, by name; as well as they were distinguished for him by situation, i. e. in the midst of the garden.

Being capable of speech, Adam acquired the habit of using that capacity, by affixing to certain vocal sounds denoting natural wants, &c. those determinate ideas which, ever after, when those wants recurred, would prompt him to repeat those same vocal sounds.

His number of vocal sounds was greatly increased, by the necessity laid on him, by his Maker, of giving names to the creatures; this may, perhaps, be justly considered as his first extensive lesson in language, and the lasting effect of this would be, that whenever afterwards he meant, for example, to denote a sheep, he might repeat its name, originally taken—from its voice, suppose, as baa: if he meant to denote a cow, he might call it boo. So do his posterity to this day; and among the first means used to bring forward children in their speech, (I suppose in all countries; certainly wherever my observation has reached) is prompting them to imitate the sound made by an animal, and to call the animal by that sound: bow wow for a dog; croak for a frog; caw for a crow, &c.; and all languages have so much of this imitation in them, that grammarians have in their language adopted a term to express it, as onomatopœia.

V. The character which necessarily results from these principles, implies that however Adam might be, in capacity of understanding, a man, yet in experience he was but a child. He had no cause to distrust any, to suspect fraud, collusion, prevarication, or ill design; he had no conception of any such principle as existing in the universe, since he knew it not in himself. Where, then, is the wonder, if entire innocence, if perfect purity of mind, if total unsuspicion, should be deluded by an artful combination of appearances; by fraud, by guile, exerted against it? Those among mankind who are most versed in the ways of men, of crafty men, are often at a loss to detect the deep contrivances of others, (as we say, "honest men are no match for knaves,") and this, in a state of things wherein experience has produced a virtue, for which innocent Adam could have no use—PRUDENCE: and, perhaps, it is risking little to assert, that scarcely one among the millions of his sons has risen to man's state, who might not have been an overmatch in craft for his father Adam, in his state of original simplicity.

But the disobedience of Adam is not the less inexcusable; because, as was his situation, such was the test allotted to him; it was not an active, but a passive duty, not something to be done, but something to be forborne; a negative trial: nor did it regard the mind, but the appetite; nor was that appetite without fit, yea, much fitter supply, in abundance all around it: presumption unrestrained, liberty extended into licentiousness, was the principle of Adam's transgression.

VI. Whoever has seen a beautiful vase fall, and be broken, may form some idea of Adam after his sin: the integrity of his mind was violated; the first compliance with sin opened the way to future compliances; grosser temptations might now expect success; and thus spotless purity becoming impure, perfect uprightness becoming warped, lost that entire-ity which had been its glory. Hereby Adam relinquished that distinction, which had fitted him for immediate communion with supreme holiness; and was reduced to the necessity of soliciting such communion, mediately, not immediately; by another, not by himself; in prospect, not instant; in hope, not in possession: in time future, not in time present; in another world, not in this world.

VII. It is worthy of notice, how precisely the principles which infatuated Adam have ever governed his posterity; how suitable to the general character of the human race was the nature of that temptation by which their father fell!—Who is not self-convicted of Pride?

Surely, when in after ages, Adam was giving advice to his descendants, when his sacred hands, stained with the blood of the victim recently offered to JEHOVAH, were extended in benediction over his worshipping family, he would say, "My sons, behold in me the sad instance of disobedience to restraint; had I constantly honoured that SIMPLE prohibition, I had been happy: how many restraints, now necessary for human welfare, had never been known! Now is man restrained from this—because to this he is prone; and from that—because that seems good to him; but, under seeming good lurks real evil. Such was the character of my temptation! It offered pleasure, but I found it anguish; it allured the sense, but the sense was depraved by it; before I sinned, I was serene, delighted, happy; afterwards I was gloomy, turbulent, miserable; wherefore? because I violated the Divine restraint; because, having abundance, I craved a superfluity; because, being a man, I must needs wish to be as gods; because, knowing only good, I would know evil also—"good lost, and evil got!"

VIII. That only, or chiefly, in the Garden of Paradise, were the prime fruits and herbage in perfection, is very presumable: the land around the garden might be much less finished, and only fertile to a certain degree: to promote its fertility by cultivation, became the object of Adam's labour, personally—so that in the sweat of his brow, he himself did eat bread. But the sentence passed on our first parents, doubtless regarded them as the representatives, the very concentration of their posterity; of the whole human race: and after attaching to themselves, it seems prophetically also, to suggest the condition of the sexes, in future ages, q. d. "The female sex, which has been the means of bringing death into the world, shall also be the means of bringing life—posterity—to compensate the ravages of death;—and, to remind the sex of its original transgression, that which shall be its greatest honour and happiness, shall be accompanied by no slight inconveniences. But the male sex shall be under the necessity of labouring for the support, not of itself only, but of the female, and her family: so that if a man could with little exertion provide for himself, he should be stimulated to far greater exertions, to toil, to sweat, for the advantage and support of those to whom he has been the means of giving life."

IX. Death closes the sentence passed on mankind; this also is prophetic of an event common to Adam, and to all his descendants: q. d. "The poison in your blood, though slow, is sure; though latent, yet it will operate in time. I do not think proper to exert my Almighty power in curing this malady directly; I shall remedy its effects another way: I leave you uncertain of when you may die; every day brings you nearer to the period at which you must die: be this anxious suspense the commencement of your punishment; it is one of the bitternesses of death; and when your constitutions, originally designed for nobler purposes, sink under the effects of the venom they have imbibed, then shall the complete termination of life more fully demonstrate its fatal power, which, though suspended, is not annihilated; but which I leave to its now natural course."

See how the favour of God mitigates the consequences announced in this sentence! It inflicts pain on the woman, but that pain was connected with the dearest comforts, and with the great restorer of the human race: it assigns labour to the man, but then that labour was to support himself and others, dearer to him than himself, repetitions of himself: it denounces death, but death indefinitely postponed; and appointed as the path to life.

X. It may be proper to notice the difference between the Hebrew expressions, in the day (כִּיּוֹם BEIUM), and, in that very day (כִּיּוֹם הַהוּא BEIUM HE HUA): the former is used in the threatening announced to man; it is of a more loose and general signification than the other; much like our English expressions, when speaking of time long past, or long to come—as "the people of that day;" meaning, of that time, with great latitude: the other phrase expresses a fixed, or an instant day.

XI. But the mercy of God might farther extend itself to Adam: perhaps he was not instantly expelled the garden; some delay might be granted him; including the time necessary for his farther instruction in the purport of new rites of worship, and mediatorial institutions. Beside this, our first parents were now clothed with a skin (singular, not plural) of a beast, no doubt; ONE SKIN SERVED THEM BOTH. They had endeavoured to cover themselves with trees;—no, the intertwining, the plaiting of a leaf, or leaves, of boughs, or branches, recalled no image of death; it shed no blood, it expressed nothing that included the idea of substitution: no—but the skin of a beast was not to be procured without first taking away the life of that beast; and the life of that beast could not be taken away, without reminding Adam, of the penalty threatened—DEATH!

What a subject this offers to the imagination! what a scope might it not take here! How did Adam tremble, when he first selected the creature to be slain; when he led it towards the place appointed for its death; with what heavy reluctance, what hesitation, did he bind it, wreath around it the confining twigs, and then proceed to slaughter it! What were his reflections when its blood streamed, when its limbs quivered! and at length when they ceased to quiver! Did not its last gasp thrill through his soul? Did he not now feel what death was? Yes, by sympathy he did; and penitential tears streamed from his eyes, to think that to this he must eventually submit; that to this he had subjected his descendants to the very latest posterity. What, then, could be the import of sacrifice, but a memorial-representation of death—deserved by the principal, but transferred for the merciful purpose of postponement, to a substitute? Vide EVE, LANGUAGE, REVELATION, &c. &c.

Many Jewish writers (as Rabb. Samuel, Abarbanel, Manasseh Ben Israel, vide Leidegger Hist. Patriarch, &c.) have asserted, that man and woman were created in one body, united by the shoulders, having four feet, four hands, and two heads, alike throughout excepting sex; and that God having cast this compound figure into a deep sleep, divided it, and made two persons of it. Engubinus (in Cosmopœia) affirms, that it was joined by the sides throughout, so that God, according to the Scripture, took the woman from Adam's side. Many other fabulous stories are told of Adam's stature and beauty: such as—that he was the handsomest man that ever was; that God, before he formed him, assumed a human body, after the pattern whereof he created Adam. [In this manner it was literally true, they say, that Adam was made after the image and resemblance of God.] The Rabbins tell us (Vide lib. Sanhedrin, and Bartoloci, tom. i. pag. 65, 66.) that this first man was of so prodigious a stature, that he reached from one end of the world to the other; but that after his transgression, God pressed his hand heavily upon him, and reduced him to the measure of a hundred ells. Others allow him to have been nine hundred cubits in height, and maintain that God reduced him to this measure at the request of the angels, who were frightened at his first stature. [We may hint, in explanation of this paradoxical mode of speech, that the government, not the dimensions, of Adam reached from one end of the world to the other, (i. e. he was universal sovereign over the creatures,) but his authority was afterwards diminished: also that he was, perhaps, capable of at least a comparative immortality: but was reduced to a life of about 900 years. Some have said, that his head reached to heaven—(i. e. his mental powers were great, and his intercourse with God was direct.)—while in innocence.]

The Rabbins add, that Adam was of so elevated a nature, and the matter of his body was so subtle, fine, and aerial, as almost to equal the angels; that he had as perfect a knowledge of God and his attributes as a creature is capable of. He was not unacquainted even with the incommunicable name JEHOVAH; for when Adam had appropriated their several names to the brute creation, God asked him, "What is my name?" Adam answered, "JEHOVAH, he who is." This they say Isaiah points at in these words, "I am JEHOVAH, that is my name" (Isa. xlii. 8); meaning the name which Adam gave me, at the beginning of the world.

As circumcision is, according to the Jews, the seal of the covenant between God and believers, they have imagined that Adam was created circumcised; and, that he defaced, as much as he could, the mark of his circumcision by violating the covenant of the Lord at his fall. They ground this vision on a passage in Hosea, "But they like Adam have transgressed the covenant; they have dealt treacherously against me."

The salvation of Adam has been disputed: Tatian and the Encratites were positive he was damned; but this opinion the church condemned. The book of Wisdom says, chap. xi. "That God delivered him from his sin." The Fathers believe he did HARD PENANCE: the Rabbins believe the same; and the same will be believed by all who read his history, and draw the proper inferences from his after state. No one knows where our first parents died, or were buried. Some of the ancients believed, that they were interred at Hebron, which opinion they whimsically grounded on Joshua xiv. ult. "And the name of Hebron before was Kirjath-Arba, which Arba was a great man (ADAM, אֲדָם) among the Anakim."—Origen. tract. xxxv. in Matth. Epiphani. Hæres. 46. Ambros. l. 10, in Luc. Hieronym. in Matth. xxvii. and a great number hold, that Adam was buried on Calvary, and this opinion has its advocates to this day. There is a chapel on mount Calvary, dedicated to Adam; but Jerom confesses, that this opinion, though adapted to soothe the ears of the common people, is not, however, the more certain.

Adam has been reputed the author of several books. It has been supposed that he was master of profound, and very extensive knowledge: God having created him perfect, no question but he gave him a very clear and comprehensive mind. Some have believed that he invented the Hebrew letters. The Jews say he is the author of the ninety-first psalm; and that he composed it soon after the creation. The Gnostics had a book entitled, The Revelations of Adam, which is placed among the apocryphal writings by pope Gelasius, who also mentions a book called Adam's Penance.—Apud Salian. T. 1, Annal. pag. 230—Masius speaks of another Of the Creation, said to have been composed by Adam.—Hottinger. Histor. Oriental. pag. 22.—The Arabians inform us, that Adam received twenty books which fell from heaven, and contained many laws, promises, and prophecies.

The Mahometans, after their manner, relate the creation of Adam and Eve, their fall, and that of the angels. God, they say, by rains of long continuance, prepared the slime of the earth, of which to form the body of Adam; after this, he sent the angel Gabriel, and commanded him to take from seven layers of earth, of each a handful. Gabriel obeyed, declared to the earth his orders received from God, and moreover that the Lord had determined to extract out of her entrails, that substance of which he proposed to form man, who was to be monarch over her, and God's vicegerent.—The earth, amazed at this proposition, desired Gabriel to represent to God her fears, that this creature, whom he designed to form out of her bosom, would one day rebel against him, and draw down his curse upon her. Gabriel returned, and reported to God the earth's remonstrances; but God resolving to execute his design, dispatched Michael, and afterwards Asraphel, with the same commission. These two angels returned in like manner to report the earth's excuses, and absolute refusal to contribute to this formation. Last of all, the Lord deputed Azrael, who, without saying any thing to the earth, or asking any questions, took hastily, and carried off by force, seven handfuls, of seven different beds, or layers, out of the mass belonging to her, which he carried to a place in Arabia, lying between Mecca and Taief.—Azrael, as a reward of his pitiless action, received the commission to separate the souls of men from their bodies; for which reason he is now called the Angel of Death. Alcoran, chap. of the Stone. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 55.

It is scarcely credible that the Mussulmans should literally believe a creation in this manner; but we read this as a tradition in their authors.—(Mahomet says no more than that God—created and framed man partly out of a sandy earth, and partly out of a stinking slime; but as for the Genii, he had already framed them out of a hot glowing fire.)—This difference of the earths employed in the formation of Adam, is of great service to them in explaining the different colours and qualities of men derived from it; some of whom are white, others black, others tawny, yellow, olive-coloured, or red: some of one humour, inclination, and complexion; others of another quite different.

The angels, having with their hands kneaded this earth brought by Azrael, God with his own hand formed out of it a human statue, which being left for some time in the same place to dry, the angels had leisure to examine it, and Eblis, or Lucifer, the first of them, having viewed it on all sides, and striking it on the breast and belly, perceived it sounded: from thence he concluded, that being empty internally, it would be liable to several wants and temptations, in order to fill itself; then turning to his companions, he said, "If God should command you to acknowledge this monarch, whom he proposes to establish agent over the earth, what would you do?" They answered, "It would be highly necessary to obey God."—Eblis agreed in words; but with a secret resolution not to comply.

Some time after, God communicated his spirit, or his enlivening breath, to this statue, infused life and understanding into it, and clothed it in a wonderful dress, suitable to its dignity. At the same time, he commanded the angels to prostrate themselves before it, as a mark of honour and respect. The angels obeyed; Eblis alone refused submission, and was therefore driven out of paradise. Adam was placed in his stead, and while he was sleeping, God took out of his left side, the woman, whom he gave him for a companion.—Adam shortly after received God's command, forbidding him to eat of a certain fruit, on pain of falling under his curse.

Hereupon, Eblis resolved to be revenged on Adam: associated with himself the peacock and the serpent, and approaching Adam and Eve, held a long conversation with them, persuading them to eat of the forbidden fruit. They had no sooner tasted it, but the splendid habits wherein they were dressed fell at their feet, they discerned themselves to be naked, and being ashamed of their condition, ran towards a fig-tree, intending to cover themselves with its leaves. Soon after, they heard a voice like thunder, crying out to them, "Come down, and depart out of this place: you shall become enemies to one another, and shall have your habitation and subsistence for a time on earth."

Adam, therefore, was thrown headlong from heaven to earth, and fell, according to the most general opinion, upon mount Serandib, in the Island of Ceylon. Eve fell at Dgidda, a port of the Red Sea, in the vicinity of Mecca. The fall of Eblis happened to be at Missan, near Bassora; the peacock fell at Indostan; the serpent fell at Nisibe, or Ispahan; that is, in the places where these cities were afterwards built.

[The moral of this fable is, that pride—the peacock; and cunning—the serpent; were the tempters by which the first pair were deluded. The fall of the peacock in Indostan, is an implied satire on the pride of the Bramins and Hindoos, generally; the Persian monarchy and nation are distinguished as cunning and revengeful, by the fall of the serpent at Ispahan. The satire cannot be fully understood, without adverting to the state of those people, at the period when the tale was fabricated.]

Adam, finding himself alone in Ceylon, destitute of every consolation, reflecting on his conduct and condition, and being penetrated with repentance, lifted up his hands and eyes to heaven, imploring the clemency of his Creator. God, moved by his repentance, caused a tent, or pavilion, to descend from heaven by the ministry of angels, which they say was placed in that very spot where Abraham afterwards built the temple of Mecca. Gabriel instructed him in all the proper ceremonies to be used in this sanctuary, to obtain the pardon of his sin. Adam went thither, and performed every thing which he had been enjoined. Soon after, he was conducted by the same angel to mount Arafat, where Adam and Eve met again, after a separation of above two hundred years.

From thence they retired into the isle of Serandib, or Ceylon, where they employed themselves in cultivating the earth, and multiplying their family. Eve at twenty several births, had twins, one male, the other female. Adam lived 960 years, of all which, according to the Mussulmans, he spent but half a day in Paradise; but they explain this by one day of Paradise—or of the other world, which is equivalent to a thousand years with us; so that this half day was equal to five hundred years. During the whole life of Adam, mankind had but one religion, and were often visited by angels, who assisted and instructed them.

They assert that Adam was buried near Mecca, upon mount Aboucaïs. Others think that Noah, at the time of the deluge, took his body into the ark, and that it was carried to Jerusalem, by Melchisedec. In the modern Naplouse, or Samaria, in Palestine, is shown a chapel, which, under the name of Adam, is respected by the Turks; but the ancient Persians were of opinion, that he was buried at Serandib, and that his sepulchre was guarded by lions at the time of the giants making war against one another. D'Herbelot, Bib. Or. p. 56.

The Mussulmans believe that Adam was inspired by God; and that a ray of the divinity passed from him to succeeding prophets: they suppose him to have been inspired to write ten volumes, for so we are to understand them, when they say, that God sent them down from heaven to him.—Vide TERRESTRIAL PARADISE, LANGUAGE, &c. &c.

Besides the three sons of Adam whose names are recorded by Moses,—Cain, Abel, and Seth, the eastern people name two others,—Abdaltharth, and Rocail. The last, they say, was Seth's younger brother, and perfect master of the most elevated and obscure sciences. His understanding was so lively and penetrating, that he seemed to be more of an angel than a man.

This specimen of the eastern people's manner of thinking, and expression, shows how greatly they love fictions, wonders, and mysteries; for we are not to imagine that all which they relate of Adam and the other patriarchs is to be understood literally; it is frequently allegory, or moral reflection enveloped in a certain kind of parable, or parabolic expressions.

The Cabalists (Jewish doctors, who cover moral, physical, and theological truths under mysterious expressions: vide CABBALA) describe the first Adam, whom they call Adam Kadmon, as the first and most perfect emanation that proceeded from the essence of God, and, the "first of all that was created in the beginning." They assign him the human form, a skull, brain, eyes, feet, and hands, but some profound mystery is included in each of these parts: his skull signifies wisdom, his right ear understanding, his left ear prudence; and so of the rest. Some Christians have thought, that hereby they alluded to Christ, the second person of the Trinity. It is true, the Cabalists believe that God, not intending to create the world immediately by himself, created it by the agency of the first, the celestial Adam, thereby displaying his power in a more perfect manner: but they acknowledge that the first Adam had a beginning. Abrah. Cohen-Irira Philosoph. Cabbal. Diss. vi. cap. 7. See Basnage's Continuation of the History of the Jews.

The Talmudists tell abundance of fabulous stories referring to Adam and his creation. Such as—that at the first hour of the day God collected the dust, out of which he designed to compose the body, and so disposed it as to receive the form which he intended to give it; at the second hour, Adam stood upon his feet: at the fourth hour he gave names to the animals; the seventh hour was employed in the marriage of Adam and Eve. The Lord, like a bridegroom, conducted her to her new spouse, with her locks curled, and dressed in all her ornaments. At the tenth hour Adam sinned, immediately after which judgment was passed on him; at the twelfth hour he began to feel the punishment of his sin, and the effects of the sentence. Midras Tehillim. Ps. xcii. Vide Basnage, ibid. tom. iv. pag. 186.

Some have imagined that Eve was the forbidden fruit, which Adam could not touch without sin; that the serpent having first enjoyed it, produced Cain, who, consequently, was not the son of Adam; that the latter was so afflicted at the death of Abel, that he continued 180 years without coming near his wife, after which time only he began to have children after his own image and resemblance.

The Greeks put Adam and Eve together, with all the righteous of the Old Testament, and honour them December 19, or, properly speaking, on the Sunday before Christmas.

They moreover commemorate the banishment of our first parents out of Paradise with religious mourning, and very doleful prayers, February 4, or the first day of their Lent.—Some Latin martyrologies commemorate Adam, April 24. There is a Julian calendar which notices him December 24; and some martyrologies place the creation and death of Adam on March 25th, as if with design of bringing the first Adam nearer to the second, who was conceived and died on the same day, according to many of the ancients.—Bolland. die 4 Febr. pag. 449. tom. 3. Apr. pag. 260, tom. 3. Mart. pag. 541.

ADAM, Earth, earthly, red, or bloody. [This city, saith Rab. Jochanan, is distant from Zaretan twelve miles: Jerus. Sotah, fol. 21. 4. Adam was in Perea over against Jericho: and was the center where the waters parted. Josh. iii. 16. Psalm lxxxviii. 60.

It is probable this city was named from the colour of the earth in its neighbourhood; which is understood to have been a stiff clay. So we have in our own country, "Tuxford in the clays," where the soil is as red as burnt brick. The same distinction was applied to many cities, as Pyrrha, Erythra, &c. among the Greeks. But some suppose the word Adam denotes beauty, symmetry, and, therefore, that this town was handsome, symmetrical, as implied, say they, in its name.]

ADAMITES, heretics of the second century. The author of this sect was Prodicus, a disciple of Carpoerates. They assumed the title of Adamites, and affected to possess the innocence of Adam, whose nakedness they imitated in their churches, which they called Paradise. It is said (how truly we know not), community of women was one of their tenets; they lived, or professed to live, in solitude and continency, condemning matrimony: any one guilty of particular offences, they called Adam, and said, he had eaten of the forbidden fruit; and when they expelled him from their community, they drove him out of Paradise; as their phrase was. This heresy was renewed in the fifteenth century by one Picard, a native of Flanders, who retired into Bohemia. In Poland and in England it had some followers: they were said to hold their assemblies in the night-time, and to observe these rules exactly: "Swear, forswear, and reveal not the secret." Some anabaptists were accused of falling into the extravagancies of the Adamites.—Epiphan. Hæres. 52. Theodoret. Hæretic. Fab. lib. i. cap. 6. Augustin. de Hæres.

ADAMAH, a city of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 36. The LXX call it Armath; the Vulgate, Edema.

ADAMI, אָדָמִי: my man; red, earthly, human.

ADAMI, a city of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 33.

ADAR, אָדָר; Vide ADDAR.

ADAR, the twelfth month of the ecclesiastical year among the Hebrews; the sixth of their civil year. It has twenty-nine days; and nearly answers to our February, O. S.; but enters into March, according to the course of the Moon. Vide MONTHS.

On the third day of Adar the building of the second temple was finished, and the dedication of it kept in a solemn manner (Ezra vi. 15. A. M. 3489; ante A. D. 515). On the seventh the Jews celebrate a fast on occasion of the death of Moses. On the thirteenth, they celebrate a fast which they call Esther's, in memory of that observed by Mordecai, Esther, &c. On the fourteenth, they celebrate the festival of Purim, as a memorial of their deliverance from the cruelty of Haman. Esth. ix. 17. On the twenty-fifth, is a commemoration of Jehoiachim, king of Judah, advanced by Evil-Merodach above other kings at his court. Jer. lii. 31, 32.

As the lunar year, which the Jews follow in their calculation, is shorter than the solar year by eleven days, which after three years make about a month, they then insert a thirteenth month; this they call Ve-Adar, or a second Adar, to which they assign twenty-nine days. This intercalation has the effect of postponing the great feasts, &c. a whole month.

ADAR, a city of Judah, Joshua xv. 3. Eusebius places another town of this name in the neighbourhood of Lydda or Diospolis, in the district of Thamna.

ADAR, or Hazar-Addar, a village. Numb. xxxiv. 4.

[The ADAR of Josh. xv. 3. is perhaps the same as this Hazar-Addar. Adar is thought to be the name of the person who built it: "the place of Adar." Adar is also taken for excellent, valuable. The root seems to imply something round of shape, and, perhaps, such was the form of this residence.]

ADARCONIM, אָדָרְכֹנִים: a sort of money, mentioned 1 Chron. xxix. 7; and Ezra viii. 27. The Vulgate translates it "golden pence," the LXX "pieces of gold." They were Darics, a gold coin, which some value at twenty drachms of silver. Gronov. de pecunia veterum, lib. iii. cap. 7. Vide DARKMONIM, which is the same with Adarconim.

Herodotus says (lib. iv. cap. 166,) Darics were first coined under Darius, son of Hystaspes (who lived long after the author of the Chronicles and Ezra); but the scholiast on Aristophanes affirms, that they were struck by another Darius, long prior to Darius son of Hystaspes. The Adarconim of Scripture, and Darkonoth of the Talmudists, are the same with the Greek Δαρικὸν, Darics. A Daric was a piece of gold, of the value of one of our Jacobuses. Vide Prideaux's Connection.

It was Darius the Mede, who coined a great number of pieces of pure gold, called Darics, or Stateres Darici. This Darius was the first king of the Medes and Persians who coined gold money.—They were stamped on one side with the effigies of an archer, who was crowned with a spiked crown, had a bow in his left hand, and an arrow in his right, and was clothed in a long robe. I have seen one of them in gold, and another in silver. They were of the same weight and value with the attic Stater, or piece of gold money, weighing two Attic drachms. Darius seems to have learned the art and use of money from the conquered kingdom of the Lydians, and to have re-coined their gold; for the Medes, before they conquered the Lydians, had no such money. The Lydians were the first who coined gold and silver; and Cresus coined gold monies in plenty, called Cressoi. It was not reasonable that the monies of the kings of Lydia should continue current after the overthrow of their kingdom; therefore Darius re-coined it with his own effigies, but without altering the current weight and value.—Vide The Chronology of Sir Isaac Newton, page 319, &c.

ADASA, or Adarsa, the Greek reads Ἀδασᾶ, Adasa; which may signify the sun, deaf, a labourer; if we suppose that the Hebrew read חֶרֶס cheres, the sun: or חֶרֶשׁ cheresh,—deaf, a labourer: otherwise, the deaf testimony, or the testimony of the plougher.

[Perhaps, ad, the great, Aresha espouser; the Juno Pronuba of the Latins: a temple dedicated to the god, or goddess of marriage; Hymen, or Juno.]

ADARSA, or ADASA, 1 Macc. vii. 40, a city of Ephraim, four miles from Beth-horon, and not far from Gophna.—Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 17. Euseb. in Adasa. Perhaps between the upper Bethoron and Diospolis; because it is said, 1 Macc. vii. 45, the victorious army of Judas pursued the Syrians from Adasa to Gadara, or Gazara, which is one day's journey.—Adarsa is called likewise Adazer, and Adaco, or Acedosa, in Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 17. & de Bello, lib. i. cap. 1.—Here Nicanor was overcome, and his army put to flight by Judas Maccabæus, notwithstanding he had 3000 men only, and Nicanor had 35,000. Josephus tells us, that Judas, in another war, was killed in this place. De Bello, lib. i. cap. 1.

ADBEEL, or Adbal, אֲדָבֵל: a vapour, a cloud of God; from אֲדָב ed, and אֵל el, God. Otherwise, a vexer of God; from אֲדָב adab, to vex or provoke, and אֵל el, God.

ADBEEL, third son of Ishmael, head of a tribe of Ishmaelites. Gen. xxv. 13.

ADDAN, unable to prove his pedigree at the return from Babylon, was excluded from among the true Israelites. Ezra ii. 59.

ADDAR, אָדָר: a cloak. Otherwise, power, grandeur; from עָדָר adar. Son of Bela, son of Benjamin. 1 Chron. viii. 3.

ADDER, vide ASP, and SERPENTS.

ADDI, אָדִי, 'אָדִי: my witness, adorned, passage, prey.

ADDI, son of Cosam, and father of Melchi. Among the ancestors of Christ. Luke iii. 28.

ADER, or Oder, עָדָר: flock; otherwise, he that cuts.

ADER, tower of Ader; or, tower of the flock. Jerom observes (Epist. 27.), that the place where the angels declared the birth of Jesus Christ to the shepherds, was called by this name. Luke ii. 8, 9. It is said the empress Helena built a church on this spot, the remains of which are still visible.

ADER, one who took the city of Gath. 1 Chron. viii. 15.

ADIABENE, a country in Assyria, through which the river Lycus passes, and discharges itself into the Tigris. Josephus speaks much of Helena, queen of the Adiabeniensians, and of Izates, her son, converts to Judaism, in the time of the emperor Claudias, A. D. 41.—Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 2.—Some authors, as Orosius, lib. vii. cap. 6, have suggested that this queen and her son embraced Christianity, but that Josephus designed to do honour to his nation by appropriating their conversion. But we see the marks of Judaism only, both in Helena and Izates. Adiabene is thought to be the province of Ava, through which the river Ahava, or Adiava runs. Vide AHABA.

ADIDA: witness of the hand, or prey of the hand; from עָדָה oda, testimony, and יָד jad, the hand.

ADIDA, a city of Judah, at which Simon Maccabæus encamped, to dispute the entrance into the country with Tryphon, who had treacherously seized his brother Jonathan, at Ptolemais. 1 Macc. xiii. 13. Thought to be the Adida of chap. xii. 38.

ADIEL, אֲדִיָּאל, עֲדִיָּאל; witness of the Lord; from עָדָה ada, and אֵל el, the Lord.

ADIEL, son of Adiel, of Judah. 1 Chron. iv. 36.

ADITHA, or ADITHAIM, עֲדִיתִים, Ἀδῆθαιμ: assemblies: otherwise testimonies; from עָדָה ada, testimony. A city of Judah. Josh. xv. 36.

[Perhaps, "the great single or solitary being;" Ens Entium: but it may also imply, with some small variation, the great personage who was deprived: or rendered solitary, by the loss of his associates. Some suppose it means orna- never pronounce, the Chaldee paraphrase puts three Jods, thus, יידי.

ADONAI, signifies, properly, my lords, in the plural; as Adoni signifies my lord in the singular. The later Jews read Adonai, whenever they meet with Jehovah in the Hebrew [so does our English translation], but the ancient Jews were not so nice; no law forbids to pronounce the name of God.

ADONI-BEZEK, אֲדֹנִי-בֶזֶק: lightning of the Lord, or the Lord of lightning; from אֲדֹנִי adon, a lord, and בֶּזֶק bazak; otherwise, Lord of Bezek.

ADONI-BEZEK: king of the city Bezek, in Canaan, seventeen miles from Naplouse, east.—Euseb. in Bezek.—Adoni bezek was a powerful and cruel prince, who, having at various times taken seventy kings, ordered their thumbs and great toes to be cut off, and made them gather their meat under his table. Judg. i. 7. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. cxxi. After the death of Joshua, the tribes Judah and Simeon marched against Adoni-bezek, who commanded an army of Canaanites and Perizzites. They beat him, killed ten thousand men, and having taken him, they cut off his thumbs and his great toes: then Adoni-bezek acknowledged the retributive justice of this punishment from God. He was afterwards carried to Jerusalem, where he died, A. M. 2585, ante A. D. 1415.

ADONIJAH, אֲדֹנִיָּה: the Lord is my master, from אֲדֹנִי adon, a Lord, and יָה jah, God.

ADONIJAH: fourth son of David, by Hagith, was born at Hebron, while his father was acknowledged king by only part of Israel. Adonijah seeing his elder brothers, Amnon and Absalom, were dead, believed the crown by right belonged to him (vide FRAGMENT, No. xlv.) and as king David, at the close of his life, being in a very weak condition, could take little care of public affairs, he thought he should endeavour to be acknowledged king before his father's death; he set up a magnificent equipage, with chariots and horsemen, and fifty men to run before him. Adonijah was the eldest of the family, handsome, beloved by the king, and had a strong party at court.

He contracted very close engagements, particularly with Joab, the general, and with Abiathar, the priest, who had more interest in the king than any others; but neither Zadock the priest, nor Benaiah, son of Jehoiada, captain of the king's guards, nor Nathan the prophet, nor the body of David's army, were of his party. Adonijah made a great entertainment for his adherents near the fountain Rogel, east of the city, and below the walls, to which he invited all the king's sons, except Solomon; also the principal persons of Judah, except Nathan, Zadock, and Benaiah. His design was to be proclaimed king, and to assume the government before the death of David. But Nathan understanding what was transacting, went to Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, and said, "Do you know that Adonijah designs to get himself proclaimed king? Go to king David, report to him what is doing, and remind him of his promise, that Solomon, your son, should be his successor; and while you are conversing with the king, I will come in, as if accidentally, and second what you have reported." Bathsheba went immediately to the king, and while she was informing him, the prophet Nathan was announced, who addressed him: "My lord, O king! is it by your orders Adonijah has directed himself to be declared king? for he has been saluted with the cries of—Long live king Adonijah!"

David, sending immediately for Zadock and Benaiah, said to Nathan and to them: "Take my guards, seat Solomon on my mule, conduct him to the fountain Gihon, west of the city, and there let Zadock and Nathan crown him, and with trumpets proclaim him king of Israel, with cries of—Long live king Solomon!" After this, bring him back hither, and seat him on my throne; he shall reign in my place, and I will commit the government of Judah and Israel into his hands." This was immediately executed. Jonathan, son of Abiathar, gave instant notice of this to Adonijah and his party, who were still in the tent where they had been feasting. At this news, they dispersed from table in great fright. Adonijah, fearing lest Solomon should put him to death, retired to the tabernacle, and laid hold of the horn of the altar of burnt-offerings; which being reported to Solomon, he said, "If Adonijah would show himself a worthy man, not a hair of his head should fall to the earth; but if wickedness be found in him, he should surely die." King Solomon, therefore, sent, and they brought him from the altar, and he came and bowed himself to king Solomon, who said to him, "Go to thine house."—This happened, A. M. 2989, ante A. D. 1011.

Some time after David's death, Adonijah, by means of Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, intrigued to obtain Abishag, the recent wife of king David his father. Solomon replied, "Why dost thou ask this of me? ask for him the kingdom also (for he is mine elder brother); for he has the priest Abiathar already for him, and Joab the general. I swear by the Lord, Adonijah shall be put to death this day." Benaiah, son of Jehoiada, executed this order, A. M. 2990, ante A. D. 1010.

ADONIKAM, אֲדֹנִיקָם: the Lord is raised, or, my Lord has raised me; from אָדוֹן adon, Lord, and קוּם kum, to raise or lift up.

ADONIKAM: returned from Babylon with 600 men of his family. Ezra ii. 13.

ADONIRAM: אֲדוֹנִירָם: my Lord is most high, or, the Lord of might or elevation; from adon, Lord, and רָמַם ramam, to raise up.

ADONIRAM: receiver of Solomon's tributes, and chief director of the 30,000 men whom that prince sent to Lebanon, to cut timber. Some think him to be the Adoram, who was receiver-general in Rehoboam's reign. Vide ADORAM.

ADONIS. According to the Vulgate, Ezekiel viii. 14, imports, that this prophet saw women sitting in the temple, weeping for Adonis; but the Hebrew reads for Tammuz, or, the hidden one.—Among the Egyptians, Adonis was adored under the name of Osiris, husband of Isis. The Greeks worshipped Isis and Osiris under other names; as that of Bacchus; and the Arabians under that of Adonis:

Ogygia me Bacchum canit;
Ogyrin Egyptus vocat;
Arabica gens, Adoneum. AUSONIUS.

But he was sometimes called Ammuz, or Tammuz, the concealed, to denote, probably, the manner of his death, or the place of his burial. (Vide Plutarch, de defectu Oracul.)—The Hebrews, in derision, sometimes called him the dead, because his worshippers wept for him, and represented him as dead in his coffin: sometimes they called him the image of jealousy, because he was the object of jealousy of the god Mars. The Syrians, Phœnicians, and Cyprians, called him Adonis. Some are of opinion, that the Ammonites and Moabites called him Baal peor. Vide TAMMUZ.

The Hebrew women, therefore, of whom Ezekiel is speaking, celebrated the feasts of Tammuz, or Adonis, in Jerusalem; and God showed the prophet these women weeping, even in his own sacred temple, for the supposed death of this infamous god.

The Rabbins (Kimchi, Maimon. alii. Hebr. Vide & Sant. Pagnin. in Thesauro.) tells us, that Tammuz was an idolatrous prophet, who having been put to death by the king of Babylon, all the idols of the country flocked together about a statue of the sun, which this prophet, who was a magician, had suspended between heaven and earth: there they began all together to deplore the prophet's death: for which reason a festival was instituted every year, to renew the memory of this ceremony, at the beginning of the month Tammuz, which answers pretty nearly to our June. In this temple was a statue, representing Tammuz. It was hollow, the eyes were of lead. A gentle fire was kindled below, which insensibly heated the statue, melted the lead, and seduced the deluded people to believe that the idol wept. All this time the Babylonish women, in the temple, were shrieking, and making strange lamentations. This story stands in need of good proofs.

The scene of Adonis's history is said to have been at Biblos, in Phœnicia; and this pretended deity is supposed to have been killed by a wild boar in the mountains of Libanus, from which the river Adonis descends. (Lucian de Dea Syria.) The waters of this river, at a certain time of the year, change colour, and appear as red as blood. [Mr. Maundrell confirms this fact; of which he was so fortunate as to be an eye-witness. See his journey to Jerusalem, March 17.] This was the signal for celebrating their Adonia, or feasts of Adonis. It was not lawful to omit the observance of them; great lamentations were made at this time through town and country; they cried dreadfully, whipped themselves, and imitated all the ceremonies of a most afflictive mourning for a dead person. After this mourning was ended, succeeded the interment and funeral solemnities. The next day it was reported, that he was alive, and had ascended into the air.

The common people were persuaded to believe, that the Egyptians, at the feast of Adonis, sent by sea a box made of rushes, or of Egyptian papyrus, in the form of a human figure, in which a letter was inclosed, acquainting the inhabitants of Biblos, a city above seven days' journey from the coast of Egypt, that their god Adonis, whom they apprehended to be lost, had been discovered. The vessel which carried this letter arrived always safe at Biblos, at the end of seven days. Lucian tells us, he was a witness of this event. Procopius, St. Cyril, of Alexandria, (on Isaiah xviii.) and other learned men, are of opinion, that Isaiah alludes to this superstitious custom, when he says, "Woe to the land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the river of Ethiopia: that sendeth ambassadors by the sea, even vessels of bulrushes upon the waters." Some, as Bochart, Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 2. translate—that sendeth images, or idols—by sea." But the Hebrew signifies properly, ambassadors—deputed thither by sea, to carry the news of Adonis's resurrection. In our comment on Isaiah, we have given another sense to this passage, which has no relation to Adonis. [Vide FRAGMENT, No. 322.]

ADONIZEDEK: אֲדוֹנִיזֶדֶק: Justice of the Lord, or, the Lord of justice; from adon, Lord, and זֶדֶק zedek, justice: or, Lord of Zedek, a city.

ADONIZEDEK: king of Zedek, (or Jerusalem;

salem; for that city is believed to have had four names; Salem, Jerusalem, Jebus, and Zedek. [A proof of this last name we have in MELCHIZEDEK; i. e. king of Zedek, or Salem; as well as in this name Adoni-zedek: or, lord of Zedek; but whether he were of the posterity of Melchizedek, does not appear: perhaps he was.] Adonizedek, understanding that the inhabitants of Gibeon had capitulated to the Hebrews, who had destroyed the cities of Jericho and Ai, struck with terror, considered how he might stop the conquests of the Israelites (Josh. x. 1, 2, &c.) He sent to Hoham, king of Hebron, to Piram, king of Jarmuth, to Japhia, king of Lachish, and to Debir, king of Eglon, inviting them to join him against Gibeon.

The Gibeonites sent in haste to demand succours from Joshua, who was at Gilgal. Joshua, with a chosen band of troops, marching all night, fell on the enemy at break of day, made a great slaughter, and pursued them to Azekah and Makkedah. In this battle, the Lord showered down hailstones upon them, and the lights of the Sun and Moon were stayed at Joshua's prayer. Vide JOSHUA, and FRAGMENT, No. CLIV.

The five kings hid themselves in a cave, near Makkedah; which Joshua ordered to be stopped by large stones, and guarded. The Israelites continued the pursuit till evening; when Joshua opening the cave, said to the principal officers, "Come near, put your feet upon the necks of these kings; fear not, nor be dismayed; for thus shall the Lord do to all your enemies, against whom ye fight." Afterwards Joshua slew them, and hanged them. When the sun was going down, Joshua commanded that they should be taken off the trees, and cast into the cave wherein they had been hid, and great stones laid at the cave's mouth.

ADOPTION is an act, whereby a man takes a stranger into his family in order to make him a part of it; acknowledges him for his son, and designs him for an heir of his estate. I do not find that adoption, strictly speaking was used among the Hebrews. Moses says nothing of it in his laws; and Jacob's adoption of his two grandsons, Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. xlviii. 1.) is rather a kind of substitution, whereby he intended, that his grandsons, the two sons of Joseph should have each his lot in Israel, as if they had been his own sons,—"Ephraim and Manasseh, are mine; as Reuben and Simeon they shall be mine." But as he gives no inheritance to their father Joseph, the effect of this adoption extended only to their increase of fortune and inheritance; i. e. instead of one part, giving them (or Joseph, whom they represented) two parts.

Another kind of Adoption among the Israelites, consisted in the obligation of a surviving brother to marry the widow of his brother, who had died without children (Deut. xxv. 5; Ruth iv. 5; Matt. xxii. 24), so that the children of this connexion were considered as belonging to the deceased brother, and went by his name; a practice more ancient than the Mosaic law, as appears in the History of Tamar; [but this manner of adopting was not practised among the Greeks and Romans: it seems, however, to have been known in India. See FRAGMENT, No. 337. See the Article LEVIRATE. This kind of adoption was not intended by Sarah, Leah, and Rachel; when they gave their handmaids to their husbands. Gen. xvi. 2; xxx. 3.]

Pharaoh's daughter adopted the child Moses (Exod. ii. 10), and Mordecai adopted Ester (Ester, ii. 7, 15). We are not acquainted with what ceremonies were observed on these occasions, nor how far the privileges of adoption extended; but it is presumed, they were much like those of the Roman laws; that adopted children shared the parent's estate with his natural descendants; that they assumed the name of the person who adopted them, and became subject to his paternal power.

By the propitiation of our Saviour, and the communication of his merit, sinners become adopted children of God. Thus St. Paul writes, "Ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry Abba, father." Rom. viii. 15. —"we wait for the adoption of the children of God." And, "God sent forth his son to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons." Gal. iv. 4, 5.

Among the Mahometans, the ceremony of adoption is performed, by causing the adopted to pass through the shirt of the person who adopts him. Hence, to adopt among the Turks is expressed by saying—"to draw any one through one's shirt;" and they call an adopted son, Akietogli, the son of another life—because he was not begotten in this. (D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 47.) Something like this is observable among the Hebrews: Elijah adopts Elisha, by throwing his mantle over him, 1 Kings, xix. 19, and when Elijah was carried off in a fiery chariot, his mantle, which he let fall, was taken up by Elisha his disciple, his spiritual son, and adopted successor in the office of prophet (2 Kings, ii. 15). [N. B. Elisha asks not merely to be adopted (for that he had been already), but to be treated as the elder son, to have a double portion (the elder son's prerogative) of the spirit conferred upon him. Did the gift of the mantle imply this also?]

This circumstance seems to be illustrated by the conduct of Moses, who clothed Eleazar in Aaron's

Aaron's sacred vestments, when that high-priest was about to be gathered to his fathers; indicating thereby, that Eleazar succeeded in the functions of the priesthood, and was, as it were, adopted to exercise that dignity. The Lord told Shebna, captain of the temple, that he would deprive him of his honourable station, and substitute Eliakim, son of Hilkiah. (Isaiah, xxii. 21). "I will clothe him with thy robe, saith the Lord, and strengthen him with thy girdle, and I will commit thy government into his hand." St. Paul, in several places says, "that Christians—put on the Lord Jesus;—that they put on the new man," to denote their adoption as sons of God. Rom. xiii. 14; Gal. iii. 27; Ephes. iv. 24; Col. iii. 10. The same, John, i. 12; Epist. John, iii. 2. Vide Son.

ADOR, אֲדוֹרָא: generation, or habitation; from דור dor: otherwise, witness of light, or of fire; from יָדָה odeh, or ada, testimony, and אור or, or aur, fire, or light.

ADOR: probably Adora, 2 Macc. xiii. 20.

ADORA, or ADORAIM; sometimes called Ador, or Dora, a city belonging to Judah, not far from Maresu, or Narisa, near Eleuthropolis, in the south of Judah, on the confines of Idumæa. 2 Chron. xi. 9; 1 Macc. xiii. 20. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 17.

ADORAM, אֲדוֹרָם: their beauty, their power, or their cloke; from אָדָר ader, and the pronoun מֵם mem, their's: otherwise, praise, or a cry lifted up; from רוֹם rom.

I. ADORAM, son of Tou, king of Hamath, who, sent by his father, congratulated David on his victory over Hadadezar, king of Syria (1 Chron. xviii. 10); Adoram is called Joram; and Tou, Toi, 2 Sam. viii. 10.

II. ADORAM, receiver-general of the tributes, in the reign of David (2 Sam. xx. 24), might be the father of Adoram, who had the same employment under Solomon and Rehoboam.

III. ADORAM, treasurer to Rehoboam (1 Kings, xii. 14, 15, 18). This prince having by his haughtiness, provoked the ten tribes to separate from the house of David, thought he should regain them by sending to them Adoram, who was receiver of the tribute money, or principal surveyor of the works. Whether in this he intended to reduce the people by gentle, or by harsh means, or by putting into their hands the instrument of those vexations they had suffered under the preceding reign (for many believe Adoram to be the same with Adoniram, who had executed the same office under Solomon (1 Kings, iv. 5; v. 14)—however this might be, the people being furious, stoned Adoram to death; whereupon Rehoboam got hastily into his chariot, and returned to Jerusalem. This happened A. M. 3029. ante A. D. 971.

ADORAIM, אֲדוֹרַיִם, אֲדוֹרָאִים: strength or power of the sea; from אָדָר ader, and יָם, jam, the sea: Aduraim is their cloke, their power.

Perhaps, this city was divided into two parts; so that this is only the plural of Ador. Simon thinks, "the established habitation."

ADORAIM, a town fortified by Rehoboam, perhaps the Adur or Hazer-addar, a city of Judah. 2 Chron. ix. 9. Vide ADORA, and RELAND'S PALESTIN. tom. ii. pag. 547.

[ADORATION, as an act of worship, is strictly due to God, and to God only: but mortal men have too often, in this respect, as it were, "seated themselves in the temple of God, showing themselves as if they were gods." Nevertheless, as the ideas attached to certain forms of respect, to certain attitudes and customs, are not merely different, but even (occasionally) contradictory, in different countries; it is well to understand the import of such or such a token, in the country where it occurs.

The east adopts many modes which seem forced, and excessive, to us of the northern and western parts of Europe; and many which are there thought simply respectful, appear to us to be adorative; whereas, no such idea is really annexed to them in that country.

Nevertheless, external attitudes have always been regarded as tokens of internal sentiments: wherefore, a proper care is necessary for the regulation of external attitudes;—and this in our behaviour to men; and if in our behaviour to men, then in so much of our behaviour as may be seen by them, even though such behaviour be directed toward God. Not that we can suppose God to be better pleased by one attitude than by another; the disposition of the mind, the soul, the understanding, the affections, constitutes worship, as offered to him; yet, as expressive of that disposition, of reverence, of deep humility and abasement, we have no reason to think prostration, as an act of worship, or any other becoming posture of body, is despised by God.

Attitudes of adoration have varied according to time, and place, or occasion.

1. Sometimes STANDING was the attitude of worship: so Solomon stood, 1 Kings, viii. 22; so the priests stood, in the temple service; and so the Pharisee represented by our Lord (who cannot be supposed ignorant of external forms) stood before God. The Greeks, I believe, generally stood; and the Romans, so far as I recollect, universally: in short, standing has been the attitude of devotion adopted by many nations.

2. Sometimes BENDING the body somewhat forward, the eyes fixed to the earth, the hands, perhaps, resting on the knees; this is still an attitude of meditation, if not of prayer, in the east.

3. Sometimes KNEELING: this appears to have been a very general attitude, importing a kind of lessening of a person's self in the presence of a superior: the instances of this attitude are so common, as to need no reference; it was used in Egypt, in Judea, &c. &c.

4. Sometimes SITTING, the under parts of the thighs resting on the heels; and this attitude is still in use, as that of servants attending their masters: it appears to be of the greatest antiquity; almost all the Egyptian figures of worshippers are thus represented, and there are many allusions to it in Scripture; perhaps, indeed, it is usually alluded to, when sitting before God is mentioned, as 2 Sam. vii. 18.

5. Sometimes PROSTRATION, the body resting on the hands and knees together, the head bent to the earth: this seems to have been used as an attitude of intense humility and devotion; or, a turning away from every sensible object, that the mind might be more exclusively engaged in its present exercise.

6. Sometimes KNEELING, and laying the head on the earth; the hands crossed over the back. This is conceived to have been the posture of suppliant captives to their conquerors: implying the non-exertion of the hands any farther against them. May we say this was the attitude of the five kings when Joshua ordered his officers to set their feet on the necks of these kings?

In general, mankind have been too fond of respect paid to their persons. Pride is the vice of man; yet we occasionally find saints and angels forbidding adoration, and declining that honour; whereas, on the contrary, we find the Devil, himself, very modestly desirous of it; and that from the son of God, (Matt. iv. 9.) "If thou wilt fall down and adore (or worship) me,"—as if a little would not serve his turn; but he would have a deep adoration, as the purchase of such immense promotion; and the premium for such extensive grandeur. The temptation was well suited to depraved humanity, though infinitely too frivolous to engage the attention of him to whom it was addressed.

Nebuchadnezzar required prostration before his golden image; an external act of adoration, at which many would start: but is there not an internal adoration of that splendid metal, whose ready devotion, needs not the animating sound of harp, dulcimer, or sackbut? [See the Plate of ATTITUDES.]

hand is carried to the mouth, or—to kiss something; but it also includes in this action, a sense of veneration and worship. So Job xxxi. 26, 27. "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness, and my mouth hath kissed my hand, this also were iniquity;" if I have adored them, by kissing my hand at the sight of them; which action, it should seem, might be thus explained; q. d. If I had these objects of worship near me, I would, in token of affection, kiss them, as I now kiss my hand as a substitute." And 1 Kings xix. 18. "Yet I have left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him," or kissed towards him. Minutius Felix says (in Octavio), "that as Cæcilius passed before the statue of Serapis, he kissed his hand (no doubt towards the statue—transferring the action and sentiment to that); as is the custom of superstitious people." Those who adore, use to kiss their hands, says St. Jerom (Contra Rufin. xvi. 1), and to bow their heads; and the Hebrews, according to the idiom of their language, put kissing for adoration; "Kiss the son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way;" i. e. adore the son, and submit, with veneration, to his government. Psalm ii. 12. Pharaoh, speaking to Joseph, says, "According to thy word shall all my people kiss," i. e. in token of veneration to your orders, as if they were the immediate commands of the king. Gen. xli. 40.

[The word adore, in Scripture, is taken, not only for worship due to God, but likewise for marks of civil respect customarily paid to kings, and great men. In adoration of both kinds men in those times, as now in those countries, frequently bowed their bodies very low, and often prostrated themselves on the earth, in token of respect; especially when soliciting favours. Abraham, thus prostrate, adored (in the civil sense) the angels who appeared to him at Mamre. Gen. xviii. 2. Lot adored in the same manner those who went to Sodom. Gen. xix. 1. It is very probable, indeed certain, that neither Abraham nor Lot, at first sight, took these visitors for any other than men; but, such being the manner of expressing respectful politeness, those Patriarchs adopted this action according to its general use, and then current estimation.] In the same sense (for in no other is it credible) Abraham adored the people of Hebron, Gen. xxiii. 7; he fell prostrate before them, entreating them to sell him a burying-place for Sarah. The Israelites, hearing that Moses was sent by God to deliver them from Egypt, bowed their heads and worshipped the Lord. Exod. iv. 31. It is needless to multiply tively examples of this way of speaking; they occur in almost every page of Scripture, especially of the Old Testament. [Our Lord was adored by many, who sought his assistance, who yet did not see in him more than a prophet or teacher, sent from God; and it is probable, that the angel who corrected John (Rev. xix. 10) discovered in his action (or in his mind) somewhat beyond this civil respect, which induced him to refuse it: as Peter also might, in the instance of Cornelius. Acts x. 26.]

ADRAA, in the Batanaea (Euseb. in Artaroth) twenty-five miles from Bostri. Vide EDREI.

ADRAMMELECH, אדרמלך: the cloak, glory, grandeur, or power, of the king; from אדר ader, and מלך melech, a king.

I. ADRAMMELECH, son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria (Isaiah, xxxvii. 38. 2 Kings, xix. ult.) His father being returned to Nineveh after his fatal expedition into Judæa against Hezekiah, was killed by his two sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer, while worshipping in the temple of his god Nisroch. It is not known what induced these two princes to commit this parricide. After they had murdered their father, they fled to the mountains of Armenia; and Esar-haddon, their brother, succeeded to the crown. A. M. 3295, ante A. D. 705. Adrammelech and Sharezer, the sons of Sennacherib, are called, by Said-ebn-Botrik, Anzur-melech, and Serassera: the last of these names comes very near that of Siessernera, which the Arabians give to king Sennacherib.

II. ADRAMMELECH, one of the gods adored by the inhabitants of Sepharvaim, settled in Samaria, in the stead of those Israelites who were carried beyond the Euphrates. The people of Sepharvaim made their children pass through fire in honour of this false deity, and of another called Anamelech. 2 Kings xvii. 31. The Rabbins say, Adrammelech was represented under the form of a mule; but this is not probable: there is much more reason to believe that Adrammelech represented the sun, and Anamelech the moon; the first signifies the magnificent king, the second, the gentle king. Many eastern nations adored the moon as a god, not a goddess; as did the Greeks in some places. Vide ANNAMELECH; and FRAGMENT, No. cviii.

[Perhaps the name Adrammelech is derived from the gorgeous robe which adorned his image! if it be not rather an epithet given first by poetical imagination, and afterwards adopted by the royal worshippers, as well expressing the god adored in their sumptuous palace, where he might be superbly lodged: q. d. the king of splendors.—The original idol seems to have been Bel, or Baal, which see.]

ADRAMMYTIUM. St. Paul, in his first voyage to Italy, embarked in a vessel going to Adrammytium, now Adramiti, a maritime town of Mysia, in Asia Minor, over against the island of Lesbos. Acts xxvii. 12. It was an Athenian colony.

[II. A city on the north coast of Africa, west of Egypt. Jerom, or whoever composed the catalogue of places mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, alludes to an Adrammytium in Bazatio, a region of Africa. But the probability is, that the “ship of Adrammytium,” into which the Apostle Paul entered, was one which was returning home to its own port, Adrammytium in Mysia, and therefore coasted along the shores of Asia Minor. This city was situated in the greater Mysia, on a gulf of the same name, which was given to this city, according to Aristotle, by Adrammyttus, son of Alyattes, king of Lydia, and brother of Cræsus, who had built it.]

ADRIA, a city of Italy, on the Tartaro, in the state of Venice. It gives name to the Adriatic sea, which is sometimes called simply Adria, (Acts xxvii. 27.); and although this name, strictly speaking, belongs only to the sea within the Adriatic gulf, yet the sacred author, describing the navigation of St. Paul, uses it for the Sicilian and Ionian sea; i. e. if the island now called Malta was the scene of his shipwreck; but some have thought it was Melita in the Adriatic. Vide MALTA.

[There has been much debate among those who have investigated the voyage of the Apostle Paul, how he could be tossed up and down in Adria, or the Adriatic sea, yet land on the island now called Malta; the solution is, that this name extended beyond the proper limits of the Adriatic gulf, and was given to an indeterminate extent of the sea, as we say, the Levant, &c. in an enlarged and general import. Ptolemy says, lib. iii. cap. 4. that Sicily was bounded east by the Adriatic: cap. 16. that Crete was washed on the west by the Adriatic Sea; and Strabo says, lib. vii. that the Ionian Gulf is a part of that which in his time was called the Adriatic Sea.]

ADRIAN: this emperor is not named in the Bible, but some are of opinion that he is alluded to, Rev. viii. 10, 11. where it is said, “And the third angel sounded, and there fell a great star from heaven, burning as it were a lamp, and it fell upon the third part of the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters. And the name of the star is called wormwood, and the third part of the waters became wormwood, and many men died of the waters because they were bitter.” By this star was predicted Barchochebas, the famous Jewish impostor, who induced

Adrian did not love the Jews, because he had seen the disturbances they occasioned during the reign of Trajan. To mortify them, and keep them in subjection, he sent a colony of strangers to Jerusalem, and built a temple there to Jupiter. Jerusalem was not then very considerable; and since its ruin and destruction by Titus, could not have recovered itself. The Jews, not enduring that this colony of strangers should occupy their city, and introduce a foreign religion, began to mutiny, about A. D. 134. (Xiphilin. p. 262 Dio Cass. Basnage Hist. des Juifs, tom. ii. lib. 4. cap. 8.) Barchochebas, who appeared about the same time, and assumed the character of the Messiah, animated them in their rebellion. The presence of Adrian, who was then in Syria and Egypt, somewhat restrained the Jews; but from enmity to the Romans, they forged bad arms for them with a purpose of disabling them, in what encounters they themselves might have with them. They afterwards raised little forts with walls, in places which seemed most advantageous; and made subterraneous passages for the better communication with one another, and for concealment from the pursuit of their enemies: but these the Romans at first despised, as so many vain efforts. (Xiphilin. loco. cit.)

At length the number of mutineers encreased; they fought desperately: the thieves of all the neighbouring provinces joined them, in hopes of plunder: and their rebellion had an influence on adjacent countries. Tinnius Rufus, who some time before had been the emperor's lieutenant in Syria, had at this time the same character in Judea; he attacked the Jews, and killed great numbers, but with a considerable loss of men, and he was even defeated in several skirmishes. At last, Adrian sent Julius Severus, one of the greatest generals of his age, from Britain; who besieged Bether, or Betheron, which served as a retreat to them, and which was at length taken.

The number of Roman soldiers and auxiliary troops that perished in the course of this war, which lasted, as St. Jerom and the Rabbins say, three years and a half (Hieronym. in Dan. ix. Basnage Hist. des Juifs. tom. ii. pag. 133), or, as others, only two years, was very great: and Dio remarks, that the emperor, in writing to the senate the success of this war, did not use the common form in the beginning of his letters: "If you, and your children are in good health, I am glad of it; I and the army are in good condition;" by reason of the great losses sustained in this war. Dio, lib. 69. pag. 794.

After this revolt, Adrian finished the building of Jerusalem, and changed the name of that city to ELIA, which was his family name. Vide ELIA. He expelled the Jews, and forbade them, under a severe penalty, to enter it (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iv. cap. 6.); he commanded great numbers of the prisoners to be carried to the fair held near the turpentine tree, where, as was believed, Abraham received the angels; here they were sold at the price of horses; and such as could not be sold here, were conveyed to another fair at Gaza (Hieron. Chron. an.); the rest were sent to Egypt. Jerom (in Zach. xi. 7.) applies to this calamity of the Jews, the words of Zachariah. "I will feed the flock of slaughter." And the Hebrew doctors apply those words, Jer. xxxi. 15. "A voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation and bitter weeping; Rachel weeping for her children," &c. The Jews purchased with a sum of money the liberty, not of entering Jerusalem, but only of looking from a distance on it, and going to lament its fall and desolation.

We are assured, that Tinnius Rufus, or, as the Rabbins call him, Turannus, or Turnus Rufus, plowed up the spot of ground on which the temple had formerly stood. There are medals of Adrian extant struck on this occasion; on the reverse of which Judea is represented as a woman, holding two naked children by her, and sacrificing upon an altar. On another medal, we see Judea kneeling, submitting to the emperor, and three children begging mercy of him. (Tristan. Com. Hist. Adrian, pag. 363. Freher de Num. Censús. pag. 3648.)

From this time, as no more Jews were suffered in Jerusalem, we find among its principal persons bishops taken from the Gentile converts to Christianity: hitherto the bishops of that city had been circumsised believers. Vide ELIA.

ADRIEL, אֲדִיֶּל, Ἰδριήλ, the flock of God; from אֲדֵר ader, a flock; otherwise a privation or cutting of God; from אֲדֵר ader, and אֵל el. God.

ADRIEL, son of Barzilla, married Merab, daughter of Saul, who had been promised to David. 1 Sam. xviii. 19. Adriel had five sons by her, who were delivered to the Gibeonites to be put to death before the Lord, to avenge the cruelty of Saul their grandfather against the Gibeonites. 2 Sam. xxi. 8, imports, that these five were sons of Michal and Adriel; but, either the name of Michal is put for Merab, sister of Michal; or, Michal had adopted the sons of her sister Merab: [according to the sense of our translation, which says—Michal

Michal brought them up for Adriel—whose wife Merab perhaps was dead, or personally incapable of that duty.]

ADULLAM, אדוללם, their testimony, their prey, or their ornament. The name of a cave to which David escaped from Achish, 1 Sam. xxii. 1. 2 Sam. xxiii. 13. The prophet Micah i. 15. seems to use a kind of play on this word, "He shall come unto (the ornament) Adullam, the glory (ornament) of Israel."

[Perhaps, "the cave of retirement," or hiding, from the Syriac root, to decline, to retire; to this sense agrees the purport of the passages where it occurs as a cave. Nevertheless, as the prophet Micah describes a city of this name, as "the glory of Israel," that epithet ill agrees with this sense. It is probable, therefore, that the name of the city implied shew, decoration, or splendour, whatever might be intended by that of the cave.]

ADULLAM, a city of Judah (Josh. xii. 15. xv. 35), in the southern part of that tribe, towards the Dead sea. Eusebius says (in locis in Adullam) it was a large town, ten miles from Eleutheropolis, eastward. (Jerom places it at eleven miles from Eleutheropolis.) Rehoboam rebuilt this place, and strengthened it with fortifications, 2 Chron. xi. 7, 8. Judas Maccabæus encamped in the plain of Adullam, and there passed the sabbath-day, 2 Macc. xii. 38. Joshua killed the king of Adullam, Josh. xii. 15. David, during his flight, hid himself in the cave of Adullam, 1 Sam. xxii. 1.

ADULTERY is a criminal connection between persons who are engaged to keep themselves wholly to others; in this it differs from, and exceeds the guilt of Fornication; which is the same intercourse between unmarried persons. Fornication may be, in some sense covered by a subsequent marriage of the parties; but adultery cannot be so healed: hence, adultery is used by God, to signify the departing of his own people (i. e. of those who were under engagements to him) from his worship to that of other gods, &c. to associate with strangers; hence, God compares himself to a husband jealous of his honour; and hence the adoption of vile opinions and practices is compared to the worst kind of prostitution. It is an argument ad hominem, not merely to the Jews, but to human nature at large, against the flagitious wickedness of forsaking God, his worship, &c. for stranger-gods.

ADULTERY. The law of Moses punished adultery with death, both the man and the woman guilty of this crime, Lev. xx. 10.

The Jews having surprised a woman in adultery, brought her to Jesus Christ, (John viii. 3.) and asked him what they should do with her,

Moses having ordered women guilty of this crime to be stoned? This they said, tempting him, to find accusation against him. Jesus stooping down as though he heard them not, wrote with his finger on the ground, afterwards somewhat raising himself, he said, "Let him who is without sin cast the first stone;" then stooping again, he resumed his writing on the ground, seeming to take no notice of those around him, but leaving them to the operations of their own reflections and consciences. Her accusers, self-convicted, retired one after another, the oldest first. Jesus raising himself up, and seeing himself left alone with the woman, said, "Woman, where are thy accusers? Has no one condemned thee?" She said, "No, Lord." Jesus answered her, "Neither do I (now) condemn thee; go, and sin no more."

On this story it is presumed, with reason, first, that this woman's accusers were themselves guilty of the crime they laid to her charge, almost in the same manner as the accusers in the story of Susanna. Now it is not just to receive the accusations of persons who are guilty of the evil of which they accuse another (says Cicero, in Verrem, Orat. 5). [But this might not be strictly the fact: it seems enough to say, that their consciences accused them of such crimes as restrained their hands from punishing this woman; who, perhaps, was guilty in this instance of a less enormous sin than they were conscious of in other kinds. It may yet be suggested, that their malevolent design to entrap our Lord, was appealed to by him; and this was no slight cause of their confusion, if they had wished to found a charge which might affect his life; since their intended murder was worse than this woman's adultery: especially if, secondly, there is room to believe that the woman had suffered some violence.]

Selden and Fagius consider this case as that supposed by Moses, Deut. xxii. 23. "If a damsel, a virgin, be betrothed to an husband, and a man find her in the city, and lie with her, then ye shall bring them both unto the gate of that city, and ye shall stone them with stones that they die; the damsel, because she cried not, being in the city, and the man, because he hath humbled his neighbour's wife." (Selden, Uxor Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 11. Fagius ad Deut. xxii. 22.)

[The law was, that both the culprits should be brought before the council, where, if condemned, the whole audience, COUNCIL INCLUDED, were to stone them. By bringing this woman only to Jesus, the Jews were guilty, 1. of partiality, as they ought to have brought the adulterer also; 2. They desired
Jesus

Jesus to take on himself the office of the council, which would have been assuming political power, and would have endangered his life: this plot he retorts on themselves by saying, "Do you, on your own proposals, assume that conduct which you well know the council would pursue in such a case; consider this prisoner as ipso facto condemned by the circumstances in which she was apprehended, therefore do you cast stones at her, as the council would cast stones at a person so condemned." This they declined, being aware of its tendency; and they shrunk from that action to which they had urged Jesus. To this his words seem more particularly to allude, "Let him who is without sin—not moral guilt, merely, but political offence—he who can be innocent in assuming that power of life and death, which is legally lodged elsewhere, let him act the judge, and stone her." And so, speaking to the woman, "has nobody officially condemned thee—executed the condemnation of the law on thee, by stoning thee?—Neither do I officially condemn thee;—I do not execute condemnation on thee by stoning thee: Remember the narrow escape thou hast now experienced: Go, and sin no more."]

ADULTERY. The story of the woman taken in adultery is not in many Greek copies. St. Jerom observes, (lib. ii.) that in his time it was omitted in many copies, as well Greek as Latin. The generality of the Greek fathers did not read it. Of twenty-three commentators in the Greek Catena on St. John, not one has explained it; which seems to imply that it was not in their copies. Maldonatus assures us, that of all the Greek copies consulted by him, he found it but in one; viz. in that which contains Leontius's comment on St. John, nor does Leontius say one word of it in his comment; and in the Greek text, which is joined with it, this story is marked with obelisks, to show it was an addition. Dr. Mill cites many other Greek manuscripts wherein it is not. Neither Origen, Chrysostom, Theophylact, or Nonnus, acknowledge it; nor can Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 39.) be said to own it, since he takes notice that it was contained in the Hebrew copy of St. Matthew, which the Nazarenes used. It is true, some assert that Eusebius has acknowledged this story in his Canons, or "Harmony of the Gospel;" but others maintain that he refers, not to the history of the adulteress, but to the verses which precede it. (Simon Hist. Critique du N. T. pag. 150.)

It is said, also, that the Armenians omit this passage; that neither the Syriac printed in the Polyglots of Paris and London, nor the old Gothic version, by Ulphilas, read it. The manuscripts wherein it appears vary extremely; some insert it at the end of St. John's Gospel, others at the end of the 21st chapter of Luke; others in the margin of the 8th chapter of St. John; others again mark it with obelisks, as dubious. Euthymius, who mentions it in his comment, confesses that it is not in the best manuscripts. This is the full force of what is said against the authenticity of this story.

What is produced in favour of it, now follows. All the copies used by Robert Stephens, in number 16, and those consulted by Theodore Beza, which amounted to 17, only one manuscript excepted, which is cited by him, read this story. Those likewise to which Dr. Mill had recourse, for the most part acknowledge it. Tatian, A. D. 160, and Ammonius, A. D. 220, owned it, and placed it in their Harmonies. The author of the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. ii. cap. 24.) and the Synopsis ascribed to Athanasius, have it; St. Jerom, St. Justin, Ambrose, and the Latin fathers, received it, though they were not unacquainted with the differences among the Greek copies. (Aug. de Conjug. Adulter. lib. ii. cap. 7.) St. Justin conjectures, that some of the faithful, of too little judgment, (or, perhaps, some who were enemies to the faith) expunged this story, lest our Saviour should be thought to authorise the crime by forgiving it so easily. Many Syriac manuscripts, of good antiquity, read it; and we meet with it in all printed copies, Greek and Latin; it should be admitted therefore without difficulty. Vide the commentators on the Gospel of John, chap. viii. Dr. Mill's Annotations on the New Testament; M. Fabricius's Cod. Apocr. N. T. tom. i. p. 355. [Griesbach prints the passage between [] as dubious; yet, on the whole, admits it.]

ADUMMIM, a town and mountain of Benjamin, Josh. xv. 7. xviii. 17. Some place it south, others north, of Jericho. If it be true, as is believed, that the road from Jerusalem to Jericho passed through Adummim, this place must have been west of Jericho. Some think the traveller mentioned Luke x. 30. & seq. who, in his way from Jerusalem to Jericho, fell among thieves, was attacked at Adummim between these two cities. (Vide Hieronym. in Matt. xx. & Ep. 27.)

[In like manner, "Red Stone," Saxa rubra, was a small town near Rome, otherwise called Rubra, red, understanding Saxa, stone; Leo Africanus mentions Red-stone, a city of Africa; and we have Pyrra, or "fire-coloured," a promontory in Thessaly, &c. Vide ADAM.]

AELIA CAPITOLINA, was the name given to Jerusalem, when the emperor Adrian, about

A. D. 134, settled a Roman colony there, and banished the Jews from thence on pain of death. (Spartian, in vita Adriani.) Some assert that they were even prohibited to circumcise their children, as St. Jerom says (in Sophon. i). He says also, that in his time the Jews bought permission of the Roman soldiers to look on Jerusalem, and shed tears over it. (Paulin. ad Sever. Epist. 11.) Thus the people which bought Jesus Christ with money, were obliged to pay a price even for the indulgence of their own tears: old men and women, loaded with rags and years, were observed to go weeping up the Mount of Olives (vide Mark xiii. 3.), to lament the ruin of the temple from thence. They purchased very dearly this sight, with the liberty of spreading perfumes on a stone which was there. The name Ælia became so common, that "Jerusalem" was preserved only among the Jews, and better informed Christians. It went by the name Ælia till the emperor Constantine's time, when it resumed that of Jerusalem.

The name Ælia, however, was not abolished under Constantine: it was called so long after, as may be seen in Greek, Latin, and Mahometan authors. Jerusalem was called Ælia, because Ælius was the name of Adrian's family, and Capitolina, from Jupiter Capitolinus, to whom the city was now consecrated; and to whom a temple was built over the place where Jesus rose from the dead. A marble Venus was also set up at Calvary, on the rock where the cross had stood; a hog in marble was placed on the gate which led towards Bethlehem: and, at Bethlehem, a grove was planted in honour of Adonis, to whom was dedicated the cave wherein it was said our Saviour was born. (Hieron. ad Paulin. Ep. 13.) Notwithstanding which degradations, these places, consecrated by the birth, death, and resurrection of Jesus, were honoured by Christians, and were in great repute among the heathen. [And these kind of insulting pollutions contributed to identify, and to commemorate the locality of the spots thus defiled, but destined to honour. Vide FRAGMENT, No. cxxxix.] Adrian's order prohibiting Jews to enter Jerusalem, did not exclude Christians; they remained, and had bishops there. Hitherto this church had been composed principally of converted Jews, who, with the liberty of the gospel, retained the old legal ceremonies; but from this time it was formed of Gentile converts only, who abolished the remains of those Jewish observances. (Sever. Sulpit. Hist. lib. ii. Epiph. de Pond et Mens. cap. 14, 15.)—Some affirm, that the emperor Adrian, in building

Jerusalem, employed one Aquila, a native of Sinope, in Pontus, who at first embraced Christianity, but being expelled the church turned Jew, and became celebrated for his translation of the Old Testament into Greek. Vide ADRIAN and AQUILA; also the Plates MEDALS of JERUSALEM.

ÆEN, or AIN, or OIN, ay, an eye, or fountain: the name of a city. Josh. xv. 32. xix. 7. AIN, or OIN (a fountain), occurs in composition with several names of cities. The city Ain was first given to Judah; afterwards to Simeon. 1 Chron. i. 32. Eusebius says this is Beth-anin, four miles from Hebron, and two from the Terebinthus. Vide EN.

ÆRA, is nearly the same thing with Epocha, which is a point of time which Chronologers call a fixed point; or chronological æra. So the first Olympiad, the foundation of Rome, the Æra of Nabonassar, of Alexander the Great, of the Selucidæ (or, in the language of the books of Maccabees, the year of the Greeks,) and the year of Jesus Christ, or Anno Domini, are all æras.

The ÆRA of the first Olympiad is fixed A. M. 3228, before Jesus Christ 772.

The Æra of the foundation of Rome, A. M. 2856.

The Æra of Nabonassar, A. M. 3527, before A. D. 743.

The Æra of Alexander the Great, or his last victory over Darius, A. M. 3674, before A. D. 326.

The Æra of the Selucidæ, A. M. 3692, before A. D. 312.

The Jews call this Æra, the Æra of Contracts. The first book of the Maccabees places the beginning of it in spring, the second places it in autumn. When the Jews became subject to the Syro-Macedonian kings, they were obliged to use this Æra in their contracts, and civil affairs; for which reason it became denominated the Æra of Contracts. In the Maccabees, it is called the Æra of the kingdom of the Greeks. All other nations that computed by this Æra, began it from the autumn of the year before Christ 312, but the Chaldeans began it from the spring following; because, till then, they did not think Seleucus thoroughly settled in the possession of Babylon. Vide PRID. Connect. Part. 1. Book viii.

The ÆRA of the birth of Jesus Christ, A. M. 4000, three years at least before our vulgar Æra, wherein we reckon the year 1800; whereas if we take exactly the Æra of our Saviour's birth, we should reckon it 1804, or at least 1803. Vide EPOCHÆ, also the Chronological Table. On this subject there are great difficulties culties to obtain precision : but we generally add three years to A. D.

ETHAN, or ÆTHAM, between Jerusalem and Beth-lehem. Vide ETHAN.

AFFINITY. There were several degrees of affinity among the Hebrews, which were considered as obstructions to matrimony. (Vide Lev. xviii. 7.)

1. A son could not marry his mother, nor his father's second wife ;

2. A brother could not marry his sister, whether by the father only, or by the mother only, much less his sister by both sides ;

3. A grandfather could not marry his grand-daughter, either by his son or by his daughter ;

4. No one could marry the daughter of his father's wife ;

5. Nor the sister of his father or mother ;

6. Nor the uncle his niece, nor the aunt her nephew ;

7. Nor the nephew the wife of his uncle by the father's side ;

8. A father-in-law could not marry his daughter-in-law ;

9. Nor a brother the wife of his brother, while living, nor after the death of that brother, if he left children : if he left no children, the surviving brother was to raise up children to his deceased brother, by marrying his widow ;

10. It was forbidden to marry a mother and her daughter at one time, or the daughter of the mother's son, or the daughter of her daughter, or two sisters together.

The Patriarchs, before the law, sometimes married their half-sisters, as Abraham married Sarah, his father's daughter by another mother ; or two sisters together, as Jacob married Rachel and Leah ; Vide FRAGMENT, No. cxxvi. but these cases are not examples, because they might plead necessity, or custom, the law not then prohibiting. Since the law, Scripture expressly disapproves of matrimonial connections among such intimate relations : witness Reuben's incest with Balah, his father's concubine ;—the marriage of Herod Antipas with Herodias his sister-in-law, his brother Philip's wife, while her husband was living ;—and that which St. Paul reproves and punishes among the Corinthians, 1 Cor. v. 5. Vide FRAG. CLIII. No. 5.

AFRICA, Ἀφρική, Lybia : one of the parts of the world, and Lybia in particular. The Gr. Ἀφρική, may derive from the Heb. עפר ophar, dust, or אפר apher, ashes reduced to dust, [sundry parts of this country being mere wastes of sand, for many days' journeys together. But I rather prefer the derivation of it from phreka, to break off, or rend asunder : which describes the state of this peninsula as it really is, broken off, as it were from Asia, by the Red Sea, and holding to the great continent only at the isthmus of Suez : q. Aphreka, " the parted country."]]

AFRICA was peopled principally by Ham and his descendants. Misraim peopled Egypt. (Gen. x. 6, 13, 14.) The Pathrusim, the Naphthuhim, the Castuhim, and the Ludim, peopled other parts : their situations are not now known distinctly. Nevertheless, we place Lehabim in Lybia, and Phut between Numidiu and Lybia, along the Mediterranean. It is thought that many of the Canaanites, when expelled by Joshua, retired into Africa. (Procop. de Bello Vandelico. lib. ii. cap. 10. Gemar. alii.) The gospel was certainly carried to Africa by the Eunuch of Candace, whom Philip baptized ; and probably also by some of those who from different parts of it, attended the feast of Pentecost : Acts ii. 10. In after-times, very flourishing churches were situated on various points of the Mediterranean shore of Africa ; but, at present, Mahometanism, or idolatry, involves almost the whole continent ; as has been the case ever since its conquest by the Saracens. The Mahometans believe that the Amalekites, who dwelt in ancient times in the neighbourhood of Mecca, were forced from thence by the kings descended from Zioram. (Pocock. in Specimene Hist. Arab.) This matter may be seen at large in Calmet's Dissertation concerning the Country whither the Canaanites retired ; before the Book of Joshua.

AGABA, a fortress near Jerusalem, which Galestus, its governor, restored to Aristobulus, son of Alexander Jannæus. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 24. Agaba, or Haggabah, in Hebrew signifies, a rising ground, or eminence.

AGABUS, Ἀγαβος : a locust ; from גוב goob, otherwise, the feast of the father ; from הג heg, rejoicing, and אב ab, a father : or, father's joy.

AGABUS, a prophet, and, as the Greeks say, one of the seventy disciples of our Saviour. (Acts xi. 28.) A. D. 43, he foretold a great famine throughout the Roman empire : St. Luke informs us that it happened in the days of Claudius, A. D. 44. Profane historians notice this famine ; Suetonius (in Clandio, c. 18. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 2.) observes, that the emperor himself was insulted on this occasion, was attacked by the people in the marketplace, and obliged to retire to his palace. As this famine very greatly afflicted Judæa, the Christians of Antioch resolved to send relief to their brethren at Jerusalem ; St. Paul and St. Barnabas were entrusted with their charity, and conveyed conveyed it to the church, A. D. 44, Acts xi. 29, 30.

Several years after, (A. D. 58) St. Paul, going to Jerusalem, landed at Cæsarea, in Palestine, Acts xxi. 10. Agabus coming there also, and visiting St. Paul and his company, he took that apostle's girdle, [perhaps without any previous information to whom it belonged,] and binding himself hand and foot, he said, "Thus saith the Holy Ghost, so shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man who owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles." When the brethren heard these predictions, all present besought St. Paul to go no farther: but he answered, "That he was ready not to be bound only, but to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus." We know no other particulars of Agabus. The Greeks say he suffered martyrdom at Antioch; and they observe his festival March 8. The Latins, since the ninth century, February 9.

AGAG, אַגַּג, ʾAga-gos: roof, floor; from אַגַּג, a roof.

AGAG, king of the Amalekites. The Amalekites attacked Israel in the wilderness, at their coming out of Egypt, while sinking under fatigue, and massacred all who were unable to keep up with the main body. Exod xvii. 14. Deut. xxv. 17. The Lord was not satisfied with the victory which Joshua obtained over them, but protested that he would destroy the memory of Amalek from under heaven. Exod. xvii. 14, 16. About 400 years after, the Lord commanded Samuel to order Saul to march against the Amalekites; saying, "Spare them not; nor desire any thing that is their's, but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass." Saul invading the country of the Amalekites, took Agag their then king alive, with the best of the sheep and oxen, and the most valuable spoil. Samuel having reproved Saul for this disobedience, called for Agag, who trembling said, "Surely the bitterness of death is over;" but Samuel said, "As thy sword hath made mothers childless, so shall thy mother be childless." And he hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal. 1 Sam. xv. 32. [The text does not say that Agag was thus trembling; but the Septuagint and Vulgate do. The Hebrew מערר, which we have rendered, in fetters, may be translated in delicacies, delicately.] Vide FRAGMENT, No. LIII. Vide AMALEK.

AGALLA, or EGALLA, GALLIN, or EGALLIM, or EGLAIM, a city beyond Jordan, east of the Dead Sea, in the land of Moab. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 2. Eusebius in Agallim, places it eight miles south from Ar, or Areopolis. Isa. xv. 8. 1 Sam. xxv. 44.

AGAPÆ, Ἀγαπαί: feasts of friendship, from ἀγαπᾶω, to love: [to love with great affection.]

AGAPÆ, feasts of friendship, charity, or kindness, in use among the primitive Christians. It is very probable they were instituted in memory of the last supper of Jesus Christ with his apostles, which supper was concluded before he instituted the eucharist.

These festivals were kept in the assembly, or church, towards evening, after prayers and worship were over; the faithful ate together with great simplicity and union, what each had brought; so that rich and poor were no way distinguished. After a supper, marked by much frugality and modesty, they partook of the sacramental signs of the Lord's body and blood, and gave each other the kiss of peace. This custom, so good in its origin, soon degenerated, and was abused. St. Paul (1 Cor. xi. 21.) complains, that the rich despised the poor in these assemblies, and would not condescend to eat with them: "When ye come together," says he, "in one place—this coming together merely is not eating the Lord's supper, one taking before another his own supper; one being hungry, another over full. What, have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? or despise ye the church of God, and shame them that have not?" In this discordant state of its members, a church could not but be unfit to celebrate the great commemoration of Divine love. [Vide Jude 12. "Spots in your feasts of charity—Agapæ—feasting themselves, &c."]

[It must, I think, be admitted, that the Agapæ are placed before the eucharist (1 Cor. xi. 21.); and if they did refer to our Lord's supper before he instituted the eucharist, this seems to be their natural order. But it is probable, that, at least in some places, or no some occasions, the holy eucharist preceded the Agapæ; perhaps when persecution rendered extreme caution necessary; for it seems very likely, that Pliny speaks of these Agapæ in his famous letter to Trajan: "After their service to Christ, (quasi Deo), they departed, and returned (no doubt, at a more convenient season) to take a harmless repast in common."]

The Jews had certain devotional entertainments, in some degree related to the Agapæ. On their great festival days, they made feasts for their family, for the priests, the poor, and orphans; or they sent portions to them. These repasts were made in Jerusalem, before the Lord. Also, there were certain sacrifices and first-fruits appointed by the law, to be set apart for this purpose. Somewhat of the same custom obtained among the Heathen: at least, so far as to partake merrily of the flesh, &c. of what had been offered in sacrifice: and perhaps also, sending portions to absentees, &c.

[The Essenes also had their repasts in common; and probably many other confraternities or sects. To this fellowship, the institution of the Sodales, or brotherhoods, which had become popular since the days of Augustus, might greatly contribute.]

[It seems to us very extraordinary, that on any occasion, much more an occasion of a Christian institution recently attended to, and a solemn Christian ordinance about to be attended to, the Corinthians should, any of them, indulge to excess of any kind: but when we consider that public suppers, meals, &c. were customary among the Greeks (to which they might assimilate these Agapæ), and besides, that the sacrifices at which these Corinthians had been accustomed to attend, were followed, (and some were accompanied) by merriment, we shall see less reason to wonder at their falling into intemperance of behaviour so very different from the genius of the gospel. Certainly the Eucharist itself is, as the name implies, a feast for joy, but for joy of a much more serious kind. However, we must, at any rate, vindicate the Corinthians from that gross profanation of the Eucharist, with which, from our translation, or rather from the common acceptance of the phrase "Lord's Supper," they have been reproached.]

AGATE, a precious stone called Achates, or Hagathes; in Hebrew שֶׁבוּ shebo. It is said to take its name from a river in Sicily, where it was first found. Agates are likewise found in Phrygia and India. There are many sorts: Agate Sardonyx, or only Sardonyx; Agate Onyx, or only Onyx; Agate Chalcedony, or Chalcedony; Roman Agate; German Agate. These differ in colour and value. Some have black and white veins, or veins of gold, or resemble amethysts. Cups and vessels are made of agate. Oriental agates are polished and glittering, and sometimes very pretty things are seen in them, represented naturally: art has often taken advantage of these.

AGES OF THE WORLD. The time preceding the birth of Jesus Christ, has generally been divided into six Ages:

The first Age extends from the beginning of the World to the Deluge; and comprehends 1656 years.

The second Age, from the deluge to Abraham's entering the land of promise, in A. M. 2082, comprehends 426 years.

The third Age, from Abraham's entrance of the promised land, to the Exodus, A. M. 2523, comprehends 430 years.

The fourth Age, from the Exodus to the foundation of the Temple by Solomon, A. M. 2992, comprehends 479 years.

The fifth Age, from Solomon's foundation of the temple, to the Babylonish captivity, in A. M. 3416, comprehends 424 years.

The sixth Age, from the Babylonish captivity to the birth of Jesus Christ, A. M. 4000, the fourth year before the vulgar æra, or A. D. comprehends 584 years.

We shall not enlarge on the different systems of ancient and modern Chronologers, concerning the years of the world. Those who would study these matters, will recur to the first sources, and consult authors who have expressly treated the subject. We have chosen to follow Usher in the chronology of the Old Testament, with some little differences only. Among the Appendices to this Dictionary is a Chronological Table, agreeable to his system, and we have endeavoured to conform to it the dates inserted in the course of this work.

OF THE AGES OF THE PATRIARCHS.

There are great disproportions in the ages of the Patriarchs, as recorded in the Septuagint, and in the Hebrew text. This difference in reference to the time before the Deluge, amounts to about 586 years. According to the Septuagint, the Deluge happened A. M. 2242, but according to the Hebrew, it happened A. M. 1656. From the year of Noah, 601, which is the next after the Deluge, the Septuagint reckon 1172 years to the seventieth year of Terah; whereas the Vulgate reckons but 292 years, which makes a difference of 980 years; so that, including the 580 before the Deluge, the Chronology of the Septuagint contains 1466 years more than the Vulgate.

No writer has hitherto been able to discover any motive which could induce the Septuagint thus to lengthen the lives of the patriarchs: some have conjectured, that their design was to secure the sacred books from the censure of the Heathen, who, being unwilling to credit the relation of the long lives of the patriarchs, maintained, that one of our years was equivalent to ten (or five) of their's; so that a person who is said to have lived 800 years, in reality lived only 80, or at most 160, and so in proportion. However this might be, it is the general opinion, that the Septuagint increased the patriarchs' years; as there is no apparent reason for charging a diminution of these years on the Hebrew copy. On the differences between the Hebrew and the Septuagint, consult Isaac Vossius, De Ætate Mundi, & de LXX Interpretibus, and F. Pezron, in his Antiquité des Temps rétablie. [We have also several able Chronologers among British writers; but they do do not agree among themselves, sufficiently to be depended on.]

As to the length of the year of Moses and the Hebrews, there is no doubt but at the time of Noah the year consisted of twelve months of thirty days each; the proof is, in the particular mention of the day of that year wherein the Deluge happened, which is very accurately noted by Moses.

The following is a comprehensive account of the Ages of the World, according to the Greek text, together with the proofs; abridged according to the system of M. Boivin the elder, who laboured with great application for fifty years, to clear this part of Ancient Chronology: which he thus estimates.

From thence to the Deluge, inclusively (Gen. vii. 6, 11) - - -	600
Total, according to the best reading of the LXX. - - -	2262

These 2262 years are attested by Julius Africanus in Syncellus, p. 20, 53, 88: by Epiphanius, in his Heresies, p. 5; by St. Austin, in his City of God, lib. xv. cap. 13. & 20; and on Gen. ix. 2. (this is according to five copies, viz. three Greek, one Latin, and one Syriac); by the Puschalion, or Alexandrian Chronicle; by Godfrey, of Viterbo; by Honorius, of Autun; by all the collections of various readings on the LXX.

Note, the 167 years from Methuselah to the birth of Lamech, instead of 187, are a fault of the transcriber in most of our Greek Bibles. This mistake is not in the Greek editions of Basil and Strasburg; besides, it is corrected by the Hebrew, the Vulgate, and Josephus. According to this erroneous reading, the Deluge would have happened A. M. 2242. Methuselah, therefore, who, according to all our Bibles and Josephus, lived 969 years, must have died fourteen years after the Deluge; whereas, according to the proper and right reading, he died six years before the Deluge. St. Austin's City of God, 15, 13, ad fin.

* * There is nothing in which transcribers are so apt to mistake as in numbers: we should not therefore wonder that copies, whether of the original or of versions, differ: and this laborious calculation demonstrates that when they are once become confused, it is very difficult to recover them satisfactorily.

AGEE, גֵּאָה, vale or depth; from גֵּאָה, geeah, a valley. Father of Shammah, a gallant man in David's army (2 Sam. xxiii. 11.)

AGRIPPA, Ἀγρίππας. This word is Latin, and signifies one who at his birth causes great pain, who is born with his feet foremost; æger partus.

I. AGRIPPA, MARCUS; favourite of the emperor Augustus. His name is not in the canonical books; but as he is mentioned in Josephus and Philo, and participates in the History of the Jews, we shall say something of him. Augustus gave him his daughter, Julia, to wife; and the government of Asia. Herod the Great, who was under obligations to him, paid his respects to him at Mitylene; from whence he conducted him to Jerusalem, where he was received with extraordinary honours. Agrippa never spoke of his reception there without great satisfaction. He beheld the beautiful order observed in the temple, offered a hecatomb in it, entertained the inhabitants of Jerusalem at a feast, and granted to Herod and the people all they desired of him. He visited Sebasta and Cæsarea which Herod had built in honour of Augustus, and was charmed with the magnificence of the Jewish monarch, and the splendor of those cities. This journey was ten years before the birth of Jesus Christ. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 2.

II. AGRIPPA, surnamed Herod, son of Aristobulus and Mariamne, and grandson to Herod the Great, was born three years before our Saviour, and seven years before the vulgar æra. After the death of his father, Aristobulus, Herod, his grandfather, took care of his education, and sent him to Rome, to make his court to Tiberius. (Vide Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 7 8, et seq. et de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 15.)

The emperor conceived a great affection for Agrippa, and placed him about his son Drusus: Agrippa very soon engaged the good graces of Drusus, and of the empress Antonia: but Drusus being carried off by a sudden death, A. D. 23, all who had been his companions were commanded by Tiberius to quit Rome, lest the sight and presence of them should renew his affliction. Agrippa, who had indulged his disposition to liberality, was obliged to leave Rome overwhelmed with debts, and very poor. He did not dare to go to Jerusalem, because of his inability to make an appearance suitable to his birth; he retired therefore to the castle of Masada, where he lived private. Herod the Tetrarch, his uncle, assisted him for some time with great generosity; made him the principal magistrate of Tiberias, and presented him with a large sum; but all this was not sufficient to answer his excessive profusion; so that Herod, becoming weary of assisting him, and one day reproaching him gently with his want of economy, Agrippa was so chagrined, that he resolved to quit Judæa, and return to Rome. A. D. 35.

But, as he wanted money, Marsyas, his freedman, formerly his slave, addressed himself to Protus, a person of the same condition about his mother Berenice, who consented to lend him 20,000 drachmas (about 700*l.*) on Marsyas's security, provided Agrippa, who was already in his debt, would give him a bond for 20,000 on the receipt of 17,500. Besides this, he borrowed 200,000 drachmas of Alexander, Alabarch (i. e. chief) of the Jews at Alexandria, on condition that Cyprus, Agrippa's wife, should be responsible. Alexander would pay him part only of this sum at Alexandria, the rest he remitted to him in Italy as soon as he arrived there.

Tiberius then kept his court at Caprea, and Agrippa, before he proceeded farther, sent intelligence telligence of his arrival, and desired leave to wait on him. Tiberius, whom time had cured of his affliction for the death of Drusus, (it was now A. D. 36) was glad to hear of his return, and desired to see him at Caprea. Thither he went, and the emperor, as a mark of distinction, gave him an apartment in his palace, and received him with abundant caresses.

The next day, letters were brought to the emperor from Herennius, who had the care of his affairs in Judæa; wherein he related, that Agrippa, having borrowed 300,000 pieces of silver out of his exchequer, had fled from Judæa, without repaying them. This news very much disturbed Tiberius, and so far exasperated him against Agrippa, that he commanded him to leave the palace, and to pay what he owed. Agrippa, not dejected at this unlucky incident, addressed himself to the empress Antonia, and desired her to lend him this sum. Antonia, who loved Agrippa for the sake of his mother Berenice, granted him this favour; by which means, Agrippa got clear of this troublesome affair. Tiberius received him again into favour, and commanded him to attend Tiberius Nero, the son of Drusus. Agrippa chose rather to attach himself to Caius Caligula, the son of Germanicus, and grandson of Antonia; as if he had some presentiment of the future elevation of Caius, who at that time was beloved by all the world; and Agrippa so engaged the affection of this prince, that he was not able to live without him.

One day as they were journeying together in a litter, Agrippa said to Caius, "I wish I could see the day when this old man (intending the emperor) would be going into the other world, and leave you master of this, without meeting with any obstacles from his grandson, Tiberius Nero! How happy would the world then be, and how overjoyed should I be, to see that lucky moment!" This discourse was overheard by Eutyches, a slave, whom Agrippa had made free. For the present he took no notice of it; but some time after, being dissatisfied with Agrippa, he desired an audience of the emperor, saying he had things of consequence to impart, relating to Agrippa.

Tiberius, who was very slow in all he did, was contented, for the time, with ordering that Eutyches should be confined. Nevertheless, Agrippa, who knew nothing that his servant had to tell, and believed himself to be entirely innocent, pressed Tiberius much to hear what Eutyches had to say, and to end this affair. The emperor, who loved Agrippa, made no haste to enquire; Agrippa, therefore, at last, by means of the empress, forced as it were, Tiberius to have Eutyches produced, and heard.

Agrippa on his accusation was loaded with fetters, and committed to the custody of an officer, who observed him narrowly, but not without showing some regard to him, in compliance with the command of Antonia. Tiberius dying some time after, Caius Caligula, the new emperor, heaped favours and wealth on Agrippa, changed his iron fetters into a chain of gold of the same weight, set a diadem on his head, and gave him the tetrarchy which Philip, son of Herod the Great, had possessed; i. e. the Batanaea and Trachonitis: to this he added that of Lysanias; and Agrippa returned speedily into Judæa, to take possession of his new kingdom, A. D. 39.

His good fortune raised the envy of Herodias, his sister, wife to the tetrarch Herod, who engaged her husband, in a journey to Rome, hoping that he too might obtain the title of king from Caius. But he had scarcely got to Italy, when Fortunatus, to whom Agrippa had given his liberty, arrived also, with letters from his master, accusing his uncle Herod of having carried on a secret correspondence with Sejanus, and of having private intelligence at that time with Artabanus, king of Parthia; in proof of this, he assured the emperor, that there were in his arsenals arms for 70,000 men. While Herod was receiving audience of Caius, Fortunatus came, and presented Agrippa's letters: he immediately read them, and asked Herod whether it were true, that he had such a quantity of arms? Herod, not being able to deny it, was banished into Gaul; and his tetrarchy was given to Agrippa, A. D. 40.

The emperor Caius desiring to be worshipped as a god, intended to place his statue in the temple at Jerusalem, A. D. 40; but the Jews opposed this with such resolution, that Petronius, his lieutenant, dared not pursue it farther, but took the liberty of representing to the emperor what resistance he met with from the Jews. Agrippa, then at Rome, visiting the emperor at the very time he was reading this letter, Caius told him, that the Jews were the only people, of all mankind, who refused to own him for a god; and that they had taken arms to oppose his resolution. At these words, Agrippa fell down, as it were in a swoon, was carried home, and continued without sense or knowledge of any thing till the next evening. When a little recovered, he wrote a long letter to Caius, wherein he endeavoured to soften him; and his arguments made such impression on the emperor, that he desisted for a time, at least, and in appearance, from his design of setting up his statue in the temple.

Caius being killed in the beginning of the year following, (A. D. 41, Jan. 25,) Agrippa, then then at Rome, contributed greatly by his advice to establish Claudius in the empire, to which he had been advanced by the soldiers. But herein Agrippa showed more cunning and address, than sincerity and honour; for while he professed to be in the interests of the senate, he secretly advised Claudius to be resolute, and not to abandon his good fortune. The emperor in acknowledgment for his services, gave him all Judæa, and the kingdom of Chalcis, which had been possessed by Herod, his brother; so that Agrippa suddenly became one of the most powerful princes of the east, and possessed as much, or more, than Herod the Great, his grandfather, had done. He returned into Judæa, and governed to the great satisfaction of the Jews. But the desire of pleasing them, and a mistaken zeal for their religion, induced him to commit an injustice, the memory of which is preserved in Scripture. Acts xii. 1, 2, 3, &c. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xix. cap. 4.

Near the passover, A. D. 44. James, the greater, son of Zebedee, and brother to John the Evangelist, was put to death by his order. He proceeded also to seize Peter, and imprisoned him, waiting till the festival was over, designing then to have him executed. But Peter being miraculously delivered from his confinement, the evil intention of Agrippa was frustrated. After the passover, Agrippa went from Jerusalem to Cæsarea, where he celebrated games in honour of Claudius. (Antiq. lib. xix. cap. 7; and Acts, xii. 19, &c.) Here the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon waited on him, suing for peace. This prince being come early in the morning to the theatre, to give them audience, seated himself on his throne, dressed in a robe of silver tissue, worked most admirably. The rays of the rising sun darting on it, gave it such a lustre and resplendence as the eyes of the spectators could scarcely endure. When, therefore, the king spoke to the Tyrians and Sidonians, the people urged by his flatterers exclaimed, "The voice of a God, not of a man!" Instead of rejecting these impious flatteries, Agrippa received them with complacency; but, at that instant, looking upwards he observed an owl above him, sitting on a cord. He had noticed a bird of this kind before, when in bonds, under Tiberius, and was then told, that he should soon be set at liberty; but, that whenever he saw this kind of bird a second time, he should not live above five days beyond it. He was therefore extremely terrified; and now an angel of the Lord smote him, because he did not give glory to God: his attendants were under the necessity of carrying him back to his palace; where he died, at the end of five days, racked with tormenting pains in his bowels, and devoured by worms. Such was the death of Herod Agrippa, after seven years' reign, A. D. 44. He left a son, seventeen years of age, of the same name, then at Rome; also, three daughters, viz. Berenice, married to her uncle Herod, her father's brother; Mariamne, betrothed to Julius Archelaüs, son of Chelcias; and Drusilla, promised to Epiphanius, son of Archelaüs, king of Comagena.

III. AGRIPPA, the younger, son to Agrippa whose history we have related, was at Rome with the emperor Claudius when his father died. A. D. 44. (Joseph. Antiq. lib. xix. cap. 7, et lib. xx. cap. 1. et seq. et lib. ii. de Bell. cap. 21, 22, 23.) The emperor Claudius was at first inclined to give him all the dominions of his father; but being dissuaded by those about him, Agrippa being only seventeen, he kept him four years longer at his court, and sent Cuspius Fadus into Judæa, till this prince was of age to reign. The year following, A. D. 45, the governor of Syria coming to Jerusalem, designed that the high priest's ornaments should be committed to the custody of Fadus, intending to compel the Jews to deliver them, to be kept within the tower of Antonia, where they had formerly been deposited, till Vitellius entrusted them to the Jews. But they, giving good security, were permitted to send deputies to Rome on this affair, who by the credit and good offices of young Agrippa, maintained the possession of their privilege; and the pontifical ornaments continued in their custody.

A. D. 48, Herod, king of Chalcis, uncle to young Agrippa, dying, the emperor gave his dominions to this prince, who, notwithstanding, did not go into Judæa till four years after. (A. D. 53.) when Claudius, taking from him Chalcis, gave him the provinces of Gaulanitis, Trachonitis, Batanaea, Panæas, and Abilene, which formerly had been possessed by Lysanias.

After the death of Claudius, his successor Nero, who had a great affection for Agrippa, added Julias in Perea, and that part of Galilee which included Tarichæa and Tiberias. Festus, governor of Judæa, coming to his government, A. D. 60, king Agrippa, and Berenice his sister, went as far as Cæsarea to salute him. As they continued there some time, Festus conversed with the king on the affair of St. Paul, who had been seized in the temple about two years before, and who a few days prior to this had appealed to the emperor, i. e. to Claudius, then reigning at Rome.

Agrippa said to Festus, "I have long desired to hear this man speak." (Acts xxv. 13.) On the morrow, when Agrippa and Berenice were come with great pomp into the hall of against the enemy. In the mean while, his blood issuing from his wound, ran on his chariot; and in the evening he died. He was carried to Samaria, and there buried. His chariot, and the harness of his horses, were washed in the fish pool of Samaria, and there the dogs licked his blood, according to the prophet's prediction, A. M. 3107; ante A. D. 893. Vide ELIJAH, MICAH, &c.

II. AHAB, son of Kolaiah, one of the two false prophets who seduced the Israelites at Babylon (Jer. xxix. 21, 22). The Lord threatened them, by Jeremiah, with delivering them up to Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, who should put them to death in the presence of those who had been deceived by them; and that the people should use their name proverbially, when they would curse any one, saying, "The Lord make thee like Ahab and Zedekiah, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire."

The Rabbins (who in this have been followed by several expositors) believe these to be the two elders who endeavoured to corrupt the chaste Susanna, as related in that story. But the punishment annexed to the crime of those in the Apocryphal history, destroys this opinion; for Ahab and Zedekiah were roasted in the fire, the others were stoned: the text does not say, literally, they were stoned; but that they were treated as they would have used their neighbour; and that they were put to death according to the law of Moses; yet as that law condemns adulterers to be stoned; which was the punishment they would have had inflicted on Susanna, it follows that this was the punishment they were to suffer in retaliation.

AHARAH, אַחֲרָה; a brother having an odour; from אחָ acheh, a brother, or relation, and רִיחַ riach: otherwise, an odoriferous meadow; from אחוּ achu, and רִיחַ riach; third son of Benjamin. 1 Chron. viii. 1.

AHARHEL, אַחֲרֵל, Ἀδελφός ῥηκαλ: a second army; from אחֵר acher, another, and חַיִל chail or chil, an army, or trouble: otherwise, the sheep of a brother: from רַחֵל rachel, a sheep. Son of Harum. 1 Chron. iv. 8.

AHASBAI, אַחַסְבַּי, Ἀχασβᾶ: who trusts in me; from חַסָּב hasah, confidence: otherwise, brother that surrounds; from אח ach, brother, and סָבַב sabab, to surround. 2 Sam. xxiii. 34.

AHASUERUS, אַחַשְׁוֵרֶשׁ: prince, chief; from ראש rash, a head. This word is probably Persian, therefore its etymology from the Hebrew is uncertain. [The Persian title imports "the Majestic Prince:" q. his Majesty?]

I. AHASUERUS (Dan. ix. 1) otherwise Astyages (Dan. xiii. 65.) and Artaxerxes (Dan. vi. 1, Gr.) Vide ASTYAGES.

II. AHASUERUS. This prince was born about A. M. 3455; ante A. D. 545. After the death of Cambyzes, king of Persia, (A. M. 3482) several principal Magi of that country usurped the sovereign authority, pretending that Smerdis, son of Cyrus, who had been killed by his brother, Cambyzes, was living, and that it was he who now succeeded him in the throne. Val. Max. lib. ix. cap. 2. Ammian. Marcell. lib. xxiii. Ostances, a noble Persian, having a daughter, who was one of the royal concubines, enquired of her whether the supposed king had ears or not (for Cyrus, or, according to others, Cambyzes, had cut them off): she discovered he had none. Ostances thus ascertained that a false Smerdis, had usurped the kingdom. Vide Justin. lib. ix. Herodot. lib. iii. Ctesiam, &c.

Ostances communicated this discovery to the principal lords; who engaged themselves by oath to kill this king, assaulted the palace, dispersed all they met, and being come to the apartment of the Magi, attacked them: these defended themselves, and wounded two of the conspirators; but the conspirators prevailing, one of them, Gobryas, seized the principal Magus; and as his companions were fearful of wounding him instead of the Magus, because this was transacted in an obscure place, Gobryas bid them pierce the enemy through his own body, lest they should miss him. But providence so ordered it that the Magus was killed, and Gobryas not wounded. A. M. 3483.

Six days after, the seven conspirators met to deliberate on the future government; they agreed that the next day, before sun-rise, they should all meet on horseback at the same place, and that he, whose horse should first salute the sun by neighing, should be acknowledged king of Persia, and successor to Cambyzes. Oeber, Darius's groom, understanding this, in the evening carried his master's horse with a mare to the place where they were to meet; so that the next day, directly as Darius's horse came thither, the recollection of what had passed there the evening before, set him a-neighing, which won the kingdom for his master: immediately the other six conspirators dismounted, and saluted him king of Persia. Herod. lib. iii. cap. 80—88. Justin, lib. iii.

Darius married Atharsa, daughter of Cyrus, founder of this monarchy; she had been first wife to Cambyzes, then to the false Smerdis. Justin. lib. i. Herodot. lib. iii. cap. 88. In the second year of his reign, the Jews who had returned to Palestine, encouraged by the exhortations of the prophets Haggai and Zachariah, resumed the rebuilding the temple, which had been interrupted, under the reign of Cambyzes. Whereupon the governors of the province for the the Persians, demanded, by what authority they undertook this work? (Ezra, v. 3, 4, 5, 6, 13). The Jews produced an edict of Cyrus, which permitted them: these governors wrote to Darius; and Darius gave directions to seek this edict. Having found it at Ecbatana, he confirmed it, commanded his officers to assist in this design, and to furnish things necessary for sacrifices, &c.

The next year Ahasuerus made a feast to the principal persons of the empire, in the palace of Shushan, wherein he displayed the utmost magnificence (Esth. i. 1, 2, 3, &c.) The feast continued a hundred and fourscore days, or six months: after this, the king invited all the people, great and small, in Shushan, the palace, to an entertainment for seven days. Vashti the queen, at the same time, treated the women in her apartments of the palace. On the seventh day, Ahasuerus, warmed with wine, ordered his eunuchs to bring the queen to his company, that they might admire her beauty; but Vashti refused to come. The king consulted his council on Vashti's behaviour, whose advice was, for the king's divorcing her, and taking another wife.

This council was followed, and Esther, the niece of Mordecai, a Jew, by nation, was chosen to be wife of Ahasuerus. Mordecai did not explain his relation to Esther, but was content to wait at the palace-gate, to enquire after his niece Esther's health; but after Haman had obtained an edict from the king, condemning all Jews to death, and their estates to confiscation, he engaged Esther to solicit the king for a revocation of this edict.

In the mean while, one night the king could not sleep, and therefore ordered the journals of the preceding years to be read to him. They related in particular, the conspiracy of two eunuchs against the king's life, and that one Mordecai had discovered the plot, and had preserved the king. Ahasuerus asked whether Mordecai had been rewarded. He was answered, no. The king then ordered a signal honour to Mordecai; rendered the more signal, because conferred by the hands of his enemy, Haman, who was that day engaged to dine with Esther and the king, in private.

A second favour of the same nature was conferred; when Ahasuerus, having drunk freely, said to Esther, "What would you ask, or desire of me?" She replied, "If I have found favour in thy sight, O king, let my life and my people's lives be given me, at my petition; for we have all been destined to be destroyed, and extirpated." The king answered, "And who dare undertake this?" Esther said, "This Haman, here present; our mortal enemy!"

Haman hearing this, was quite confounded; the king, at the same moment, rose up in great anger, left the dining room, and went into the garden adjacent. Haman threw himself at the feet of the queen, who was lying on the sofa, on which, after the manner of the Persians, she had reclined while eating. Ahasuerus that instant returning, and seeing Haman on the queen's bed, "What!" said he, "will he force the queen also before me, in my own house!" As the word quitted the king's lips, the attendants covered Haman's face, looking on him as condemned to die; and he was hanged on the gallows fifty cubits high, which he had made for Mordecai. Esth. viii. 1, 2, &c.

After this the king gave Haman's employments to Mordecai, and his estate to Esther: and cancelled the edict which had appointed the massacre of the Jews. A. M. 3494, 3495, 3496. The rest of Darius's life has no relation to sacred history. He died A. M. 3519; ante A. D. 481; after a reign of six and thirty years. He was succeeded by Xerxes, his son by Apharsa or Vashti.

N. B. The foregoing statement is in conformity to that opinion, which supposes Ahasuerus, Esther's husband, to be Darius, son of Hystaspes: but, as this matter has its difficulty, we shall propose what Dr. Prideaux has suggested in support of his opinion, that Artaxerxes Longimanus was the scripture Ahasuerus to whom Esther was spouse. Herein he differs, as he acknowledges, from Usher and Scaliger. Usher believes Ahasuerus was Darius, son of Hystaspes: Scaliger believes he was Xerxes.

Usher thought Darius, son of Hystaspes, married Atossa, (the same as Vashti), afterwards divorced by him; and that he took to wife Aristone, daughter of Cyrus, and widow of Cambyses, (who is Esther). But this is contradicted by Herodotus, lib. iii. & vii. who informs us, that Aristone was daughter of Cyrus, and, consequently, she could not be Esther, who was too young. He says farther, lib. vii. sub initium, that Atossa had four sons by Darius, without reckoning daughters; and that she had so great an ascendancy over him, as to prevail on him to declare her son, Xerxes, his successor, to the exclusion of his own sons.

We foresaw, says Calmet, this objection, in our comment on Esther, i. 9. and, without venturing to ascertain the Vashti divorced by Ahasuerus, we have shewn that neither Atossa, whom we take to be daughter of Cyrus, nor Aristone, who was a virgin when he married her, and might be Esther, that neither of them was dismissed by Ahasuerus. Herodotus says expressly, in his third book, that the daughter of of Cyrus, and wife of Darius, was Atossa, lib. iii. cap. 68 & 88.

Dr. Prideaux adds, (Hist. Part. i. book iv.) that the principal reason which influenced Usher, was the notice in the book of Esther, "That Darius, son of Hyastaspes, laid a tribute on the land, and on the isles of the sea," which we read likewise in Herodotus, lib. iii. cap. 89. But Strabo attributes this to Darius Longimanus, which our author would refer to Artaxerxes Longimanus. Strabo, lib. xv.

Scaliger thinks Xerxes is the Ahasuerus of scripture, and his wife Amestris queen Esther. De emendat. Temp. lib. ix. He grounds his belief only on the resemblance of the names; but the marks of Amestris in history, prove invincibly that she is not the Esther of scripture: for Amestris, wife of Xerxes, had a son by that prince, who was of age to marry in the seventh year of his father's reign. Herod. lib. ix. She could not therefore be Esther, who was not married till the seventh year of his reign.

The reasons brought by Dr. Prideaux for Artaxerxes Longimanus are these: (1) That Josephus expressly affirms, that Artaxerxes Longimanus was Esther's husband, Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 6. (2) The Septuagint, and the Greek additions to the book of Esther, call Ahasuerus — Artaxerxes; (3) several circumstances in these additions cannot be applied to Artaxerxes Mnemon; (4) the extraordinary favour wherewith Artaxerxes Longimanus honoured the Jews, strengthens the probability that he had married a Jewess. This opinion is maintained by Sulpitius Severus, and many others, both ancients and moderns.

AHAVA, אַחַוָּא: essence, or generation.

AHAVA, a river of Babylonia, or of Assyria, where Ezra assembled those captives who were returning to Judea, Ezra, vii. 15. This Ahava is thought to be a river which ran along the Adiabene, where a river Diava, or Adiava, is mentioned, on which Ptolemy places the city Abane or Aavane. This is probably the country called Ava, (2 Kings, xvii. 24; xviii. 34; xix. 13) whence the kings of Assyria translated the people called Avites into Palestine; and where, likewise, in their room, they settled a part of the captive Israelites. Ezra intending to collect as many Israelites as he could, halted in the country of Ava, or Ahava, whence he sent agents into the Caspian mountains, to invite such Jews as were willing to join him, Ezra viii. 17. The history of Izates, king of the Adiabeniensians, and his mother Helena, who became converts to Judaism some years after the death of Jesus Christ, is an argument, that there were many Jews remaining settled in that country.

AHAZ, אַחַז: one that takes and possesses, or that sees; for אחז chazah, to see, often signifies to possess or enjoy.

AHAZ, king of Judah, son of Jotham, is celebrated for his impieties. There are great difficulties about his age when he began to reign. The text expresses that he was twenty years of age; yet if he reigned but sixteen years, it must be concluded, he lived only thirty-six years: but it is said (2 Kings, xviii.) that his son, Hezekiah, was twenty-five years of age when he began to reign; in which case, his father, Ahaz, begat him when only ten, or at most, eleven years old; and many good commentators do maintain this; while others study different ways to disentangle this perplexity. Vide Hieronym. Epist. ad Vitalum, & Samuel Bochart. Dissert. in Reg. xvi. Vide HEZEKIAH. also, FRAGMENTS, No. III.

Ahaz imitated the kings of Israel and Samaria, in idolatry and all manner of disorders. One of his sons he consecrated, making him pass through fire, in honour of Moloch. He offered sacrifices and incense on the high places, and in groves. About the end of the reign of his father, Jotham, king of Judah, the Lord sent against Judah, Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel; but these two kings made their chief inroads under Ahaz: they defeated the troops of Ahaz, and besieged Jerusalem (2 Kings, xvi. 1, 5; 2 Chron. xxviii. 5, & seq.; Isa. vii. 1.) When they found they could not take it, they divided their army, plundered the country, and made prisoners every where. Rezin and his party, retired with all their spoil to Damascus. But Pekah having in one battle killed 120,000 of Ahaz's army, took prisoners 200,000 persons, men, women, and children. As they were carrying these captive to Samaria, the prophet Oded, with the principal inhabitants of the city, came out to meet the captors, and prevailed with them, by remonstrances, to liberate their prisoners, which they did; they also gave them food, and restored the booty: those who were not able to perform the journey homeward on foot, were conveyed in carriages to Jericho.

The Philistines and Edomites also spread themselves like an inundation over the territories of Ahaz, committed great disorders, killed many people, and carried off much booty.

In these sad circumstances, and just before the siege of Jerusalem, the prophet Isaiah, with his son Shearjashub, went to meet Ahaz, foretold the deliverance of his country, and the destruction of his enemies, offering him the choice of any prodigy, in confirmation of this prediction. Under the appearance of declining to tempt the Lord, Ahaz refused to select a sign. "Hear then," said Isaiah, "O house of David; behold the sign which the Lord gives you;—a virgin conceiving and bearing a son, whose name shall be called Emmanuel. (Vide ALMAH. EMMANUEL.) Butter and honey shall he eat, that he may know to refuse the evil, and choose the good." Then, pointing to his own son, Isaiah assured Ahaz, that before this CHILD should be able to distinguish good and evil, the two kings confederated against Judah should be slain; which accordingly happened.
to

As Ahaz did not change his conduct, God did not change his punishment, but permitted his enemies to return the year following (A. M. 3263), and to waste the kingdom of Judah. Ahaz, in despair, sent ambassadors to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, saying, "I am thy servant, and thy son; come up and save me." Collecting the gold and silver from the temple and the palace, Ahaz sent them to Tiglath-pileser, who marched to assist Ahaz, attacked and killed Rezin, took Damascus his capital, and removed the inhabitants to Cyrene, i. e. to that part of Iberia where the river Cyrrus runs. Ahaz went to Damascus to meet the king of Assyria, where, having seen an altar which he admired, he sent a model of it to the high-priest Urijah, that he might place one like it in the temple of Jerusalem accordingly. Ahaz removed the altar which was in the temple, and fixed this in the room of it. Upon this he offered sacrifices, and commanded the high-priest Urijah to use this only. He ordered also the bases to be taken away, and the lavers of brass; the brazen sea, and its supporting oxen; and commanded them to be placed below, on the pavement of the temple.

His misfortunes amended not his practices: (2 Chron. xxvi, 22, 23, &c.) in his greatest affliction he shewed the highest contempt of God; he sacrificed to the Syrian gods, to render them propitious: he broke the vessels of the temple, shut the gates, and erected altars in all parts of Jerusalem, and in all the cities of Judah, to burn incense on them. He died, and was buried in Jerusalem; but not in the sepulchres of the kings of Judah, his predecessors, because of his iniquities.—[Other princes, his predecessors, as Jehoram and Joash, as well as Manasseh and Ammon, two of his successors, for the same reason were treated with the same ignominy; and denied the privilege of being interred among the kings, their predecessors.] Hezekiah his son reigned in his stead; A. M. 3278, ante A. D. 722.

II. AHAS, father of Jehoadan, 1 Chron. viii. 36.

AHAZI, אחיז: Vide AHAS.

AHAZIAH, אחיזיה: seizure, possession, or vision of the Lord; from אחז achaz, and יהי jah, the Lord.

I. AHAZIAH, son and successor of Ahab, king of Israel. (1 Kings xxii. 40.) He reigned two years, part alone, part with his father Ahab, who associated him in the kingdom the year before his death; from A. M. 3105, to 3108. Ahab died A. M. 3107, before A. D. 897.

Ahaziah imitated his father's impiety; he worshipped Baal and Astarte, whose rites had been introduced into Israel by Jezebel, his mother. Jehoshaphat, king of Judah having equipped a fleet at Ezion-geber, Ahaziah desired that his servants might accompany Jehoshaphat's to Ophir; (2 Chron. xx. 36, 37.) but God, provoked at the alliance of Jehoshaphat with this impious king, shattered the ships by tempestuous winds, and disabled them from prosecuting the voyage.

The Moabites, who had been subject to the kings of Israel since its separation from Judah, revolted after the death of Ahab, and Ahaziah was unable to reduce them; for about this time, having fallen from the terrace of his house, [Vide FRAGMENT, No. XCIX,] he hurt himself considerably, and sent to Ekron, to consult Beelzebub, concerning his indisposition. The prophet Elijah, under divine direction, met these messengers, and said, "Is it because there is no God in Israel that ye go thus to consult Beelzebub, the god of Ekron? Therefore, thus saith the Lord, Thou shalt not come down from that bed on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die." These people returning, related this incident to Ahaziah, who immediately sent a captain, with fifty soldiers, to seize Elijah: this captain, insisting imperiously on his message, was destroyed by [lightning] fire from heaven, as was also another captain. A third being sent, entreated Elijah to preserve his life, and wait on the king. Elijah, therefore, went to Ahaziah, to whom he repeated, that he should not recover. Accordingly, he died; and Jehoram his brother reigned in his stead, A. M. 3108; ante A. D. 892 (Vide ELIJAH).

II. AHAZIAH, king of Judah, son of Jehoram and Athaliah, succeeded his father A. M. 3119 ante A. D. 885. (2 Kings viii. 24. 2 Chron. xxii. 2.) He was twenty-two years old when he began to reign, and he reigned only one year at Jerusalem. He followed Ahab's house, to which he was allied by his mother, and did evil. This prince was likewise called Jehoa-haz and Azariah. The text of the Chronicles imports that he was forty-two years of age when he began to reign, wherein it differs from that of the Kings.

Joram,

Joram, king of Israel, attacking Ramoth Gilead, was there dangerously wounded, and carried to Jezreel for cure; Ahaziah, his friend and relation, visited him at Jezreel: in the mean time, Jehu, son of Nimshi, whom Joram had left besieging Ramoth, rebelled against him, designing to extirpate the house of Ahab, according to the Lord's commandment. Joram and Ahaziah, who knew not his intentions, went to meet him: Jehu shot Joram dead on the spot; Ahaziah fled; but Jehu's people overtook him near Ibleam, and mortally wounded him; yet he had strength enough to reach Megiddo, where he died: he was buried with his fathers in the city of David. In this manner is this incident related. 2 Kings ix. 21, &c.

But in the Chronicles this story is told somewhat differently. "When Jehu was executing judgment on the house of Ahab, and found the sons of the brethren of Ahaziah, he slew them: and he sought Ahaziah, and they caught him, (for he was hid in Samaria) and brought him to Jehu;—and when they had slain him, they buried him, because, said they, he is the son of Jehoshaphat." To reconcile these relations, it may be said, that here Samaria signifies not the city, but the kingdom. Jehu being informed that Ahaziah was still in the territories of Israel: i. e. of Samaria, sought him—(at Megiddo, doubtless) where he ordered him to be brought into his presence, and slain.

AHER, of Benjamin, 1 Chron. vii. 12.

AHI, אָחִי: my brother; from אחֶה acheh, a near relation, and the pronoun my, or mine: otherwise my brethren.—אָח, a brother, is joined in composition with many of the following names, and it will be needless to repeat it.

AHI, son of Shomer, of Benjamin, 1 Chron. vii. 34.

AHIAH, אָחִיהָ: brother of the Lord; from אחֶה, a brother, and הָ the Lord.

I. AHIAH, son of Shisha, and Solomon's secretary, 1 Kings iv. 2.

II. AHIAH, son and successor to the high priest Ahitub: his son, Abimelech was put to death by Saul. 1 Sam. xxii.

III. AHIAH, son of Naaman, of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 7.

AHIAM, אָחִיאָם: brother of the mother; from אָם am a mother: otherwise brother of the nation; from אָם aom, a nation.

AHIAM, an officer in David's army, 2 Sam. xxiii. 33.

AHIAN, אָחִינִי: brother of wine; from יַיִן jain, wine: son of Shemida, 1 Chron. vii. 19.

AHIEZER, אָחִיעֶזֶר: brother of assistance; from עָזַר azar, to assist: otherwise, of the court; from עֲזָרָה azarah.

AHIEZER, son of Ammishaddai, chief of the tribe of Dan, who came out of Egypt at the head of 72,000 men of his tribe. His offering was the same as that of his fellow chiefs, Numb. vii. 66, 67.

AHIHUD, אָחִיחֻד, 'Aχιδ: brother of union; from יָחַד ichad, to join, or unite: otherwise, of the point from חָדַד chad, sharp-pointed: otherwise, of the riddle, from חֻד chud; otherwise, of joy, from חֻדֵּה chadeuh, to rejoice.

AHIHUD, son of Naaman, and brother of Ahoah, of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 7.

AHIJAH, אָחִיהָ: Vide AHIAH.

AHIJAH, a prophet of the Lord, who dwelt at Shilo: thought to be the person who spoke twice to Solomon from God: (1 Kings vi. 11.) once while he was building the temple, when he promised him divine protection; (Chron. xi. 6.) another time after his irregularities, when he expressed God's indignation with great threatnings. Ahijah wrote the history of this prince's life (2 Chron. xi. 29.) Epiphanius, de vita & morte Prophet. in Ahia, mentions his warning to Solomon that he would be perverted by women, and God would raise up enemies against him: also, his prediction to Jeroboam, that he would by stratagem usurp a kingdom, and that two heifers should alienate him from the Lord; meaning the two golden calves erected by Jeroboam, at Dan, and at Bethel.

We read, (1 Kings xi. 29.) that Jeroboam, going one day out of Jerusalem, was met by the prophet Ahijah, of Shilo. As they were alone in the fields, the prophet took a new cloke, which Jeroboam then wore, [rather Ahijah wore the new mantle, and had wrapped himself closely in it. Vide FRAGMENT, No. clix.] from off his shoulders, and tearing it in twelve pieces, said, "Take ten pieces for thyself; for thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give ten tribes to thee." Adding, "Howbeit, I will not take the whole kingdom out of his hands, and I will suffer him to govern for the remainder of his life; but I will take the kingdom out of his son's hands, and will give it unto thee, even ten tribes." This happened A. M. 3020; ante A. D. 984.

This prophecy could not be so secret, but what Solomon got intelligence of it; or, perhaps, Jeroboam might imprudently boast of it; however, Jeroboam was obliged to fly for security into Egypt, where he continued with king Shishak, till the death of Solomon, A. M. 3025, when Jeroboam was placed by the ten tribes on the throne of Israel.

About

About the end of Jeroboam's reign, towards A. M. 3046, Ahijah, son of Jeroboam, fell sick: Jeroboam said to his wife, "Change your dress, and disguise yourself, that you may not be known, and go to Shiloh, where the prophet Ahijah lives, who first promised that I should reign over this people, and consult him concerning the indisposition of my son." The queen accordingly went to Ahijah's house in Shiloh. Now the prophet's eyes were darkened with age; but the Lord said to him, "Behold, the wife of Jeroboam is coming; thus and thus shall you say unto her."

As Jeroboam's wife approached, Ahijah heard the sound of her feet, and said, "Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam; why feignest thou thyself to be another? I am sent to thee with heavy tidings. Go, tell Jeroboam, thus saith the Lord, I will bring evil upon the house of Jeroboam; I will cut off all the males of his family, and will utterly extirpate them out of Israel: I will take away the remnant of the house of Jeroboam, as a man taketh away dung, till it be all gone. Him that dieth of Jeroboam in the city shall the dogs eat, and him that dieth in the field shall the fowls of the air eat, for the Lord hath spoken it. And as for thee, when thy feet enter the city, the child shall die: and Israel shall mourn for him, and bury him; for he, only, of Jeroboam's house, shall come to the grave, because in him there is found some good thing toward the Lord God of Israel." The event was answerable to the prediction. The prophet Ahijah, in all probability, did not long survive.

II. AHIJAH, son of Baasha, king of Israel, 1 Kings xv. 27. Baasha killed Nadab, son of Jeroboam, and usurped his kingdom, thereby executing the predictions of the prophet Ahijah.

III. AHIJAH, son of Pelon, a brave officer in David's army.

IV. AHIJAH, keeper of the temple-treasury, under David, 1 Chron. xxvi. 20.

V. AHIJAH, son of Esrom, of Judah, 1 Chron. ii. 25.

AHIKAM. אֲחִיקָם: brother that raises up; from אָמַן kum, to raise up.

AHIKAM, son of Shaphan, and father of Gedaliah, sent by Josiah, king of Judah, to Huldah, the prophetess, to consult her concerning the book of the law, found in the temple, A. M. 3380, ante A. D. 624.

AHILUD, אֲחִילֹד, Ἀκὴλῶδ: a brother born; from אָחִי ilod: or only brother; from יָחִיד ichid, only. The father of Joshaphat, who was David's secretary, 2 Sam. viii. 16.

AHIMAAZ, אֲחִימָאז: a brother of the council, or my brother is counsellor; from אָחִי acha, a brother, and אָחִי ahats, a counsellor; otherwise, the beauty of the brother.

AHIMAAZ, son of Zadok the high priest. He succeeded his father about A. M. 3000, under Solomon. He did David very important service during the war with Absalom (2 Sam. xv. 17, & seq. xvii. 17); for while his father, Zadok, was in Jerusalem with Hushai, the friend of David, Ahimaaz and Jonathan continued a little way without the city, near the fountain Rogel: hither a maid-servant came to tell them the resolutions of Absalom's council; they immediately went away to give the king intelligence; but being discovered by a young lad, who informed Absalom, he sent orders to pursue them. Ahimaaz and Jonathan, fearing to be taken, retired to a man's house of Baharim, in whose court yard was a well, in the sides of which they concealed themselves. Upon the mouth of this well the woman of the house spread a covering, and on the covering, corn, ground, or rather parched. When Absalom's people came, and enquired after Ahimaaz and Jonathan—she answered, "They are over the little water, being in great haste." Deceived by this equivocation, the pursuers passed over a brook at no great distance, but not finding them, returned to Jerusalem. Afterwards, Ahimaaz and Jonathan continued their journey to David.

After the battle against Absalom, wherein that prince was slain, Ahimaaz desired to carry the news to David, and was the first who arrived. The king, hearing of his approach, said, "He is a good man, and bringeth good tidings." Ahimaaz coming near, fell down on his face before the king, and said, "Blessed be the Lord thy God, who hath delivered up the men that lift up their hand against my lord the king." The king said, "Is the young man, Absalom safe?" Ahimaaz, out of prudence, or real ignorance, or unwilling to declare his death, said only, "When Joab sent thy servant to thee, I saw a great tumult, but I knew not what it was." Ahimaaz was succeeded in the high priesthood by Azariah, 1 Chron. vi. 9.

AHIMAN, אֲחִימָן, Ἀχιμαῖν: a brother prepared; from מָנָה manah, to prepare: otherwise, brother of the right hand; from יָמִין imin, the right hand; or, the which, from the pronoun מֶנּוּ men.

AHIMAN, a giant of the race of Anak: who dwelt at Hebron, when the spies visited the land of Canaan. (Numb. xiii. 22.) He was driven from Hebron with his brethren, Sheshai, and Talmi, when Caleb took that city, A. M. 2559, ante A. D. 1445.

AHIMELECH, אֲחִימֶלֶךְ: my brother is a king, king, or, the brother of my king; from מֶלֶךְ melech, a king.

AHIMELECH, son of Ahitub, and brother of Ahiah, whom he succeeded in the high priesthood. The tabernacle was then at Nob, where Ahimelech, with other priests, dwelt. David finding it necessary to retire from Saul, (1 Sam. xxi. 1.) went to Nob, to the high priest Ahimelech, to whom he pretended pressing business from the king; and persuaded the priest to give him the shew-bread, recently taken from the sacred table in the holy place, he having no other in his house; also the sword which he had won from Goliath; of which he says, "There is none like that, give it me." Doeg, the Edomite, being at Nob, when David came thither, related to Saul what had passed. Saul immediately sent for Ahimelech and the other priests, and said, "Why have you conspired with the son of Jesse against me?" Ahimelech answered the king, "Who is so faithful among all thy servants as David, the king's son-in-law, who goeth at thy bidding, and is honourable in thine house? Did I then begin to enquire of God for him?" [i. e. Have I not often so enquired for him?]

Saul commanded his guards that were about him to slay the priests; but the king's officers would not. Then Saul commanded Doeg to kill them, who on that day massacred fourscore and five persons. He went afterwards to Nob, and put men, women, children, and cattle, to the sword; but one of Ahimelech's sons (Abiathar) escaped the carnage, and retired to David, A. M. 2944; ante A. D. 1060.

AHIMOTH, אֲחִימוֹת: brother of death, or my brother is dead; otherwise, the brother of days: from יוֹם ium, יָמִים imuth in the plural. Son of Elkanah, 1 Chron. vi. 25.

AHINADAB, אֲחִינָדָב: voluntary, or liberal brother; from נָדָב nadab, which also signifies a vow or offering; otherwise, of the prince; from נָדִיב nadib, a prince.

AHINADAB, son of Iddo, governor of the district of Mahanaim, beyond Jordan, under Solomon, 1 Kings iv. 14.

AHINOAM, אֲחִינוֹאִם, Ἀχινουάμ: the beauty and comeliness of the brother; from נָחַם naham: otherwise, brother of motion.

I. AHINOAM, daughter of Ahimaaz, and wife to Saul. 1 Sam. xiv. 50.

II. AHINOAM, David's second wife, mother of Amnon: a native of Jezreel, taken by the Amalekites when they plundered Ziklag, but recovered by David. 1 Sam. xxx. 5.

AHIO, אֲחִי, Ἀδελφοί ahis: his brother, his brethren; from the pronoun הָ, his.

AHIO, with his brother Uzzah, was charged with the conduct of the ark, when David removed it from the house of Abinadab to Jerusalem. 1 Chron. xiii. 7. Vide UZZAH.

AHION, אֵיּוֹן: look, eye, fountain; from עַיִן ain, or oin; son of Abi-gibeon and Maachah, 1 Chron. viii. 31.

AHIRA, אֲחִירָא: brother of iniquity; from יָרָא jara, wicked; otherwise, brother or companion of the shepherd; from רוּחַ rohe: otherwise, brother of him that bruises; from רָעָה, rahah.

AHIRA, son of Enan, chief of the tribe of Naphtali. His offering was similar to that of his fellow chiefs (Numb. ii. 29.) He came out of Egypt at the head of 53,400 men of his tribe.

AHISAMACH, אֲחִישָׁמַח, Ἀχισαμαχ: brother of strength or support; or, my brother supports me; from סָמַךְ sumak, to sustain, and אָחָא, a brother.

AHISAMACH, father of Aholiab, the famous artificer employed by Moses, in building the tabernacle, A. M. 2514; ante A. D. 1490.

AHISHAHAR, אֲחִישָׁחַר: brother of the morning, or, of blackness; from שָׁחַר shachar. Son of Bilham, of Benjamin, 1 Chron. vii. 10.

AHISHAR, אֲחִישָׁר: brother of a prince; from שָׂר shar, a prince: otherwise, brother of a song; from שָׁר shur, which also signifies an enemy: otherwise, brother of the direction, or brother of right; from יָשָׁר yashar, rectitude.

AHISHAR, high-steward of Solomon's household.

AHITOPHEL, אֲחִיתוֹפֵל: brother of ruin, or folly; from תָּפַל tophel.

AHITOPHEL, a native of Gillo. The Jews [Author libri Tradit. Hebr. in lib. Reg. & Paralip. & ita Interp. plerique.] describe him as grandfather to Bathsheba, wife of Uriah, and afterwards of David, by his son Ammiel, father of Bathsheba: if so, Ahitophel must have been very old at the time of Absalom's rebellion, since his grand-daughter, Bathsheba, had been some time married to Uriah, before she became wife to David. Some conjecture, [Cornel. a Lapide, Tirin, &c.] that the cause of Ahitophel's embracing Absalom's interest so warmly, was revenge for the dishonour David had done to his grand-daughter; however that might be, directly as Absalom was acknowledged king, he sent for Ahitophel, whose counsels at that time were received as oracles. Nothing gave David more uneasiness, than hearing that this great statesman was of Absalom's party; and when Hushai, his friend, came to accompany his flight, he intreated him rather to return to Jerusalem, to disappoint the good advice expected from Ahitophel.

When Absalom had entered Jerusalem, Ahitophel advised him, in the first place, to abuse his father's concubines publicly, whereby all Israel might understand, he had rendered his breach with his father absolute and irrevocable. Soon after, Ahitophel proposed to take twelve thousand chosen men, and pursue David this very night, and fall upon him while he is weary, and not on his guard." This advice was agreeable to Absalom, and to the chiefs; but Hushai counteracted it.

Israel

Ahitophel seeing his counsel rejected, saddled his ass, went to his house at Gillo, hanged himself, and was buried in the sepulchre of his fathers. Foreseeing the event, he determined to avoid that ignominious death he deserved; which David would certainly have inflicted on him, when resettled on the throne. A. M. 2981; ante A. D. 1023.

AHITUB, אֶחֱיָטֹב: brother of goodness, or my brother is fine or good; from טוב thub.

I. AHITUB, son of Phinehas, and grandson to Eli, the high-priest. His father, Phinehas, being slain in that unhappy engagement where-in the ark was taken by the Philistines, Ahitub succeeded Eli. (1 Sam. iv. 11) A. M. 2888.

II. AHITUB, son of Amariah, and father of Zaduck, the high-priest (1 Chron. vi. 8). It is not certain whether this Ahitub ever exercised the office of high-priest.

AHIUD, אֶחָיֹוד, אַחְיֹוד: brother of praise; from יָדָה jadeh, to praise.

AHIUD, son of Shelomi, of Asher, appointed by Moses one of the commissioners for dividing the land of Canaan. Numb. xxxiv. 27.

AHLAB, אַחְלָב, Ἀκλαβ: which is of milk, or which is fat; from חָלָב chalab, milk; otherwise brother of the heart; from אַחָה acha, a brother, a near relation, and לֵבָב, lebab, the heart. A city in Asher: its situation is not known (Judg. i. 31).

AHLAI, אַחְלִי, Ὀχλαί: one that prays; from חָלָה chaluh; otherwise, one that complains, from חָלָה chul; or חָלָה chil: or, one that waits; from יָחַל ichel: or, that begins; from חָלָל chalal.

I. AHLAI, son of Sheshan, 1 Chron. xi. 31.

II. AHLAI, a gallant commander in David's army, 1 Chron. xi. 41. [Zabud, son of Ahlai, Eng. Trans.]

AHLAI, אַחְלִי, Ὀχλαί: Vulg. Oholi, my tent.

AHOBAN, or Achoban, אַחֹבָן, אַבָּן: brother of the son, or the son of the brother; from אַחָה acha, a brother, and בֶּן ben, a son; otherwise, of the understanding; from בִּינָה binah: or, of the building; from בִּינָה binin: otherwise, secret; from חָבֵץ chabuck; whence חֵבֶץ chebion, hidden.

AHOBAN, or Akban, son of Abishur and Abihail, 1 Chron. xi. 29.

AHOHE, אַחֹה: brotherhood; from אַחָה achah; otherwise, a thorn; from חֹאךְ choach: otherwise, a hook; from חָךְ chach.

AHOHE, or Ahoah, third son of Bela, and grandson of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 4. His descendants are called Ahokites.

AHOHITES, Achochi, or Ahoi, אַחֹי: of the family of Ahohe: a living brother; from אַחָה acha, a brother, and חַיָּה chajeh, living; otherwise, my thorn: from the pronoun י, jod, mine, and חָךְ chach, a thorn.

AHOLAH, or Acheleh, אַחֹלָה: his tabernacle, his tent; from אֶהֱלֵה ahel.

AHOLIAB, or Aeliab, אַחֹלִיָּאב: the tent or tabernacle of the father: from אֶהֱלֵה ahel, a tent.

AHOLIAB, son of Ahisamach, of Dan, appointed with Bezaleel, to construct the tabernacle, Exod. xxxv. 34.

AHOLIBAH, or Aelibeh, אַחֹלִיבָה: my tent and my tabernacle: from אֶהֱלֵה ahel, a tent: from the pronoun י, my; the preposition ב, beth, in; and the pronoun ה, a, her.

AHOLIBAH, and Aholah, are two feigned or symbolical names adopted by Ezekiel, (chap. xxiii. 4.) to denote the two kingdoms of Judah and Samaria. They are represented as sisters, and of Egyptian extraction. Aholah stands for Samaria; and Aholibah for Jerusalem; the first signifies a tent: the second, my tent is in her. They both prostituted themselves to the Egyptians and Assyrians, in imitating their abominations and idolatries; wherefore, the Lord abandoned them to the power of those very people, for whom they showed such excessive and impure affection. They were carried into captivity, and reduced to the severest servitude. (Vide NAMES.)

AHOLIBAMAH, or Aelibemeh, אַחֹלִיבָמָה, Ὀλִיβεμὰς: my tabernacle is exalted; from אֶהֱלֵה ahel, a tent, and the pronoun י, my, and בָּמָה bamah, exalted.

AHUMAI, or Achumi, אַחֹומִי: brother of the waters; from מִים mim: otherwise, the meadow of waters, a waterish meadow; from אַחֻ achu, a meadow, and מִים mim, waters. Son of Jahath, of Judah. 1 Chron. iv. 2.

AHUZAM, or Oosam, or Achzem, אַחֹוזָם, Ὀזָאן: their possession, their occupation; from אַחָז achaz: to take, to possess, and the pronoun מ, am, their's; otherwise, their vision; from חָזָה chazah, to see. Son of Naarah, of Judah, 1 Chron. iv. 6.

AHUZAT, or Achozath, אַחֹוזָת: possession, occupation, vision; from אַחָז achaz: or, brother of the olive; from אַחָה acha, a brother, and זֵיתֹן zith, an olive tree.

AHUZZATH, friend of Abimelech, king of Gerar, who came with him and Pichol, his general, to make an alliance with Isaac (Gen. xxvi. 26). Several interpreters, following the Chaldee and St. Jerom, [Qu. Hebr. in Gen.] take Ahuzzuth in an appellative sense, for a company of friends which attended Abimelech.

The LXX call him Ahuzzath, the Brideman. A. M. 2200; ante A. D. 1804.

AI, a city near Bethel, westward (Josh. vii. 2). The LXX call it Agai, and Josephus, Aina; others, AIath. Joshua having detached 3000 men against AI, God permitted them to be repulsed, on account of the sin of Achan, who had violated the anathema pronounced against Jericho, by appropriating some of the spoil. A. M. 2553; ante A. D. 1451. After the expiation of this offence, Joshua sent by night 30,000 men to lie in ambush behind AI: the next day, early in the morning, he marched against the city, with the remainder of his army. The king of AI sallied hastily out of the town with his troops, and attacked the Israelites, who, on the first onset, fled, as if under great terror; by this feint they drew the enemy into the plain. When Joshua saw the whole of them out of the gates, he elevated his shield on the top of a pike, as a signal to the ambuscade; which immediately entered the place, now without defence, and set fire to it. The people of AI, perceiving the rising smoke, endeavoured to return, but found those who had set fire to the city in their rear, while Joshua and his army advancing in front, destroyed them all. The king was taken alive, brought to Joshua, and was afterwards hanged.

We read chap. viii. 3. "So Joshua arose, and all the people of war, to go up against AI; and Joshua chose out 30,000 mighty men of valour, and sent them away by night." There is a manifest contradiction between this verse and the twelfth, where it is said, that "Joshua chose 5000 men, whom he sent to lie in ambush between Bethel and AI." Dom Calmet, [Comment on Joshua, viii. 13.] says, that "Masius, [in Joshua, viii.] allows but 5000 men for the ambuscade, and 25,000 for the attack of the city, being persuaded, that an army of 600,000 men could only create confusion on this occasion, without either necessity for, or advantage in, such numbers." Masius seems to argue rightly, and to think like a soldier. "But the generality of interpreters," continues Calmet, "acknowledge two bodies to be placed in ambuscade, both between Bethel and AI, one of 25,000, the other of 5000 men."

State it thus: Joshua sent at first 30,000 men, who marched by night, and, to prevent discovery, went behind the eminences of AI, where these posted themselves at Bethel, taken by Joshua for the ambuscade. The officer, the head of them, then detached 5000 men, who lay hid as near as possible to the town, in order to throw themselves into it on the first opportunity.

Dom Calmet says, that some interpreters will not allow the Hebrew word akeb to signify an ambuscade; and that literally it denotes the heel; if so, then by a metaphor, it must signify ambuscade, since the property of an ambuscade is to fall on the enemy behind. It is an expression in daily use with us, that—the enemy is at our heels, that—he is close up with us—at our backs: and it is generally from behind that an ambuscade discovers itself by its attack.

The learned commentator on this place, reports the different opinions of interpreters concerning the nature of the signal used; but he does not render the matter absolutely clear. Some pretend, says he, that the Hebrew כִּידֹן cidon, signifies a shield; the LXX and Aquila, suppose it to mean a javelin all of iron, called guscos; but a javelin is too small to serve for a signal, at such a distance, nor is a shield more easily distinguished, though seen.

The Rabbins, though commonly a parcel of dreamers, have yet sometimes good intervals; they believe it was a staff belonging to some of their colours, which Joshua elevated as a signal.—[Most probably, it was one of the fire-pots, which are used as ensigns by the eastern caravans, the smoke of which would rise to a great height, be easily seen, and signify the fate intended for the city; beside this, as the frame and staff of this instrument was of iron, it answers to the translation of LXX. and Aquila, and is, very probably, what they had in contemplation.]

AIAH, or Oiah, אֵיָא, or אֵיָא by א aleph: vulture: according to others, pie, or raven; from אֵיָא ajah: or, alas! otherwise, where is he?

I. AIAH, mother of Rizpah, who was Saul's concubine. David delivered her children to the Gibeonites, to be hanged before the Lord, 2 Sam. xxi. 8.

II. AIAH. Jerom translates it vulture. Bochart believes it signifies the merlin; the Syriac renders it raven, and the Arabic, owl. Our translation, Job xxviii. 7, renders it vulture; but Lev. xi. 14, and Deut. xiv. 13, kite. It is evidently a species of unclean bird, most probably the vulture; so called from its gluttony, or perhaps from its note. The word אֵיָא (Jer. l. 39), though supposed by Bochart to denote jackalls, may perhaps be the plural of Aiah: and signify vultures, their flights, or companies; which in some countries are very numerous. See the articles on NATURAL HISTORY, BIRDS.

III. AJALON, אֵילָן: a chain; from אֵלָה alah: otherwise, strength; or, a stag; from אֵיל ail.

AJAH, son of Zibeon, of the race of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 24.

AITH, אֵיתָ: a city, heap, muss.

[AJALON, אֵילָן, the city of the great stag; or of the great oak; many cities have taken their names from animals; and among others, from from the stag. So the Greeks had their Elaphusa, Elaphite, Elaphoneusus: so, the Germans have their Hirschau, Hirschberg, Herschfeld: and we have our Hart-ford, the county town of Hartfordshire. Is it "the Aun" with the stag? See the MEDALS OF EGYPT, No. 18.]

AJALON, a city of Dan (Josh. xix. 42) assigned to the Levites of Kohath's family. We find it sometimes named Elom or Ailom. Eusebius says, that in his time there was shown a place called Ajalon, three miles east of Bethel: but this cannot be the Ajalon mentioned by Joshua, ch. x. 12, where he speaks to the lunar light to stay in the valley of Ajalon; for this did not belong to Dan; and Bethel was too remote from that tribe. St. Jerom notices another Ajalon two miles from Shechem, in the way to Jerusalem. He says, [in Epitaphiæ Paulo,] that Sta. Paula going from Shechem to Bethoron, saw on her left hand Ajalon and Gibeon. In 2 Chron. xxviii. 18, Ajalon is placed between Bethshemesh and Timnah. There was a city called Ajalon, in the tribe of Zebulun, Judges, xii. 12. Thus there were four cities of this name.

(1) In Dan, between Timnah and Bethshemesh; probably, that spoken of by Joshua.

(2) Ajalon, in Benjamin, east of Bethel. 2 Chron. xi. 10.

(3) Ajalon, in Ephraim, not far from Shechem

(4) Ajalon, in Zebulun; its situation not known.

[Vide FRAGMENT, No. CLIV.]

AICHMALOTARCH, Ἀιχμαλοτάρχης: a Greek term, signifying, prince of the captivity, or chief of the captives. This was the title, as the Jews pretend, of him who governed that people, during the captivity of Babylon.

They believe these princes, or governors, to have been constantly of the tribe of Judah, and family of David. But they would be very much puzzled to prove the real existence of these Aichmalotarchs. According to Basnage (Hist. des Juifs, lib. iii. cap. 4) the eastern Jews had their princes of the captivity, as the western Jews had their patriarchs. The Eastern Jews were those settled in Babylon, in Chaldæa, Assyria, and Persia; while they who dwelt in Judæa, Italy, Egypt, and other parts of the Roman empire, were called Western Jews. There was no prince of the captivity before the end of the second century. Huna was the first invested with this character, about that time. The office continued till the eleventh century. The princes of the captivity, it is said, resided at Babylon; where they were installed with ceremony, held courts of justice, &c.

This magistrate in Babylonia was called, in the Jewish language, Rosh-Golah, i. e. head of the captivity. The Jews of Alexandria had their Alabarchæ, and the Jews of Antioch had their Ethnarchæ; after this the Jews in most places of their dispersions had their Patriarchæ, for the same purpose; and there are in the Imperial laws, edicts concerning them. Prid. Connect. &c. Part ii. B. 4. Vide ALABARCHA.

AIR, or Oin, ὕψ: a fountain, or an eye.

AIR. The air, or atmosphere, surrounding the earth, is often meant by the word heaven; so the birds of the heaven—for the birds of the air. God rained fire and brimstone on Sodom from heaven, i. e. from the air, Gen. xix. 24. "Let fire come down from heaven;" i. e. from the air, 1 Kings, i. 10. Moses menaces Israel with the effects of God's wrath, by destruction with a pestilential air, Deut. xxviii. 22, or, perhaps, with a scorching wind, producing mortal diseases; or with a blast which ruins the corn. 1 Kings, viii. 37. Vide WIND.

To "beat the air," to "speak in the air" (1 Cor. ix. 26) are modes of expression used in most languages, signifying—to speak without judgment, or understanding; or to no purpose; to fatigue ourselves, in vain. "The powers of the air," Eph. ii. 2. are probably meant of devils, who exercise their powers principally in the air; exciting winds, storms, and tempests, or other malign influences (vide Job i. 9.) to which, perhaps, the apostle may allude; [if it be not rather an accommodation of the Jewish manner of speaking which was current in his days. Vide ANGEL.]

AKAN, or Oken, ὀκν, ἰσκαμ: tumult, blowing, or gnashing of teeth: otherwise, rampart, outward wall.

AKIBA, a famous Rabbin, who lived about A. D. 130, and was, as it were, the fore-runner of the celebrated impostor Barchochebas. The Jews, who greatly extol him, relate, that Akiba was descended from Sisera, the general of Jabin, king of Canaan, (Judg. iv. 7). He spent forty years in the country, employed in keeping the flocks belonging to one Calva Juna, a rich citizen of Jerusalem. His master's daughter offered to marry him, if he would quit the life of a shepherd, and apply to study. Akiba promised he would, whereupon they were clandestinely married; and he went to the University, where he spent twelve years, with so much reputation, that he came from thence with 12,000 scholars. His wife advised him to return thither; he continued, therefore, twelve years longer there; and his reputation increasing, he brought from thence 24,000 disciples. It may easily be perceived, that this prodigious number of scholars is a Rabbinical hyberbole; but they go farther, and tell us, that that all these scholars died between Easter and Whitsuntide, for not behaving with suitable respect to one another; and they were all buried at the foot of a hill near Tiberias. Basnage, Hist. des Juifs, tom. 2. lib. vi. cap. 8.

The Jews say, Akiba was a man of so much learning, that he could give a reason for the minutest letter of the law; and that what God had concealed from Moses, he revealed to him. There are a thousand opinions in the Mishna, whereof he is thought to be the author, and which are esteemed as so many maxims and decisions.

He was in the height of his reputation, and prince of the Sanhedrin, when Barchochebas appeared, to whom, it is certain, Akiba was attached, and to whom he served as harbinger, or fore runner, in the same quality almost as John Baptist was to our Saviour. But these two men were governed by a different spirit from that of our Saviour and John. They kindled a war in Judea, prompted the Jews to rebellion, committed infinite disorders, killed thousands of Christians and Romans, and caused the entire destruction of their country. Vide ADRIAN and BARCHOCHEBAS.

After the taking of Bether, Akiba was a prisoner, and continued some time in fetters, manifesting so great adherence to the observances of his predecessors, that he chose rather to go without drinking, and to use in washing himself, the water which was allowed him, than to omit that practice. The emperor Adrian severely punished his rebellion, and ordered his skin to be torn off with an iron comb. With him, say the Rabbins, vanished the honour of the law. Mishna in Sota, 515. They add, that Judah the Holy, another celebrated doctor, was born the day that Akiba died, i. e. A. D. 135. Bether was taken August 10th, that year.

AKKUB, or Okub, אקוב, Ἀκουβ: footstep, heel: otherwise, he that supplants, that deceives; from אקב hakub, or okeb, which has all these significations.

ALABARCHA, Ἀλαβάρχη. This term is not in Scripture; but Josephus uses it repeatedly to signify the chief of the Jews in Alexandria. Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 8, 20, xx. cap. 3. Philo calls this magistrate, ἑταρχης, Genarches; in Flacc. p. 975, d. Josephus also, in some places, calls him Ethnarches. Antiq. lib. xix. cap. 4. These terms signify the prince, or chief, of a nation. But the signification of Alabarcha, is disputed. Some believe, that this name was given in raillery to the principal magistrate, or head of the Jews at Alexandria, by the Gentiles, who despised the Jews. So Vales. not in Euseb. lib. ii. cap. 5. Ita & Turneb. lib. xxvii. cap. 25. Others derive Alabarcha from Alaba, which signifies ink to write with; Alabarcha would then signify the chief secretary, or collector of the customs and duties on cattle carried out of the country. So Cujac. lib. viii. Obser. cap. 37.

Fuller, Miscell. Theologic. lib. iv. cap. 16. [Vide Martinii Lexicon] derives it from the Syriac Hulaph (הלפ loco, via) and Arcin (ארצין or ארצין Arcon): the intendant, or the sovereign's delegate: for in places where the Jews were numerous, a principal of their own nation, or some other to whom they might address themselves, in their own affairs, was placed over them. But this last etymology seems no better than the other, says Calmet. It is certain, the dignity of Alabarch was common in Egypt, as we see in Juvenal; Sat. 1, v. 129.

Necio quos titulos Egyptus aut Alabarches.*

Also the emperors Valens, Gratian, and Theodosius, speak of the customs, or imposts, called Alabarchia in Egypt. Lib. ix. cap. de Vectig. & Commiss. Usurpationem totius licentia summovemus circa vectigal Alabarchia per Egyptum. Perhaps, originally the title Alabarcha, signified the person who had the custom of salt; but was wantonly given to the head, or governor, of the Jews at Alexandria. In this sense the etymology will come from the Greek, hals, halos, salt, and Archon, the chief. [The opinion, if not the derivation, of Fuller, seems to be confirmed by FRAGMENT, No. XXII. relating to the heads of trades, &c. in the East.]

ALABASTER. In Matt. xxvi. 6, 7. we read, that Jesus being at table in Bethany, in the house of Simon, the leper, a woman, (Mary sister of Lazarus, John xii. 3.) poured an alabaster box of precious ointment on his head. This alabaster was a sort of white marble, wherein precious liquors or unguents were preserved. Pliny says, lib. xxviii. cap. 8. that this kind of marble was found in the neighbourhood of Thebes, in Egypt, and about Damascus, in Syria. It was wrought into any form with ease, being neither hard, nor brittle. From the general use of this material, many kinds of vessels to contain liquors, received the name of alabaster, though not made of this stone. Some authors think, as Epiphanius, lib. de Mensur. that the box here mentioned, was of glass; and this opinion they support by St. Mark's expression, ch. xiv. 3, that "a woman POURED out the perfume upon our Saviour." A vessel of glass was given to Constantine the Great, as that wherein the liquor or perfume had been contained, which was poured on the head of Jesus; says Suidas, in Φωρος. Theodosius ordered it to be removed from the Forum of Constantinople, into a safer place. Some suppose the

the name alabaster denotes the form, rather than the matter, of this box. Alabastrum may signify a vessel without a handle: it is certain this term expresses generally a box to put perfumes in; [and this was probably in shape like some kinds of our snuff-boxes.]

[Herodotus, lib. iii. cap. 20. among the presents sent by Cambyses to the king of Ethiopia, mentions μυρον αλαβαστρον. Cicero, Academ. lib. ii. speaks of alabaster plenus unguenti. As to the expression, breaking the box, it merely implies, that the seal upon the box, which closed it, and kept the perfume from evaporating, &c. had never been removed, but was on this occasion broken, i. e. FIRST OPENED; implying that, not only was this unguent extremely valuable, but that it was not the remains at the bottom of a vessel, but—the prime, first opening, most fragrant part, which was used in thus perfuming our Lord, as a token of the utmost respect: a fit example for imitation! With the fragrance of such ointment, well might a house (the whole premises, as John says) be filled remarkably.

ALAMELECH, אלמלך: od is king; from אל al, God, and מלך melech, king.

ALAMETH, or Olmeth, אלמית, Ἀλεμὶθ: secret; otherwise, youth, ages: from אלם alam, or olum: otherwise, above death; from by ol, above, and מות muth, death. Ninth son of Becher, son of Benjamin, 1 Chron. vii. 8.

ALCIMUS, Ἀλκιμος: strong, vigorous.

ALCIMUS, Jacimus, or Joachim, high priest of the Jews, A. M. 3842, died 3844; ante A. D. 160. He was of the race of the priests, but not of a family of the first rank, nor whose ancestors had enjoyed the high priesthood. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 8. Besides, he had been polluted with idolatry, during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. xiv. 3) and he obtained this dignity by very irregular means. He was confirmed in his office, by king Antiochus Eupator, after the death of Menelaus. Alcimus did not perform the functions of it till after the death of Judas Maccabæus. Seeing he could not exercise his dignity of high-priest, he no sooner had intelligence that Demetrius, son of Antiochus Epiphanes, had stolen privately away from Rome, and was arrived in Syria, but putting himself at the head of the apostate Jews, who were then at Antioch, he threw himself at the feet of this new king, and besought him to defend them from the violences of Judas Maccabæus, whom he accused as an oppressor of those who supported the king's party, and who had dispersed and driven them out of their country. Intreating him also to send somebody into Judæa, to examine into the mischiefs and disorders committed by Judas Maccabæus, and to chastise his insolence.

Demetrius sent Bacchides thither with an army, and confirming Alcimus in his office of high-priest, commanded him to accompany Bacchides; and charged them both with the conduct of this war. As soon as they came into Judæa, they endeavoured to surprise Judas and his brethren, under pretence of treating with them; but they suspected, or discovered the snare, and happily avoided it. Some not so prudent, perished; among others, sixty As-sideans, and many scribes and doctors of the law; not imagining that a priest of Aaron's race, was capable of such iniquity. On his swearing, that no injury should be offered to them, they went to him; but as soon as he had them in his power, he gave directions that they should all be murdered. After which perfidy, no one would trust him.

Bacchides having established Alcimus by force in Judæa, marched out of Jerusalem, and encamped at Bezeth, on his return into Syria. 1 Macc. vii. 19, 20. From thence he sent and apprehended several who had deserted his party, with others, whom he commanded to be killed; after which, having committed the province to Alcimus, and left troops sufficient, he returned to king Demetrius. Alcimus, for some time, kept his ground; deserters came over to him in great numbers, with whom he made terrible havoc in the country; but Judas soon recovered the superiority; and Alcimus finding himself unable to resist Judas, returned to the king with a present of a gold crown, a palm-tree, and golden branches; which, in all probability, he had taken out of the temple. 1 Macc. xxv. 26, &c. The king sent a new army against Judas, under Nicanor, his old enemy, with particular orders to kill him, disperse his party, and establish Alcimus in full possession of his dignity.

Nicanor, who was well acquainted with the bravery of his adversary, proposed a treaty; but Alcimus, who thought sufficient care was not taken of his interests, went to the king, and prejudiced him so strongly against this treaty, that he refused to ratify it, and sent Nicanor positive orders to continue the war, till he had killed Judas, or taken him.

Nicanor attempted to secure the person of his enemy at an interview, near Jerusalem; but Judas perceiving treachery, withdrew, and recommenced the war. Nicanor was beat at Capharsalama; and in a second battle he was killed, and his army routed. Demetrius being informed of this, sent again Bacchides and Alcimus, with a powerful army, the choice of his troops. Judas had only three thousand men; and this little body was much lessened by terror and desertion, so that he had not above eight hundred hundred with him; with this small force, he ventured to attack the enemy, and, after prodigies of valour, died, overwhelmed by numbers.

Alcimus and his party now became the strongest. Alcimus began to exercise the offices of the high-priesthood, which he had purchased; but attempting to pull down the wall of the inner court, which had been built by the prophets (that probably which separated the altar of burnt-offerings from the priest's court) God punished him by a stroke of the palsy, whereof he died, after enjoying the pontificate three or four years, A. M. 3844. Joseph. Ant. lib. xii. 47.

ALEMA, or Alimis, 'Αλεμος: porch; from אֶלֶם alem.

ALEMA, a city in Gilead, beyond Jordan, 1 Macc. v. 26. Isaiah speaks of Elim, in Moab, Is. xv. 8. Helmon-Dehlataim, or Almon-Dehlataim, is known to be in the same country: this may, perhaps, be the Alema, mentioned in the Maccabees.

ALEMETH, or Olemeth, אֶלֶמֶת, 'Αλαμωθ: Vide ALEMA.

I. ALEMETH, son of Jehoadah, of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 36.

II. ALEMETH, a city of Benjamin. It joined to Anathoth. Both were cities of refuge.

ALEPH (א) the name of the first letter in the Hebrew alphabet, whence the Alpha (Α) of the Syrians and Greeks is derived. This word (as a word) signifies chief, prince, or thousand, expressing, as it were, a leading number.

There are certain psalms, and other parts of scripture, which begin with Aleph; and the verses following begin with the following letters of the alphabet in their order: these are called acrostics. In the 119th Psalm, the first eight verses all begin with Aleph (Α); the eight following all with Beth (Β); and in like manner the eight lines of the stanzas following begin each with the same letter. In the 111th Psalm, the first verse, "I will praise the Lord with my whole heart," begins with Aleph (Α); the following, "In the assembly of the upright, and in the congregation," begins with Beth (Β); and so on, each verse beginning with its proper letter of the alphabet, in its order. In the Lamentations of Jeremiah, chapter i. the first strophe only begins with Aleph (Α); the second with Beth (Β); and so the others. In the third chapter, three verses successively begin with Aleph (Α); then three others with Beth (Β) &c. We have no other sort of acrostic Hebrew verses remaining.

The Jews at this day use their letters as numerical characters; A, Aleph, stands for one; B, Beth, for two; G, Gimel, for three; and so on. But I do not find that this custom is ancient. Vide HEBREW POINTS, LETTERS, &c.

ALEXANDER, 'Αλέξανδρος: one that assists men; or that helps stoutly; or one that turns away evil. Such is the signification of this Greek word, which nearly answers to the Hebrew word Solomon.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT, son and successor of Philip, king of Macedon, is denoted in the prophecies of Daniel (vii. 6) by a leopard with four wings, signifying his great strength, and the unusual rapidity of his conquests: also (Dan. viii. 4, 5, 6, 7) as a one-horned he-goat, running over the earth so swiftly, as not to touch it; attacking a ram with two horns, overthrowing him, and trampling him under foot, without any being able to rescue him. The he-goat prefigured Alexander, the ram prefigured Darius Codomannus, the last of the Persian kings. In the statue beheld by Nebuchadnezzar in a dream, (Dan. ii. 39) the belly of brass was the emblem of Alexander; the legs of iron designed his successors. He was appointed by God to destroy the Persian empire, and to substitute the Grecian monarchy.

Alexander was born at Pella, ante A. D. 355. His father was killed at a marriage feast, when Alexander was about eighteen.

After he had performed the last duties to his father, Philip, he was chosen by the Greeks general of their troops going against the Persians. He entered Asia with an army of 34,000 men, A. M. 2670; ante A. D. 334. He subdued almost all Asia Minor in one campaign; he defeated Orobates, one of Darius's generals; and Darius himself, whose army consisted of 400,000 foot, and 100,000 horse, in the narrow passes which lead from Syria to Cilicia. Darius fled, abandoning his camp and baggage, his children, wife, and mother.

After he had subdued Syria Alexander came to Tyre; the Tyrians evading his entrance into their city, he besieged it. He wrote at the same time to Jaddus, high-priest of the Jews, that he expected to be acknowledged by him, and to receive from him those submissions which he had hitherto paid to the king of Persia. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xi. cap. ult. Jaddus refusing, as having sworn fidelity to Darius, Alexander resolved to march against Jerusalem, when he had reduced Tyre. That siege lasted long, but at length the city was taken, and sacked; this done, he entered Palestine, and reduced it. As he was marching against Jerusalem, intending to punish the high-priest, Jaddus, fearing his resentment, had recourse to God by prayers and sacrifices; and the Lord in a dream commanded him to open the gates to the conqueror, and, dressed in his pontifical ornaments, attended by the priests in their formalities, at the head of his people, to receive Alexander in triumph. Jaddus

Jaddus obeyed; and Alexander seeing from a distance this company advancing, was struck, and approaching the high-priest, he saluted him first, then adored God, whose name was engraved on a thin plate of gold worn by the high-priest on his forehead: the people in the mean while surrounded Alexander, with great acclamations. The kings of Syria who accompanied him, and the great officers about Alexander, could not comprehend his conduct; Parmenio alone ventured to ask, "Why he, to whom all people prostrated themselves, had prostrated himself before the high-priest of the Jews?" Alexander replied, "that he paid this respect to God, not to the high-priest: for," added he, "while I was yet in Macedonia, I saw the God of the Jews, who appeared to me in the same form and dress as this high-priest; he encouraged me to march my army with expedition into Asia, promising under his conduct to render me master of the Persian empire. For this reason, as soon as I perceived this habit, I recollected the vision I had seen, understood that my undertaking was favoured by God, and that under his protection I might expect very soon to obtain the Persian empire, and happily to accomplish all my designs."

Having said thus, he embraced Jaddus, and was conducted into the city. He went directly to the temple, where he offered sacrifices to the Lord, punctually conforming to the directions of the priests, and leaving to the high-priest the honours and functions annexed to his dignity. They showed him the prophecies of Daniel, wherein it is said, that a Grecian prince should destroy the Persian empire: these he applied to himself; and was thereby confirmed in his opinion, that God had chosen him to execute that great work.

After this, he dismissed the multitude; and the next day, bade them ask what they would of him: the high-priest desired only the liberty of living under his government according to their own laws, with an exemption from tribute every seventh year, because in that year the Jews neither tilled their grounds, nor reaped their products. Alexander readily granted this request: and as they besought him to grant the same favour to the Jews beyond the Euphrates, in Babylonia and Media, he promised that privilege, as soon as he had conquered those provinces: after this, having signified, that if any would enlist in his troops, he would receive them; many followed him.

This done, he left Jerusalem, and visited other cities; being every where received with great testimonies of friendship and submission. The Samaritans, who dwelt at Sichem, observing how kindly Alexander had treated the Jews, resolved to say, that they also were by religion Jews; for it was their practice, when they saw the affairs of the Jews prosper, to boast, that they were descended from Manasseh and Ephraim; but when they thought it their interest to say the contrary, they would not fail to affirm, and to swear, that they had no relation to the Jews.

They came therefore with many demonstrations of joy, to meet Alexander, as far, almost, as the territories of Jerusalem. Alexander commended their zeal; and the Sichemites intreated him to visit their temple, and their city: he promised that he would, at his return; and as they petitioned him for an exemption from taxes every seventh year, because they, also, neither tilled nor reaped that year, Alexander asked them, if they were Jews? They said, they were Hebrews; and by the Phœnicians, called Sichemites. Alexander answered, that he had granted this exemption only to Jews; but, at his return, he would enquire into this affair, and do them justice.

[N. B. In reading the accounts of Josephus, we ought always to recollect, that his chief design in his history was to recommend his nation, then captive, to the powers of Rome: and that, in common with his countrymen, he had strong prejudices against every nation but his own, and every sect but his own.]

Alexander having conquered Egypt, and regulated it, gave orders for the continuation of his new city, Alexandria, and departed from thence about spring, with the utmost expedition, into the east, in pursuit of Darius. (Quint. Curt. lib. iv. cap. 8. Euseb. Chronic. Cedren.) Passing through Palestine, he was informed, that the Samaritans, in a general insurrection, had killed Andromachus, governor of Syria and Palestine, who coming to Samaria to regulate some affairs, the inhabitants set fire to his house, and burned him: this was infinitely displeasing to Alexander, who loved Andromachus: he ordered all who were concerned in his murder to be executed; the rest he banished from Samaria, and settled a colony of Macedonians in their room. (Joseph. lib. ii. contra Appion.) The Samaritans who escaped this calamity, collected in Sichem at the foot of Mount Gerizim, which became their capital, as it still continues. And lest the 8,000 men of this nation, who were in his service, and had accompanied him since the siege of Tyre, if sent back into their own country, might renew the spirit of rebellion, Alexander sent them into Thebais, the most remote (southern) province of Egypt, and there assigned them lands.

We shall not enlarge in reciting Alexander's conquests. After he had subdued Asia, and opened a way to India, with incredible good fortune and rapidity, he gave himself to intemperance: having drunk to excess, he fell sick, and died, after he had obliged "all the world to be quiet before him," 1 Macc. i. 3. Being sensible his end was near, he sent for his court, and declared, "he gave the empire to the most deserving:" yet, it is said, he regulated the succession by a will. 1 Maccabees, chap. i. 7, says, he divided his kingdom among his generals while he was living. It is certain, a partition was made of Alexander's dominions, among the four principal officers of his army, and that the empire which he founded in Asia subsisted many ages after him. He died A. M. 3681; ante A. D. 323, at the age of thirty-three, after reigning twelve years, viz. six as king of Macedon, and six as monarch of Asia. Justin. lib. xii. Quint. Curt. lib. ii. cap. 7.

The spurious Josephus, or Josephus Ben Gorion (vide JOSEPHUS II.) relates, that Alexander having entered the temple, the high-priest showed him the courts, the treasures, and all the beauties of that holy place, and even the holy of holies itself, the most sacred and innermost part. Alexander having admired these things, and blessed the Lord for them, said, "I desire to leave here, a monument of my devotion and respect to the God whom you adore; I will give, therefore, to the artificers, a great quantity of gold, that they may make a statue of me as large as life, and place it between the altar of burnt-offerings and the holy place:" but the high-priest replied, "he might make a better use of the sum he intended to devote to God, by giving it to support the priests, and for the service of the people, who should worship God in his holy place; and that he would erect a more excellent monument in honour of him." "What monument then can that be?" replied Alexander: "It is this," says Jaddus; "all the children of the priests that shall be born this year in Jerusalem and all Judæa, shall be called by the name of Alexander: these will be so many living monuments, that shall every day revive the memory of your name in the Lord's temple."

The Jews relate, that the Egyptians prosecuted the Hebrews before Alexander, to procure the restitution of the gold and silver vessels, &c. which their ancestors had borrowed at the Exodus (Exod. iii. 22). The Egyptians set forth their right in the best manner they could; but when he heard the representations of the Hebrews, and understood that this was a consideration for many years' oppression, labour, and bad usage received from the Egyptians, and for children drowned or exposed;—also, that the evidence rested on the Hebrew writings, he dismissed the Egyptians in confusion. This law-suit is probably only an invention of the Rablins; [though it is not impossible, the idea might be started before Alexander in a merry mood, and might afterwards be reported as fact.] Abraham Zaceuth. in Sepher. Juchasim. & Gemar. Babylon. ad. tit. Sanhed. cap. 11.

Some have been of opinion, (See M. Simon's Dictionary, under the title ALEXANDER,) that it was the high-priest Jaddus who told Alexander, that the Gods worshipped by the Heathen, were mortal men deified: but this is conjecture only. The ancients, from whom we learn this particular (taken from a letter of Alexander to his mother) have not told us, that he had it from Jaddus, but from Leo, a high-priest, who had the care of the Egyptian mysteries: [and as this was certainly the fact, it was at once an historical truth, and a complimentary kind of apology for the same madness in Alexander, who herein imitated the heroes of ancient days.] Tertull. de Pallio, cap. 3. Minutius Felix, in Octavio. Cyprian. de vanitate Idolatorum, cap. 1. August. de Civit. Dei, lib. viii. cap. 5; & de consensu Evang. lib. i. cap. 23.

The name of this conqueror is equally celebrated in the writings of the Orientalists, as in those of the Greeks and Romans; but they vary extremely from the accounts which western historians give of him: they call him, Escander Dulkarnaim, "double-horned Alexander," alluding to the two horns of his empire (or his power) in the east and west. His posterity is yet extant in parts towards India: and his fame is there maintained and cherished. Bibl. Orient. Escander, p. 317.

The eastern writers do not agree as to Alexander's father and mother: the Mahometans generally relate his origin thus:—Darab, king of Persia, made war against Philip, king of Macedonia, and having defeated him, obliged him to retreat to a place, where he blocked him up so closely, that he was forced to sue for peace, to give his daughter in marriage, and to pay an annual tribute of a thousand beizats, or golden eggs, each forty drachms in weight. Darab having espoused the princess, perceived that her breath was offensive, and resolved to send her back to her father, though she was with child by him: Philip received her; and the son of whom she was delivered, he named, as if he had been his own; and called him Alexander.

Darab, at his death, left his kingdom to a son of his own name (Darius Codomannus, of the Greeks; Dara, in the Persian language, signifies sovereign). This prince extended his territories, territories, settled posts throughout his dominions for giving speedy intelligence, and reigned some years happily: but, as he governed with great pride and severity, he drew on himself the odium of the great men and of the common people, who rebelled against him. The grandees wrote to Alexander, inviting him to conquer Persia, which belonged to him, as son and heir to Darab the first. Alexander desiring to take advantage of these dispositions, refused to pay the thousand beizats, or golden eggs; and the king of Persia demanding them, by his ambassador, Alexander replied, "The bird which laid these eggs, is flown into the other world."

On this, Darius levied a powerful army, to reduce Alexander, who, also, raised forces, and marched against Darius: after a bloody combat, the victory remained with Alexander. Darius retiring from the battle, no sooner entered his tent, but two of his chief officers pierced him through the body with their swords, and fled to Alexander, who, on notice of what had happened, ran to Darius, and placed the expiring monarch on his knees, protesting, that he was no way concerned in his death: Darius opening his eyes, desired him to avenge his murder, gave him his daughter Roxana, and intreated him to leave the provinces of Persia under the government of natives of the country. Such, according to the eastern people, was the death of Darius Codomannus.

Abulfarage, Said, son of Batrik, and Josephus Gorionides, suggest, that Nectanetus, king of Egypt, was Alexander's father; that, being driven out of his own country by Artaxerxes Ochus, he disguised himself as an astrologer, came into Macedonia, and lying with Olympia, Philip's wife, begat Alexander. [Thus Alexander, by wishing to be thought the son of Jupiter, has entailed lasting shame on his mother, and uncertainty on his own origin: had he been less aspiring in point of descent, he had been more honourably descended.] The same Abulfarage says, that Alexander defeated thirty kings in battle, and built twelve cities, four whereof he called by his own name. It is related also, that he commanded a bridge of admirable structure to be destroyed, which had been erected by an ancient king of Persia over the Tigris: afterwards a bridge of boats was made in the same place, which continued there for a long time. [This is perhaps founded on his burning of Persepolis, and the galleries there; or both accounts may be true.]

We read in the first book of Maccabees, (chap. i. 6, 7) that Alexander, near his end, sent for his principal officers, who had been brought up with him from his youth, and divided his kingdom among them, while he was yet living. [This he might do: or, he might express his foresight of what actually took place after his death:] by this supposition, we reconcile this relation with the Greek and Latin historians, who have mentioned the circumstances of his death, and the manner wherein he disposed of his dominions; which is otherwise a difficulty. In this particular, the eastern historians agree with the historian of the Maccabees; they say, he died in the city of Scheherezour, (D'Herbelot. Bibl. Orient.—Long. 82° 20', lat. 34° 30' N.) in Assyria (or, as others, in the Curdistan) after having divided his dominions among ninety of his principal captains, the chief of whom was Ptolemy, son of Lague. Eskenderous, otherwise Aridæus, his son, or rather, as Greek authors say, his brother, had no share in this succession, being addicted entirely to the study of philosophy, under the direction of Aristotle, who had been Alexander's preceptor.

Another historian, Tarikh Montekheb, informs us, that this prince, a little before his death, divided the provinces of Persia among the sons of those princes whom he had subdued, and dispossessed, they paying fealty, and homage to him, and keeping a stipulated number of troops in his service; but, after the death of Alexander, they, who had been tributary, made themselves sovereigns, and are distinguished in the Arabian and Persian histories, by the title of kings of the nations: who form a particular dynasty in the succession of Persian kings.

Josephus ben Gorion, whose history was published in Germany, by Sebastian Munster, in the sixteenth century (but much more correctly since) has related the history of Alexander the Great, which he learned, he says, from the Egyptian Magi, in so strange a manner, and blended with so many fables, and such gross ignorance, that to repeat them, would too severely try the reader's patience.

The eastern people agree, that Alexander built a strong wall, from one of the Caspian mountains to another, to prevent the northern hordes, whom they call Gog and Magog (Vide Ezek. ch. v) from penetrating into Persia. This wall was known among the ancients by the name of the Caspian gates. Vide CASPIAN.

While at Babylon, amid his debauches, Alexander resolved to rebuild the temple of Belus, which Xerxes had demolished at his return from Greece. He first ordered the area to be cleared, and observing that the Magi, to whom he had committed this work, proceeded very slowly, he employed ten thousand of his troops about it: they laboured at it during two months before his death; yet the undertaking remained unfinished. It was designed, that the Jews in his army should take their turn in this work, but they strongly represented, that it was not lawful for them to assist in building an edifice intended for idolatrous worship. Violent means were used to force them; but they continued inflexible. Alexander admiring their constancy, discharged them, and sent them home. Diod. Sicul. lib. xvii. Arrian. lib. vii. Joseph. contra Appion. lib. ii.

II. ALEXANDER BALAS, so called from Bala, his mother, was the natural son of Antiochus Epiphanes; and on medals is surnamed Theopator Evergetes. Some historians will not allow him to be, even the natural son of Antiochus Epiphanes. Flores, Epitome Livii. lib. lii. calls him, an unknown person, and of uncertain extraction. Justin says, lib. iv. "that the enemies of Demetrius, king of Syria, suborned a young man, from among the meanest of the people, to declare himself son and heir of Antiochus; and that he, warring with success against the king of Syria, obtained his kingdom." Appian affirms plainly, Syriac. p. 31. that Alexander Balas pretended to be of the family of the Seleucida, without any right to that pretension; and Athenæus says, that he was the supposed son of Antiochus Epiphanes. However, the Roman Senate, the Jews, the Egyptians, and the Syrians, acknowledged him as son and heir of that prince.

Heraclides, of Byzantium, was the person who undertook to seat Alexander Balas on the throne of Syria, and to displace Demetrius, who was his particular enemy. He carried Alexander, and Laodicea, a daughter of Antiochus Epiphanes, to Rome, where he gained many of the senators by presents, persuading them, that Alexander was the natural son of Antiochus: when he thought his plan mature, he brought Alexander and Laodicea into the senate-house:—where they desired assistance from the senate, to recover their father's inheritance, the kingdom of Syria, usurped by Demetrius. Heraclides seconded their petition with a long harangue; and though men of understanding looked on all this as mere farce, yet the party gained by Heraclides, being the most numerous, carried it; and the senate resolved, that Alexander and Laodicea might endeavour to recover the dominions of their father; that the senate and people would support them, and would furnish them succours: A. M. 3851, ante A. D. 153. Immediately Heraclides conducted Alexander and Laodicea to Ephesus, and made preparations to carry on the war in earnest against Demetrius.

Alexander Balas went into Syria, and on his first appearance, Ptolemais, then in custody of some mal-contented of Demetrius's troops, opened to him. Then he wrote to Jonathan Maccabæus, to engage him in his party: (1 Macc. x. 18). At the same time, he sent him a purple robe, and a crown of gold: Jonathan therefore embraced Alexander's party, notwithstanding the offers and solicitations of Demetrius. After this, Alexander fought Demetrius: the left wing of Demetrius, put to flight Alexander's right wing; but the right wing, where Demetrius commanded in person, was obliged to retreat: Demetrius, though deserted by his men, and alone, performed prodigies of valour; at last, unhappily, plunging into mire, he fell from his horse, and was pierced through with arrows, fighting valiantly to the last.

Thus Alexander Balas obtained full possession of the kingdom of Syria. When this was accomplished, he considered how to strengthen himself by an alliance with the king of Egypt. He demanded that king's daughter in marriage, and Ptolemy Philometor gave her to him. The two kings met at Ptolemais, where the marriage was concluded (1 Macc. x. 51, & seq.) Jonathan Maccabæus, invited by king Alexander, appeared there with great splendour: he brought large presents to Alexander, and was very well received by both princes. The king of Syria showed him all marks of honour, clothed him in purple, placed him in the number of his principal friends, and made him his master of horse.

Alexander had not been above two years on the throne, when Demetrius Nicator, eldest son of the former Demetrius Soter, at the head of some troops which he had received from Lasthenes, of Crete, passed into Cilicia. Alexander was then in Phœnicia, and instantly as he received the news, he returned to Antioch, that he might order affairs before the arrival of Demetrius.

Demetrius gave the command of his troops to Apollonius, who with very insolent language bid defiance to Jonathan. Jonathan, and his brother Simon, marched against him, and found him near Joppa; the enemy's horse, after sustaining great fatigue all the day, was at last put to flight by Simon's infantry: after which the two brothers took Azotus and Ascalon, and returned laden with spoil to Jerusalem. King Alexander informed of this success, advanced Jonathan to new honours, and sent him the buckle of gold which was generally given only to near relations of the king. Moreover, he gave him Accaron, and its territory, as his own property.

While this was transacting, Ptolemy Philometor, father-in-law of Alexander Balas, devising vising how to unite the kingdom of Syria with Egypt, took private measures to destroy both Demetrius Nicator and Alexander Balas. He levied a powerful army, and under pretence of assisting his son-in-law, entered Syria, and was received as a friend into all the cities; (Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 5. Diodor. lib. xxxii. Justin, lib. xxxv. &c.) after having seized them, he gave out that Balas had prepared several ambuscades for him in Ptolemais, with intention to surprize him. Jonathan Maccabæus came to him near Joppa; and though the inhabitants of the country did all they could to render him odious to Ptolemy, by representing the numbers which Jonathan had slain in the preceding war, the temple of Dagon, which he had burnt, and the city of Azotus, which he had destroyed, the king nevertheless received him with great distinction. 1 Macc. xi. 4, 5, 6, 7.

Ptolemy advanced to Antioch, without resistance, assumed the throne of Syria, and put on his head the two diadems of Egypt and Syria.

Balas, who had returned into Cilicia, there gathered a numerous army, with which he marched against Ptolemy and Demetrius Nicator, now confederated against him: he gave them battle on the river Eneparus, but was overcome, and saved himself by flight, with five hundred horse that followed him, into Arabia: where Zabdiel, a prince of the Arabians, cut off his head, and sent it to Ptolemy. The history is related to this effect, in the first book of Maccabees: but other historians relate, that Alexander's generals considering their own interests and security, treated privately with Demetrius, treacherously killed their master, and sent his head to Ptolemy at Antioch. A. M. 3859, ante A. D. 145. Polyb. excerptis. Vales. p. 194. Diodor. lib. xxxii. in Bibliot. Photii.

Alexander Balas left a son very young, called Antiochus Theos, whom Tryphon raised to the throne of Syria. Vide ANTIOCHUS.

III. ALEXANDER JANNEUS, third son of John Hircanus. John Hircanus left three sons (or five, according to Josephus, de Bello, lib. i. cap. 3.) He was particularly fond of Antigonus and Aristobulus, but could not endure his third son, Alexander, because he had dreamed that he would reign after him; which dream extremely afflicted him, inasmuch as according to the order of nature, it implied the death of his two brothers. Events justified the dream. Antigonus never reigned, and Aristobulus reigned but for a short time. [He began to reign in 3898, which was the year Hircanus died; and he died in 3899, before A. D. 105.] After his death, Salome, or Alexandra his widow, liberated Alexander, whom Aristobulus had kept in prison ever since their father's death, and made him king. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 20.

Alexander being seated on the throne, put to death one of his brothers, who had formed a design on his life, and heaped favours on another, called Abasalom, who being contented with a private condition, lived peaceably, and retired from public employments.

Alexander was of a warlike enterprizing genius; when he had regulated his dominions, he marched against Ptolemais: the inhabitants gave him battle, but he repulsed them, and compelled them to shut themselves up in the place; which he closely besieged. They had recourse to Ptolemy Lathyrus, who having been expelled the kingdom of Egypt by his mother, Cleopatra, continued in the isle of Cyprus. Lathyrus promised them assistance, and fitted out a strong fleet: in the mean time, Demænetus, who had great credit in Ptolemais, persuaded the inhabitants it was much more their advantage to carry on the war against the Jews, and run all hazards, than to receive Ptolemy, and thereby throw themselves into inevitable slavery. The people admitted these reasonings, and ordered thanks to be returned to Ptolemy, for his offer of assistance.

Ptolemy was at sea when he received this news; notwithstanding which, he advanced to Sicaminum, over against Ptolemais, where he landed his army, composed of about 30,000, horse and foot. The inhabitants of Ptolemais persisted in refusing to receive him; during which time, deputies from Gaza came to him on the part of Zoilus, tyrant of Dora, and of Strato's tower, desiring his assistance against Alexander Jannæus, who wasted their country.

Ptolemy was overjoyed at this opportunity of making an honourable retreat from before Ptolemais: and Alexander, not thinking it advisable to hazard an engagement with Ptolemy, withdrew his troops, and privately solicited Cleopatra, Ptolemy's mother, to join his party, professing a desire to live well with her son; and offering him four hundred talents to deliver up Zoilus; with assurances, that he would resign to him the land of which Zoilus was proprietor. Ptolemy soon perceived that Alexander deluded him; for which reason, he conducted the war against him with fresh vigour.

He attacked, and took some places in Galilee: Alexander gave him battle near Asophus, not far from the Jordan; but Ptolemy killed 30,000 of his men (50,000, if Timagenes, cited in Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 20, 21, may be believed.) After this victory, he met with no resistance. His mother, Cleopatra, fearing lest such success should make him too powerful, equipped a large fleet, and sent her son Alexander under into Phœnicia, where he was well received by the people, who forsook Ptolemy's party; but appearing before Ptolemais, he was obliged to lay siege to it; and Cleopatra came to his assistance to hasten the taking of that city.

Alexander Jannæus, as affairs stood, thought it impossible to procure any succour but from Cleopatra: he went therefore to her camp before Ptolemais, carrying great presents, and was received as an unhappy prince, an enemy of Ptolemy, who had no refuge but the queen's protection. Some of Cleopatra's friends persuaded her to seize Judæa; but Ananias, one of her generals, by birth a Jew, demonstrated to her, not only the injustice of such a proceeding, in robbing a prince, her ally, come to throw himself into her arms; but likewise that it would render her odious to all the Jews in the world; who could not but detest such perfidy. Cleopatra, swayed by these reasons, made an alliance with Alexander Jannæus, in the city of Scythopolis; thereupon, Alexander marched with his troops into Cœlo-Syria, where he took the town of Gadara, after a siege of ten months, and after that Amathus, one of the best fortresses in the country, where Theodorus, son of Zeno, had lodged his most valuable property, as in absolute security. This Theodorus falling suddenly on Alexander's army, killed 10,000, and plundered his baggage.

That misfortune was unable to shake the courage of th' prince; he besieged Raphia and Anthedon, towns on the Mediterranean, and took them; he attacked Gaza, and ravaged the neighbouring country: but Apollodotus, who commanded in the town, made a sally in the night, fell furiously on Alexander's camp, put the Jews into disorder, and had the advantage while night lasted; but when it was day, the Jews discovering who their enemies were (for they thought at first that it was Ptolemy Lathyrus, come to the assistance of Gaza) recovered spirit, and killed near 1000 of the enemy. After a long resistance, having lost their chief, Apollodotus, the town was taken, and sacked, not, however, without great loss to the Jews; for the defenders of Gaza seeing no hope of quarter, sold their lives very dearly.

Alexander returned to Jerusalem, a year after he had begun the siege of Gaza: but at Jerusalem he did not find that peace he expected. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 21. The Jews revolted; and on the feast of tabernacles, while he as high-priest was preparing to sacrifice, according to custom, the people assembled in the temple, had the insolence to throw lemons at him; (for it is usual with the Jews, during this festival, to carry branches of palms and of lemon-trees in their hands, as tokens of joy.) To these insults, they added reproaches, upbraiding him, that he who had been a captive, was not worthy to go up to the holy altar, and offer solemn sacrifices. Provoked by these affronts, Alexander put the seditious to the sword, and killed about 6,000: afterwards, he erected a partition of wood before the altar and the inner temple, to prevent the people from coming so near the altar: and to defend himself in future against such attempts, he took into his pay guards from Pisidia and Cilicia; for, as he was no lover of the Syrians, he would have none of them in his service.

He made war afterwards against the Moabites and Ammonites, and obliged them to pay tribute: he attacked Amathus, the fortress beyond Jordan, before-mentioned, and razed it; Theodorus, son of Zeno, not daring now to encounter him. On another occasion, being at war with Obedas, king of the Arabians, he fell into an ambuscade, near Gadara, beyond Jordan; and being inclosed by a troop of camels, in steep places, he, with difficulty, disengaged himself, and got back to Jerusalem, alone.

Here he found the Jews more animated against him than ever; and after this time he was obliged to make war upon them, during six years: he killed above 50,000. All his endeavours to be reconciled, served only to irritate them more; so that having one day asked them 'what they would have him do to acquire their good will?' they answered unanimously, 'that he had nothing to do but to kill himself:' and they sent deputies to Demetrius Eucærus, to desire succours against their king. [Demetrius Eucærus was established king of Damascus in 3912. It was not, therefore, till after this year that he came into Judæa.]

Eucærus coming into Judæa, joined the opposers of Alexander, and encamped at Sichem. Alexander marched against him with 6,200 foreign troops, and 20,000 Jews, who continued faithful. Eucærus had 3000, and 4,000 foot. The two kings endeavoured mutually to weaken each other; Eucærus, by debauching the foreign troops in Alexander's pay, and Alexander, by separating from the party of Eucærus those Jews who had joined his army: but neither of them succeeding, they came to a battle, in which victory declared for Eucærus; of the foreign troops belonging to Alexander, not one was left; and this prince was forced to fly for shelter to the mountains. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 22.

This misfortune, which, to all appearance, must have ruined his affairs, contributed to his re-establishment. Six thousand Jews, touched with the unhappy condition of their king, joined him; and Demetrius, content with his advantage, tage, retired into Syria, and left the rebels to oppose their king with their own forces. Alexander overcame them in all skirmishes, and having shut up the fiercest of them in Bethom, he forced the town, made them prisoners, and carried them to Jerusalem, where he ordered eight hundred of them to be crucified before him, during a great entertainment which he made for his friends; and before these unhappy wretches had expired, he commanded their wives and children to be murdered in their presence. This was an unheard-of and excessive cruelty; and on this occasion, the people of his own party called him Thracides, meaning to say, "as cruel as a Thracian." A body of 8,000 mutineers, who still kept the field, terrified with this execution, secured themselves in places strongly situated, and left the king to his dominions.

Antiochus, surnamed Dionysius, having conquered Damascus, resolved to invade Judæa: Alexander Jannæus, informed of his design, and unwilling to hazard a battle, ordered the construction of intrenchments, from Antipatris to Joppa, which was the only place through which the enemy could penetrate; and having added a wall to these works, with wooden towers at proper distance, for about a hundred and fifty furlongs, he prevented the enterprize of Antiochus. That prince, having only burnt these wooden towers, thought it convenient to return, and direct his arms against the king of the Arabians; in which war he was killed. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 23; A. M. 3917 or 3918.

After his death, the people of Damascus presented the crown to Aretas; who came into Judæa, attacked Alexander, and overcame him near Adida, in the plain of Sephala, east of Gaza and Anthedon; which led to a peace. Aretas returned to Damascus; and Alexander besieged Dia, or Dium, in Arabia, near Pella, in the region of Decapolis; (Pliny lib. v. cap. 17.) having taken it, he led his army to Essa, where Zeno had lodged all his most valuable effects. Jos. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 10. He surrounded the place with a triple wall, and after its capture, marched against Golan and Seleucia: these he took, and became master of the valley of Antiochus, and the fortress of Gamala. He accused Demetrius, who was the proprietor of all these parts, of several crimes; and having taken possession of them, he returned in triumph to Judæa, after an absence of three years. The Jews received him with joy, by reason of his great successes; and under his reign their dominion extended over many cities which he had conquered.

After this, Alexander having drunk to excess, laboured under a quartan fever, three whole years, without, however, intermitting his military exercises; his strength was at last exhausted, and he died in the country of Gerasa, while besieging the castle of Ragaba, beyond the Jordan (Ragaba is probably the Argob, of Bashan, mentioned Deut. iii. 4, 13, 14).

The queen, his wife (Vide ALEXANDRA) observing him near his end, and foreseeing all she had to fear, from a mutinous people, not easily governed; and her children not of age to conduct affairs; Alexander told her, that to reign in peace, she should first conceal his death from the soldiery, till Ragaba was taken; that, when returned to Jerusalem, she should give the Pharisees some share in the government; that she should send for the principal of them, show them his dead body; tell them they might use it as they pleased, and treat it with all manner of indignities, in revenge for the ill treatment they had received from him; but for the rest, that she would do nothing henceforward in the government, without their advice and participation.

He added, "if you do thus, you may be assured, they will make a very honourable funeral for me, and you will reign in peace, supported by their credit and authority among the people." Having said these words, he expired, aged forty-eight, after a reign of twenty-seven years. A. M. 3926; ante A. D. 78. He left two sons, Hircanus and Aristobulus, who disputed the kingdom and high priesthood, till the time of Herod the Great; their divisions caused the ruin of their family, and were the means of Herod's elevation.

[This admission of the Pharisees into the government, demands the especial notice of the reader: as it accounts, not only for their influence over the minds of the people, but also for their connection with the rulers, and their power as public governors; which appear so remarkably in the History of the Gospels; much beyond what might be expected from a sect merely religious.]

IV. ALEXANDER, son of Aristobulus and Alexandra, and grandson of Alexander Jannæus. After Pompey had taken Jerusalem from Aristobulus, that prince, with Alexander and Antigonus, his sons, and two of his daughters, were carried captives to Rome. Young Alexander found means to escape by the way, and returning to Judæa, raised an army of 10,000 foot, and 15,000 horse, with which he performed many gallant actions, and seized the fortresses of Alexandrium and Macherus, where he designed to fortify himself: but Gabinius, general of the Roman troops, allowed him no leisure for this; he drove him from the mountains, beat him near Jerusalem, killed 3000 of his men, and and made many prisoners. Gabinius also besieged the fortress of Alexandrium, wherein was Alexandra, the mother of Alexander: she came out of this castle, accommodated matters between her son Alexander and Gabinius, on condition that Alexander should surrender the castles of Alexandrium, Hircanium, and Machærus, which Gabinius demolished. A. M. 3947.

While Gabinius was employed in Egypt, and while Sisenna, who commanded in Judæa, during his absence, was unable to subdue the robbers, which ravaged all parts of the province; Alexander, taking advantage of this opportunity, excited fresh commotions, and formed an army considerable enough to terrify the country: wherever he met with Romans, he sacrificed them to his resentment: those who escaped him, fortified themselves on Mount Gerizim, where he besieged them: and here Gabinius found him at his return from Egypt. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 11.

Gabinius, apprehensive of engaging the great number of troops with Alexander, sent Antipater with offers of a general pardon, if they laid down their arms. This had the desired success, many forsook Alexander, and retired to their own houses: but with 30,000 still remaining, he resolved to give Gabinius battle: they met at the foot of Mount Tabor, where, after a very obstinate action, Alexander was overcome, with the loss of 10,000 men: the rest were dispersed.

Alexander began again, under the government of Crassus, to embroil affairs; but after the unhappy expedition against the Parthians, Cassius obliged him, under conditions, to continue quiet, while he marched to the Euphrates, to oppose the passage of the Parthians.

During the wars between Cæsar and Pompey, Alexander and Aristobulus, his father, took Cæsar's part, who sent Aristobulus to Judæa, with two legions, to support his interest there: but Pompey's party found means to poison him by the way. Nevertheless, Alexander, his son, levied troops to join those of Aristobulus: of this Pompey having intelligence, he sent directions to Scipio, who was then in Syria, to dispatch him: Alexander was accordingly apprehended, and carried to Antioch, where he was arraigned, and condemned to lose his head. A. M. 3935; ante A. D. 69. Joseph. Antiq. lib. x. cap. 13, & de Bello Jud. lib. i. cap. 6, 7.

V. ALEXANDER, son of Jason, was sent to Rome, to renew friendship and alliance between the Jews and Romans: he is named in the decree of the senate directed to the Jews, in the ninth year of Hircanus's pontificate. A. M. 3935; ante A. D. 69. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 16.

VI. ALEXANDER, son of Theodorus, was sent to Rome, by Hircanus, to renew his alliance with the senate. He is named in the decree of the senate, addressed to the magistrates of Ephesus, made in the consulship of Dolabella; which specified that the Jews shall not be forced into military service, because they cannot bear arms on the sabbath-day, nor have, at all times, such provisions in the armies as are authorised by their law. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 17.

VII. ALEXANDER, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne. His history can hardly be separated from that of Aristobulus, his brother, and companion in misfortune. These princes were the handsomest men of their time. After the tragical death of their mother, Mariamne, Herod sent them to Rome, to be educated near Augustus, in the exercises suitable to their quality. Augustus did them the honour to allow them an apartment in his palace, intending this mark of his consideration as a compliment to their father Herod. Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 13. Some time after, Herod visited Rome, to pay his court to Augustus, and to bring home his sons: Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 1. The people received these princes in Judæa with great joy, in consideration of their beauty, and their descent from the Asmonæan race, by their mother's side: but Salome, Herod's sister, who had been the principal cause of Mariamne's death, apprehending, that if ever they possessed authority, they would make her feel the effects of their resentment, she resolved, by her calumnies, to alienate the affections of their father from them.

This she managed with great address, and, at first, discovered no symptoms of ill-will. Herod married Alexander to Glaphyra, daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and Aristobulus to Berenice, daughter of Salome. Pheroras, the king's brother, and Salome, his sister, conspiring to destroy these young princes, watched all their discourses, and often contrived opportunities of their speaking their thoughts freely and forcibly, concerning the manner wherein Herod had put to death their mother, Mariamne. Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 6. Whatever they said was immediately reported to the king, in most odious and aggravated terms. Herod, who had no distrust of his brother and sister, and who well knew the disposition of his sons, easily credited what was told him of their saying, frankly, "that they would one day revenge their mother's death." To check, in some degree, their lofty spirits, he sent for his eldest son, Antipater, to court, whom he had by one Doris, who was brought up at a distance from Jerusalem; because the quality of his mother was much inferior to that of Mariamne. By thus thus making Aristobulus and Alexander sensible that it was in his power to prefer another of his sons above them, he thought to render them more circumspect; but the contrary happened; for the presence of Antipater did but exasperate the two princes.

Herod placed great confidence in Antipater; and never suspected any thing he said against his brothers, he so well disguised his thoughts; and even while forming against them accusations of the most heinous nature, he seemed always to excuse and pity them; at last, Herod was so far alienated from his two sons, that he carried them to Rome, to accuse them before Augustus, of designs against his life. A. M. 3993; ante A. D. 11. The young princes defended themselves so well, and affected the spectators so deeply with their tears, that Augustus reconciled them to their father, and sent them back to Judæa, apparently in perfect union with Antipater, who returned with them, and expressed great satisfaction to see them restored to Herod's good graces. When returned to Jerusalem, Herod convened the people in the temple, and publicly declared his intention, that his sons should reign after him; first Antipater, then Alexander, and then Aristobulus.

This declaration further exasperated the two brothers; they broke out into complaints and murmurs: which were immediately reported to Herod; and Pheroras, Salome, and Antipater, omitted nothing that might irritate him against his sons. Pheroras one day told Alexander, that Salome had informed him, that Herod was passionately in love with Glaphyra, his wife. Alexander, unable to contain himself, went directly to Herod, and declared what Pheroras had told him. Herod, enraged against Pheroras, reproached him bitterly with raising against him so heinous an accusation. Pheroras threw the whole blame on Salome, and Salome, who was present, defended herself vehemently, and protested loudly that it was all false.

Herod had three cunuchs, whom he very much trusted, and employed even in affairs of great importance. These were accused of being corrupted by the money of Alexander. The king commanded them to be racked; and the extremity of the torture forced them to confess, "that they had been often solicited by Alexander and Aristobulus, to abandon Herod, as now of no farther use, and who vainly endeavoured to disguise his age, by having his beard and hair painted: that they would do better to join them, who shortly must ascend the throne, whether their father would or not, and who would then be able to bestow on them the first offices of state: that all was disposed in their favour: and their friends, and their party, were ready for any undertaking, in asserting their indisputable right to the crown." This was enough to make Herod very uneasy, and suspicious of all persons about his court.

One, however, overcome by pain, confessed, during the relaxation of his torture, that the two brothers had conspired to lay snares for their father, while hunting; and were resolved, should he die, to go instantly to Rome, and beg the kingdom of Augustus. Letters were produced likewise from Alexander to Aristobulus, wherein he complained that Herod had given fields to Antipater, which produced an annual rent of two hundred talents.

Herod thought this intelligence sufficient reason for putting Alexander under arrest, and his principal friends to the torture. Many died under their torments, without confessing any thing; and the whole court was full of terror, consternation, and trouble. One who was racked, declared that Alexander had written to his friends, desiring they would dispose the emperor to send for him to Rome; and that he had informations of great consequence to offer him against his father, who had preferred the friendship of Mithridates, king of Parthia, to his alliance with the Romans: adding, that this young prince had at Ascalon, poison prepared for his father. Search was made after this poison, but in vain, for none could be found.

Alexander, however, not dejected at this storm; not only denied nothing which had been extorted from his friends by torture, but frankly confessed it; whether designing to confound the credulity and suspicions of his father, or to involve the whole court in perplexities, from which they should be unable to extricate themselves. He got papers presented to the king, wherein he represented that to torment so many persons on his account, was in vain; that in fact, he had laid ambuscades for him; that the principal courtiers were his accomplices: naming, in particular, Pheroras, and his most intimate friends: adding, that Salome came secretly to him by night, and, whether he would or no, would lie with him: and that the whole court wished for nothing more than the moment when they might be delivered from that pain in which they were continually kept by his cruelties.

In the mean time, Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, father-in-law of Alexander, informed of what passed at Herod's court, came to Jerusalem, proposing to effect, if possible, a reconciliation between Herod and his son-in-law. At first he pretended anger against Alexander, very much blamed his conduct, and commended that of the king, protesting he was ready to dissolve the marriage between Alexander and his daughter, Glaphyra, if he could discover that she had any share in the plots of her husband. Herod seeing Archelaus so warmly espouse his passion, began to relent, and re-assume the sentiments of a father towards his child; so that he first began to excuse his son; desiring Archelaus not to carry things to extremes, nor to think of breaking off the marriage of his daughter with Alexander.

Archelaus then began to throw the blame on others, and chiefly on Pheroras; and the king confessed, that indeed he was the cause of all this mischief. Thus Alexander, by the prudent management of Archelaus, was restored to the good graces of his father. Archelaus afterwards reconciled Pheroras with Herod.

But this calm did not long continue. One Eurycles, a Lacedæmonian, having insinuated himself into Herod's favour, gained also the confidence of Alexander; so that this young prince opened his heart freely to him, concerning the grounds of his discontent against his father. Eurycles repeated all to the king, who began again to conceive violent suspicions against his sons, to observe them narrowly, and to hearken to every thing said against them. Alexander having received among his guards two persons whom Herod had dismissed from his service, the king grew jealous of them, and ordered them to be tortured.

After this, the governor of fort Alexandrium was taken into custody; and accused of having promised Alexander and Aristobulus to receive them into his fortress, and to deliver up the royal treasury which was lodged there. The governor suffered the rack with great resolution, and maintained that nothing was more false than this accusation: but his son coming in, confessed whatever they desired, and even produced letters from Alexander, purporting: "As soon as we have executed what we have designed, we shall come to you; therefore be ready to receive us into your castle, according to your promise." Herod having seen these letters, no longer doubted but his sons had prepared an ambush for him. Alexander affirmed that he never wrote these letters; but that Diophantus had counterfeited his handwriting. Herod was then at Jericho, and having produced before an assembly of the people, those persons whom the violence of torment had forced to accuse his sons, the people stoned them; and had done the same by Alexander and Aristobulus, if the king had not sent Pheroras and Ptolemy, to prevent them.

Herod having confined the two princes in different prisons, commanded them to relate the whole conspiracy in writing. Alexander and Aristobulus wrote, that indeed they had desired to retire to the king of Cappadocia, but had by no means conspired against their father's life: that they should have been very glad if Tyrannus, one of their accusers, had been examined more strictly; whom the people of Jericho, pushed on by the emissaries of Antipater, had stoned. The king commanded Alexander to be brought, fettered as he was, to the princess Glaphyra, his wife, to know from her, whether she were not an accomplice with his son in the designs against him. The sight of her husband in so melancholy a condition, drew from her bitter lamentations, and a torrent of tears: she protested that she was guilty of nothing; but, that, indeed, to free herself from the uneasinesses she suffered, she had resolved to retire, with her husband, to the king of Cappadocia, her father, and from thence to Rome. Herod wrote to Archelaus, complaining, that he too was involved in the conspiracy with his sons, without giving him intelligence; at the same time, he wrote to Augustus, accusing his sons of plotting against his life, and of designing to flee out of his dominions.

Augustus answered, that if his sons were convicted of having attempted his life, he might punish them as parricides; but if they were guilty only of a desire to withdraw, he should treat them with gentleness: that he advised to call a council at Berytus, composed of his friends, and of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, wherein to deliberate, how he should proceed. Herod, in compliance with this advice, convened as many of his friends as he thought proper, at Berytus; but would not invite Archelaus, nor Alexander and Aristobulus; he left them at Platane, a village of the Sidonians, not far from Berytus, that they might be at hand, if it were necessary for them to appear. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 17.

Herod entered the assembly, which consisted of a hundred and fifty persons, and began to accuse his sons, with great vehemence and passion; he said, "that not only Augustus had made him master of his sons' destiny, but, that the very laws of the Jews declared, that if a son were accused by his parents, and they put their hands upon his head, all present should stone him, and put him to death," (Deut. xxi. 18, 19, 20.) yet he was willing to have the opinion of this council, and expected his friends would join him, in giving an example of just severity on unnatural children."

with death. His three sons, who were present, were of the same opinion : but Volumnius pronounced, that they deserved death ; and the majority gave the same advice ; so that their death was resolved on by a plurality of voices. Herod, therefore, carried them to Tyre ; and Nicholas, of Damascus, being just arrived there from Rome, the king asked what his friends thought of his sons ? Nicholas answered, that general opinion was for their imprisonment, till he had at leisure taken his resolution. Herod was long thoughtful : and at last determined to carry them to Cæsarea.

The whole city was in great expectation of what course Herod would take in this juncture. Every one pitied the two princes ; but no one dared to speak plainly. One of Herod's old soldiers, called Tyro, who had a son of the same age with Alexander, having ventured on some pretty sharp remonstrances to the king, telling him that the officers, the soldiers, and the people compassionated the young princes ; the king, losing patience, commanded the soldier and his son to be seized, and all whom he had named. Having put the old soldier and his son to the torture, the old man declared, that he had formed a resolution to kill the king, and to expose himself, for the love of Alexander, to any sort of punishment. The king, after this, thought of nothing more than of accomplishing his intention of dispatching his sons. He sent them to Sebaste, (otherwise Samaria), and ordered them there to be strangled. Their bodies were carried to the castle of Alexandrium, where their ancestors, by the mother's side, had generally been buried. Thus died Alexander and Aristobulus, sons of Herod the Great and Mariamne, A. M. 3999, one year before the birth of J. C. and four before the usual computation of A. D.

[The reader is desired to pay particular attention to this history of the behaviour of Herod to his two sons ; because, it has a strong connection with the gospel histories of the massacre of the infants—for the king who could slay his own sons, would not scruple to slay those of others ; and it suggests clear reasons for the alarm of the whole city, and of the priests, from whom Herod enquired, where the Messiah should be born ? also, for the flight of Joseph and Mary into Egypt, and for their fear of returning again into Judea, under the power of his successor, who, as they supposed, might very probably inherit this king's cruel and tyrannical disposition, &c. &c.]

Josephus relates, that Glaphyra, Alexander's wife, having been sent back by Herod, to her father, Archelaus, she married, for her second husband, Juba, king of Mauritania ; and that afterwards she married Archelaus (a son of Herod, by another wife, consequently) brother to Alexander, her first husband. One night, her first husband, Alexander, appeared to Glaphyra, and reproached her with her little love for him ; since, not content with a second marriage, she had contracted a third, with his brother, Archelaus. "For this reason," added he, "I am determined to show you, that my affection is more constant than your's ; and, as a proof that I have not forgotten you, within five days I will take you once more to myself ; and deliver you from the infamy in which you now live." Accordingly, Glaphyra died at the end of five days. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 15.

VIII. ALEXANDER, a Jewish impostor, of the city of Sidon, who so nearly resembled in person Alexander, son of Herod and Mariamne, [No. VII.] that all who had been acquainted with him, were persuaded that this was really Alexander himself. Antiq. lib. xvii. 14. He gave out, that his brother, Aristobulus, and he, had been delivered from death by the kindness of a friend, who had substituted others at the time when they were to have been executed. He came into the isle of Crete, where all the Jews owned him as a son of Herod ; and furnished him with money to provide an equipage, and make a journey to Rome. He landed at Puzzuolo, where the Jews received him with honour ; Herod's friends, and they who had known Alexander most intimately, were deceived by his great resemblance to him, so that the Jews of Rome crowded to meet him ; and he entered the city with a train that might become a king.

Augustus was the only person who was not deluded ; the air of this man, and his hands, hardened by labour, discovered to him, that he was an impostor : he first asked him, "what was become of his brother, Aristobulus ; and why he did not come to Rome, to share in his fortune ?" He answered, that he was in the isle of Cyprus ; left behind, because they would not both expose themselves to the dangers of the sea ; in order that if any misfortune should befall one of them, the other might be preserved. Augustus took this young man aside, and putting on a serious air, said to him, "If you will declare the truth to me, I promise to dismiss you, without taking away your life. Tell me, then, who you are, and who has engaged you to play the counterfeit in this manner ; for you are not of an age to form an intrigue of this nature of yourself." The young man, unable to persist in his falsehood before the emperor, confessed the whole cheat to him ; and Augustus, not to violate the promise he had made, sent him to the gallies, because he was a corpulent and robust fellow ; and put to death the person who had persuaded him to act this part. This happened some time after the death of Herod. A. M. 4001 ; of J. C. 1 ; and three years before the vulgar era, or A. D. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 14.

IX. ALEXANDER, son of Phasaël and Salampso, Herod's sister. Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 7.

X. ALEXANDER, son of Alexander, the son of Herod, and Glaphyra, daughter to the king of Cappadocia. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 17.

XI. ALEXANDER, son of Tigranes, and grandson of Alexander, who was put to death by Herod. He married Jotape, the daughter of Antiochus, king of Comagena. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 7.

XII. ALEXANDER, a Jew, of Cyrene, was accused by ruffians, before Catullus, governor of that province, and by him put to death, about A. D. 73. Joseph. de Bello, lib. vii. cap. 38.

XIII. ALEXANDER, son of Simon, the Cyrenian, and brother of Rufus, who assisted our Saviour in carrying one part of his cross, as he was going to mount Calvary, Mark xv. 21.

XIV. ALEXANDER LYSIMACHUS, Alabarch of Alexandria, brother to Philo, the Jew. Some believe, that this was the Alexander who was in company with the priests, when the apostles were carried before the senate, to give an account of their doctrine, Acts iv. 6. A. D. 34. This Alexander was the wealthiest Jew of his time. He made rich presents to the temple. He was the father of Tiberius Alexander, who renounced the religion of the Jews, and became a Pagan. Alexander Lysimachus had the management of the empress Antonia's affairs. Caligula put him in prison ; and he was not liberated till the reign of Claudius, Caligula's successor. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xix. 4. xx. 3.

XV. ALEXANDER, a Jew of Ephesus, who addressed the rabble that clamoured against St. Paul, and endeavoured to appease them : but when he appeared in the assembly, and was known to be a Jew, the Ephesians cried out more vehemently, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians !" It is not known whether this Alexander were for or against St. Paul ; whether he were then a Jew, or a convert to Christianity. Acts xix. 33. A. D. 57.

XVI. ALEXANDER, an artificer in copper, mentioned by St. Paul, 1 Tim. i. 19, 20. The apostle excommunicated him and Hymenæus, because they had blasphemed against the truth. [I rather think he was not excommunicated, but taught by suffering. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CLII. No. 6, "OF SATAN."]

I. ALEXANDRA, otherwise SALOME ; for Salome, in Hebrew, signifies much the same as Alexandra in Greek. N. B. In the later times of the Hebrew government, i. e. after the Greek conquests, and predominance in Syria, &c. almost all Jews had two names ; one Greek, the other Hebrew, or Syriac. (vide NAMES) [SHELOMEH שלמה, signifies pacifica, felix : Αλεξανδρος, may signify, one who assists men, or who protects men against the violence of others.]

Alexandra was first wife to Aristobulus, (sur-named Philellen, or "lover of the Greeks,") by whom she had no children. She afterwards married Alexander Jannæus, brother to Aristobulus, her first husband (vide ALEXANDER JANNÆUS). She lived twenty-seven years with him ; and when she saw him ready to expire before the castle of Ragaba, she represented to him the sad condition in which she and her children would be left, because of the opposition of the Jews.

Alexander advised her to conceal his death from the soldiers, till Ragaba was taken ; and that when she was returned to Jerusalem, she should conciliate the principal Pharisees, and admit them to a share of the government.

Alexandra followed this advice ; and the Pharisees, won by these marks of respect, persuaded the people ; and never was any prince buried more pompously than king Alexander Jannæus. This prince left two sons, Hircanus and Aristobulus ; he gave the regency to the queen, Alexandra, who governed peaceably and happily ; but, had no more, properly, than the title of queen, the Pharisees governing in her name ; notwithstanding, some affairs of consequence she undertook without their direction ; and she kept a good number of soldiers in her pay. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 24.

Under her government, the country enjoyed peace : no enemy from abroad disturbed its tranquillity. The Pharisees were the only persons who caused any disturbance, by insisting that the queen should revenge the death of 800 men, who had been crucified by king Alexander Jannæus, and should deliver up those who had promoted that act of inhumanity : they also, first ordered one Diogenes to be dispatched, and after him another ; so that none of Alexander's friends could be secure of their lives. At last, the principal persons about the court, and they who had served in the late king's armies, came to the palace, with Aristobulus, her son, at their head, and showing sufficiently by their air, that what had passed had not been agreeable to them, they demanded of the queen, that if no consideration could be obtained for their former services, she would, at least, permit them to retire, and to secure their lives from the Pharisees. Aristobulus spoke to his mother with great vehemence. The queen not knowing what better to adopt, distributed these old officers into the several fortresses of the country; but put none of them into the castles of Hircanium, Alexandrium, and Machærus, whither she had removed every thing valuable.

Some time after, Alexandra sent her son, Aristobulus, toward Damascus, with troops, against Ptolemy Mennæus, who very much incommoded that city: but Aristobulus returned, without doing any thing memorable. After this, Tigranes coming to besiege Ptolemais, Alexandra sent ambassadors to him, with great presents, desiring him not to undertake any thing against her dominions. Tigranes received the ambassadors favourably, promised to regard the queen's request, and was soon after obliged to return into Armenia, to oppose Lucullus, who was ravaging that country.

At last, queen Alexandra falling dangerously ill, Aristobulus, her son, thought it convenient to execute a design he had long formed. He went by night, attended only by one servant, and visited all the castles where his father's friends commanded, in order to make himself master of them, and to prevent the Pharisees from seizing the government. The next day, when it was light, and it was known that Aristobulus was absent, the queen suspected that he was gone upon some enterprize, and was confirmed in her suspicion, when couriers came from various parts to inform her that the fortresses had mostly surrendered, one after another, to Aristobulus.

This news threw her into great consternation; orders were given for seizing the wife and children of Aristobulus, whom he had left at Jerusalem, and they were kept in the fortress adjoining the temple. In the mean time Aristobulus got possession of twenty-two places of strength, and was soon at the head of a great number of troops, which came in voluntarily to serve him. Hircanus, his brother, and the principal persons of the nation, desired the queen to put things into some order; but her indisposition no longer permitted her to act. She died soon after, aged seventy-three, having been nine years regent, A. M. 3935; ante A. D. 69.

II. ALEXANDRA, daughter of Aristobulus, and wife of Philippion, son of Ptolemy Mennæus, prince of Chalcis, a province situated between Libanus and Antilibanus. Ptolemy himself falling in love with Alexandra, killed Philippion, and married his widow, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 15.

III. ALEXANDRA, daughter of the high-priest, Hircanus, and wife to Alexander, son of Aristobulus (which Aristobulus was brother to the high-priest, Hircanus, and son of Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews.) This Alexandra was mother of Mariamne, wife of Herod the Great, and of Aristobulus, who was invested with the high-priesthood, but enjoyed it one year only, being drowned in a bath at Jericho, by procuration of Herod. Joseph. Antiq. xv. 3.

Herod having put to death the high-priest, Hircanus, sent for Annanel, a priest, from Babylon, on whom he conferred the high-priesthood. Alexandra was so provoked at it, that she wrote to Cleopatra of Egypt, wife, or mistress, of Antony, intreating her to solicit the pontificate from Antony, for her son, Aristobulus, brother to Mariamne, and grandson to Hircanus. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 2. Antony having heard much of Mariamne's beauty, and of Aristobulus, desired Herod, by letter, to send Aristobulus to him: Herod excused himself, and, over-powered by the solicitations of his wife, Mariamne, gave the high-priesthood to Aristobulus, his brother-in-law, but got rid of him very soon: in the mean while, he complained mightily of Alexandra, and of her addresses to Antony: he commanded her to continue in the palace, and not to intermeddle in affairs: the king had her narrowly observed, so that she could neither do nor say any thing, but what was immediately reported to him.

Alexandra, enraged to see herself thus reduced to captivity, wrote to Cleopatra, and complained of it. Cleopatra advised her, by all means, to withdraw, with her son, Aristobulus, into Egypt; where she would receive them. Alexandra, accordingly, provided two biers, or coffins, one for herself, the other for her son: these coffins were to be carried on board a vessel, which waited for them at sea: but one of Alexandra's slaves discovered this to Herod, who gave directions for seizing her and her son, at the instant when they were conveying away: however, he did not treat her ill, apprehending the resentment of Cleopatra, and that she might do him some ill office with Mark Antony.

After Herod had procured the death of Aristobulus, Alexandra's son, this princess pretended to believe that it was purely accidental; but she waited for an opportunity of revenge. She related to Cleopatra what had passed, and the daily danger of her life: that queen prevailed with Antony to order Herod to appear before him, and clear himself of the crime. Herod went, but so wrought on Antony by his presents, that he declared, Herod being king of the Jews, was accountable to no man for his actions. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 4.

In the mean time, a report spread, that Antony had put Herod to death; whereupon, Alexandra solicited Joseph, Herod's uncle, who governed in his absence, that she and Mariamne Mariamne might be carried to the Roman legions, for their personal security, in case of disturbance: but this was not executed, because letters from Herod contradicted the rumour. When that prince returned to Jerusalem, being informed by his sister, Salome, of all that had passed, he ordered Alexandra to be closely confined, and put in fetters.

Herod having put to death his wife Mariamne, her mother, Alexandra, fearing the same fate, pretended to condemn her daughter's conduct, and when she was led to execution, loaded her with abuse, and would have assaulted her, which the spectators regarded as folly and base-ness, beneath contempt. The grief of Herod, after the death of Mariamne, caused an indisposition, which reduced him very low; and Alexandra, thinking him in extremity, solicited the governors of the two forts in Jerusalem, to put them into her hands, and to secure them for Herod's children by Mariamne, to prevent others, if the king should die, from getting possession of them: the governors, who did not love Alexandra, gave immediate intelligence to Herod: and he, without delay, gave orders for dispatching her, which were instantly executed. ALEXANDRIA, a celebrated city in Egypt, built by Alexander the Great, A. M. 3673; ante A. D. 331, situated between the Mediterranean and the lake Moeris. Arrian, lib. iii. Strabo, lib. xvii. Pausan. Eliacis. A village called Rachotis, stood near this port. Alexandria is mentioned in the Latin version of books of the Old Testament, which were written before Alexander: but this name is not in the original Hebrew.

The Arabians say, that Alexandria was called Caisoun, before Alexander the Great rebuilt it. D'Herbelot. Bibl. Orient. p. 320. Dinocrates the same architect who rebuilt the temple of Diana, at Ephesus, directed the construction of this new city; but, that it might be carried on with more diligence, Alexander appointed Cleomenes, one of his captains, who was of Naucratis, in Egypt, to act as superintendent. Justin calls him founder of Alexandria, as having contributed greatly to the improvement of it.

Aridæus, Alexander's brother, was charged with the care of carrying the corpse of that prince from Babylon, where he died, to Alexandria. He employed two years in preparations for the funeral pomp, which is described by Diodorus Siculus. There had been a prophecy current, that the place where Alexander should be buried, would rise to great prosperity: the governors, therefore, of several towns and provinces, disputed the honour and advantage of possessing his body. It was proposed to convey it to Aigui, in Macedonia, where, generally, the Macedonian kings were buried; but Egypt prevailed. His body was deposited first at Memphis, and afterwards at Alexandria: it is said to have been enclosed in a coffin of gold, and to have been embalmed in honey. Arrian. Quint. Curt. &c. Justin. lib. xiii. cap. 4. Said Sil. Batrik.

Alexandria belonged to the Greeks, then to the Romans, then to the Greeks again, till it was taken by the Mahometan Arabians, while Omar III. was caliph. The happy situation of this city, attracted the commerce of the east and west, and soon made it one of the most flourishing cities in the world. When the Arabians took it, there were in it four thousand palaces, four thousand bagnios, forty thousand Jews paying tribute, four hundred squares, and twelve thousand persons who sold herbs and fruits. This city, formerly so rich and powerful, has now little remarkable, beside its ruins. The Egyptians, or Copts, call it generally Rachot, this being, as we have observed, the name of the old village, on the site of which it was built. Bibl. Orient. p. 320. Thevenot, P. 1. lib. ii. cap. 1, 2. Vide NO-AMMON and THEBES.

The Christians, at this day, reverence the churches of Alexandria, dedicated to St. Mark and St. Catherine; that of St. Mark, is celebrated for the tomb of that evangelist, whose body was carried away by the Venetians (vide MARK). A picture in it, say the Copts, who are possessors of this church, was painted by St. Luke: it represents the archangel Michael, at little more than half length, with a sword in his hand.

There are some remains of Cleopatra's magnificent palace; and, without the city, is a pillar, very much admired, the shaft whereof is six fathoms high, all of one piece, of admirable granite. Granite is a very hard stone, composed as it were, of grains, which some pretend, the ancients had the secret of dissolving. It is the largest column any where to be seen; and is usually called Pompey's pillar.

After the death of Alexander the Great, Ptolemy, surnamed Soter, who had been captain of his guards, conveyed his remains to Alexandria, and made this city the capital of his kingdom. The Ptolemys, his successors, reigned there 293 years. The Jews had great intercourse with these kings of Egypt; for a list of whom, vide EGYPT.

[The commerce of Alexandria was very great, especially in corn (for Egypt was considered as the granary of Rome), so that, the centurion centurion might readily "find a ship of Alexandria—corn laden—sailing into Italy." Acts xxvii. 6. Apollon was born at Alexandria, Acts xviii. 24.

The Alexandrian school of the Jews, and afterwards of the Christians, was long in the highest esteem: and, we have reason to think, that, the Christian school at Alexandria, besides producing many eloquent preachers, paid great attention to copying the books of the holy Scriptures: of which we have an instance in that very ancient MS. now extant in the British Museum, known by the name of the Alexandrian MS. because written by Thecla, a noble virgin of that city.]

Alexandria received the gospel, by the ministry of St. Mark, about A. D. 59, or 60. He suffered martyrdom there toward the year 68, and was succeeded by Anian, whom he had converted in his first voyage to that city. The Jews were very numerous here; they had several fine synagogues, and great privileges. See ALABARCH.

[The Alexandrian Jews had likewise a synagogue at Jerusalem, where was an academy for the instruction of their youth in the Hebrew language, and the law. The History of the Acts informs us, that the Jews of this synagogue were among the warmest opposers of Stephen. Acts vii. 9.

The Jews relate many marvels concerning this city. That their cathedral here, had a double cloistered court walk: that the number of Jews in this city, was sometimes double the number that came up out of Egypt: that their worship was magnificent: that each trade sat by itself, so that a stranger might address himself to those of his own occupation, and receive assistance from them, &c.

The city of Alexandria has been rendered famous by modern events; and no Briton can forget the valour of his countrymen, by whom the French, who under Buonaparte had established themselves in Egypt, were defeated and expelled. The battle of March 21, 1801, was severe and bloody; the English commander in chief, General Abercrombie, was killed; as were no less than five French Generals, and four thousand of their troops. Alexandria surrendered to the British arms, under the command of Lord Hutchinson, Sept. 2, 1801, and with it the whole remaining French force.

The trophies taken on that occasion now form part of the curiosities in the British Museum; and among them is an immense sarcophagus, which was long an object of veneration at Alexandria; and which has been supposed to be the tomb of Alexander the Great. Could that character be determinately attached to it, it would certainly be, not only extremely curious—which it is; but absolutely invaluable.]

ALEXANDRIUM, a castle built by Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews, on a mountain, near Corea. We do not know distinctly, where Corea was, but it was the principal city of Judæa, on the side of Samaria, in the direction of Jericho, towards the frontiers of Ephraim and Benjamin. Gabinius demolished this castle, but Herod rebuilt it: the princes of Alexander Jannæus's family were mostly buried here. Hither, Herod ordered the bodies of his sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, to be carried, who had been put to death at Sebaste (otherwise Samaria.) Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 24; xvi. cap. 2; xiv. cap. 6. 10.—de Bello, lib. v. cap. 4. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 6. 10. 27. xvi. ult.

ALEXAS, third husband of Salome, sister to Herod the Great. To Alexas and Salome Herod sent orders for executing, as soon as he expired, those Jews whom he had confined in the Hippodrome, at Jericho; that all Judæa, being afflicted at the death of so many persons of quality, might appear, at least, to mourn for their king: but Alexas, instead of obeying such cruel orders, set them all at liberty, directly as the king's eyes were closed; whereby he procured the esteem and friendship of the Jews. A. M. 4000; ante A. D. 5. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 10.

ALLAN, הלל, 'אלסאן: leaves; from הלל halah, or oleh: otherwise, exalted; from הלל helion, or olion: eldest son of Shobal, son of Seir, 1 Chron. i. 40.

ALLEGORY, is a figurative discourse, which employs terms appropriate to one thing, by which to signify another: it is a metaphor prolonged and pursued: for example; when the prophets represent the Jews under the allegory of a vine, planted, cultivated, watered, by the hand of God, but which, instead of producing good fruit, brings forth sour grapes; and so of others.

[The same, when the apostle compares the two covenants of Sinai and the gospel; or Jerusalem that "now is;" and the Heavenly Jerusalem; "which things," says he, "may be allegorized." As this was common among the Jews, in writing to Jews, he adopts their custom; in which having been deeply learned, he could, no doubt, have greatly enlarged: but then, where had been the power of the cross of Christ; the genuine unsophisticated doctrines of the gospel?]

Allegories are frequent in Scripture, as well as metaphors, parables, similitudes, and comparisons. The Jews, says St. Jeron. and, in general, the people of Syria and Palestine, were fond of this sort of figurative discourse, and and used it in almost every thing they said; so is all the East. One principal business of a commentator is, to distinguish between the allegorical and literal meaning of passages, and to reduce the allegorical to the literal sense. The ancient Jews, as the Therapeutæ, the Book of Wisdom, Josephus, and Philo (and, in imitation of them, many of the Fathers) turned even the historical passages of Scripture into allegories; places where the literal sense is most clear. These allegorical explanations may edify, perhaps, but they are good for little: they cannot justly be produced as proofs of any thing; unless where Christ, or his apostles, have so applied them. Vide SENSE OF SCRIPTURE. Hieronym. in Matth. xviii. Philo de Vita contemplativa, p. 901. Wisd. xviii. 24, & alibi sæpius. Joseph. Præmio, in lib. Antiq. ad finem. Photius, Cod. 105.

The ancient philosophers and poets also used to deliver doctrines, and to explain things allegorically: Pythagoras instructed his disciples in this symbolical manner, believing it to be the most proper method of explaining religious doctrines, and a help to memory. Euclid, of Megara, did, indeed, forbid the use of allegories and emblems, as fit only to render plain things obscure: and Socrates taught in a manner the most natural and simple, excepting those ironies which he sometimes interspersed in his discourses; but the philosophers, for the most part, were excessively fond of allegories, and mystical theology; and the Christian writers of the early ages, in this particular, too much resembled them.

ALLELUIA, or HALLELU-JAH, הלל-יהוה: praise the Lord; or, praise to the Lord: compounded of הלל hallelu, praise ye, and יהוה jah, the Lord.

ALLELUIA. This word occurs at the beginning, or at the end, of many Psalms. Vide St. Jerom, or the Author printed under his name, on Psal. cv. Alleluia was sung on solemn days of rejoicing; "And all her streets (i. e. of Jerusalem) shall sing alleluia," says Tobit, speaking of the rebuilding of Jerusalem. (Tob. xiii. 18). St. John, in the Revelations, says (chap. xix. 1, 3, 4, 6) "I heard a great voice of much people in heaven, who cried, alleluia; and the four living creatures fell down, and worshipped God; saying, alleluia."

This expression of joy and praise was transferred from the synagogue to the church. At the funeral of Fabiola, "several psalms were sung with loud alleluias," says Jerom, in Obit. Fabiolæ; and, in Epitaphio Paulæ, "the monks of Palestine, were awakened at their midnight watchings, with the singing of alleluias." It is still occasionally used in devotional psalmody.

[An expression in sound very similar to this, seems to have been used by many nations, who can hardly be supposed to have borrowed it from the Jews. Is it impossible, that this is one of the most ancient expressions of devotion? From the Greeks using εἰλεν η, as a solemn beginning and ending of their hymns to Apollo, it should seem, that they knew it: it is said also, to have been heard among the Indians in America: and Alla, alla—as the name of God, is used in great part of the East: also in composition. What might be the primitive stock which has furnished such spreading branches?]

ALLON, ὄλον, Ὀηλών: an oak; from ὄλον alla: otherwise, strong; from ὄλον el, or ail;—son of Jedaiah, of Simeon, 1 Chron. iv. 37.

II. A city of Napthali, Josh. xix. 33.

ALLOPIYLI, Ἀλλόφυλοι: a Greek term, which signifies, properly, strangers; but the Hebrew term to which it corresponds, is generally taken, in the Old Testament, to signify the Philistines.

ALLUSH, or Ollush, ὄλυσ, Ἀλυσ: paste, or dough; from ὄλυσ lush, to knead.

ALLUSH, or Abush. The Israelites being in the wilderness of Shur, departed from Dophkah to Allush, and from thence to Rephidim, Num. xxxiii. 13. In Judith (chap. i. 9, Gr.) Chellus, or Chalus, and Kades, are set down as pretty near each other. Eusebius and Jerom, fix Allush, in Idumæa, about Gabala, i. e. about Petra, the capital of Arabia Petrea; for, according to them, the Gabaleue is near Petra. Euseb. & Hieron. in Onomastico, voce Idumæa, & in Masaris, & in Allud vel Allus.

Allush is called likewise Eluza, or Chaluza: in the Accounts of the Empire, it is situated in the third Palestine; and is placed by Ptolemy, among the cities of Idumæa. The Jerusalem Targum on Genes's xxv. 18, and on Exodus, xvi. 22, translates the desert of Seir, by Allush.

[Perhaps this word may be derived from lesh, or leshen, a tongue; in which case, it would indicate a tongue of land, or a cape, as it imports a tongue of sea, or a bay, Josh. xv. 2. 5. Whence, probably, it implies, that the Israelites traversed the Arabian coast of the Red Sea, to its most southernmost cape, or point, now Ras Mahommed; before they turned towards Mount Sinai. In the Talmud, it denotes a crowd of men, gathered from different tribes, but bound together by common pact, or agreement.]

ALMAH, or Otmeh, ὀλמח. This Hebrew word signifies properly a virgin; the authors of the books of the Maccabees, and Ecclesiasticus, speaking of the young unmarried women, give them the epithets, kept in—secluded—hidden, to distinguish them from married women, who occasionally appear in public. St. Jerom preserves preserves a distinction between bethula, a young woman, and almah, a virgin, in that, the latter is one who never has been seen by men. This is its proper signification, in the Punic, or Phœnician language, which, as is well known, is the same as the Hebrew. In this sense, it occurs in the famous passage of Isaiah, vii. 14: "Behold, a virgin (almah) shall conceive, and bear a son." The Hebrew has no term that more properly signifies a virgin, than almah; but it must be confessed, without lessening, however, the certainty or application of Isaiah's prophecy, that sometimes, by mistake, for instance, a young woman, whether truly a virgin or not, is called almah. In like manner, in Latin, the name of virgo is sometimes given to a young woman, who has not retained, strictly speaking, her virginity. Jerom, in his Comment on Isaiah, vii. 14, remarks, that the prophet, declined using the word bethula, which signifies a young woman, or young person, but employed the term almah, which denotes a virgin, never seen by man. Ergo Alma non solum puella, sed cum Ἐκράσι virgo abscondita & secreta qua nunquam virorum patuerit aspectibus. This is the proper import of the word almah; which is derived from a root that signifies—to conceal. It is very well known, that young women, in the East, do not appear in public, but are shut up in their houses, and their mothers' apartments, like nuns. Vide Philon. lib. contra Flac. & de special. leg. The Chaldee Paraphrast, and the Septuagint, translate almah—virgin, ἡ παρθένος; Akiba, the famous Rabbin, a great enemy to Christ and Christians, who lived in the second century, understands it thus: the apostles and evangelists, and the Jews of our Saviour's time, explained it thus, and expected a Messiah born of a virgin; and, farther, Mahomet and his followers, acknowledge the virginity of the mother of our Lord. [Rab. Akiba, in Genar.]

ADDITION, No. I.

Such are the remarks of Dom CALMET; which I think it not improper to enforce, by recalling the attention of the reader to the derivation of the word almah;—as hidden, secret, concealed: and the rather, because some places in which it occurs, have been greatly misapprehended. Sometimes, to almah is added, "which had not known man." In Joel i. 8. in our translation, "Lament like a virgin for her husband;"—it is not almah in the original.—Almah occurs seven times in S.S.; in five, it is agreed, by Jews as well as Christians, that it imports a true virgin: the sixth (Prov. xxx. 19) we mean to consider; for if this be properly understood, then the Jewish objections against the seventh (Isaiah, vii. 14) fall to the ground.

PART III. Edit. IV.

There be three things too wonderful for me,
Yea, four, which I comprehend not:

- 1, The way (or trace) of an eagle in the air;
- 2, The way (or trace) of a serpent on a rock
- 3, The way (or trace) of a ship out at sea;
- 4, The way (or trace) of a man with a virgin.

LIKE to all which, is
5, The behaviour of an adulterous woman,
Who wipeth her mouth, and saith,
"I have done no wickedness."

Let us analyse the import of these similes, and see how they apply to the dissolute character consequent on prostitution:

1, An eagle in the air, leaves no trace of its passage; the air is too thin to retain any indication of it:

2, A serpent on a rock, glides along, leaving no impression on its surface; the rock is too hard to suffer any such impression:

3, A ship at sea, leaves no furrow on the waves; the waves are too yielding to maintain the track:

Like to these insensibles, these non-impressibles, an adulteress is so abandoned by habit, that instead of suffering remorse, she commits a great crime, which leaves no trace of its guilt on her conscience; she considers it as a mere nothing, or rather as innocent: no harm whatever.

These comparisons evidently agree with the subjects compared to them; in what, then, consists, so as to be illustrated by these comparisons, the non-impression of a young man with a maid?—This may be either (1) personal, or (2) mental.

We have no need to recur to the immediate personal connection of the sexes; nor to any thing relating to the strict tokens of virginity; which, having lost (while undetected) a young woman might still be considered as almah—for this is not true, strictly taken;—though such is the sense adopted by eminent commentators.

But, in referring this to mental non-impression, we intend to propose an easier, yet stricter sense, in alluding to a fact, of which Solomon could not but have seen many instances, which might well excite his wonder. Perhaps the import of the simile is this:—Where young women are kept closely shut up, the sexes have little or no opportunity of intercourse: there are no means, whereby a young man may engage the affections of a young woman, his designed consort; but she can only acquiesce in the choice made for her by her parents or friends: she is given by them; she does not give herself;—and I have often reflected, with surprise, when I considered, with what little regret, the spouse proposed to a virgin, has been abandoned by her, and by those who had the disposal of her, in favour of another party: she (almah) has transferred, as it were, (or, for the sake of what is called a better bargain, has been transferred,) her connection, connection, her person, with so little difficulty, to successive suitors, that, however she might seem to have encouraged the first, and even to have adopted him as her husband elect, he appears,

1, To have left no more track in her mind, than an eagle leaves in the air;

2, To have made no more impression on her heart, than a serpent makes on the obdurate rock;

3, To have left no more effect on her affections, than a ship leaves on the buoyant waves;

4, To have raised no more compunction in her mind, than arises in that of the adulteress, or prostitute, who for lucre yields herself to several men.

This comparison, then, may refer, not to the person, but to the mind (the affections) of almah: since not only, if thus taken, are the other comparisons, at least equally proper; but the allusion to the adulteress is infinitely more striking and appropriate. And if this interpretation be admitted, which according to the general nature of the Proverbs, is drawn from actual observation, from the ordinary customs of the East, in the time of Solomon, as well as in the present day; then almah, here also, keeps its true and proper import; and the argument of the Jews, against its being so taken in Isaiah, is obviated; since there will then be no passage, in which almah can be construed to mean other than a pure virgin.

For instances of such easy alienation, I shall merely hint at Samson's wife, who was given to one of his bridemen; and to David's, who was given to Adriel: but many others might be noticed: a hundred such occur in Josephus, and the reader cannot fail of remarking them in many articles of this work.

I believe, if Solomon were living now, he would no less wonder at the coquetry, and jilting, which he might find, where young women are much more free to choose their partners for life, than they are in the East: the idea, according to which we have interpreted this verse, is the subject of familiar remark, and occurs but too frequently; though we must hope not so frequently as those incidents to which such versatility is compared.

ADDITION, NO. II.

As the passage Isaiah vii. 14, is of great moment to the Christian dispensation, it seems not improper, to endeavour to set it in its true light.

It deserves notice, (1) That this prophecy is given by God himself; freely, and voluntarily, as chosen by him: we may therefore be certain, there is somewhat included in it, which, to understand, will reward, as well as justify, enquiry.

(2) That the prophet Isaiah, had already a young child (aged under two years,) in his arms; whom he took, by divine direction, and who was, undoubtedly, to subserve some purpose in this transaction, (3) That a considerable part of this prophecy was fulfilled within the space of two, or less than three years, from the time when it was given. (4) That this prophecy was not given to Ahaz solely; but to the House of David: so that, however it might assure that king, for the time being, it concerned other branches of David's house; and nothing, that I perceive, hinders them from appropriating it to themselves for comfort and support, &c. in any time or place.

Now, the nature of, and the conduct usual in, significative prophecies, naturally divides them into two parts: (1) the sign given; (2) the event predicted. So, in the case of Hezekiah; the going back of the shadow, was the sign given; the lengthening of his life, was the event predicted: So Samuel gave several signs to Saul; in which, the receiving of bread, the meeting of the prophets, were signs given, to confirm his belief, in the certainty of the event, foretold to him—which was, his possession of the kingdom.

In like manner, the son of Isaiah, was a sign to Ahaz; "Before a child, such as this, can distinguish between good and evil, in the article of his diet, liking one thing, and disliking another (which is one of the most early habits of children) the land of Israel shall be liberated from its destroyers." Such is the first sign, or first part of the general sign; and its application to Ahaz, seems to be (1) to assure him of speedy deliverance; (2) that the house of David should not fail; (3) that there should again be prosperous times, in which butter and honey should be plentiful; (4) it insinuates a delicate rebuke to Ahaz:—why worship false gods, when such glorious things are expected from your own family, and your own descendants? of which, this promise reminds him.

There seems also to be a second sign, or a second part of this sign, given by the prophet, viz. the actual begetting of a child: for the prophet takes two witnesses, to record—What? That, at this time, the prophecy was given—that, at this time, it was written and dated—and that he, at this time, having immediate access to the prophetess, she conceived. Before the child thus conceived, could pronounce the words usually first spoken by children, (dadu, mama) the king of Assyria should plunder Damascus.

Now, if the whole of this transaction had no reference beyond Ahaz—supposing what was spoken of Shearjashub, the prophet's son, in his arms, might be some comfort to him, of what use use could be the child to be begotten, or any thing said, or done, respecting him?—why so much preparation for what might follow—what, if it did follow, was, in the ordinary course of nature, at some distance from the birth; and at a still greater distance from the period in which the child should be capable of speech?—of what (instant) importance was all this to a king, about to be besieged in his capital; and seeking to provide water for the city, which expected an attack; which city was the only remains of his kingdom, not overwhelmed by the enemy? But this birth of a child, might very well serve as a second sign, or a second part to that sign already given to lighten his immediate distress; as it looked somewhat more distant, though not much, and as it carried his expectations somewhat farther, though not very far: while at the same time, it was in its very nature, a confirmation of the prophecy respecting Emmanuel; e. gr.—If the prophetess continued barren—then the sign must fail; and such a thing might be:—If the interval between this prophecy and the birth of a child by this prophetess, was very long, as several years, or even as two years; it would affect the prophecy accordingly. Had the issue been a daughter instead of a son, then the prophecy would be falsified:—and what could be more contingent, in respect of Isaiah?—Had the child died in the birth, or soon after, before it could name its father or mother, where had been the prophecy then? But, if the child, being a son, was born according to the time of nature, reckoned from the day of the date, witnessed by Uriah and Jeberechiah, and the conditions therein mentioned; if it lived to a certain age, &c.; then, from this specific accomplishment, might be fairly inferred, that there was something more than ordinary in this affair; and it might very well serve for the sign of a future event, however distant that event might be. And such is the language of the prophet—"the Lord himself shall give you a sign"—not the full termination, the absolute, and final accomplishment, of the prophecy: but the sign, the earnest, of its complete fulfilment, at the period appointed in the divine counsels.

The inference is obvious: if the sign of the event be fulfilled, the event itself shall be fulfilled in its time—it is true, the event is wonderful; but then the sign that prefigures it, is extraordinary: the event is, doubtless, above the course of nature; but then the sign is not strictly a customary procedure of nature, though not contrary to it. In short it seems, probable, that Isaiah, in some degree, imitated the faith of Abraham, (Rom. iv. 19) and depended for the accomplishment of this prediction (by his personal instrumentality) on the same Divine power as had commissioned him to utter this prophecy.

N. B. The division of chap. vii. from chap. viii. seems to obscure this transaction, by separating what has a mutual reference.

There is a question or two remaining, on the circumstances of this prophecy, which, though they do not affect its application, yet afford matter of speculative enquiry at least: (1) The name of the person to whom Isaiah approached, is translated "prophetess;" and it is usually said, because she was the prophet's wife: but, if so, this is the only place in which the word has this sense, though it is applied several times to women. (2) She might not be, and probably was not, the only wife of Isaiah, who had already a young child. (3) May it be a proper name given on this occasion?—I went unto Nebiah (הַנְּבִיָּא הַנְּבִיָּא Nebiah,—THE Nebiah) and she conceived. (4) The signification of Nebiah is, that of a person who explains, who illustrates, or interprets, the will or sentiments of another; so Abraham was the Nebiah of God (Gen. xx. 7.); Aaron was the Nebiah of Moses (Exod. vii. 1); the musicians or singers of David (1 Chron. xxv. 1, 2, 3,) are called his Nebiahs, &c.: may we take the word in this sense here? since such is its proper import, q. d. the indicator—INDICATRIX: i. e. she by whom the truth or falsehood of this prophecy was to be indicated; and this person might probably, from thence receive the name of Hannebiah. (5) Was she a virgin, when Isaiah approached to her?—also, was what Uriah and Jeberechiah witnessed in the GREAT roll (perhaps to contain more writing than usual) among other things, of the nature of a marriage contract?—in which case, Isaiah must have been previously betrothed to this virgin; as otherwise he could not have had instant communication with her.

On the whole, may the history of this second sign, stand thus? Isaiah having been betrothed to A. B. is directed by God to give an instance of his confidence in divine providence, protection, support, &c. by completing his marriage with her directly; on the principle, that no person, in such distressing times, would think of marriage, and further incumbrances of a family, &c. except one who was willing to run all hazards in compliance with, and dependence on Divine direction. [Something like this occurs in the case of Jeremiah, who purchases a field, in the midst of war and desolation, and pays the full price for it; as a sign that fields should be bought in peaceable times, after the desolations of his country should be over.] Of his faith and of the predictions, &c. connected with it, Isaiah takes the most incontrovertible witnesses; then consummating the marriage, his new wife conceives, and in due time, has a son, whence she obtains the name of Hannebiah?

If my memory serves me rightly, Rezin, one of the two kings which now oppressed Israel, was slain before the year was out;—to him refers the first child; i. e. that in Isaiah's arms—"Before THIS child can speak plain," &c. The other king, Pekah, was slain, before three years, perhaps before two years, were fully expired;—to him refers the second child—"Before THAT child, now to be conceived, can like or dislike his diet—not milk from the breast, but diet for a child somewhat older," &c.

In referring this prophecy to Jesus, as the Messiah, observe—(1) He was predicted, by many prophets. (2) The time of his birth was pre-dated, viz. by DANIEL. (3) He was born of a virgin. (4) Of a virgin betrothed, though not married. (5) The age of Isaiah, who was far advanced in life (as all antiquity represents Joseph to have been). N. B. Isaiah had prophesied thirty or forty years, at this time. (6) Jesus was the only person, who, in any tolerable sense, could be called IMMANUEL, "God with us," which name was not, in any degree, fulfilled in the prophet's son. What kind of person this "God with us" was to be, appears from the following discourses; all of which have reference to him, to the end of chap. xii. all of which seem to have been written by the prophet at various intervals, about this time; and, as the accomplishment of his prophecy, in his own son, though gradual and private for a time, could not but have occasioned many observations and rumours in the neighbourhood, and among the public, these discourses seem well adapted to direct the attention of the pious Israelites to a much more remarkable fulfilment of its principal import, to be expected at a distant period. Vide ANNUNCIATION, EMMANUEL, MARY, JESUS, &c.

The parallel between Isaiah and Joseph, in respect to (1) their age, (2) their property, (3) their previous family, (4) the trouble of the times, (5) the youth of their consorts, (6) their dependence on Divine interference for support and protection; might perhaps be much closer than we are aware of.

ALMODAD, אֱלֹמָדָד: measure of God (vide ELMADUN); otherwise, court of the well-beloved; from אֱלָם alam, a court, and דָּד dud, beloved.

ALMON, or Olmun, עֶלְמֹן: the same as Alameth.—A city of Benjamin, Josh. xxi. 18; probably, the Alameth, given to Aaron's family, 1 Chron. vi. 60.

ALMON-DIBLATHAIM, עֶלְמוֹן-דִּבְלָתַיִם: compounded of almon, or אֱלָם alam, secrecy, youth, in age, or contempt; and diblathaim, or דִּבְלָתַיִם tabul, figs, or a lump of figs.

ALMOND-TREE, שקד shaked, from a root which signifies to watch; for, in fact, the almond-tree is one of the first trees that blossoms in the spring, and, as it were, awakes, while most are asleep, by reason of winter. This tree is often mentioned in scripture. The Lord intending to express to Jeremiah (i. 11.) the vigilance of his wrath against his people, showed him the branch of an almond-tree: where the duplicity of meaning in the word shaked, is difficult to express in translation. "What seest thou? He answers, I see the rod of a watcher . . . } . . I will watch over an almond tree } my word to fulfil it."

The almond-tree, in Judæa, blossoms in January, and by March has fruit.

Aaron's rod, which bore blossoms and fruit in the wilderness (Numb. xvii 8.) was of the almond tree. Ecclesiastes xiii. 5. expressing metaphorically the whiteness of an old man's hair, says, "the almond-tree shall flourish." The blossoms of this tree are white.

ALMUGIM, אֱלֻמִּיִּם, 2 Chron. xi. 7. אֱלֻמִּיִּם Algumim. LXX. Ἐύλα πύκνισα. Vulg. Ligna pinea. 1 Kings x. 11. LXX. Ἐύλα πελεκητα, Ligna dolata: wrought wood.

ALMUGIM, a kind of wood. Vulg. tigna thyina. The Rabbins generally render it coral; others, ebony, or pine: it certainly is not coral, for coral is not proper to make musical instruments, nor to be used in rails, or in a staircase, to which uses the Scripture tells us, the wood almugim was put. The pine-tree is too common in Judæa, and the neighbouring country, to search for it as far as Ophir. The wood thyinum, is that of the citron-tree, known to the ancients, and much esteemed for its odour, and beauty. It came from Mauritania. Plin. lib. xiii. cap. 16.

We are of opinion that by almugim, or algumim, or simply gummim, taking al for an article, may be understood oily and gummy wood, particularly the tree which produces gum Arabic. It is said gum Ammoniac proceeds from a tree resembling that which bears myrrh; and gum Arabic, comes from the black acacia, which we take to be the same as the Shittim wood, frequently mentioned by Moses; if so, Solomon's Almugim and Moses's Shittim, would be the same wood. Vide SHITTIM.

[The thyon-tree, says Theophrastus, grows in Africa, near the temple of Jupiter Ammon: it resembles the cypress; it was highly esteemed among the Heathen, for doors and images, because it would not rot. Josephus compares it to that of the fig-tree, white and shining. As it came from Ophir, its name is probably not Hebrew, and it may be generic to several sorts.]

eight or ten feet high; at the head of it is a large bunch of leaves, thick and indented, broad at bottom, but narrowing toward the point, and about four feet in length; the blossom is red, intermixed with yellow, and double like a pink; from this blossom comes fruit, round like a large pea, white and red; the juice of these leaves is drawn by cutting them with a knife; and afterwards it is received in bottles.

The Eastern geographers tell us, Bibl. Orient. p. 913, that the wood of aloes, the smell whereof is exquisite, is found only in those provinces of India which are comprehended in the first climate; that the most excellent, is that which grows in the isle of Senf, situated in the Indian sea, towards China: others are of opinion, that the wood of aloes, produced in the isle of Comar, or at cape Comorin, is the best, and that it was of this kind a certain king of India made a present, weighing ten quintals, to Nouschirvan; which when applied to the fire, melted, and burned like wax. This wood is brought from the islands of Sumatra and Ceylon.

The Hebrew אהלים ahalim, probably signifies aloe-trees. The Vulgate reads, ut tabernacula quæ fecit Dominus, "as tents which the Lord hath spread;" but the Hebrew may be translated: "As ahalim trees which the Lord hath planted," [in our translation, "lign-aloes:"] the LXX and Jerom, sometimes translate ahalim stacte, or aloe; but as the aloe-tree is not common in Arabia, or the neighbouring countries, the Rabbins translate ahalim—santal. The aloes of Syria, Rhodes, and Candia, called Aspalathus, is a shrub full of thorns; the wood is used by perfumers, after they have taken off the bark, to give consistency to their perfumes.

[The true Aloe-tree, probably, is native, much further east than Candia or Judæa: it is found in China and Siam. The Siamese Ambassadors to the Court of France, in 1686, brought a present of this wood from their Sovereign; and were the first to communicate any consistent account of the tree. It is said to be about the height and form of the Olive-tree; the trunk is of three colours, and contains three sorts of wood: the heart, or finest part, is called tambac, or calambac; it is used to perfume dresses and apartments; and is worth more than its weight in gold: it is esteemed a sovereign cordial against fainting fits, and other nervous disorders. From this account of it, the reader will perceive the rarity and value of this perfume, implied in the notice taken of it by the spouse in the Canticles; and the boast of the prostitute. The Santal wood approaches to many of its properties; and is applied to similar uses, as a perfume, at sacrifices, &c.]

II. ALOES, a plant or herb; the leaves are about two inches thick, prickly, and chamfered; in the middle rises a stem, the flower yields a white kernel, extremely light, and almost round. These aloes are not uncommon among us. It has been said, that one kind of aloes flowers but once in a hundred years, and that, as its flower opens, it makes a great noise: [there have been several seen blowing in the gardens at, and round London, without making any noise. As the flowers have six stamina, and one style, Linnaeus ranges this plant in his sixth class, called hexandria monogynia. Our knowledge of it is obtained not so much from Oriental specimens, as from American: which could not be known to the Ancients. The Cape of Good Hope furnishes many kinds.]

From this plant is extracted the drug called aloes, which is a very bitter liquor, used in embalming, to prevent the putrefaction of the dead body. Nicodemus bought about a hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes, to embalm the body of Jesus Christ, (John, xix. 39.) In Proverbs, (vii. 17) the debauched woman says, she had perfumed her bed with myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon; and the spouse in the Canticles (iv. 14) says, that myrrh, aloes, and all manner of perfumes, are found in the garden of her beloved. The Hebrew reads ahalim; most understand by it, either the aloes-plant, or the aloes-tree.

ALPHA (A) is the first letter of the Greek alphabet, derived from (x) Aleph, the first of the Hebrew alphabet. In the Greek alphabet, Alpha stands for one, or the first, vide A. Martial, in imitation of the Greeks, who used to distinguish the rank of people by letters, says:

Quod ALPHA dixi, Codre, penulorum,
Te nuper, aliqua, cum jocarer in chanta
Si forte bilem movit hic tibi versus,
Dicas lucebit PLTA me togatorum.

Epig. l. v. Ep. 26.

ALPHABET. Vide HEBREW LETTERS.

ALPHÆUS, Ἀλφαῖος a thousand; from the Hebrew אֶלֶף aleph, a chief.

I. ALPHÆUS, father of St. James Minor, Matt. x. 3; Luke vi. 15. Alpheus was the husband of Mary, believed to have been sister to the Holy Virgin; for which reason, James is called the Lord's brother; but the term, brother, is too general in its application, to fix their relation; though the fact is probable. Many are of opinion, that Cleophas, mentioned Luke xxiv. 18, is the same as Alpheus: Alpheus being his Greek name, and Cleophas, his Hebrew, or Syriac name, according to the custom of this province, (or of the time) where men often had two names; by one of which they were known to their friends and countrymen, by the other to the Romans, or strangers. Vide NAMES. Vide Bolland. ix. April. p. 811.

II. ALPHÆUS,

II. ALPHEUS, father of Levi, or Matthew, whom Jesus took to be an apostle and evangelist.

ALTAR. Sacrifices are nearly as antient as worship, altars are of nearly equal antiquity: Scripture speaks of altars, erected by the patriarchs, without describing their form, or their matter. The altar which Jacob set up at Beth-el, was the stone which had served him for a pillow; Gideon sacrificed on the rock before his house. The first altars which God commanded Moses to raise, were of earth, or rough stones, (Exod. xx. 24, 25); and the Lord declared, that if iron were used in constructing them, they would become impure, Exod. xxv. 1, 2, 3, &c.

The altar which Moses enjoined Joshua to build on Mount Ebal, was to be of unpolished stones (Deut. xxvii. 5: Josh. viii. 31); and, it is very probable, that such were those built by Samuel, Saul, and David. The altar which Solomon erected in the temple, was of brass, but filled, it is believed, with rough stones, 2 Chron. iv. 1, 2, 3. It was twenty cubits long, twenty wide, and ten high. That built at Jerusalem, by Zerubbabel, after the return from Babylon, was of rough stones: as was that of the Maccabees. Josephus says, De Bello, lib. vi. cap. 14. that the altar which in his time was in the temple, was of rough stones, fifteen cubits high, forty long, and forty wide.

The Altars in the temple were as follow, (for their form, uses, &c. vide the Dissertations accompanying the Plates, or the article TEMPLE):

I. Altar of Incense.

II. Altar of Burnt-offerings.

III. The Table of Shew-bread: improperly called an altar.

ALTAR at Athens, inscribed Ἀγνωστω θεῷ, "to the unknown God." St. Paul being come from Thessalonica to Athens,—as he discoursed on the resurrection of the dead, some of the philosophers brought him before the judges of the Areopagus; where he uses this expression, (Acts xvii. 22, 23.) "Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things, ye are (too theistical) over fond of gods: for, as I passed by, and beheld your sacred instruments, I found an altar, with this inscription—"to the unknown god;" him, therefore, whom ye worship, as "unknown,"—him declare (represent, announce) I unto you."

The question is, what was this altar, thus consecrated to the "unknown" god? St. Jerom relates, that it was inscribed "to the gods of Asia, Europe, and Africa; to the unknown, and strange gods;" and that the apostle uses the singular form, because his design was only to demonstrate to the Athenians, that they adored an unknown God. Hieronym. in Ep. ad Tit. cap. 1.

Others believe, (Grot. Voss. Beza in Act. xv. 11. Casaub. ad Laert. Selden. de Synod. lib. iii. cap. 13. Hammond. alii.) that St. Paul speaks of altars extant in several places of Attica, without any inscription, erected after a solemn expiation for the country, by the philosopher Epimenides. Diogen. Laert. lib. i, in Epimenide.

Others conceive this altar was one mentioned by Pausanias and Philostratus, Attic. lib. vi. cap. 2, who speak of Ἀγνωστων θεῶν βωμοὶ ἱδρυταί, altars at Athens, consecrated "to the unknown gods." There were probably several altars, each inscribed, "to the unknown god;" for which reason, they mention them in the plural. Lucian, in the Dialogue attributed to him, entitled, Philopatris, swears—"by the UNKNOWN GOD, at Athens." He adds, "Being come to Athens, and finding there the UNKNOWN GOD, we worshipped him, and gave thanks to him, with hands lifted up to heaven."

Peter Comestor, author of the Historia Scholastica, relates that Dionysius, the Areopagite, observing, while he was at Alexandria, the eclipse, which, contrary to nature, happened at the death of our Saviour, from thence concluded, that some unknown God suffered; and not being then in a situation to learn more of the matter, he erected, at his return to Athens, this altar, "to the unknown god," which gave occasion to St. Paul's discourse at the Areopagus.

Theophylact says, after a battle, which the Athenians had lost, a spectre appeared, and told them, that he was the cause of their misfortune, from his dislike of their celebrating games in honour of all the other gods, and none to him: after this, he disappeared, without declaring his name. The Athenians, to repair their fault, erected an altar "to the unknown god."

Others say, that during the war between the Persians and Greeks, the latter sent Philippides to desire succour of the Lacedæmonians: on Mount Parthenius, the god Pan appeared to him, and complained, that he was the only god to whom they did not pay adoration; but he promised them his assistance, provided they admitted him among their gods: they did so, and erected an altar to him; and lest there should be any other god dissatisfied also, they built an altar "to the unknown god."

Ecumenius reports this matter something differently: he says, the Athenians being seized with a burning distemper, which would not allow them to endure any thing on their bodies, addressed themselves in vain, to all the gods honoured in their city: as they received no relief from hence, they bethought themselves of erecting an altar "to the unknown god," apprehending, that some strange deity had smitten them in his indignation; and to this unknown god, they attributed the cure of their disease. Each

Each of these opinions has its difficulties. The altar, intitled, "To the gods of Asia, Europe, and Africa, to the unknown and strange gods," is not, in all probability, that mentioned by St. Paul: the Areopagites would never have understood this altar by the bare name of the "Unknown God." The histories related by Theophylact, Eecumenius, &c. have no warrant from antiquity: it is therefore probable enough, that the Athenians, a people extremely superstitious, apprehensive that they had forgotten some divinity, and had omitted to worship him, erected altars in some part of their city, inscribed "to the unknown god;" whence St. Paul took occasion to preach first Jehovah, and then Jesus, to them: as a God, with respect to them, truly unknown, yet, in some sort, adored by them without their knowing him.

These are St. Chrysostom's thoughts on the matter, founded on what we have above mentioned, from Philostratus, Pausanias, and Lucian. Chrysost. in Acta.

St. Austin doubts not but the Athenians, under the name of the Unknown God, adored the true God.

ADDITION.

Some have thought, that the God of the Jews was the object of this altar, he being a powerful God, but not fully known, as the Jews never used his name in speech, but substituted "the Lord" for "Jehovah." But, unless this were a public altar, the senate could hardly be said to worship its object: and it might stand in some public place (the apostle saw it "as he passed by") erected, as it were, by the senate and people of Athens; and therefore it alluded to some public incident of former ages.

The following is Dr. Doddridge's note on this passage:—"The express testimony of Lucian (Philopat. ad fin.) sufficiently proves, that there was such an inscription at Athens; and shows, how unnecessary, as well as unwarrantable, it was in Jerom to suppose, that the apostle, to serve his own purpose, gives this turn to an inscription, which bore on its front, a plurality of deities. Whence this important phenomenon arose, or to what it particularly referred, it is more difficult to say. Witsius (Melet. p. 85.) with Heinsius (in loc.) understands it of Jehovah, whose name, not being pronounced by the Jews themselves, might give occasion to this appellation; and to this sense, Mr. Biscoe inclines (Boyle's Lect. chap. viii. § 12. pag. 322, 325.) Dr. Welwood (pref. to the Banquet of Xenophon, p. 18, 19) supposes that Socrates reared this altar, to express his devotion to the one living and true God, of whom the Athenians had no notion; and whose incomprehensible being, he insinuated by this inscription, to be far beyond the reach of their understanding, or his own. And in this I should joyfully acquiesce, could I find one ancient testimony in confirmation of the fact: as it is, to omit other conjectures, I must give the preference to that which Beza and Dr. Hammond have mentioned, and which Mr. Hallet (Disc. on Script. vol. i. p. 307, 308) has laboured at large to confirm and illustrate; though I think none of these learned writers has set it in its most natural and advantageous light. Diogenes Laertius, in his life of Epimenides (vide lib. i. p. 29, C. with the notes of J. Casaubon and Menagius) assures us, that in the time of that philosopher (about 600 years before Christ) there was a terrible pestilence at Athens; in order to avert which, when none of the deities to whom they sacrificed appeared able or willing to help them, Epimenides advised them to bring some sheep to the Areopagus, and letting them loose from thence, to follow them till they lay down, and then to sacrifice them (as I suppose the words τω προσηκοντι Θεω signify) to the god, near whose temple or altar they then were. Now it seems probable, that Athens, not being then so full of these monuments of superstition as afterwards, these sheep lay down in places where none of them were near; and so occasioned the rearing what the historian calls anonymous altars, or altars, each of which had the inscription αγνωστο Θεω, to the unknown God; meaning thereby, the deity who had sent the plague, whoever he were, one of which altars, at least, however, it might have been repaired, remained till Paul's time, and long after. Now as the God whom Paul preached as Lord of all, was indeed the deity who sent and removed this pestilence, the apostle might, with great propriety, tell the Athenians, he declared to them him whom, without knowing him, they worshipped; as I think the concluding words of the 28th verse, may most decently be rendered.]

[Dr. Lardner has an Article on this subject, which may be consulted with advantage; it is in the new edition, in quarto, in vol. iv. p. 174.]

ALVA, or Alua, or Obveh, ἄλῃ, Γάλα: his ascension or elevation; as is believed from by ala, ascension, and the pronoun he, his: otherwise, prevarication, from חללה halila.

ALVAH: the name of the wood which God showed Moses, that with it he might sweeten the waters of Marah (Exod. xv. 25) as called, by the Mahometans, who maintain, that Moses had received a piece of it, by succession from the patriarchs, Noah having kept it in the ark, and delivered it to his posterity. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 105, col. i. & p. 1022. col. i. [by this they should seem to mean the true religion.]

The

The word alua has some relation to aloes, which is a very bitter wood; and some interpreters have hinted, that Moses took a very bitter sort of wood, on purpose, that the power of God might be the more remarkable, in sweetening these waters. Josaphus says, that this legislator used the wood which he found by chance, lying at his feet.

[“El-vah, says Mr. Bruce, (Trav. vol. ii. 470) is a large village, or town, thick-planted with palm trees, the Oasis Parva of the ancients, the last inhabited place to the west, that is under the jurisdiction of Egypt—it yields senna and coliquintida. The Arabs call El-vah, a shrub or tree, not unlike our hawthorn, either in form or flower. It was of this wood, they say, that Moses’s rod was made, when he sweetened the waters of Marah. With a rod of this wood too, say they, Kaleb Ibn el Waalid, the great destroyer of Christians, sweetened these waters at El-vah, once bitter, and gave it the name from this miracle. A number of very fine springs burst from the earth at El-vah, which renders this small spot verdant and beautiful, though surrounded with dreary deserts on every quarter; it is situated like an island, in the midst of the ocean.”]

[If my memory serves me rightly, our colonists who first peopled some parts of America, corrected the qualities of the water they found there, by infusing in it branches of sassafras; and it is understood, that the first inducement of the Chinese to the general use of tea, was to correct the water of their rivers: it follows, that some kinds of wood have such a quality; and, therefore, it may be, that God directed Moses to the very wood proper for his purpose: but then, it must be owned, that the water of these parts continues bad to this day, and is so greatly in want of something to improve it, that had such a discovery been communicated by Moses, it could hardly have been lost. M. Niebuhr, when upon the spot where this miracle was performed, enquired after wood capable of this effect; but could gain no information of any such. It will not, however, from hence follow, that Moses used a bitter wood; or even any ordinary wood; but, as Providence usually works by the proper and fit means to accomplish its ends, probably, the wood used by Moses, was, in some degree, at least, corrective of that quality which abounded in the waters; though, perhaps, it might itself have other qualities equally bad, but of a different kind (wherefore it has been lost) adapted, perhaps, to neutralise the water, and so to render it potable.

That other water also stands in need of correction, and that such correction is applied to it, appears from a custom in Egypt, in respect to the water of the Nile; a custom which being of great antiquity, might have been familiar to Moses.

“The water of the Nile is always somewhat muddy; but by rubbing with bitter almonds, prepared in a particular manner, the earthen jars in which it is kept, this water is rendered clear, light, and salutary.” Niebuhr’s Travels, vol. i. p. 71. Did these bitter almonds suggest the idea of bitter wood?

ALVAN, or Owen, אֱוֶן, Towam: the same as Alva. Shobal’s eldest son; of the race of Esau, second prince of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 23.

AMAD, or Omod, אֲמֹד, the people of testimony; from אָמַח omeh, or ummah, and נָדָה hed, testimony; or of the prey, and of eternity: otherwise, of passage; from נָדָה hadah, or odeh. A city belonging to Asher, Josh. xix. 26.

AMAL, or Omel, אָמַל, labour and iniquity. The fourth son of Hemel, 1 Chron. vii. 35.

AMALEK, or Omelek, אֲמֶלֶק: a people that licks up, or, that takes away all; from אָמַח om, or am, a people, and לָקַח lakak, to lick up, to take away all: otherwise, a people that strikes, or that uses till; from חָמַל hamal, or omel.

AMALEK, son of Eliphaz and Timna, his concubine, and grandson to Esau. He succeeded Gatam in the government of Edom, south of Judah, Gen. xxxvi. 12, 16; 1 Chron. i. 36.

Amalek was father of the Amalekites, a powerful people which dwelt in Arabia Petraea, between the Dead Sea and the Red Sea, or between Havilah and Shur (1 Sam. xv. 7) perhaps, in moving troops. We cannot assign the particular place of their habitation; and it does not appear that they had cities; though one is mentioned, 1 Sam. xv. 5. They lived generally in wandering parties, in caves, or in tents.

The Israelites had scarcely passed the Red Sea, when the Amalekites attacked them in the desert of Rephidim, and slew those who through fatigue or weakness, lagged behind. Moses, by God’s command, directed Joshua to repel this assault; to record this act of inhumanity in a book, to perpetuate its remembrance, for future vengeance. Joshua attacked the Amalekites, and defeated them, while Moses was on the mountain, and, with Aaron and Hur in his company, held up his lifted hands to heaven, A. M. 2518; ante J. C. 1487.

The Benedictine commentator cites Philo, who says, “the king of the Amalekites apprehending lest the Israelites might ravage his territories, resolved to prevent them; and putting himself at the head of his troops, he marched to oppose their passage, designing if they shewed an inclination to resist him, to attack them with all his forces.” I should have been pleased, if the sacred writer had informed us in this place, what was was the number and nature of Amalek's forces. The book of Judith (iv. 13, 14.) in few words, describes the army of the Amalekites, as "a formidable one, composed of many horse, and a great number of chariots, the soldiers whereof were furnished with good weapons, and abounding with confidence in their own strength." [This citation is from the Vulgate; for there is no mention of it in the Greek, nor is it inserted in our English translation.]

According to the Scripture mode of expression, Moses needed all the virtue of his rod and his prayers, to defeat so dreadful an enemy; if God had not interfered on behalf of his people, the battle had been lost; the number, valour, and advantage of Amalek's arms, had given them the victory. Moreover,— Victory, which God gives or withholds at his pleasure, had certainly favoured the Amalekites, if Aaron and Hur, who accompanied Moses on the mount, remote from danger, had not supported the extended arms and hands of that legislator. The mystery of this I leave to commentators. The battle lasted till the approach of night; for Scripture says, Exod. xvii. 12. "the hands of Moses were steady till the going down of the sun." As the success of this action was the pure work of God, he said to Moses, "write this for a memorial in a book."

Under the Judges (Judg. vi. 3) we see the Amalekites united with the Midianites and Moabites, to oppress Israel, (Judg. iii. 13) but Ehud delivered Israel from Eglon, and Gideon delivered them from Midian and Amalek.

Many years after, the Lord directed Samuel to say, to Saul, "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, I remember what Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for him in the way when he came up from Egypt: now go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all."

Saul marched therefore against the Amalekites, advanced to their capital, defeated and drove them from Havilah (towards the lower part of the Euphrates) to Shur (towards the Red Sea) destroying the people: but he spared the best of the cattle and moveables; thereby violating the command of God.

Nevertheless some fugitives escaped: for though the Amalekites appear but little more in history, yet, some years after Saul's slaughter of them, a troop of Amalekites pillaged Ziklag, then belonging to David, where he had left his wife and his property. David returning, pursued, overtook, and dispersed them, and recovered all the booty which they had carried off, 1 Sam. xxx. 1, 2, &c.

The Arabians maintain, that Amalek was a son of Ham, and grandson of Noah; that he was the father of Ad, and grandfather of Schedad.

PART III. Edit. IV.

This opinion is not to be rejected: it is not easy to conceive how Amalek, as a people, if only the posterity of the son of Eliphaz, and grandson of Esau, could be so powerful and numerous as this tribe was, when the Israelites departed out of Egypt. Besides, Moses relates (Gen. xiv. 7) that in Abraham's time, the five confederate kings invaded Amalek's country, about Kadesh; as likewise that of the Amorites, at Hazezon-tamar.

Moses also, Numb. xxiv. 20. relates, that Balaam observing from a distance the land of Amalek, said, in his prophetic style, "Amalek is the first (the head, the original) of the nations, but his end shall be, that he perish for ever." This certainly cannot agree with the Amalekites, if they were so modern; for the generation then living was but the third from Amalek himself, as appears by the following comparative genealogy.

Esau,	Jacob,
Eliphaz,	Levi,
Amalek,	Koath,
—	Anram,
—	Aaron.

Moses never reproaches the Amalekites with attacking the Israelites, their brethren; an aggravating circumstance, which he would not have omitted if they had been descended from Esau, and, by that descent, brethren to the Israelites. Lastly, we see the Amalekites almost always joined in Scripture with the Canaanites and Philistines, and never with the Edomites; and when Saul destroyed Amalek, the Edomites neither assisted nor avenged them. It is therefore probable, that the Amalekites, so often mentioned in Sacred History, were a people descended from Canaan, and very different from the descendants of Amalek, the grandson of Esau, who, perhaps, might be but a small tribe, and not conspicuous at the time; if indeed they ever rose to much importance.

The Arabians relate of the Amalek destroyed by Saul, that he was the father of an ancient tribe in Arabia; which contained only Arabians called pure, the remains of which were mingled with the posterity of Jocktan and Adnan, and so became Mosarabes or Mostaarabes, i. e. mixed-Arabians, i. e. blended with foreigners. They believe that Goliath, who was overcome by David, was king of the Amalekites, and that the giants who inhabited Palestine in Joshua's time, were of the same race: part of which retired into Africa, while Joshua was living; and settled on the coasts of Barbary; which account has many circumstances very credible.

The son of Amalek was Ad, a celebrated prince among the Arabians, Bibl. Orient. p. 51. Ad. He began stately buildings, and a city, his own residence, and that of the giants in his time. Some make him the son of Uz, and grandson of Aram, the son of Shem. The Mahometans say, Ad was father of an Arabian tribe, called Adites, who were exterminated, for not hearkening to the patriarch Eber, who preached the unity of God to them. Ad had two sons Schedad and Schedid. This is what the Arabians relate of the Amalekites.

[These accounts are, indeed, very imperfect; but on the whole, we seem to be warranted in suggesting, (1) that there were more kinds of Amalekites, than one: (2) that the tribe which Saul destroyed, might not be very numerous at that time; and that the tract of country mentioned in relation to them, was that of their flight, not that of their possession, unless as rovers, or bedouens: (3) that they were turbulent and violent toward their neighbours, as formerly they had been toward the stragglers of Israel; which accounts why their neighbours were not displeased at their expulsion: (4) that such being their character, they might have produced a war, giving recent cause of offence to Israel; though Scripture only mentions the fulfilment of an ancient prophecy. N. B. Perhaps there never had been peace between the two nations. (5) That Agag, slain by Samuel, had been extremely cruel; which seems warranted by the expression, "As thy sword has made mothers childless:" and, therefore, he met with no more than his just punishment in the death he received. Vide SAMUEL, AGAG, and FRAGMENT, No. LIII.

[We should on this article carefully distinguish the people called Amalekites, Gen. xv. 7. from the tribe exterminated, or expatriated, by Saul, 1 Sam. xxx. 1. xiv. 48. xxxvii. 8, in consequence of the anathema, Exod. xvii. 14: and apparently both these should be distinguished from the descendants of Eliphaz and Timnah, Gen. xxxvi. 12.

Balaam says, Numb. xxiv. 20. Amalek was the first, or chief, of the nations—i. e. around the country within his view or ken: this agrees with the derivation from Melek, the king, or ruler; q. "king's people."

The Arab writers often mention and glory in their descent from Amalek; their historians, poets, commentators on the poets, and genealogists, all boast of this; and down to the very days of Mahomet, many families traced their descent from this progenitor, and prided themselves on the distinction.

Probably the different tribes bearing this name might, in a geographical view, be thus arranged:

1. Amalek, the ancient, Gen. xiv. 7, where the phrase is remarkable, "all the country of the Amalekites," which implies a great extent. This people we may place near the Jordau. Numb. xxiv. 20.

2. A tribe in the region east of Egypt: between Egypt and Canaan. Exod. xvii. 8. 1 Sam. xiv. &c.

3. The descendants of Eliphaz.

It was against the second of these that Moses and Joshua fought, Exod. xvii. 8—13, against which tribe perpetual hostility was to be maintained, ver. 16. 1 Sam. xv.

It was also, most probably, to the ancient Amalekites, No. 1. that Balaam alluded, Numb. xxiv. 20, as having been "head of the peoples:" for the descendants of Esau, were very far from answering to this title; in fact, they were but just appearing as a tribe, or family. Even at this day, the Arabs distinguish between families of pure Arab blood, and those of mixed descent; but they include the posterity of Ishmael among those of mixed descent, while they reckon the Amalekites by parentage as of pure blood. The posterity of Esau, therefore, could hardly claim privilege above that of Ishmael, either by antiquity, or by importance. Neither is it any way likely, that the Amalekites of Esau's family should extend their settlements to where we find those Amalekites (No. 2.) which attacked Israel, at the very borders of Egypt, and on the shores of the Red Sea. Instead of Maachatai, Deut. iii. 14. Josh. xii. 4, 5. xiii. 11. 13. the LXX read the kings of the Amalekites, which implies that this people had occupied very extensive territories. The same countries seem to be alluded to by David, Psal. lxxxiii. 7; he had already mentioned Edom, the Ishmaelites, Moab, &c. yet distinct from these he mentions Gebel, Ammon, and Amalek, consequently, this Amalek was not of the descent of Esau, or of Ishmael.

The spies sent to explore the land of Canaan, Numb. xiii. 29, report that the Amalekites inhabited the south; which agrees exactly with the equivocation of David to Achish, 1 Sam. xxvii. David invaded the Amalekites, ver. 8. but ver. 10, he says he went "against the south of Judah," the south of the Jerahmeelites, the south of the Kenites; which indeed was very true, as he went against the Amalekites, who were south of all those places.

D'Herbelot tells us, that the Mussulmen give the name of Amalekites to those giants which inhabited Palestine, when the Israelites attacked it: they suppose that some of these even fled to Barbary, and this agrees with the opinion of those who mention inscriptions found in Barbary, importing that the people who wrote them, fled from Canaan, from the face of Joshua, son of Nun, the robber. Vide Procop. de Bello Vandal. and Reland, Pal. p. 82.]

AMAN, אָמָן: their mother, or their fear; from אָמַי aim, fear: otherwise, a cubit; from אָמָה ammeh; and from the affix מָמָם mem, their's. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 26.

AMANA, אֲמָנָה (vide ABANA:) integrity and truth; if from the Heb. אָמָן emun or amun.

I. AMANA, a mountain, mentioned Cant. iv. 8. Some are of opinion, that this is mount Amanus, in Cilicia. St. Jerom, (Epist. ad Dardanum, & ad Ezek. vii. Item ad Ezek. xx.) and the Rabbins, (in Gemar. Jerosol. Schevush) describe the land of Israel as extending northward to this mountain; and Solomon's dominion did extend so far. Mount Amanus, with its connections, separates Syria from Cilicia, and reaches from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates.

II. AMANA, a mountain, beyond Jordan, in the tribe of Manasseh, three leagues from lake Moron; three leagues in circumference at the bottom, where are five vineyards; but its top is always covered with snow, for which reason, the Arabians give it the name of Gibel Sheik; i. e. the Old Man's Mountain, because the top of it is all white. Some think this to be the mount Amana, to which the spouse alludes in the Canticles. Eugene Roger, Terre Sainte, lib. i. cap. 20. I do not observe, that either Josephus, St. Jerom, or Eusebius, had any knowledge of this mountain: at least they say nothing of it, under the name of Amana.

[Probably "the steady or established mountain,"—or, in the other sense, "the mountain which nourishes, and constantly maintains its inhabitants." In reference to a river, "the constant stream," as distinguished from those which run only at some periods: or, "the fostering beneficent stream," i. e. free from injurious particles, or qualities, by which some waters prove detrimental. Vide ABANA.]

AMARIAH, אֲמָרְיָהוּ, or אֲמָרִיָּהוּ: the Lord says; from אָמַר amar, to speak, and יָהּ jah, the Lord: otherwise, elevation; from אָמַר raam: otherwise, the Lamb of God; from אֲמָרָה ammera, in Chaldee, a lamb, and יָהּ jah, the Lord.

And if he actually did exercise this office, he should be placed, as I think, before Eli, who was succeeded by Abitub, who, in the Chronicles, is put after Amariah, ver. 7.

II. AMARIAH, one who separated from his foreign wife, Ezra x. 42.

III. AMARIAH, grandfather to the prop he Zephaniah, and father of Gedaliah, Zeph. i. 1.

AMASA, or Omesha, אֲמָסָה: a forgiving people: from אָמַם am, a people, and from אָמַשׁ nesha, to pardon, or to rise up: otherwise, the burden of the people; from אָמַשׁ nasha, to carry.

I. AMASA, son of Jether and Abigail, David's sister. Absalom, during his rebellion against David, placed his cousin, Amasa, at the head of his troops (2 Sam. xvii. 25). Amasa engaged Joab, general of David's army, but was worsted; A. M. 2981. After the defeat of Absalom's party, David, from hatred to Joab, who had killed Absalom, offered Amasa his pardon, and the command of his army, in the room of Joab, whose insolence rendered him insupportable (2 Sam. xix. 13, & seq.) On the revolt of Sheba, son of Bichri, David ordered Amasa to assemble all Judah against Sheba; but Amasa not forming his army against the time prescribed, David directed Abishai to pursue Sheba, with what soldiers he then had about his person. Joab, with his people accompanied him; and these troops were scarcely got so far as the great stone in Gibeon, before Amasa joined them with his forces. Then said Joab to Amasa, "Art thou in health, my brother?" and took him by the beard with the right hand to kiss him. But Amasa not observing the sword which was in Joab's hand, the latter smote him with it. Such was the end of Amasa, David's nephew, A. M. 2981; ante A. D. 1023. [Vide FRAGMENT, No. XCIII.]

II. AMASA, son of Hadlai, opposed the admission of such captives as were taken from the kingdom of Judah, in the reign of Ahaz, into Samaria, 2 Chron. xxviii. 12.

AMASAI, or Omeshi, אֲמָסַי: the present of the people; from אָמַם am, people, and שִׁי shi, a present: otherwise, with a present; from the preposition אָמַם om, with, and שִׁי shi, a present.

I. AMASAI, son of Elkanah, 1 Chron. vi. 25.

II. AMASAI, the same perhaps already mentioned: a Levite, who joined David with thirty gallant men, while in the desert, flying from Saul. David went to meet them, and said, "If ye be come peaceably to help me, mine heart shall be knit unto you; but if ye be come to betray me to mine enemies, seeing there is no wrong in mine hands, the God of our fathers look thereon, and rebuke it." Then said Amasai, "Thine are we, David, and on thy side, thou son of Jesse: peace be unto thee, and peace be to thine helpers." David, therefore, received them; and gave them a command in his troops. 1 Chron. xii. 17.

AMASHAI, or Omeshai, אֲמָשַׁי; oppression of the people; from אָמַ am, the people; and שָׁשֶׁה shaseh, to plunder, to oppress.

AMASIS, king of Egypt. Notwithstanding the name of this prince does not occur in the text of Scripture, he is nevertheless celebrated in Sacred History. Scripture speaks of Necho, who killed Josiah, king of Judah, in the battle of Megiddo, 2 Kings, xxiii. 29; Jer. xli. 2. Necho was succeeded by Psammis, Psammis by Apries (in Jeremiah called Hophra) and Hophra, by Amasis, who lived in Egypt at the time when Cyrus reigned in Babylon. He governed forty-four years; loved and respected by his subjects: from A. M. 3435 to 3472. He died in the time of Cambyses, ante A. D. 525.

AMATH, or Emath, a city of Syria; the same with Emesa on the Orontes. Vide EMATH; and AMATHEANS.

AMATHA, a town near Gadara, where were hot baths. Gabinius established one of the five seats of justice at Amatha. The word hamath חמַת, signifies hot waters; whence so many towns in Palestine were called Amath, Amathus, or Emmaus. Euseb. Onomast. Joseph. de Bell. lib. i. cap. 6.

AMATHUS, a city beyond Jordan, Eusebius places it twenty-one miles from Pella, southwards. Euseb. Onomastic. in 'Αθαμ. Alexander Jannæus took and destroyed it. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 21. Some are of opinion, that Gabinius fixed one of the five seats of justice in this city: Others think, it was at Amatha, on this side Jordan. AMATHEANS, descendants of Amath, a son of Canaan. We are of opinion, that they dwelt at Emath, or Amath, or Emesa, in Syria, on the river Orontes. Vide AMATH.

AMAZIAH, אֲמַזְיָה: the strength of the Lord; from חֶמֶץ hamatz, or ometz, strength, and יָהּ jah, the Lord.

I. AMAZIAH, eighth king of Judah (2 Chr. xxiv. 27; xxv. 1, 2, 3, &c.) son to Joash; succeeded his father A. M. 3165; ante A. D. 839. He was twenty-five years of age when he began to reign, and reigned twenty-nine years at Jerusalem. He did good in the sight of the Lord, but not with a perfect heart. When settled in his kingdom, he put to death the murderers of his father, but not their children; because it is written in the law, "The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers; every man shall be put to death for his own sin." Deut. xxiv. 16.

In the muster which he made of his people, he found 300,000 men able to bear arms. He hired, besides, 100,000 men of Israel; for which he paid the king of Israel a hundred talents (about 34,000*l. English*). His design was to employ these troops against Edom, which had revolted from Judah, in the reign of Joram, about fifty-four years before, 2 Kings viii. 20.

But a prophet of the Lord came to him, and said, "O king, let not the army of Israel, go with thee; for the Lord is not with Israel." Amaziah, hereupon, sent back those troops; and they returned, strongly irritated against Amaziah. They dispersed themselves over the cities of Judah, from Bethoron to Samaria, killed 3000 men, and carried off a great booty, to make themselves amends for that they had expected from Edom.

Amaziah, with his own forces, gave battle to the Edomites, in the Valley of Salt. [This valley is generally placed south of the Dead Sea; but we think rather, that it was in Idumæa, between Palmyra, and Bozra. Vide le Bruyn's Voyage.] killed 10,000 Edomites, and took 10,000 more, who had saved themselves, in all probability, on a rock, where they were assaulted, and from whence they were thrown headlong, and thereby dashed to pieces. [In 2 Kings, xiv. 7. it is said "Amaziah took Petra, and gave it the name of Jectael." Some think he took Petra, the capital of Arabia Petræa; others are of opinion, that he only took the rock to which these ten thousand Edomites had retreated.] Amaziah having thus punished Edom, and taken their gods prisoners, adored them as his own deities. This provoked the Lord, who, by a prophet, remonstrated to him, "Why hast thou sought after the gods of a people, which could not deliver their own people out of thine hand?" Amaziah answered him, "Art thou made of the king's counsel? Forbear; why shouldst thou be smitten?" Then the prophet forebore, and said, "I know that God hath determined to destroy thee, because thou hast done this, and hast not hearkened unto my counsel."

God, therefore, permitted Amaziah to be so blinded, as to believe himself invincible. He sent to defy the king of Israel, saying, "Come, let us look one another in the face." The motive of this challenge was, probably, to oblige Joash, king of Israel, to repair the ravages which his troops had committed on their return, homewards. Joash answered him, by the fable of the cedar of Lebanon, and the thistle trod down by a beast.

Amaziah, deaf to these reasonings, advanced to Bethshemesh, but was defeated and himself taken there, by Joash, who carried him to Jerusalem:

Jerusalem: where Joash ordered the demolition of 400 cubits of the city wall; carried to Samaria all the gold and silver; the rich vessels of the house of God; the treasures of the royal palace; and the sons of those among his own people, who had been hostages there.

Amaziah reigned after this, fifteen or sixteen years at Jerusalem; but returned not to the Lord with all his heart; who therefore punished him, by a conspiracy formed against him at Jerusalem. He endeavoured to escape to Lachish; but was assassinated. He was brought back on horses, and buried with his ancestors, in the city of David. A. M. 3194; ante A. D. 810. Uziah, or Azariah, his son, about sixteen years of age, succeeded him.

II. AMAZIAH, priest to the golden calves at Bethel. The prophet Amos, having predicted the destruction of the high places, consecrated to idols, however holy they might be thought by Israel; also, that the house of Jeroboam should be extirpated by the sword; Amaziah, priest of Bethel, sent to Jeroboam, complaining of Amos, and at length procured his banishment. Vide Amos.

Amos prophesied under Jeroboam II. at which time the kings of Israel kept their court at Samaria; but they had, in all probability, a palace at Bethel, where they worshipped. About A. M. 3215; ante A. D. 789.

AMBIVIVUS (MARCUS) succeeded Coponius in the government of Judæa: Annius Rufus was his successor, A. D. 13. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 3.

AMBUSHES, Ambuscades, אֲרֻב כְּאֵד Invidia. These words are not always taken in their strict signification. They sometimes signify, an attack on a man who has no distrust of such a thing; attacking any one behind, concealing one's self in some particular place with design to surprise any one. Vide Judges, ch. ix. Abimelech, who lay lurking with his people in the heights of Sichem, to rob and ill treat those who passed that way, came and attacked the city of Sichem with his troops, divided into three bodies: according to the Hebrew, "They prepared ambuscades against Sichem in four heads, or companies." Ver. 43. Abimelech being informed that the Sichemites were marched, took his army and divided it into three bodies, and LAID WAIT for them in the field." Sam. xxii. 8, 13, Saul complains, that David laid ambuscades for him. Nothing could be worse grounded than this accusation, if we understand the word strictly: but he might say, though unjustly, that David was his secret enemy. 2. Chron. xx. 22. it is said, God turned the ambushes laid by the enemies of Israel upon themselves; i. e. their endeavours, their malice, their arms, he turned against themselves; for the enemies there mentioned, came not in private, or by stratagem; they marched openly in arms against Israel.

AMELEC, or EMELEK, מֶלֶךְ: the king, or the counsellor; from מֶלֶךְ melec, a king.

AMELEK, father of that Joash who received orders from king Ahab to keep the prophet Micaiah in his custody, 2 Chron. xviii. 25. [q. Joash son of Amelek: Eng. trans. "Joash the king's son."]

AMEN, אָמֵן, in Hebrew, signifies, true, faithful, certain. It is used likewise in affirmation; and was often thus used by our Saviour: Amen, Amen, verily, verily. It is understood as expressing a wish, Amen! so be it! or an affirmation, Amen, yes: I believe it. Numh. v. 22. she shall answer, Amen! Amen! Deut. xxvii. 15, 16, 17, &c. all the people shall answer, Amen! Amen! 1 Cor. xiv. 16; "How shall he who occupieth the place of the unlearned, say amen! at thy giving of thanks? seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest." "The promises of God are amen in Christ;" i. e. certain, confirmed, GRANTED (2 Cor. i. 20). The Hebrews end the five books of Psalms, according to their distribution of them, with Amen, Amen; which the Septuagint translate genoito, genoito; and the Latins, fiat, fiat. The gospels, &c. are ended with AMEN. The Greek, Latin, and other churches, preserve this word in their prayers, as well as alleluia and hosanna. At the conclusion of the public prayers, the people anciently answered with a loud voice, Amen! And Jerom says, (Præfat. in lib. ii. Epist. ad Galat.) that, at Rome, when the people answered, Amen! the sound was like a clap of thunder, in similitudinem celestis tonitru Amen reboat. The Jews assert, that the gates of heaven are opened to him who answers Amen! with all his might.

[It is remarkable, that in the New Testament, our Lord is the only person who uses amen at the beginning of his discourse, in affirmation. It is remarkable also, that in John's Gospel he is represented as using it doubled, Amen, amen; "Verily, verily." Did he actually use it in this duplicate form? Probably, it was his custom, being the Hebrew manner; a Hebraism, in fact; but this may support the remark, that the Holy Spirit has not thought fit, always, to give us the very expression our Lord did use; for, if our Lord did thus accustom himself to this use of amen, then the other gospels, which omit the duplication, vary from his mode, in this instance; and if he did not thus accustom himself, then John has varied from his mode. But it should be remembered, that neither has Divine providence thought fit to preserve any relation of our Lord's deportment, of his precepts, expressions, &c. in the very language he did use (the Syriac); so that, in fact, except here and there in the original gospels themselves, we hear him, in this sense, speaking by the medium of a translation; which may well be supposed to require some allowances in the power, order, or construction of words. This, perhaps, should be well considered, before too great stress is laid on verbal criticism; though verbal criticism is not, therefore, to be either blamed or despised; but is of great use in its due application. Vide BIBLE.]

[Amen is applied as a title to our Lord: "THE AMEN; the true and faithful witness," Rev. iii. 14. Is a kind of fondness for this term peculiar to John? he recollecting, with much pleasure, after many years' interval, his Divine master's manner of using this term.]

AMERUTHA, a town of Upper Galilee, which Josephus fortified against the Romans: probably the same as Meroth, which terminates Upper Galilee westward. Perhaps, Mearah of the Sidonians, Joshua xiii. 4. Joseph. in Vita Sua, p. 1013. Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 2.

AMETHYST, a precious stone, the ninth in order on the High Priest's breast-plate. Its colour resembles that of new wine, and reflects a violet. The Hebrew אַחַלְמָה achalma, by the Septuagint and Vulgate thus translated, may signify sleep. The Chaldee, Onkelos, and the Syriac, translate it eenegla, or the eye of a calf. The name of Issachar was engraven on this stone. It occurs, Rev. xxi. 20. Some say the amethyst resembles wine mixed with water.

AMI. אֲמִי: my nations: otherwise, my mother; from אָמַם amem: otherwise, my cubit, from אָמַם amem: otherwise fear.

AMI, chief of a family, which returned from Babylon, Ezra ii. 57, 58.

AMINADAB, אֲמִינָדָב, my people is liberal; from אָמ am, a people, and נָדָב nadab, gracious, liberal: or prince of the people: otherwise, a people that vows.

I. AMINADAB, of Judah, son of Aram, and father of Naason and Elisheba, wife of Aaron, the high-priest. Exod. vi. 23.

II. AMINADAB. The chariots of Aminadab are mentioned Cant. vi. 12. as being extremely light. "Or ever I was aware, my soul made me like the chariots of Aminadab." He was, very probably, a celebrated charioteer, whose horses were singularly swift. [The Vulgate reads Anima mea conturbavit me propter quadrigas Aminadab; and our Septuagint, ἁγυρά Αμινάδαβ: but the Vatican edition reads εἰς ἄρμα λαοῦ ἡγμένον; which sense the Hebrew will admit of, by dividing one word into two, AMI-NADAB, "the chariots of a willing (or volunteer) people;" i. e. very ready and prompt. See FRAGMENTS, No. 409, on SOLOMON'S SONG.

III. AMINADAB, son of Koath, a brother of Korah, 1 Chron. vi. 22.

IV. AMINADAB, or ABINADAB, son of king Saul, killed with him in the battle of Gilboa. A. M. 2949; ante J. C. 1051; 1 Sam. xxxi. 2. 1 Chron. viii. 33. x. 2.

V. AMINADAB, or ABINADAB, a Levite inhabitant of Kirjath-jearim, with whom the sacred ark was deposited, after it was brought back from the Philistines, 1 Sam. vii. 1. Joseph. Antiq. lib. vi. cap. ii. He dwelt at Gibeah, (i. e. in the highest part of the city) of Kirjath-jearim. Eleazar, his son, was consecrated, or peculiarly appointed, to the office of keeping the ark. It is not certain, whether Aminadab were at that time living. The ark remained at Kirjath-jearim seventy-one years, from A. M. 2888 to 2959. David brought it from thence to Jerusalem (2 Sam. vi. 1, 2, 3); but being alarmed at the death of Uzzah, he dared not to bring it into his own house, but lodged it at Obededom's, where it continued some months.

AMITAI, or AMATHI, אֲמִתַּי; true, faithful; from אָמַת ameth: otherwise, a cubit; otherwise, a servant: from אָמַם ammeh; otherwise, one that is afraid.

AMITAI, father to the prophet Jonah, Jonah i. 1. and 2 Kings, xiv. 25.

AMIZABAD, or Omizebed, עֲמִיזָבָד; the portion of my people; from אָמ am, a people, and זָבָד zabad, a portion or dominion.

AMIZABAD, son of Benaiah, who was a principal officer in David's armies. His son, Amizabad, commanded a troop under him, 1 Chron. xxvii. 6.

AMMANITES, or AMMONITES, or OMUNI, עַמּוֹנִי: my people.

AMMAN, AMMANITES (vide AMMON, AMMONITES). The capital of the Ammonites, called in Scripture, Rabbath Ammon, and in profane authors, Philadelphia, is likewise sometimes called Amman; and the country of the Ammanites is called Ammanitis.

[AMANA, in the Jewish writers, is the same as Mount Hor; a mount in the northern boundary of the land. In the Jerusalem Targum, Mount Hor is called Mount Manus; Jonathan writes it Umanis. Inwards from Amanah was within the land, beyond Amanah was without the land: according to the opinions of the Talmudists.

AMMA, Hidden, or concealed together, covert, or his people, or with her. Josh. xix.

Probably, "the hidden one:" in which it agrees with Tammuz: or ALMON, which see. I presume, it rather refers to an individual, than to many concealed together.

AMMA,

AMMA, Aqueduct. Rather, a parting way; or, where two roads diverged. A hill. 2 Sam. ii. 24. It might, however, be called "Mother Hill;" as we have Mam Tor, in our own country.—Otherwise written

AMMAH, the hill of two ways, i. e. where two ways turned off, so that people had their choice of either.]

AMMIEL, or Omial, עמאל: the people of God; from עַם am, a people, and אֱל al, God; or my people belongs to God.

I. AMMIEL, son of Gemal, of Dan, one of the twelve sent to examine the land of Canaan, Numb. xiii. 12.

II. AMMIEL, native of Lodebar, a city of Simeon. Ammiel was father of Machir, and of Bathsheba, who married Uriah, but was seduced by David. 1 Chron. iii. 5. 2 Sam. ix. 4, 5.

III. AMMIEL, son of Obededom, a Levite, made porter of the temple under David, 1 Chron. xxvi. 5.

AMMIHUD, עמיהוד, אַמְּהוּד: people of praise; from עַם am, a people; and הוּד hud, praise: or, praise is with me; from the preposition עִם om, with, and the pronoun י' jod, me.

I. AMMIHUD, son of Ephraim, and father of Elishama, Numb. i. 10. 1 Chron. vii. 26.

II. AMMIHUD, of Simeon, father of Shemuel, or Samuel, a very different person from the prophet Samuel, Numb. xxxiv. 20.

III. AMMIHUD, of Naphthali, father of Pedabel, Numb. xxxiv. 28.

IV. AMMIHUD, father of Talmi, king of Geshur, 2 Sam. xiii. 37.

AMMISHADDAI, עמישדאי: people of the Almighty; from עַם am, people, and שֵׁדַּי shaddai all-mighty: or, the Almighty is with me; from the preposition עִם om, with, and the pronoun י' i, me: otherwise, one that ravages with me: from שָׂדַי shod, to ravage.

AMMISHADDAI, father of Ahiezer, of Dan, Numb. i. 12; x. 25.

[AMMAUM, an object People, or people in obscurity. 1 Macc. ix.

As this name is doubled, it should seem to denote intensity, "the people of peoples."—But it is uncertain, whether, or if at all, when, the ancient deity Aun, was described in the west, under the variation Aum, which he still retains among the Hindoos. If we might refer this name to that deity, this appellation would import "the people of Aum," or On. As the term Aun imports, "the great generator," and the term Om, or Aum, imports, "the origin of all things," the ideas are not unlike. I would further apply this hint to explain the intention of the daughter of Lot, who called her son Ben-ammi, usually rendered, "the son of my people," this is impossible; he might be their father, but not their son; but if we take aum in the sense of generator, source of life, then this name is extremely applicable, importing ancestor, "the son of my own parent;" in English, "ancestor's son," or "grandfather's son;" which aptly describes the descent of this child from his father, yet his grandfather, who should have been one degree further removed in blood.]

AMMON, or Omoon, עַמּוֹן: Ben-ammi is interpreted by the Vulgate, the son of my people: בֶּן-עַמִּי, ben ami; from בֶּן ben, a son, י' jod, my, and עַם am, a people.

AMMON, עַמּוֹן, his people; from עַם am, a people, and the pronoun וֹן oon, his.

I. AMMON, or No-Ammon, or Ammon-No, a city of Egypt. The Chaldee and the Vulgate, generally take this city for Alexandria. They, doubtless, were not ignorant, that Alexandria is much more modern than Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Nahum, who speak of No-Ammon; but they might believe that this city had stood at, or near, where Alexandria stands, which, nevertheless, does not appear by history; only the town of Rachotis is mentioned, as being on the sea-coast near that place.

The prophets describe No-Ammon, as situated "among the rivers; that it had the waters round about it, whose rampart was the sea, and her wall was from the sea; and that it was extremely populous," which has induced some to think, that No-Ammon is Diospolis, or the city of Jupiter, situated in the Delta, on an arm of the Nile, between Busiris south, and Mendes north, not very distant from the Mediterranean. There were such lakes about it, as might well be called seas, in the style of the Hebrews. [Beside this, the Egyptians and Greeks called the Nile, ocean. Diodorus Siculus, lib. i. cap. 10. Hence the report, that they should say their ocean surrounded the earth; i. e. the Nile visited all the land of Egypt. I doubt not, however, but that this allusion was primarily derived from the deluge: like to which, the Nile overflowed Egypt yearly.] Vide NILE.

The ruin of this city, distinctly foretold and described, by the prophets, happened under Esarhaddon and Nebuchadnezzar, and, perhaps, was completed under Sennacherib, kings of Assyria. But we must confess ingenuously, that Thebes, the capital of Upper Egypt, may be understood to have been No-Ammon, [and this is a prevailing opinion. Vide the following Article.]

II. AMMON or Hammon, or Hamaun, or Jupiter-Ammon, a celebrated god of the Egyptians, was probably, a deification of Ham, whose posterity peopled Africa, and who was the father of Mizraim, the founder of the Egyptian polity and power.

Ammon

Ammon had a famous temple in Africa, where he was adored under the symbolic figure of a ram; for the Egyptians represented their gods under the forms of certain animals. The famous temple of Jupiter Ammon, was situated in a delicious spot, in the midst of a frightful desert, (the Oasis). Here was an oracle of great fame, which Alexander the Great consulted, at the risque of his life. This oracle, however, as well as others, fell insensibly into oblivion. In Strabo's time, it was not in the repute it had been. In Plutarch's time, it enjoyed scarcely any regard; and in the reign of Theodosius, according to Prudentius, it was no longer mentioned.

[Ammon had at Thebes, the capital of Upper Egypt, a most magnificent temple, mentioned by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus (as above) and by Artapanus, Euseb. Prep. Evan. lib. ix. cap. 27. Its ruins are yet visible, and justify the ancient accounts of their extent and grandeur: from Diodorus we learn, that the city called Thebes (probably from some remembrance of Thebah, the ark) was also called Diospolis, the city of Jupiter; i. e. of Ham. The prophet Nahum, calls it by its Egyptian name (נֹחַ-אֲמֹן) No-Ammon, the habitation of Ammon; or, according to fourteen copies collated by Dr. Kennicott (נֹחַ) Nueh; elsewhere it is called (נָוִי) Nau. This article affords matter for reflection; and, on the whole, I think we ought here to remark, (1) that No, Nueh, Nau, all which variations occur in the name of this town, may have some reference to the patriarch Noah: (2) that Thebes may have reference to the ark, Thebah: (3) that Ammon has also a reference to Ham, the progenitor of the nations addicted to his worship: (4) that Ammon was the Jupiter of the Greeks; and thus we see in what sense he was, as he is often called, 'father of gods and men;' and what was the origin and the nature of that commemorative idolatry which overspread these countries.

It has been queried, whether Ammon were not an Egyptian compound, HAM-ON; i. e. Ham, the sun: On being the Egyptian name for that luminary, afterwards idolatrously referred to Ham. Moreover, in perfect coincidence with what is above stated, Aun may be taken for the generative power, as in Gen. xlix. 3, and therefore may here allude to the paternity of Ham, q. "Ham the progenitor." In Josh. vii. 2, we find a temple dedicated to On, or Aun; Beth-Aven, in our translation. Vide HAM, NOAH, THEBES, ARK, &c.]

Scripture says nothing of this false deity, in particular; but speaks of Ham, and of the city of Ammon, or No-Ammon, which was principally devoted to him, and which was very distant from the oracle just mentioned, of Jupiter Am- mon, in the desert. Ammon, the God of the Egyptians, was the Jupiter of the Greeks (Herod. lib. ii. cap. 42; Diod. Sic. lib. i.) for which reason, the Greeks call that city which the Egyptians name No-Ammon (the rest, or habitation of Ammon) Diospolis, or the city of Jupiter; but, in after-ages, the Egyptian and Greek names were united, and this deity was called Jupiter-Hammon.] See an extended enquiry on the subject of No-AMMON among the Plates.

III. AMMON, or Ben-Ammi, son of Lot, by his younger daughter. Gen. xix. 34, 38; A. M. 2107; ante A. D. 1897. His abode was east of the Dead Sea and Jordan, in the mountains of Gilead. He was the father of the Ammonites, a famous people, always at enmity with Israel.

[AMMONITES were, no doubt, the sons of Ben Ammi, descendant of Lot; but, as the name appears to be afterwards differently written, it seems to intend "a great people," or perhaps, many different peoples, tribes, intermixed into one body politic.]

AMMONITES, אֲמֹנִי otherwise, MEONITES, מְעֹנִי, 2 Chron. xxvi. 8; from מָעַן mahon, afflicted; or who fail, from מָעַן oni: otherwise, who answer, from אָנָה anah, he answered.

[Ammonites, peoples. 1 Kings, xi. 1. This name has a feminine termination, and is written full.

Ammonites, a people. 2 Chron. xxiv. 1. also, ver. 26. This name resembles the foregoing, but is not written full.]

AMMONITES, a people descended from Ammon, son of Lot; called sometimes Ammanites. They destroyed the giants Zamzummim, and seized their country, Deut. ii. 19, 20, 21. God forbade Moses and Israel from attacking the Ammonites, because he did not intend to give their land to the Hebrews. Nevertheless, as before Israel entered Canaan, the Amorites had conquered great part of the countries belonging to the Ammonites and Moabites, Moses took this from the Amorites, and divided it between the tribes of Gad and Reuben. Long after this, in the time of Jephthah (Judg. xi. 13) the Ammonites declared war against Israel, pretending that Israel detained the country which had been their's before the Amorites possessed it. Jephthah replied, that this territory being acquired by Israel in a just war, from the Amorites, who had long enjoyed it by right of conquest, he was under no obligation to restore it. The Ammonites persevered; but Jephthah defeated them.

The Ammonites and Moabites generally united in attacking Israel. After the death of Othniel, the Ammonites and Amalekites joined with Eglon, king of Moab, to oppress them. Some years after, about A. M. 2799, the Ammonites greatly greatly oppressed the Israelites beyond Jordan; but, in 2817, God raised up Jephthah to deliver them. In the beginning of Saul's reign, A. M. 2909, ante A. D. 1195, Nahash, king of the Ammonites, having attacked Jabesh-Gilead, reduced it to a capitulation, 1 Sam. xi. 1. Nahash offered no other conditions, than their submitting to have every man his right eye plucked out, as a reproach on Israel; but Saul coming seasonably to their aid, delivered the people from this intended barbarity. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CXXI.

David had been a friend of the king of Ammon; after his death he sent compliments of condolence to Hanun, his son and successor; who, regarding these ambassadors as spies, treated them in a very affronting manner. David avenged the affront, subdued the Ammonites, the Moabites, and the Syrians, their allies. Ammon and Moab continued under the government of David and Solomon, and, after the separation of the ten tribes, were subject to the kings of Israel, till the death of Ahab, 2 Kings, i. 1; A. M. 3107: ante. A. D. 897.

Jehoram, son of Ahab, and successor of Ahaziah, defeated the Moabites, A. M. 3109, 2 Kings, iii. 4, 5, 6, &c. But it does not appear, that this victory reduced them to his obedience. At the same time the Ammonites, Moabites, and other people, made an irruption on Judah, but were routed by Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. xx. 1, 2, & seq.

The prophet Isaiah, xv. xvi. threatens the Moabites with a misfortune which was to happen three years after his prediction; this probably had reference to the war of Salmanassar against them, about A. M. 3277; ante. A. D. 727.

After the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh were carried captive by Tiglath-Pileser, A. M. 3264, ante. A. D. 740, the Ammonites and Moabites took possession of the cities belonging to those tribes. Jeremiah reproaches them for it, Jer. xlix. 1. The ambassadors of the Ammonites were among those to whom that prophet presented the cup of the Lord's fury, whom he directed to make bonds and yokes for themselves, to submit to Nebuchadnezzar; threatening them, if they did not, with captivity and slavery, Jer. xxvii. 2, 3, 4.

The prophet Ezekiel, chap. xxv. 4, 10, denounces their entire destruction, and tells them, God would give them up to the people of the East, who should set their palaces in their country, so that the Ammonites should be no more mentioned among nations; and this as a punishment for insulting the Israelites on their calamities, and on the destruction of their temple by the Chaldeans. We believe, that these misfortunes happened to them in the fifth year after the taking of Jerusalem, when Nebuchadnezzar invaded all the people around Judæa. A. M.

PART III. Edit. IV.

3420, or 3421; ante A. D. 583. Joseph. Antiq.

It is probable, that Cyrus gave the Ammonites and Moabites, liberty to return into their own country, whence they had been removed by Nebuchadnezzar; for we see them, in their former settlement, exposed to those revolutions which included the people of Syria and Palestine; and subject, sometimes to the kings of Egypt, and sometimes to the kings of Syria.

Antiochus the Great took Rabbath, or Philadelphia, their capital, demolished the walls, and put a garrison into it, A. M. 3806. Polyb. lib. v. During the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Ammonites manifested their hatred to the Jews, and exercised great cruelties against such as dwelt among them, 1 Macc. v. 6—45. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 12. Justin Martyr says, Dialog. cum Tryphone, p. 272, that in his time there were many Ammonites remaining; but Origen, in Job, assures us, that in his days, they were only known under the general name of Arabians. Thus was the prediction of Ezekiel accomplished.

AMMONIUS, general of Alexander Balas's troops, was accused by Ptolemy Philometor of a design to poison him; but it is believed, this was only a pretence used by Philometor for dethroning his son-in-law, Alexander Balas, and taking his kingdom. He, therefore, attacked Balas, defeated him, took his daughter, Cleopatra, from him, and gave her to Demetrius Nicator, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 7. He says, that Alexander refusing to deliver up Ammonius to Philometor, he concluded Balas to be his accomplice, and the principal author of those secret plots which Ammonius had formed against him. To revenge himself, he marched against Antioch, whose inhabitants were greatly dissatisfied with Ammonius, by the vexations they suffered under him. Ammonius endeavoured to escape by disguising himself in a woman's dress; but he was apprehended and put to death, A. M. 3859; ante. A. D. 145.

AMNON, אֲמֹנֹן otherwise, אֲמִינֹן Aminon, 2 Sam. xiii. 20: faithful and true; from אָמֵן amen: otherwise, foster-father, or tutor; from אִמּוֹן amon: otherwise, son of the mother; from אִמָּא amam, mother, and בֵּן nin, a son.

I. AMNON, the eldest son of David, by Abinoan, his second wife. [This prince affords an unhappy instance of the guilt of unrestrained passion; but as some particulars have been represented in a light worse than they really were (though bad enough) we shall endeavour to describe them truly. It is commonly said, that Amnon conceived a violent, and unlawful, incestuous passion for his sister TAMAR; but it should be remembered, that Tamar, though uterine sister to Absalom, is mentioned, 1 Chron.

iii. 9.—as “the concubine’s children’s sister;” and not as the daughter of David; being born before her mother was connected with the king; consequently, though honoured as the king’s daughter, (as she really was his daughter-in-law) by courtesy, she was no real kin by blood to Amnon, and therefore, might have been married to him; according to her expression: “Speak to the king, for he will not withhold me from thee.”]

Amnon, having conceived a violent passion for Tamar, daughter of Absalom’s mother became ill; which being observed by the subtle Jonadab, son of Shimeah, David’s brother, he enquired the cause. Amnon discovered to him his passion. Jonadab advised him to counterfeit extreme sickness, and when the king his father, visited him, to say, “I pray thee, let my sister Tamar come and dress me food in my sight, that I may see it, and eat it at her hand.” Amnon followed this advice, and the king easily granted his request: Tamar came to the apartment where Amnon lay, “made cakes in his sight, baked them, and poured them out before him.”

Amnon would eat nothing; but calling his sister into the most private part of the chamber, and obeying only the dictates of his passion, he, by violence, abused her; after which crime, notwithstanding her remonstrances, his aversion from her became more excessive than his love had been towards her. He would have forced her to leave the room, and she delaying, he called one of his servants, and ordered him to turn her out. Her brother, Absalom, meeting her in the street, in tears, lamenting, and her head covered with ashes, soothed her, and advised her to be silent. David, when informed of what had passed, was extremely vexed: but as he tenderly loved Amnon, who was his eldest son, he refrained from punishing him.

Absalom kept his resentment for this indignity close during two years; but at length contrived an opportunity to avenge it. He invited the king, his father, and all his brothers, to an entertainment at Baal-hazor, at his sheep-shearing feast. The king declined; but permitted him to take with him the princes, his sons, and particularly Amnon. Absalom directed his servants, that when they saw Amnon elevated with wine, on a signal given, they should kill him, to avenge the criminal and violent treatment of which he had been guilty to Tamar;—a terrible lesson to dissolute appetite! thus Amnon was cut off, in the midst of his hilarity, at his brother Absalom’s house, A. M. 2974; ante A. D. 1030.

II. AMNON, son of Shimon, 1 Chron. iv. 20.

AMOK, or Omook, מֹמֶק: valley, or depth; from אֹמֶק amah, a valley.—A priest, one who returned from Babylon, Neh. xii. 7, 20.

AMON, אֹמֶן: faithful, true, &c. [or artificer, or nurse-like. Some think extensive, or very much spread. 1. Kings, xxii. 26. 2 Chron. xviii. 25. This name is written Hamon, Ezek. xxx. 15. but Amon, Jer. lii 15. Some suppose it means nursing.

Perhaps this name is compounded of Am, a mother, and Aun, a prolific power. Amun is indeed the same as the Greek and Egyptian Jupiter Ammon: but Jupiter is another name for Aun; one is, “father of gods and men;” the other is the universal generator, or generatrix; for there is no difference of sexes among the deities; Venus is masculine as well as feminine: and, accordingly, is sometimes represented with a beard: Apollo too is seen on medals in the dress of Venus: and in some medals has the breasts of the female together with the parts of the male sex. Venus armed was also worshipped by the Greeks, and we see her wield the bow of Apollo, the double pointed staff of Pluto, or the triple pointed staff of Neptune; while at the same time she holds the apple which marks her own character. I conclude therefore, that the true character of Jupiter Ammon, referred to the origin of mankind: and the ram’s horns on his head, which distinguish him, imply the same as the bull’s horns on the head of Isis, or the bull’s head on the human body. The retention of the v in the Hebrew name, corroborates this idea. Vide AMNON.]

I. AMON, governor of Samaria, kept the prophet Micaiah in custody, by king Ahab’s order, 1 Kings xxii. 26.

II. AMON, fourteenth king of Judah, son of Manasseh and Meshullemeth daughter of Haruz, of Jotbah. He began to reign, A. M. 3363; ante A. D. 641, at the age of twenty-two, and reigned only two years at Jerusalem. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, as his father Manasseh had done, 2 Kings, xxi. 19, 20, 21. He forsook JEHOVAH, and worshipped idols. His servants conspired against him, and slew him in his own house; but the people killed all the conspirators, and established his son Josiah on his throne. He was buried in the garden of Uzzah.

[AMONA, numbering, or preparing, or his multitude, or tumult: Syriac, truth. Ezek. xxxix. 16. Possibly, from another derivation, “heat of Aun;” or rather, “the Aun of the solar flame,” or fire: which points directly at Apollo, or the Sun, as the image intended. There is another root of like formation, from which it may import “Aun, the defender,” or guardian. This idea we find very frequently on on medals, and Jupiter Conservator (or Soter) appears as protector of the Roman emperors in numerous instances. But, taken as from the root intended above, this name may import "the delineator;" he who produces similitudes, or representations on correct principles, and this may describe Apollo, as the god of limners and painters; those who practice the arts of design. Vide AMTHAR and ANAHARATH.]

AMORRITE, or AMORRHÆUS, אַמֹּרִי, Amorrai: bitter; from מָרַר marar: otherwise a rebel; from מָרַר mareh: otherwise, a babbler, or prater; from אָמַר amar.

AMORITES, people descended from Amorrhæus, the fourth son of Canaan. They first peopled the mountains west of the Dead Sea. They had likewise establishments east of the sea, between the brooks Jabbok and Arnon, whence they forced the Ammonites and Moabites, Josh. v. 1; Numb. xiii. 29; xxi. 29. Moses wrested this country from their kings, Sihon, and Og, A. M. 2553; ante A. D. 1451.

The prophet Amos (ii. 9) speaks of their gigantic stature and valour. He compares their height to the cedar; their strength to the oak. The name, Amorite, is often taken in Scripture for Canaanite in general. The lands which the Amorites possessed on this side Jordan, were given to the tribe of Judah, and those beyond the Jordan, to the tribes of Reuben and Gad.

Among the Arabians, some have derived their name, Amorites, from the city of Gomorrhah, one of those which perished by fire from heaven: but Gomorrhah, or Hammorah, Gen. x. 10, (עִמֹּרַי Gomorrhah, אַמֹּרִי Amorrhæus) is written otherwise than Emor, father of the Amorites: so that it is unlikely that either the Amorites, or Emor their father, founded Gomorrhah, and called it after their name.

[1. A people in Mount Lebanon, east of Phenicia.

2. Another people in Mount Gilead, between the rivers Jabbok and Arnon.

3. Another people which inhabited the mountain of Paran, between Sinai and Kadesh Barnea. Gen. xv.

As all these places are mountains, I rather incline to adopt the idea of branching or spreading, as mountains do; which is the direct import of the Hebrew root: meaning "the people which reside in the branches" of Mount Lebanon, or Mount Gilead, or Mount Paran. As the mountains were of great extent, and branched out into various divisions, this notion is by no means unnatural; and it describes these people not by their families, but by their residence.]

AMOS, אַמֹּץ, with (א) aleph: strong, robust; from אָמַץ amatz.

AMOS, אָמֹץ, with (ץ) ain, Omoos: loading, weighty; from אָמַץ omas.

1. AMOS, the fourth of the minor prophets, was, it is said, of the little town of Tekoah, in Judah, four leagues south of Jerusalem. There is no proof, however, that he was a native of this place, except his retirement hither, when driven from Bethel: it is most probable, he was born in the territories of Israel, to which his mission was principally directed.

We find Amos prophecy in Bethel, where the golden calves were erected, under Jeroboam II. about A. M. 3215; ante A. D. 789. Amaziah, high-priest of Bethel, accused him before king Jeroboam, saying, 'Amos hath conspired against thee, in the midst of the house of Israel; the land is not able to bear all his words; for thus Amos saith, "Jeroboam shall die by the sword, and Israel shall surely be led away captive out of their own land." Amaziah said therefore unto Amos, "O thou seer, go, flee thee away into the land of Judah, and there eat bread, and prophecy there; but prophecy not again any more at Bethel, for it is the king's chapel, and it is the king's court." Amos, vii. 10, 11, &c.

Amos answered Amaziah, "I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son; but I was a herdsman, and a dresser of sycamore fruit: and the Lord took me as I followed the flock, and the Lord said unto me, Go, prophecy unto my people Israel. Now, therefore, hear thou the word of the Lord; thou sayest, prophecy not against Israel, and drop not thy word against the house of Isaac. Therefore, thus saith the Lord, thy wife shall be a harlot in the city, and thy sons and thy daughters shall fall by the sword, and thy land shall be divided by line; and thou shalt die in a polluted land, and Israel shall surely go into captivity forth of his land." The prophet then retired into the kingdom of Judah, and dwelt in Tekoah, where he continued to prophecy. [To understand the expression in the foregoing quotation "a dresser of sycamore fruit,"—it should be known, that the sycamore is a sort of fig-tree common in Egypt and Palestine, whose fruit does not ripen till it is pricked with iron nails. After it was thus pricked, it would ripen in three days. See Pliny, lib. xiii. cap. 7. Theophr. & Dioscorid. See likewise Theodoret on Amos vii.] Vide FRAGMENT, No. LXVII.

Amos complains in many places of the violence offered him, to oblige him to silence; and bitterly exclaims against the disorders of Israel. He began to prophecy the second year before the earthquake, in the reign of king Uzziah (Amos, i. 1.) which Josephus, (with most commentators) refers to that prince's usurpation of the priest's office, when he attempted to offer incense. [The Rabbins, and Procopius of Gaza, are of opinion that this happened in the twenty-fifth year of Uzziah, A. M. 3219; but this cannot be: for Jotham, son of Uzziah, born A. M. 3221, was of age to govern, i. e. between fifteen and twenty years of age, when his father undertook to offer incense, and was struck with a leprosy. See Usher. A. M. 3221.]

The first prophecies of Amos, in order of time, are those of the 7th chapter: the others he pronounced in Tekoah, whither he retired. His two first chapters are against Damascus, the Philistines, Tyrians, Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Judah, and Israel. The evils he threatens, refers to the invasions of Salmanezer, Tiglath-pilesser, Sennacherib, and Nebuchadnezzar.

He foretold the misfortunes of the kingdom of Israel, after the death of Jeroboam II. who was then living: the death of king Zechariah; the invasion of Israel by Pul and Tiglath-pilesser, kings of Assyria: the captivity of the ten tribes, and their return. He uses sharp invectives against the sins of Israel, their effeminacy, avarice, and harshness to the poor; the splendor of their buildings, and the delicacy of their tables. He reproves Israel for going to Bethel, Dan, Gilgal, and Beersheba, which were the most famous pilgrimages of the country; and for swearing by the gods of those places.

The time and manner of his death are not known. Some old authors relate, (Cyrril. Præfat. in Amos.) that Amaziah, priest of Bethel, provoked by the discourses of this prophet, to silence him, had his teeth broke; others say, that Hosea, or Uzziah, son of Amaziah, struck him with a stake on the temples, and almost killed him; that in this condition he was carried to Tekoah, where he died, and was buried with his fathers: on the contrary, it is our opinion, that he prophesied at Tekoah long after his expulsion by Amaziah: and the prophet not complaining of ill treatment received from Uzziah, his silence is probable evidence, that he suffered nothing from him. Epiphanius, de vita Prophet. cap. 12. Isidorus, de vita & morte SS. cap. 43. Dorotheus, Synops. cap. 2, Chronic. Pascal. p. 147.

There is nothing sublime in the style of Amos. Jerom, Prolog. exposit. in Amos. applies to him the words of Paul, "rude in speech though not in knowledge," 2 Cor. xi. 6. As every one chooses to speak of his own art, as being most familiar to him, Amos generally selects his comparisons from rustic life, wherein he had been brought up. St. Austin observes, de Doctr. Christ. lib. iv. cap. 7. that there is a certain kind of eloquence in the sacred writers, directed by the Spirit of Wisdom, and so adapted to the nature of the things they treat of, that even those who accuse their writings of rusticity and unpoliteness, could not choose a style more suitable, were they themselves to have spoken on the same subjects, to the same persons, and in the same circumstances.

[It should also be remarked,—that as God had his prophets in Judah, where he was professedly worshipped, so he had in Israel, though that country and kingdom was depraved:—that as he had Isaiah in a royal court, and of the royal blood, so he had Amos, who was a herdman, who could speak with advantage to the lower classes of people, could warn and admonish them with no less usefulness, and perhaps with more acceptance, than if he had been of superior rank. This should seem to be certain of Israel; and, perhaps, may be applied to the same descriptions of persons in Moab, and other nations, to whom this prophet might send his prophecies, and to whom his style of language might be peculiarly adapted.]

II. Amos, father of the prophet Isaiah, was, it is said, son of king Joash, and brother to Amaziah. The Rabbins pretend, that Amos, Isaiah's father, was a prophet, as well as his son, according to a rule among them, that when the father of a prophet is called in Scripture by his name, it is an indication, that he also had the gift of prophecy. Ex Hebr. vide Isai xxxvii. 21; xxxviii. 1; Clem. Alex. lib. i. Stromat. St. Austin conjectured, de Civit. Dei, lib. xviii. cap. 27. that the prophet Amos, the fourth among the minor prophets, was the father of Isaiah: but the names of these two persons are written differently, (אִמּוֹץ אֹמֵץ, father of Isaiah: אֹמֵץ אֹמֵץ, the prophet Amos). Besides, Amos, Isaiah's father, was, as well as Isaiah himself, of Jerusalem, and of much superior quality to the prophet Amos. Some are of opinion, that the man of God who spake to king Amaziah, and obliged him to send back the hundred thousand men of Israel, whom he had purchased to march against the Edomites, (2 Chron. xxv. 7, 8) was Amos, the father of Isaiah, and brother to king Amaziah. But this opinion is supported by no proofs. Vide ISAIAS.

III. Amos, son of Nahum, and father of Matathias, in the genealogy of our Saviour, Luke iii. 25.

[AMOSA, the yoke, or contrivance, or leaven, compression. Josh. xviii. 26. Moza, a city of Benjamin.

Possibly, the squeezed place; q. d. a little pent up, compressed, narrow town, &c. or taken actively, possibly "the squeezer;" as of the juice of grapes, by Bacchus. Simon thinks, "sufficient" that to which nothing is lacking.]

AMPHIPOLIS, Ἀμφίπολις: a city encompassed

ed by the sea; from the Greek ἀμφι, to surround, and πόλις, a city.

AMPHIPOLIS, a city between Macedonia and Thrace, but dependant on Macedonia: mentioned Acts xvii. 1. Paul and Silas being delivered out of prison, left Philippi, went to Thessalonica, and passed through Amphipolis. This city had the name likewise of Chrysopolis, or Christopolis. See the Plates of MEDALS.

[Amphipolis was originally reckoned to Thrace, but under the Macedonian empire, it was included in Macedonia. Before the expedition of Xerxes into Greece, it was called the nine ways, says Thucydides, lib. iv. The Athenians took it, and called it Amphipolis, because it was every where surrounded by the river Strymon: but Suidas says, because this place was entirely surrounded with habitations. Philip, son of Amyrtus, king of Macedon, having received various injuries from the inhabitants, assaulted and took the town by means of his battering engines. In the division of Macedonia by Paulus Emilius, it was made the chief city of the first region of Macedonia; and a metropolis.]

AMPHORA, is a Latin word, often taken in the Vulgate in an appellative sense for a pitcher, or vessel to hold wine or water: e. gr. Luke xxii. 10, "There shall a man meet you bearing a pitcher of water," (κεράμιον, Gr.) amphoram aquæ portans: at other times it is taken for a certain measure; Dan. xiv. 3. Apoc. "There were spent every day on the idol Bel, six vessels of wine," vini amphoræ sex. The amphora is not a Hebrew measure, and this place is not extant in Hebrew.

The Roman amphora contained two urna, equal to 48 sestarii, or 80 pounds, at twelve ounces to the pound: but the Attic or Athenian amphora, contained three urna, or 120 pounds, at twelve ounces each; but which make only 90, at sixteen ounces to the pound. [The amphora, in Dr. Arbuthnot's account of it, contained seven English gallons and one wine pint; the urna three gallons, four wine pints and a half; the sextarius one wine pint.

AMPLIAS, Ἀμπλιας: a Latin word, signifying large, extensive.

AMPLIAS, mentioned by St. Paul, Rom. xvi. 8. as one whom he particularly loved. It is not certainly known who he was, nor his life. The Greeks say, he was ordained bishop of Odysopolis in Mæsia, by St. Andrew; was an apostolical person, at least one of the seventy-two disciples, and a martyr. They observe his festival October 31.

AMRAM, עמרם, Ἀμβραμ: exalted people; from עַם am, a people, and רָם rum, or רַם ram, lifted up: otherwise, their sheaves, or handfuls of corn; from עמר omer, and the affix מם mem, theirs: otherwise, with the most high; from the preposition עַם om, with, and רָם ram, or רַם ram, high, exalted.

AMRAM, עמרם an ass; from עמרם chamor, or chemer.

I. AMRAM, son of Kohath, of Levi, married Jochebed, by whom he had Aaron, Miriam, and Moses. He died in Egypt, aged 137, Exod. vi. 20.

II. AMRAM son of Bani, one who after the return from Babylon, separated from his wife, married contrary to the law, Ezra, x. 34.

AMRAMITES, עמרמי, Ἀμραμι: from the same.

AMRAPHEL, עמרפל, אמרפל: one that speaks of hidden things; from עמר amar, to speak; and פל phala, secret, mysterious: otherwise, one that speaks of judgment; from פלל pillel, to judge: otherwise, of ruin; from פלח paluch.

AMRAPHEL, king of Shinar confederated with Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, and two other kings, to make war against the kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, and the three neighbouring cities, which they plundered, and carried off many captives, among whom was Lot, Abraham's nephew; but Abraham pursued them, retook Lot, and recovered the spoil. Gen. xiv. A. M. 2092; ante A. D. 1912.

AMTHAR, דמות, Ἀμαθαρ: form, figure; from דמות thoar: otherwise, he that curses death; from דמות avar, to curse; and דמות meth, or moth, death.

[This is a different reading from that followed in our translation: it appears to be the place called RIMMON METHOAR.

The first sense seems the most probable: "the town at the allotment," or place marked out; or the town, whose proportions, streets, principal edifices, &c. were regularly laid down by a plan: no very common occurrence in the east.

Or perhaps, the deity worshipped here was like Minerva, or Apollo, the patron of art and skill; so that he was the author or encourager of skill in limning, portraiture, or design: for the word tar signifies, to delineate, draw, mark out, or depict. Vide ANAHARATH. This is supposing that Amthar be the true reading: which we do not affirm.]

AMULETS, or Preservatives, were usually certain characters, ligaments, stones, or metals, engraved or adorned with stars, &c. to which was attributed a power of preserving the wearer from mischief, from witchcraft, and from diseases. Some are of opinion, that Laban's Tera-phim (Gen. xxxi. 19) carried off by Rachel; also the ear-rings which Jacob hid under an oak, Gen. xxxv. 4. were preservatives or amulets. Vide TALISMANS.

AMZI, עמצי, Ἀμασι: strong, robust; from עמץ amatz, amatz. Son of Zechariah, and father to Peliliah, Neh. xi. 12.

ANAB, or Oneb, ענב: grapes, or, bunch of grapes: otherwise, naked, bond; from ענן hanad: [Syriac, a knot.]

[Perhaps conjunction, combination, the connection of settlers; settlers united into one town, as grapes are united into one bunch: but some think it imports the place of the bunch of grapes, i. e. where grapes were abundant. Perhaps it may only refer to connection, whether of settlers, or of the sexes.]

ANAB, a city in the mountains of Judah, Josh. xi. 21. St. Jerom believes it to be the same with Beth-anaba, eight miles east of Diospolis: Eusebius places Betho-anab four miles from Diospolis. Epiphanius speaks of a city or village called Anahlata, in the diocese of Jerusalem, towards Bethel, Epiph. Epist. ad Joan. Ierosol. but, perhaps, neither of these is the Anab mentioned by Joshua, which, with Hebron and Debir, he seems to place more to the south of Judah.

ANAGLYPHA, Ἀνάγλυφα, Celata, signifies figures in relievo, or embossed, Opera signi, as Virgil speaks, Aeneid, v. 267.; or in asperitatem excisa, as Pliny terms them, are what we call Anaglyphs. Pliny, lib. xxxiii. cap. 11.

But the passage (1 Kings, vi. 32) where this word occurs in LXX, signifies, beside, palm-trees, cherubim, and blown lilies all round the wall, within the sanctuary. Solomon carved these in basso relievo, on the doors of the sanctuary.

ANAGOGICAL. This is one of the four senses in which Scripture may be interpreted, viz. the literal, allegorical, anagogical, and tropological. The anagogical sense is, when the text is explained with a regard to the end, which Christians should have in view, i. e. eternal life: for example, the Rest of the sabbath, in the anagogical sense, corresponds to the repose of everlasting blessedness.

ANAH, ענה, Evav: one who answers, or who sings responsively; from ענה ana, to answer, to sing: otherwise, poor or afflicted; from עני oni.

ANAH, son of Zibeon, the Hivite, and father of Aholibamah, Esau's wife, Genes. xxxvi. 24. while feeding asses in the desert, he discovered "springs of warm water." Thus Jerom translates the Hebrew, מָצָא מַתְּחִילִים, "he found the jemim;" the Syriac says, "a fountain." The LXX, and others, preserve the term, he found jamim, or the jamim: others, he discovered the manner of producing mules (i. e. by union of a horse and an ass) but Scripture never calls mules jamim, nor are such creatures hinted at in Scripture, till after the time of David. It is most likely, that Anah found, i. e. attacked, surprized, a people called Jemim, in the wilderness, where he was feeding asses. The Samaritan reads, 'the Emim;' whom Moses mentions as a people, Gen. xiv. 5, also, Deut. ii. 10, "The Emim dwelt therein in time past, a people great and many, and tall as the Anakim." These Emim dwelt in the neighbourhood of Seir, where Anah fed his asses. The Hebrew term מָצָא, maja, which signifies to find, is taken often for—the sudden attacking, or surprizing, of an enemy.

Some have thought, but without proof, that Anah was exalted to divine honours, and is named, 2 Kings, xix. 13, where it is said, the Sepharvaim adored Henah, or Anah, and Ivah. Vide Isaiah, xxxvii. 13. [It has lately been conjectured, that from Henah, derive the Heneti—who were famous for breeding mules; and whose posterity were afterwards called, Veneti (quasi Ve-Heneti): whence the Venetians; whose doge still [lately] retains the Phrygian bonnet, as his crown of state.]

ANAHARATH, ענחרת, dryness, inflammation; from ענן charar: otherwise, anger, from ערה chareh: otherwise, neighing: according to the Syriac suffocation. A city of Issachar, Josh. xix. 19.

[Some think a roaring groan; as of wild beasts, &c. Perhaps, Aun, the progenitor, charat sculpture: i. e. either the sculptured figure of Aun, or Aun the inventor of sculpture, and representation: the object of the first image; or the maker of the first image. Possibly this title agrees with the sense of Amthar. Vide AMTHAR and AMONA.]

ANAK, or Onac, ענק: a collar, or ornament. Some derive from hence the Greek word ἀναξ, anax, a king.

ANAK, ANAKIM, famous giants in Palestine. Anak, father of the Anakim, was son of Arba, who gave name to Kirjath-Arba, or Hebron. Anak had three sons, Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai, whose descendants were terrible for their fierceness and stature: the Hebrew spies reported, that in comparison to those monstrous men, they themselves were but grass-hoppers. Some have thought, that the name Phenician, given to the Canaanites, and particularly to the Sidonians, was originally from Bene-Anak, sons of Anak.

Caleb, assisted by the tribe of Judah, took Kirjath-Arba, and destroyed the Anakim, A. M. 2559. Josh. xv. 14; Judges, i. 20.

ANAKIM, ענקים: from the same.

ANAMIM, עינים Avequein: a fountain, or eye; from עין ain, and מים mim, waters: otherwise answer, song, affliction; from ענה ana, &c. [Gen. x. 13. The Samaritan reads Ainamin: it is observable, that Saadias, in his Arabic version, version, renders the Alexandrians. Jonathan, the Jerusalem Targum, and the Chaldee interpreter on Chronicles, reads Marithai, as if they had in idea the lake Mareotis.

That the people intended should be placed in or near Egypt, appears unquestionable; but in what part of that country it is difficult to determine. Some suppose the name implies "many flocks," or riches: but it is more probably patronymic.]

ANANIM, second son of Mizraim. He peopled the Mareotis, if we may rely on the paraphrast Jonathan, son of Uzziel; but rather, the Pentapolis of Cyrene, according to the paraphrast of Jerusalem. Bochart was of opinion, that these Ananim dwelt in the countries around the temple of Jupiter Ammon, and in the Nasamonitis. We believe the Amanians and Garamantes to be descended from Ananim. The Hebrew Ger, or Gar, signifies a passenger or traveller. The name of Gar-amantes may be derived from Ger-ananim: their capital is called Garamania, in Solinus.

ANAMMELECH, אנמלך; answer, or song of the king or council; from ענה anah, answer, and מלך melek, of the king, or of council, according to the Chaldee etymology; or, the king.

ANAMMELECH. It is said, 2 Kings, xvii. 31, that the inhabitants of Sepharvaim, sent from beyond the Euphrates to settle in Samaria, burned their children in honour of Anammelech and Adrammelech. [We have hinted that Adrammelech signified the sun, or splendid king, and Anammelech the moon, or gentle king; but this name may be composed of ענן onan, a cloud, and מלך melek, king. "The king of clouds," is no less a proper poetical epithet for the moon, than "regent of night," as one of our own poets calls that planet; but, perhaps, the distinguishing symbol of this idol was a cloud of gold, or, &c. annexed to its statue: this is conjecture only, as no such adjunct appears to its representation.] Vide ADRAMMELECH. Vide Plate of BAAL, and FRAGMENT. No. CVIII, and MEDALS, plate of PARTHIA.

ANAN, or Onen, ענן; cloud; otherwise, sooth-saying, the art of divination.

ANANI, or Oneni, ענני; my augury, my cloud. Seventh son of Elienai, 1 Chron. iii. 24.

ANANIAS, or Onenieh, ענניה; cloud of the Lord; from ענן anan, and יה jah.

I. ANANIAS. In the Apocryphal history of Tobit, when the angel Raphael offers himself to bear Tobias company to Rages, he calls himself Azarias, son of Ananias the Great: Tobit answered, that he was then, of an illustrious extraction, Tobit v. 12.

II. ANANIAS, or Ananiah, of Benjamin, returned from the Babylonish captivity, built part of the walls of Jerusalem, Nehem. xi. 32.

III. ANANIAS, a Jewish merchant, who converted Izates, son of Monobazes, king of the Adiabeniens, to Judaism. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 1.

Orosius, lib. vii. cap. 6. insists, that Ananias was a Christian, and that Izates was converted to Christianity by him. Vide ADIABENE. This conversion happened about A. D. 41.

IV. ANANIAS, son of Nebedæus, high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Joseph, son of Camith, A. M. 4050,—A. D. 47. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 3. Quadratus, governor of Syria, coming into Judæa, on the discontents which prevailed among the Samaritans and Jews, sent the high-priest, Ananias, to Rome, to answer for his conduct to the Emperor Claudius: he justified himself, was acquitted, and returned.

St. Paul being apprehended at Jerusalem, by the tribune of the Roman troops which guarded the temple, declared himself to be a citizen of Rome; which obliged that officer to treat him with some consideration. Acts, xxii. 23, 24; xxiii. 1, 2, 3, &c. As the tribune did not know of what the Jews accused St. Paul, the next day he convened the priests, and placed the apostle before them, that he might justify himself. St. Paul said to them, "Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day." He had scarcely spoken, when the high-priest, Anunias, commanded those who were near him, to strike him on the face: the apostle to this injury and insult replied, "God is about to smite thee, thou whited wall; for, thou sittest to judge me according to the law, but commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law?" They that stood by said, "Reviest thou God's high priest?" Then said Paul, "I wist not, brethren, that he who spoke was the high-priest; for it is written, thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people." Vide PAUL.

After this, the assembly being divided in opinion, the tribune ordered Paul to Cæsarea, that Felix, governor of the province, might take cognizance of this affair.

When the priests understood that St. Paul was arrived at Cæsarea, Ananias, the high-priest, and other Jews, went thither to accuse him (Acts, xxiv); but the affair was adjourned, and St. Paul continued two years there in prison. His prediction to Ananias, that God would smite him, was accomplished in the following manner, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 8. Albinus, governor of Judæa, being arrived in that country, Ananias found means to gain him by presents: and now he was considered as the first man of his nation by reason of his great riches, friends, and fortune: but he had some violent people in his party, who plundered the country and seized the tythes of the priests; and this they did with impunity, impunity, on account of the great credit of their master, and his wealth, at Jerusalem.

At the same time, several companies of assassins infested Judæa, and committed great ravages. When any of their companions were taken by the officers of the province, and were about to be executed, they never failed to seize some domestic, or relation of the high-priest Ananias, whereby to force him to procure the liberty of their associates, in exchange for those whom they detained. Thus they took Eleazar, one of Ananias's sons, and did not release him till ten of their companions were returned to them: under this system of licentiousness, their number increased, and the country suffered exceedingly.

At last Eleazar, his son, himself, heading a party of mutineers, seized the temple, and forbade any sacrifices to be offered for the emperor; the assassins joining with him, he pulled down his father's house, who, hiding himself with his brother in the aqueducts belonging to the royal palace, was soon discovered by the seditious, and both of them were killed; the faction taking no notice of Ananias' being the father of their leader. Thus God smote this whited wall, in the very beginning of the Jewish wars. Joseph. lib. ii. de Bello, cap. 38.

We are to distinguish what Josephus says of Ananias, when high-priest, from what he relates of the same Ananias, when deposed from the pontificate; lest we fall into the mistake of those who have made two persons of him.

V. ANANIAS, surnamed the Sadducee, was one of the warmest defenders of the rebellion of the Jews against the Romans. He was sent by Eleazar, leader of the mutineers, to Metilius captain of the Roman troops, who was shut up in the royal palace at Jerusalem, to promise him and his people their lives, provided they would leave the place, and surrender their arms: but, Metilius having surrendered on these conditions, the factious murdered all the Romans, except Metilius only, who promised to turn Jew, A. D. 66. De Bello, lib. ii. cap. 18. seu, 32, in Gr.

Ananias was also sent by Eleazar, to the Idumeans, A. D. 66, requesting they would come to assist the rebels at Jerusalem, against Ananus, whom they accused of designing to deliver up the city to the Romans, A. D. 67. Joseph. lib. iv. de Bello, cap. 6. seu, 15, in Gr.

VI. ANANIAS, son of Mashbal, of the priestly race, originally of Emmaus, was put to death by Simon, head of a party of malcontents, with fifteen other principal Jews of the city, during the last siege of Jerusalem by the Romans. Joseph. de Bello, lib. vi. cap. 15.

VII. ANANIAS, one of the first Christians of Jerusalem, who, in concert with his wife, Sapphira, sold an estate, and secreted part of the purchase-money; then carried the remainder to the Apostles, as the whole price of his inheritance. Acts, v. 1, 2, 3, & seq. But Peter, to whom the Holy Ghost revealed the falsehood of this pretension, reproved him sharply, telling him "that he had lied to the Holy Ghost, not to men only." Ananias fell suddenly dead at his feet. About two or three hours after, his wife, Sapphira, ignorant of what had passed, came into the assembly, Peter, having put the same question to her, as before to her husband, she also was guilty of the like falsehood; and was suddenly struck dead in the same manner. This happened not long after the Ascension, A. D. 33 or 34.

Some have been curious to enquire wherein consisted the sin of Ananias and Sapphira? Many of the ancients thought, that when the first believers resolved to make sale of their estates, this resolution included a kind of vow to reserve nothing; and that Ananias and Sapphira violated this vow, and were therefore guilty, in some sense, or in some degree, of perjury and sacrilege; herein committing a mortal sin: and if to this be added, their lying to the Holy Ghost, and their affront in tempting him, their crime appears still greater. Hieronym. Ep. 8. Basil. Serm. 1, de Inst. Monach. Chrysost. & Œcumen. in Act. v. Cyprian. lib. iii. ad Quirin. Aug. Serm. olim. 10, de diversis, nunc 148, n. 2. Gregor. Magn. lib. i. Registri Ep. olim. 31, nunc 34. Sancti. Tirin. Cornel. Grot. &c.

Origen, Jerom, Austin, Petrus Damianus, and some moderns, incline in favour of Ananias's salvation: Chrysostom, Basil, and others, to the contrary: there appears to have been no mark of repentance, nor any interval between crime and death. Of questions more curious than necessary, it is best to leave the decision to God. Origen. in Matt. edit. Huet. p. 383. Hieronym. Ep. ad Demetria. Aug. Serm. 148, & lib. iii. cap. 1. contra Parmen. Petr. Damiani lib. de contemptu sæculi, cap. 3. Sancti. Salmeron. Carthus. a Lapide. Chrysost. in Act. v. Basil. Serm. 1, de Instit. Monach.

[The causes which induced the Holy Spirit thus to punish the falsehood of Ananias and Sapphira, might possibly be as follows: (1) In the infancy of the church, to give a solemn notoriety and a self-evident sanction to the doctrine introducing; not merely by miracles of advantage (as healing) but by miracles of punishment. (2) To deter those who through worldly motives of gain, or with design to participate in the profits of the goods sold, might join the Christian church. (3) To deter spies, and false brethren, who could not but be aware of the danger of detection, tection, in all cases, after this event. (4.) If Ananias only had died, the collusion would have been less evident, and it might have seemed a mere sudden death, produced by a natural cause. (5.) Herein was the gospel, in some degree, assimilated to the law; which, directly after the law of the sabbath was given, ordered the sabbath-breaker to be stoned (Numb. xv. 35): so after the consecration of the holy altar, destroyed the sons of Aaron, who offered profane fire in their censers, Lev. x. 30. The same in the case of Achan, Josh. vii. and in other instances.

It is evident, that in this and similar events, there must have been a conviction in the minds of bye-standers, and in civil magistrates of places, that some power extraordinary was exerted: for, had Peter himself slain Ananias, he had, no doubt, been amenable to the laws as a murderer: but, if by declaration only, he slew him; or, if by forewarning him he should die, and the prediction came to pass; then (as no man has power to kill another by his word only) it is evident the power which attended this word of Peter, did not proceed from Peter, but from God, who, only, has the keys of life and death: in like manner, as the power which opened the earth to swallow down Korah, was not from Moses, personally, but from him in whose name he spake (Numb. xvi. 24); though the people afterwards, stupidly accused him of having killed the people of the Lord.]

VIII. ANANIAS, a disciple of Christ, at Damascus, whom the Lord directed to visit Paul, then lately converted, and arrived at Damascus, Acts ix. 10. Ananias answered, "Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy saints," &c. But the Lord said unto him, "Go thy way, for he is a chosen vessel unto me." Ananias went therefore to the house where God had informed him that Paul resided, and putting his hands on him, said, "Brother Saul, the Lord Jesus, who appeared unto thee on the road, hath sent me that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost." We know no other circumstance of the life of Ananias: the Apostolical Constitutions, lib. viii. cap. ult. believe him to be a layman; Eucumenius, in Act. ix. ex Canone supra citato, and some moderns think he was a deacon; St. Austin, Qu. lib. ii. cap. 40, thinks he was a priest, because it is said, that St. Paul was sent to him, that he might from his hands receive that sacrament, the administration whereof was left, by Christ, to the priesthood of his church: an argument sufficiently weak! The modern Greeks maintain, that he was one of the seventy disciples, bishop of Damascus, a martyr, and buried in that city. There is a very fine church, where he was interred; and the Turks, who have made a mosque of it, preserve a great respect for his monument. The Greeks observe his festival, October 1; the Latins, January 25.

IX. ANANIAS. Thus some of the ancients call St. Anian, bishop of Alexandria, after St. Mark.

I. ANANUS, son of Seth, high-priest of the Jews, called Annas, Luke iii. 2, John xviii. 13. He succeeded Joazar, son of Simon; he enjoyed the high-priesthood eleven years, was then deposed, and succeeded by Ishmael, son of Phabi. After he was deposed, he still retained the title of high-priest, and had a great share in the management of public affairs. He is called high-priest, in conjunction with Caiaphas, when John the Baptist entered on the exercise of his mission, though at that time he did not, strictly speaking, possess or officiate in that character, Luke iii. 2. He was father-in-law to Caiaphas. Jesus Christ was carried before Annas, directly after his seizure in the garden of Olives. Josephus remarks, that Ananus was regarded as one of the happiest men of his nation, five of his sons having been high-priests; which great dignity he himself had possessed many years: an instance of good fortune which, till then, had happened to no one.

II. ANANUS, son to Ananus, the high-priest, mentioned above, was high-priest three months, A. D. 62. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 8, describes him as a man extremely bold and enterprising, of the sect of the Sadducees; who, thinking it a favourable opportunity, after the death of Festus, governor of Judæa, and before the arrival of Albinus, his successor, assembled the Sanhedrim, and therein procured the condemnation of James the brother (or relation, or cousin) of Christ, who is often called the bishop of Jerusalem; and of some others, whom they stigmatized as guilty of impiety; and delivered them to be stoned. This was extremely displeasing to all considerate men in Jerusalem, and they sent privately to king Agrippa, who was come from Alexandria into Judæa, entreating that he would forbid Ananus from every thing of the like nature in future. The king, to punish his unwarrantable confidence, deprived him of the high-priesthood, after three months possession of it, and conferred it on Jesus, son of Damnaus: nearly at the same time, the new governor, Albinus, who was advancing from Alexandria to Jerusalem, having likewise been informed of Ananus's proceedings, wrote to him in a threatening manner, that he would curb his insolence, as soon as he should enter the city.

It is probable, that this is the Ananus, who, A. D. 66, by the council of the Jews, was nominated governor of Jerusalem. See M. de Tillemont, note 25, on the destruction of the Jews.

R

Josephus,

Josephus, de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 42, commends the prudence of this governor, mentions him as a just man, a great lover of peace, zealous for the public good, vigilant, and careful of the people's interests: qualities very different from those which he attributes to him, where he is relating the death of James: but age might have allayed that fire of youth, and that excessive boldness, which was then blameable in him.

The zealots, who were masters of the temple, having invited the Idumæans to their assistance, and to defend Jerusalem, against Ananus, whom they designed to render suspected, as one who corresponded with the Romans, Ananus shut the gates against them; but the Idumæans having entered by night, during a great storm, sought for Ananus, and having easily found him, they murdered him with much insult, and left his body exposed to beasts, and deprived of burial. Josephus says, the death of Ananus was the first step toward the destruction of Jerusalem—that its walls and strongest ramparts were overthrown, when this man, in whose wise conduct, all the hope of preservation consisted, was sacrificed so unworthily. This happened A. D. 67. De Bello, lib. iv. cap. 17, 18.

III. ANANUS, native of Lydda, a captain of the Jews; who being accused before Quadratus, of fomenting that division which had arisen between the Jews and Samaritans, was sent to Rome, with the high-priest Ananias, to give the emperor, Claudius, an account of his conduct. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 5.

IV. ANANUS, son of Jonathan, did all he could to hinder the Jews from rebelling against the Romans: he, with some others, intended to introduce Cestius into the city; but the Romans being discovered by the factious, were driven from the walls with stones; and Ananus and his party retired for shelter to their houses. Joseph. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 24.

V. ANANUS, a native of Emmaus, was one of the guards of Simon who commanded the rebels. He surrendered himself to Titus, with one Archelaus, son of Magadatus; Titus received them with clemency; but seeing that pure necessity had obliged them to surrender, he did not treat them as he had done other Jews, who had formerly come to him, but granted them their lives only; with permission to go where they would. At first, he had resolved to put them to death, as villains who abandoned the defence of their country, after they had set it in a flame. Joseph. de Bello, lib. vii. cap. 7.

ANARCHY, Ἀναρχία, ubi nullus imperat, signifies properly, the condition of a city, commonwealth, or state, without a head, or sovereign: e. gr. it is said, Judges xvii. 6; xviii. 1, 31; xxi. 25. "In those days there was no king in Israel, but every man did that which was right in his own eyes." This is a true description of an anarchy. The first anarchy we know of in the Hebrew commonwealth, ensued on the death of Joshua: that great man dying without appointing his successor, and the people having chosen no general, or chief leader, in his stead, the government devolved to the elders of the respective tribes, who governed each according to his own mind. Joshua died A. M. 2561. The elders governed about fifteen years, to A. M. 2576, and there was an absolute anarchy for about eight years, till towards A. M. 2591, ante A. D. 1413.

After the death of these elders, the anarchy became greater; and it is generally believed, that during this interval several occurrences happened, the histories of which are placed at the end of the book of Judges, viz. the story of Micah, and the idol set up in his house, Judg. xvii.;—that of the Danites, who left their country to settle at Laish, Judg. xviii; and—the history of the Levite, whose wife was dishonoured at Gibeah; which produced a war against Benjamin, Judg. xix, xx, xxi. We reckon, with Usher, that this anarchy lasted about twenty-two years, from the death of Joshua, A. M. 2561, to the first servitude of the Hebrews, under Chushan Rishathaim, A. M. 2591; allowing about fifteen years for the government of the elders after the death of Joshua; and seven for the anarchy, from that time to the dominion of Chushan Rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia (Judg. iii.) which begun A. M. 2591, and was terminated A. M. 2599, by the valour of Othniel.

It deserves particular observation, that no point of chronology is more perplexed than the anarchies, particularly those which happened under the Judges. Every writer computes them his own way. There is said to have been an interregnum of eleven or twelve years under the kings, between Jeroboam II. and Zechariah; but we think, says Calmet, we have shown the contrary. Some maintain, there was another anarchy after the reign of Pekah; but we see no proof of it. The captivity of Babylon is not properly an anarchy, but a dispersion, and a captivity of the Jewish nation.

ANATH, or Onet, עַנַּת: answer, song; from עָנָה ana: otherwise, affliction, poverty; from עָנִי ouni. Father of Shamgar, judge of Israel, Judg. iii. 31.

ANATHEMA, Ἀνάθεμα, ab avartōmē, signifies—something set apart, separated, devoted. It is understood principally to denote the absolute, irrevocable, and entire, separation of a person from the communion of the faithful, or from the number of the living, or from the privileges of society; or, the devoting of any man, animal, city, or thing, to be extirpated, destroyed, consumed, and, as it were, annihilated.

The

The Hebrew cherem cherem, signifies properly, to destroy, exterminate, devote. Moses requires the Israelites to devote, and utterly extirpate, those who sacrifice to false gods. Exod. xxii. 20. In like manner, God commands that the cities belonging to the Canaanites which did not surrender to the Israelites, should be devoted, Deut. vii. 2, 26; xx. 17. Achan having purloined part of the spoil of Jericho, which had been devoted, he was stoned, and what he had secreted, was consumed with fire, Josh. vi. 17, 21; vii.

The word cherem, or anathema, is sometimes taken for that which is irrevocably consecrated, vowed, or offered to the Lord, so that it may no longer be employed in, or return to, common uses, Lev. xxvii. 28, 29. No devoted thing (absolutely separated) that a man shall devote (absolutely separate) to the Lord, of man, beast, or field, shall be sold or redeemed, &c. Some assert, that persons thus devoted were put to death; and quote Jephthah's daughter as an example: Vide JEPHTHAH. [In the old Greek writers, anathema is used for a person, who, on some occasion, devoted himself for the good of his country; or as an expiatory sacrifice to the infernal gods.—Here the reader will recollect Codrus and Curtius.] Sometimes particular persons, or cities, were devoted: the Israelites devoted king Arad's country (Numb. xxi. 2, 3): the people at Mizpeh devoted all who should not march against the tribe of Benjamin (Judg. xix.): Saul devoted those who should eat before sun-set, while they were pursuing the Philistines (1 Sam. xiv. 24). It appears by the execution of these execrations, that those involved in them were put to death.

Sometimes particular persons devoted themselves, if they did not accomplish some specific purpose. Acts, xxiii. 12, 13, above forty persons bound themselves with an oath, that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul. The Essenians were engaged by oaths to observe the statutes of their sect; and they who incurred the guilt of excommunication, were driven from their assemblies, and generally starved to death, being obliged to feed on grass like beasts, not daring to receive food which might be offered them, because they were bound by the vows they had made, not to eat any. Joseph. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 12.

Moses (Exod. xxxii. 31) and St. Paul (Rom. ix. 3) in some sort anathematize themselves: Moses conjures God to forgive Israel; if not, to blot him out of the book which he had written; and Paul says that he could wish to be accursed [anathematized, absolutely separated from life, devoted, and made over to death—whether stoning—burning—or in the most tremendous form—as Achan, &c.] for his brethren, the Israelites, rather than see them excluded from the blessings of Christ's covenant, by their malice and obduracy; [i. e. he would, as it were, change places with them; they were now excluded from being the peculiar people of God; so would he be: they were devoted to wrath in the destruction of their state, Jerusalem, &c. so would he be: they were excluded from Christian society; so would he be: if it would benefit them.—I COULD WISH myself anathematized from the body of Christ, if that might advantage Israel: so great is my affection to my nation and people!]

Excommunication, anathema, and excision, are the greatest penalties that can be inflicted on any man, in this world; whether we understand a violent and ignominious death, or a separation from the society of saints, with exclusion from the benefit of their prayers, and communion in things sacred. Interpreters are much divided on these texts: but they agree, that Moses and Paul gave, in these instances, the most powerful proofs of a perfect charity, and in the strongest manner expressed their ardent desire, to procure or to promote the happiness of their brethren. Vide MOSES, and PAUL.

[Another kind of anathema very peculiarly expressed, seems to mean a very different thing from that explained above: it occurs, 1 Cor. xvi. 22. Anathema Maranatha—i. e. he who does not love, the Lord Jesus, will be accursed at his coming." The form is borrowed from the Jews; who, when unable to inflict so great a punishment as a crime deserved, devoted the culprit to the immediate vindictive retribution of Divine vengeance, both in this life (for they expected a miserable death to befall such) and in the future state. It is impossible to suppose, that Moses or Paul could, in any degree, wish for such an imprecation to attach on themselves: they better knew their duty, and God's sovereignty. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XXX.

Is it quite impossible that St. Paul meant to say, "I could wish myself anathematized, devoted, like as Christ had been devoted," i. e. by the Jews—(απο τη Χριστη)—"one man suffering that the whole nation perish not." The general benevolence and history of the apostle, render this idea plausible.]

Excommunication was a kind of anathema used among the Hebrews, as it is now among Christians. Anathema was the greatest degree of excommunication, whereby the criminal was deprived not only of communicating in prayers and other holy offices, but of admittance to the church, and of conversation with believers. Among the Hebrews, excommunicated persons could not perform any public duty of their employments; could be neither judges nor witnesses; nor be present at funerals, nor circumcise their own sons, nor sit down in the company of others, nearer than four cubits: they were incapable of the rites of burial; and a large stone was left on their graves, or the people threw stones on their sepulchres, and heaped stones over them, as over Achan, Josh. vii. 26; and Absalom, 2 Sam. xviii. 17. Vide Selden, de Jure Nat. & Gent. lib. iv. cap. 1. [Vide John ix. 22, 34. xii. 42.]

ANATHOTH, or Onethuth, אנתות: Vide ANATH.

[ANATHOTH, Answers, or songs, or affliction, or poverty.

The former idea of this name appears to be utterly contrary to the latter. From the turn of words employed by the prophet Isaiah, x. 30. "O poor Anathoth!" it is extremely probable that poverty is its radical import. This is not inconsistent with the idea of depression, as if this town stood in a low place, whence it might be called low-town, or town of depression; and the prophet exclaims, "O Anathoth! (depression) truly depressed!" The name is plural, so that possibly it was not a single town. It is said, that the ruins of this town are shewn in a valley, in the middle of mountains. Roberts, Itin. p. 70. Monconys, p. 301.]

I. ANATHOTH, a city of Benjamin, about three miles from Jerusalem, according to Eusebius, in Anathoth, and St. Jerom, in Jerem. i. and xxxi: or twenty furlongs, according to Josephus, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 10. Here the prophet Jeremiah was born: it was given to the Levites of Kohath's family; and was a city of refuge. This city is destroyed.

II. ANATHOTH, eighth son of Becher, 1 Chron. vii. 8.

ANAVIAH, or Onieh, אנהי answer, or affliction of the Lord; from אנהי jah, the Lord, and אנהי oni.

ANCHIALUS. This word is particularly noticed by critics who have written on Jewish affairs. We meet with it in Martial:

*Eccæ negas—jurasque mihi per Templâ tonantis:
Monendo, jura, verpe, per Anchialum.*

EPICR. lib. xi. cap. 95.

Swear, thou who art circumcised, by Anchialus. Who is this Anchialus? Is it the name of the true God? or of some false deity? And why is it demanded of the Jews that they should swear by Anchialus? This people, who were despised and hated by the Gentiles, among whom they lived, were conversant in business, and were concerned in trade; but their honesty was much called in question; and as their creed differed greatly from that of the Heathen, the latter were not contented with their taking the ordinary oaths, but obliged them to swear by their own gods (as among us at present, we oblige them to swear on their sacred books) in confirmation of the truth of what they asserted. The point, therefore, to be considered is, what is Anchialus? whether it be a name, or an epithet of God?

It is certain, the most common oath in use among the Jews was, As the Lord liveth. This we find in several places of the sacred books: God himself, whenever he condescends to use an oath, as there is no greater person by whom he can swear, swears by his own life or existence. Now the oath, As the Lord liveth; may be pronounced in Hebrew thus, חַיִּי אֱלֹהִים, Hachai-Elon, By the life of the Most High; or Ana-Chi-Elou, אֱלֹהֵי אֲנִי, Ah! may the Lord live; or simply, אֱלֹהֵי אֲנִי, Ha-Chi-El, By the life of God. The Latin termination us, is of no consideration, nor the letter n, which the poet has inserted, because in pronouncing Ha-chi-el, or al, they might seem to Gentile ears, to pronounce Han-chi-al.

Others derive Anchialon from the Greek Anchialos, which signifies—one near the shore; as if the Jews swore by the God who was adored there; because, in effect, the Jews had a custom, when not at Jerusalem, or in their own country, to perform their devotions on the banks of rivers, or near water. Vide Acts xvi. 13. Le Moine, Varia Sacra, tom. ii. p. 58.

Lastly, it has been believed, that this was swearing by the temple of the Lord, הֵיכַל ה' Heicaliah, Templum Dei; and we know that the Jews occasionally did swear by the temple: "Whoso sweareth by the temple, sweareth by it and by him that dwelleth therein," says our Saviour, Matth. xxiii. 21. But these explanations, in my opinion, are too fine spun, and unnatural. An old manuscript copy which belonged to M. de Thou, reads, Jura verpe per Ancharium. Swear, Jew, by the ass: for some believed or pretended to believe, that the Jews adored that animal.

*Judeus licet et porcinum numen adoret,
Et Cilli summas advocet aurículas.*

PETRON. FRAGM.

[In either, or all of these cases, it shows that the Jews were greatly given to prophane the name of God: it were much to be wished that both Jews and Christians did better remember the third commandment.]

ANDREW, or Andreas, Ἀνδρέας, Gr: a stout and strong man.

I. ANDREW, captain of the guards to Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt; he, it is said, inspired this prince with a resolution to liberate 26,000 Jews who were slaves in his dominions: he was supported by Aristæus, Zosibius, and Tharentinus, who were likewise of the guard to Philadelphus. There is no foundation for all all this; beside the relation in Aristæus's history of the seventy interpreters, which is generally esteemed by learned men as a fable.

II. ANDREW, an apostle of Jesus Christ, native of Bethsaida, and brother of Peter. He was first a disciple of John the Baptist, whom he left, to follow our Saviour, after the testimony of John, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world," John i. 40. He continued from about four o'clock in the afternoon, till night, with Jesus; and was the first disciple received into his society; Andrew introduced his brother Simon, and they spent a day with him; they accompanied him at the marriage in Cana, and afterwards returned to their ordinary occupation, not expecting, perhaps, to be farther employed in his service: but some months after, Jesus, meeting them, while fishing together, called them to a regular attendance on his person and ministry, and promised to make them fishers of men, Mat. iv. 19. See also John vi. 8.

A few days before the passion, certain Gentiles being desirous to see Jesus Christ, addressed themselves to Philip, who mentioned it to Andrew; and both together told Jesus, John xii. 22. Two or three days afterwards, Andrew and some other apostles, asked Jesus, when the destruction of the temple, which he had foretold, should happen? This is what the gospel informs us, concerning this apostle.

Some of the ancients are of opinion, that he preached in Scythia, (as Euseb. lib. iii. cap. 1, p. 71. Hist. Eccles. ex Origine. Eucher. Qu. in Acta. Ecumen. tom. i. Prolog. p. 13, Sophron. de viris illustr.) others, that he preached in Greece; others in Epirus, Achaia, or Argos: (as Theodoret, in Psal. cxvi. Nazianz. Orat. 25, Hieron. Ep. 148.) The modern Greeks make him founder of the church of Byzantium (or Constantinople) which the ancients knew nothing of. The acts of his martyrdom, which are of pretty good antiquity, though the critics will not allow them to be authentic, affirm that he suffered martyrdom at Patras, in Achaia, being sentenced to be executed on a cross, by Egeus, proconsul of that province. The time of his martyrdom is not known; but the ancient and modern martyrologies of the Greeks and Latins, agree in celebrating his festival November, 30. He was buried at Patras, where he was crucified; his body was removed to Constantinople, where many miracles were attributed to it. Combes, Auctuar. Bibl. PP. 2, p. 835, Florentin. p. 116, c. It is not known for what reason painters represent St. Andrew's cross like an X. Peter Chrysologus says, Serm. 123, he was crucified on a tree; which the spurious Hippolytus asserts was an olive tree. Nevertheless, the tradition which describes him to have been nailed to a cross is very ancient.

ANDRONICUS, Ἀνδρόνικος: a man excelling others, a victorious man.

ANDRONICUS, one of the great men belonging to the court of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. iv. 34) was left by that prince to govern the city of Antioch, while he went into Cilicia, to reduce certain places which had revolted. Menelaus, the pretended high-priest of the Jews, thought this circumstance might favour his design of getting rid of Onias, whose dignity he unjustly possessed, and who was come to Antioch with accusations against him. He addressed himself to Andronicus with large presents, which Onias being informed of, reproached him very sharply, secluding himself all the while in the sanctuary at Daphne (a suburb of Antioch, wherein was a famous temple; and where Julian the Apostate, afterwards sacrificed) lest any violence should be offered him.

Menelaus solicited Andronicus so powerfully to dispatch Onias, that he came in person to Daphne, promised with solemn oaths, that he would do Onias no injury, and thereby persuaded him to leave his place of refuge; but directly as he was out of it, he killed him. When the king returned from his expedition, and was acquainted with the death of Onias, he shed tears, commanded Andronicus to be divested of the purple, to be led about the city in an ignominious manner, and to be killed in the very place where he had killed Onias: A. M. 3834; ante A. D. 170.

ANEM, עֲנַי 'Eṇai: their answer, their song, their affliction, or poverty, from the pronoun אֲנִי ani, and עַי ani. See ANATH; A city of Manasseh, given to the Levites of Kohath's family, 1 Chron. vi. 70.

[Perhaps, "the double springs," or fountains. Or may it refer to clouds? a place over which clouds were accustomed to hang, as they do over some hills and mountains, where their dissolution forms dribbling rills.]

ANER, עֲנַי 'Eṇai: answer, song, affliction of light; from אֲנִי ani, affliction, and נֵר ner, or נֹר, light. 1 Chron. vi. 70. See TAANACH.

[Perhaps, rather, "the return of light:" referring either to the dawn of the morning, daily: or to a period when light was happily restored after long darkness; in which case, this name imports much the same as ner-gal, the revolving light. But some think it refers to returning exiles, as if it were built by those who having been banished had long wandered, but were now settled. Others think it received name from a man, himself named Aner.]

ANER and Eshcol, two Canaanites who joined their forces with those of Abraham, in pursuit pursuit of the kings Chedorlaomer, Amraphel, and their allies, who had pillaged Sodom, and carried off Lot, Abraham's nephew, Gen. xiv. 24. They did not imitate the disinterestedness of the patriarch; but retained their share of the spoil taken from the conquered kings.

ANGARIARE. The evangelists use this term as equivalent to PRESS:—to constrain, or take by force. The word angari, whence angariare is derived, comes originally from the Persians, who called angares, the post-boys which carried the letters and orders of the king, to the provinces: as these officers compelled the people in places where they passed, to furnish them guides, horses, and carriages, the word angariare became expressive of constraints of that nature. It appears that the Jews were subject to these angares under the Romans: Jesus said to his disciples, quisquis angariabit te, "Whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain." Simon, the Cyrenian, was compelled to bear our Saviour's cross, angaria-verunt eam (Gr. ἡγάρωνσαν) ut tolleret crucem ejus. Mat. v. 42. xxvii. 32. It is believed, that the distance of an angarie, or, from one post to another, was four miles. The Germans call the ember weeks angaries, because, on these weeks, vassals pay their quit-rents, services, &c. to their lords. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XXII.

ANGEL, ἄγγελος, Angelus, a messenger; it answers to the Hebrew מַלְאָךְ, Malac. In Scripture, we frequently read of missions and appearances of angels, sent to declare the will of God, to correct, teach, reprove, or comfort. God gave the law to Moses, and appeared to the patriarchs by the mediation of angels, who represented him, and who spoke in his name.

[Angel is understood to be properly a name of office, not referring to the nature of the person employed, but to his agency—a messenger; and it may, perhaps, be said, with little risque, that if the word messenger, envoy, or delegate, be mentally substituted by the reader for angel, where that title occurs, the passages would lose nothing by the change.]

Before the captivity of Babylon, we find no angel mentioned by name: the Talmudists say, they brought their names from Babylon, Talmud. Jerosol. lib. de principio anni. We find many angels called by their names in the book of Enoch; but that is of no authority. Tobit is the first, who has called an angel by a name: he mentions Raphael, who conducted Tobias into Media, Tobit, iii. 17; xi. 14. Tobit is thought to have lived at Nineveh, some time before the captivity of Judah. Daniel, who lived at Babylon, some time after Tobit, mentions Michael and Gabriel, Dan. x. 21; viii. 16; ix. 21. The second book of Esdras, chap.

iv. 36. speaks of Uriel; but this book is comparatively modern, the author having, in all probability, lived since Christ.

The Jewish cabalists represent some particular angels, whose names they give us, as preceptors to the patriarchs: to Adam, Raziel; to Abraham, Zedekiel; to Moses, Metatron, or Metator (i. e. he, who shows the field); to Elias, Malushiel, and to David, Gerviel, &c. In the New Testament, we observe two names of angels, Gabriel and Michael.—N. B. the same as in Daniel.

Some think, (as Origen, homil. 1, in Genes. Beda.) angels were created at the same time as the heaven; and that Moses included them under this name, saying, "In the beginning, God created the heaven:" others, (as Aug. lib. i. de Genesi ad litt. cap. 9, & lib. xi. de Civit. Rupert. lib. i. de Trinit. cap. 10.) that he intended them, under the name of Light, which God created on the first day: others, (as Origen, Homil. i. in Genes. & homil. 10, in Matt. & Basil, Homil. 1, in Hexaemer. Nazianzen, Orat. 38. Ambrose, in Hexaemer. Alii plures.) assert, that they were created before the world; and Job, xxxviii. 4, 7, seems to favour this opinion, "Where wast thou, when I laid the foundations of the earth;—and all the sons of God shouted for joy?" The Hebrews think, that God created angels on the second day of the world; and that he consulted with them, saying, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness," Gen. i. 26. Others are of opinion, that the angels were created on the fifth day, Bereschith Rabba, sect. viii. p. 10. Origen, and other Greek and Latin fathers, thought they were created before the world; and Dr. Hyde thinks a very long time before the world: de Relig. Vet. Persar. cap. iii. p. 82. Vide more of Angels in Basnage's History of the Jews, lib. iv. cap. 9.

Many of the old fathers, led into mistake by the book of Enoch, and by a passage of Genesis, (vi. 2.) ill understood, wherein it is said, "The (sons of God) angels saw the daughters of men, that they were fair, and they took them wives, of all which they chose," imagined that angels were corporeal, capable of sensual pleasures, and sensible of their allurements. It is true, they call them spirits, and spiritual beings, but in the same signification, wherein we call the wind, spirit; and wherein odours, vapours, &c. are called spiritual. Other fathers, indeed, and those in great number, have asserted, that angels were purely spiritual; and this is the common opinion.

Some have appropriated angels to empires, nations, provinces, cities, and persons. For instance, Michael is considered as protector of Israel:

Israel: "Michael, your prince," says the angel Gabriel, to Daniel, x. 21. The same Gabriel speaks likewise of the angel, protector of Persia, according to the generality of interpreters, when he says, that the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood him one and twenty days. St. Luke (Acts, xvi. 9) tells us, that a man of Macedonia appeared to St. Paul in the night, and said to him, "Come over into Macedonia, and help us;" which has been understood of the angel of Macedonia, inviting him into the province committed to his care. The LXX, Deut. xxxii. 8, say, that "God had set the bounds of the peoples, according to the number of the angels of Israel;" which, by the fathers and Rabbins, has been supposed to mean the government of each particular country and nation, wherewith God had entrusted his angels. [This passage is cited by pope Gregory, Hom. xxxiv. and St. Jerome, lib. ii. in Mich. according to this translation; and St. Chrysostom seems to glance at it in his third homily, on the epistle to the Colossians. But our English translators keep more exactly to the original, and render it, "He set the bounds of the peoples, according to the number of the children of Israel;" so that the opinion of tutelary angels, has no foundation from this passage.]

St. John, in his Revelations, wrote Letters to the Angels of the seven Christian churches, in Asia Minor; meaning not only the bishops of those churches, but in the judgment of many fathers, angels likewise, who were appointed by God for their protection. Ambrose, in Luc. lib. ii. Origen, in Luc. homil. xiii. Hilary, in Psal. cxxix Basil, in Isai. p. 854, & ep. 191. Nazianzen, Orat. 31 & 32. Jerom. in Mich. vi. & in Matt. xviii.

[The learned Dr. Prideaux observes, that the minister of the synagogue, who officiated in offering up the public prayers, being the mouth of the congregation, delegated by them, as their representative, messenger, or angel, to address God in prayer for them, was in Hebrew, called Sheliach-Zibbor, i. e. the angel of the church, and that from hence the bishops of the seven churches of Asia, are in the Revelations, by a name borrowed from the synagogue, called, angels of those churches. Connect. &c. Part i. Book vi.]

Guardian Angels appear to be alluded to in the Old Testament. Jacob speaks (Gen. xlviii. 16) of the angel who had delivered him out of all dangers. The Psalmist, in several places, mentions angels as protectors of the righteous (Psalm xxxiii. 8; [xxxiv. 7. Eng. transl.] and xc. 11. Vulg.) and this was the common opinion of the Jews in our Saviour's time. When St. Peter, having been released, came from prison to the house where the disciples were assembled, he knocked at the door; those within, thought it was his angel, (his guardian angel) and not himself, Acts, xii. 15. Jesus Christ enjoins us not to despise little ones, because their angels continually behold the face of our heavenly father, Matt. xviii. 10. The fathers agree unanimously on this article. Jews and Heathen believed, that particular angels were commissioned to attend individuals, and had the care of their conduct and protection. Hesiod, one of the most ancient Greek authors, says, that there are good angels on earth. [Whom he thus describes,

Aerial spirits, by great Jove design'd,
To be on earth the guardians of mankind;
Invisible to mortal eyes they go,
And mark our actions, good or bad, below;
Th' immortal spies with watchful care preside,
And thrice ten thousand round their charges glide.
They can reward with glory or with gold;
Such pow'r Divine permission bids them hold.
[Hesiod, Oper. & Dies. lib. i. ver. 121.]

Plato says, de Legibus, lib. x. that every person has two demons, or genii, one prompting him to evil, the other to good. Apuleius speaks but of one demon assigned to every man by Plato, Ex hac sublimiore demonum copia Plato autumat singulis hominibus in vita agenda testes, & custodes singulos additos, qui nemini conspicui semper adsint. Libell. de Deo Socratis.

The apostle Paul hints at a subordination among the angels in heaven, one differing from another, either in office, or glory; but the fathers, who have interpreted the apostle's words, are not agreed on the number, and order of the celestial hierarchy. Origen, in Joan. p. 69, was of opinion, that St. Paul mentioned part only of the choirs of angels, and that there were many others of which he said nothing; and this notion may be observed in many of the fathers, who came after him. Others, have reckoned up nine choirs of angels in St. Paul. The author, who is cited commonly under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite, admits but three hierarchies, and three orders of angels, in each hierarchy. In the first, are seraphim, cherubim, and thrones; in the second, dominions, mights, and powers; in the third, principalities, archangels, and angels. Dionys. de Cælesti Hierarchia, cap. vi. Greg. Magn. Homil. liv. in Evangel.

[Some of the Rabbins reckon four; others, ten orders of angels, and give them different names according to their degrees of power and knowledge; but this rests only on the imagination of those who amuse themselves with speaking very particularly of things, whereof they know nothing. We are not to be surprised at these these visions, which were fabricated by the Jews; for if they be compared with those of Dionysius the Areopagite, the Jesuit Celert, and many others who have settled a ceremonial, and rules for precedence among angels, the Jews would appear not more blameable in this point, than some Christians. Vide Basnage, Hist. Jews, lib. iv. cap. 9.]

Raphael tells Tobias, Tobit, xii. 15, that he is one of the seven angels who attend in the presence of God. Michael tells Daniel, that he is one of the chief princes in the court of the Almighty, Dan. x. 13. In Revelations, viii. 2, 3, St. John saw seven angels standing before the Lord. In a very ancient book, The Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, they are called angels of the presence; and in The Life of Moses, the eyes of the Lord: these denominations are, probably, imitations of what was a part of the customary order, in the courts of the Assyrian, Chaldean, and Persian kings, where there were seven eunuchs, or great officers, always near the prince. Comp. Esther i. 13. Dan. v. 7; also, FRAGMENTS No. L.

The number of angels is not mentioned in Scripture; but is always represented as very great, and innumerable. Daniel, vii. 10, says, that on his approach to the throne of the Ancient of Days, he saw a fiery stream issuing from it, and that thousand thousands of angels ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him. Christ in the gospel says, (Matt. xxvi. 53) "his heavenly father could give him more than twelve legions of angels"—more than—seventy-two thousand. The Psalmist describes the chariot of God as attended by twenty thousand angels, Psa. lxxviii. 17. Many of the fathers, to give some idea of the multitude of angels, compared with that of men, apply to them the parable of the ninety-nine sheep, left by the owner on the mountains, while he went to search after the one sheep (representing man) which was gone astray: others have inferred, from the earth's being infinitely smaller than heaven, that the number of angels was infinitely greater than that of men: as it is natural to estimate the multitude of inhabitants in any place, by the extent of their dwelling. The author published under the name of Dionysius, the Areopagite, says, that the number of angels is such, that nothing in nature can equal it. Hilar. in Matth. can. 18. Ambros. in Luc. lib. vii. cap. 15. Nyssen. lib. xi. contra Eunom. Cyril. Catech. 15. Cyril. Jeros. loco citato. Didymus Cæcus apud Maxim. ad cap. 14. Dionysii de cælesti Hierarchia.

The Sadducees denied the existence of angels and spirits (Acts, xxiii. 8); other Jews paid them a superstitious worship. The author of the book, entitled, Of St. Peter's Preaching; a work of great antiquity, cited by Clemens of Alexandria, Stromat. lib. vi. says, the Jews pay religious worship to angels and archangels, and even to the months and the moon. Celsus reproached them, almost in the same manner, apud Origen. contra Cels. lib. v. Tertullian assures us, that Simon and Cerinthus preferred the mediation of angels, to that of Christ, Lib. de præscript. cap. 12. Josephus, and after him, Porphyry, says, that the Essenes, at their initiation, engaged themselves, by oath, to preserve faithfully the names of angels, and the books relating to their sect; de Bello. lib. ii. cap. 12. Porphyry, de Abstin. lib. iv.

By angels of the Lord, are often meant, in Scripture—men of God—prophets; for example, (Judg. ii. 1.) "An angel of the Lord came up from Gilgal to Bochim, and said, I made you to go up out of Egypt, &c. And it came to pass when the angel of the Lord spake these words, they lifted up their voices and wept; and they sacrificed there to the Lord, and Joshua let the people go." It has been thought, that this angel was Joshua, or the high-priest, or a prophet. Jonathan, Mas. Vatab. Grot. Jun. Drus. &c. Several interpreters have been of opinion, that Joshua, is described by Moses, under the name of the angel of the Lord, who was to introduce Israel into the promised land: also, that in Scripture, prophets are sometimes called, angels of the Lord; e. gr. Haggai i. 3. "Then spake Haggai, the angel of the Lord, from among the angels of the Lord." Heb. מלאך, Gr. Ἀγγελος Angelus. Vulg. Nuntius. [Our translation agrees with the Vulgate, in interpreting מלאך, messenger, instead of angel, and runs thus: "Thus spake Haggai, the Lord's messenger, in the Lord's message, unto the people."] Malachi, the last of the minor prophets, is, by several of the fathers, called the angel of God; as his name signifies in Hebrew: Clem. Alex. lib. i. Strom. Tertull. contra Judæos, cap. 5, but some believe *Esdra*s to be described by the name Malachi, or angel of the Lord. Hieronym. præfat. & Comment. in Malachiam. Antiqui Hebræi. Jonath. Caldeus. Eupolemus, speaking of the prophet Nathan, who convicted David of his sin, calls him an angel, or messenger, from the Lord. Manoah, Samson's father (Jud. xiii. 2, &c.) calls indifferently, angel, and man of God, him, who appeared to his wife; till his vanishing with the smoke of the burnt-offering, convinced him it was an angel.

Sometimes

Sometimes the name of God is given in Scripture to angels. The angel who appeared to Moses in the bush (Exod. iii. 2, &c.; vide Acts, vii. 30, 31; Gal. iii. 19,) who delivered the law to him, who spoke to him, and who guided the people in the wilderness, is often called by the name of God, and the Lord said, "My name is in him," Ex. xxiii. 21. The angels who appeared to the patriarchs, are likewise termed gods (Heb. xiii. 2; Gen. xviii. 3; xix. 1) because they acted in the name of God, as his ambassadors, were entrusted with his power, and his orders: they are not only called, Elohim and Adonai, names sometimes attributed to judges and to princes, but, likewise by the name Jehovah, which belonged to God only; whose majesty they represented.

In proof of tutinary Angels of nations, some refer to Dan. x. 13, "The prince of the Persians resisted Gabriel, twenty-one days;" but this prince of the Persians, in the judgment of several good commentators, is, Cyrus, king of Persia, who was twenty one days before he submitted to the inspirations of the angel Gabriel.

Another passage, is Deut. xxxii. 8, where it is said, that the Lord divided the inhabitants of the earth "according to the number of the angels of God." The LXX read: "When the Lord separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the nations, according to the number of the angels of God.—[Ὅτε διέσπειρεν υἱὸς Ἀδὰμ, ἵσταντες ὅρα ἔθνη κατὰ ἀριθμὸν ἀγγέλων θεοῦ. They read simply בני אֱלֹהִים Filii Dei, not בני יִשְׂרָאֵל Filii Israel.]—Whereas, the Hebrew (and Vulgate) import, that he fixed the limits of the nations, according to the number of the children of Israel. On either reading, there will remain difficulties with relation to the number of nations dispersed at the tower of Babel: for, First, are we very sure that this passage relates to the division at Babel? Secondly, is it certain that every particular person, or family, which assisted in carrying on that edifice, formed a nation? And would not the sacred writer have set down in this place, all the nations which then were, or which, in succeeding ages, should be formed? And, certainly, if it be required that each nation should have its tutinary angel, we must understand it thus, according to the reading of the Septuagint.

But, if we follow the reading of the Hebrew, it will then concern us to know, at what epoch Moses intended to point, in the history of the Israelitish nation; for at the time of building the tower of Babel, there were no Israelites. If Moses referred to his own time, as the number of Israelites was then very great, it must be said, that the number of nations which descended from the builders of Babel, was very great also, and even excessive; for if we take only those men in Israel, who were capable of bearing arms, how shall we find six hundred thousand nations in the world?

The generality of opinions are fixed for seventy, or seventy-two people; but they are founded on very weak reasons; as, that (Gen. x.) where Moses enumerates the sons of Shem, Ham, and Japheth, he names seventy-two persons, from whom they believe seventy-two people to have sprung: but if the three patriarchs, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, be not reckoned, (and they ought not to be reckoned, because all their children are included,) and if the thirteen sons of Joktan are omitted, who, in all probability, were not born till after the dispersion, this number will be much diminished.

Others derive this number, seventy, from that of Jacob's children who went down into Egypt with him, Gen. xli. 26, "All the souls of Jacob's house which came into Egypt, were threescore and ten." Rigorously speaking, only sixty-six persons went into Egypt, as Moses expressly notices, ver. 26: "All the souls which came with Jacob into Egypt, were threescore and six." To complete the number seventy, Jacob, Joseph, and his two sons, born in Egypt, are added: now, if all the sons of Jacob be included, we must not insert Jacob himself, since Moses says expressly, "God separated the nations, or the sons of Adam, according to the number of the children of Israel." Besides, the LXX in several places, and Stephen in the Acts, read 'seventy-five' persons, instead of 'seventy'—Acts, vii. 14; Gen. xli. 27; Exod. i. 5. Here, then, we have new difficulties against this number of seventy, or seventy-two nations, descended from the sons of Noah; and, consequently, against the same number of angels deputed for their guardianship.

On the whole, we conclude, that the tradition of the Jewish and Christian church, is, that each nation has its tutinary angel: but the number of nations, and, consequently, of angels, their protectors, is uncertain: their number has varied as the number of nations and people has increased or decreased; from the tower of Babel to this day, infinite revolutions in the world have caused the ruin of many people; and, without going farther than the Scripture records, what is become of the Amalekites, Philistines, Canaanites, Emim, Zamzumim, &c.?

ANGEL, Destroying Angel, Angel of Death, Angel of Satan, Angel of the Bottomless Pit. These terms signify the devil and his agents; evil angels, ministers of God's wrath and vengeance, ance, God smote Sennacherib's army, with the sword of the destroying angel, 2 Kings, xix. 35; also, the Israelites, David's subjects, by the sword of the angel of death, 2 Sam. xxiv. 16. The angel or messenger of Satan, buffeted St. Paul, 2 Cor. xii. 7: the same angel accused the high-priest, Joshua, before the Lord, Zech. iii. 1, 2; and disputed with the archangel, Michael, about the body of Moses, Jude, 9. The angel of the bottomless pit, Rev. ix. 117, or the angel king of the bottomless pit, as St. John, in the Revelations, calls him, is the same as the prince of devils, the destroying angel. Vide the FRAGMENT, "of SATAN," No. CXLIII.

The ANGEL of Death is whoever God commissions to separate the soul from the body: the Jews, Arabians, Turks, and Persians, own such an one; the Persians call him—Mordad, or Asuman; the Rabbins and Arabians—Azrael; and the Chaldee paraphrasts—Malk-ad moua. Others, as the book concerning the Assumption, or death of Moses, call him Samaël, prince of the devils: that book relates, that the hour of Moses's death being come, the Lord required Gabriel to command his soul out of his body; but he excused himself: Michael, likewise desired to be dispensed with, in this particular; as did also, the angel Zinghiel, who said, that having been preceptor to Moses, he could not determine himself to take away his life. Samaël advanced toward him, with a design of forcing the soul of that conductor of God's people, out of his body; but was so struck with the lustre of his countenance, and the virtue of the name of God written on the rod with which Moses performed his miracles, that he was obliged to retire: insomuch that God himself came to separate the soul of his prophet, by giving him a kiss.

The Rabbins maintain, that the angel of death, when he has killed a man, washes his sword in the water of the house, and thereby communicates a mortal quality to it; for which reason, they throw all the water away. This angel of death stands, they say, at a dying person's bed's head, holding a naked sword in his hand, at the extremity whereof hang three drops of gall: the sick man, so soon as he perceives the angel there, being greatly frightened, opens his mouth, and the angel of death takes this opportunity to distil into it these three mortal drops; one immediately occasions his death, the other renders him pale and livid, the third disposes him to speedy dissolution in his grave. Buxtorf, Synag. Jud. i. 35.

They believe farther, that in the grave the man suffers a second death; that when a Jew is buried, the angel of death seats himself on his grave, and at the same time, the soul of the deceased returns to his body, and sets him on his legs; then the angel taking an iron chain, half whereof is cold as ice, the other burning hot, strikes the body with it, and separates all its members; he strikes it a second time, and removes all its bones; then a third time, and reduces the whole to ashes: this done, the good angels come, gather and re-unite all these parts, and re-place the body in its grave. They assert, however, that pious persons, and they who give alms liberally, are exempt from this punishment. Buxtorf, Synag. Jud. i. 35. ex Elia Thisbi.

In the Greek of the book of Job, the angel of death is mentioned frequently. ἄγγελος θανατοφόρος, Job xxxiii. 22. "Though there were a thousand angels of death about the righteous, ready to take away his life, yet none of them shall smite him, if he reflects on himself, returns to the Lord, discovers his sin and confesses his folly." And chap. xx. 15, "Riches unjustly gathered, shall be vomited up with horror, and the angel shall drag him out of his house." And chap. xxxvi. 14, "Let the soul of the hypocrite die in his youth, and let his life be snatched away by the angels." Solomon also, in Proverbs xvii. 11, says, "An evil man seeketh only rebellion, therefore a cruel angel shall be sent against him." This is the evil angel spoken of by the Psalmist, "Let them be as chaff before the wind, and let the angel of the Lord chase them, and be the cause of their perishing; let their way be dark and slippery, and let the angel of the Lord persecute them," Ps. xxxv. 5, 6.

The devil is considered in Scripture as a prince, who exercises dominion over other devils of a lower rank, and of less power. In this sense, the gospel speaks of Satan's kingdom, (Matth. xii. 26) "If Satan be divided against himself, how shall his kingdom stand?" If the devil expel devils out of bodies which are possessed by them, he destroys his own dominion. Jesus Christ came into the world, to overthrow the power of Satan; and at the day of judgment he will condemn them who have rejected the gospel to that eternal fire which is prepared for the devil and his angels, (Matt. xxv. 41) his ministers and agents, beings of the same nature, and sentenced to the same punishment, with himself.

[ADDITIONAL REMARKS ON ANGELS.]

The subject of angels is in itself very obscure, as this rank of beings is wholly above human inspection or comprehension; and all we know of them is gathered from incidental hints, scattered hither and thither in the Bible. We have have given at length, what information CALMET had collected; and shall add a few remarks, proposed with the utmost modesty.

On this subject, we must wholly rely on Scripture accounts, and waive all other, except so far as they appear reasonable, or scriptural. We shall do well to examine, first of all, the language of Scripture, in reference to angels, and their nature; and to ascertain its import in different places where it occurs.

I. Of the word ANGEL: this is taken rather as a name of office, than of nature: a messenger, an agent, an envoy, a deputy; (1) personally taken, HE who performs the will of a superior; (2) impersonally taken, THAT which performs the will of a superior.

(1) Personally taken the word angel denotes a human messenger: for instance, in the Old Testament, 2 Sam. ii. 5, "And David sent messengers (Heb. angels) to Jabesh Gilead," Prov. xiii. 17, "A wicked messenger (ἄγγελος angel) falleth into evil;"—and so in various other places. Also, in the New Testament, Matt. xi. 10, "I send my messenger (Gr. my angel, τον ἀγγελόν μου) before thy face;" also, Mark. i. 2; Luke, vii. 24, "And when the messengers (Gr. the angels) of John were departed," James, ii. 25, "Rahab received the messengers," (Gr. the angels). Gal. iv. 14, "Ye received me as the angel of God (ἀγγελον Θεου) as Christ Jesus," the prime messenger from God to man.

Some commentators have referred this, which is the simplest idea of the word, to John, v. 4: "An angel went down and troubled the water;" as if this were a messenger sent (by the priests, or, &c.) for that purpose: so Acts, xii. 15, "They said, it is the angel of Peter;" i. e. a messenger from him. But this conception apparently fails of the true import of these passages. See FRAGMENTS, No. LXVI.

It seems, however, certain from the Scriptures quoted, and from many others, that personally taken, the sense of a messenger, or one deputed by another to act for him, is a genuine idea of the word angel: both in the Old and the New Testament. Hence, therefore, Christ Jesus may well be called, "The angel of God:" he being eminently the deputy from God to man; the great Angel of the covenant, Mal. iii. 1; the agent for God.

II. The word Angel, taken impersonally, implies, that agent which executes the will of another: and, as the great natural agents of the world around us are wholly beyond the direction of man, and, therefore, are esteemed as exclusively obedient to God, the word angel, imports a somewhat empowered or commissioned by God, to execute his will. Now, though all the powers of Nature, in all their operations, are, in this sense, angels of God, as acting for him, yet their more extraordinary effects are principally noticed, as being most evidently his agents: these appearing most remarkable to, and most exciting the attention of, feeble humanity. In a sense greatly analogous to this, we say, in common speech, "Providence interposed so and so;" such a thing is, "the dispensation of Providence," &c. Now, we rarely express ourselves thus, in respect to the ordinary occurrences of life, but rather in respect to those which have a somewhat remarkable in their nature, their circumstances, or their effects, &c. Let us see how this idea applies to the word angel; accepting it as analogous to what we familiarly express by the word "providence," as being (1) kind and beneficial; or (2) calamitous and unfortunate:

1. BENEFICIAL DISPENSATIONS OF PROVIDENCE; OR KIND PROVIDENCE.

Gen. xxiv. 7: "God shall send his angel—his superintending and directing providence—before thee; to take a wife for Isaac."

Gen. xlviii. 16: "The angel who redeemed me (GAL'UN), recovered me, vindicated me from, avenged me of, delivered me) from all evil, bless the lads: i. e. the protecting, preserving, guiding providence of God, which I have experienced during my life.

Psalms xxxiv. 7: "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him:"—i. e. his providence watching over them, secures them from evil.

Psalms xci. 11: "He shall give his angels charge concerning thee"—his providence shall so regulate occurrences, as to keep off evils from injuring thee, i. e. while in the way of thy duty: for this restriction is evidently implied in our Lord's answer to Satan, "Thou shalt not tempt (i. e. by rushing into unnecessary hazards) the Lord thy God," Luke iv. 12.

2. CALAMITOUS DISPENSATIONS OF PROVIDENCE; OR ADVERSE PROVIDENCE.

1 Sam. xvi. 14: "An evil spirit from the Lord troubled Saul:" i. e. a melancholy distemper, to alleviate which, music was serviceable.

Acts, xii. 23: "The angel of the Lord smote Herod:" i. e. a fatal disease. Vide HEROD AGRIPPA.

2 Kings, xix. 35; Isaiah, xxxvii. 36: "The angel of the Lord smote Sennacherib's army."—What this angel was, we learn from 2 Kings, xix. 7: "Behold, I will send a BLAST upon him:" i. e. the samiel, or simoom (Vide FRAGMENTS, No. IV. and very probably, this is alluded to, Isaiah, xxx. 33: "The pile (of Tophet) is fire, and much wood; the breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it."

Psalm lxxviii. 49: "He cast upon them (the Egyptians) the fierceness of his anger, &c. sending evil angels among them."—What these evil angels were, we learn sufficiently from the history of the Plagues in the Exodus.

Without adducing more passages of Holy Writ, we may now accept the idea, that extraordinary operations of providence, though accomplished by natural means, are in Scripture considered as angels (agents) of God: and we conclude this remark, by observing, with the Psalmist (civ. 4) That God can if he please, "make winds his angels," to conduct his dispensations; "and flames of fire his ministers," or servants, to perform his pleasure.

The same meaning seems to be attached to the word Angel in the Apocrypha, and I cannot but think, that if we take the angel Raphael (Vide also ASMODEUS) in Tobit, in the sense of "providential protection," we shall be pretty near the intention of the author. That Raphael is a figurative personage, is, I think, evident. Tobit also says to his son, chap. v. 16, "The angel of God keep you company!" i. e. may Divine providence protect you! "The good angel will keep him company;" i. e. providence will guide and preserve him, ver. 21. So Baruch, vi. 7. "Mine angel is with you; I, myself, caring for you;" i. e. my providence accompanies you, to preserve you from persecution; in consequence of the special interest I take in your welfare.

III. But, beside agencies of natural powers, or providential angels, we have reason to infer, that there exists in the scale of beings, a series of created intelligent powers, who are angels, inasmuch as they are occasionally agents of God towards mankind. These, in capacities and dignities are vastly superior to ourselves; indeed, they are so much our superiors, that in order to render them in any degree comprehensible by us, their nature, offices, &c. are illustrated by being compared to what occurs among mankind. Thus, if a human prince have his attendants, his servants, his guards, this circumstance is taken advantage of, and is employed to illustrate the nature of celestial angels; and to this effect, by way of similitude, and condescending to the conceptions of humanity, angels are represented as attendants, servants of God. Now, we know that God needs no attendants to perform his commands, being omnipresent; but, being himself likened to a great king, his angels are compared to courtiers, ministers, subordinate to him, and employed in his service. [It cannot be said

God does not need angels, therefore angels do not exist: for God does not need man, yet man exists.]

This principle is evidently the foundation of the apologue which prefaces the poetical part of the book of Job (chap. i. 6) "There was a day, when the sons of God came to present themselves (as it were, at court) before the Lord," &c.: also, of that delivered by the prophet, Micaiah, 1 Kings, xxii. 19 "I saw the Lord sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing by him, on his right hand, and on his left," &c. Isaiah's vision, chap. vi. is to the same purpose; and our Lord continues the same idea, especially, when speaking of his glorious return—"The Son of Man shall send his angels, to expel from his kingdom all that offend. He shall sit on the throne of his glory, and all his holy angels around him;—then shall the KING say," &c. Matth. xxv. Throughout the Revelations many coincident representations may be observed.

Now, in reference to the services rendered by angels to mankind, we may safely adopt the idea of their being servants of this great King, sent from before his throne to this lower world, to execute his commissions: so far, at least, Scripture warrants us. In such services, some of them may be (and probably are) always engaged, though invisible to us; we may receive from them much good, or evil, without our being aware of any angelic interference. Thus the activity of Satan (an agent of evil) in Job, is represented as producing great effects (by storms, &c.) but Job knew not that it was Satan: he referred all the calamities he felt, or feared, to the good pleasure of God, acting by natural causes; and thus the angel might long have watched Abraham invisibly, before he called out to forbid the slaying of Isaac. Gen. xxii. In this sense, angels are "ministering spirits, sent forth to do a variety of services to the heirs of salvation."

IV. Now, if angels are engaged invisibly in the care of, or in services to, mankind, then we find no difficulty in admitting that they have had orders on particular occasions to make themselves known, as celestial intelligences. They may often assume the human appearance, for aught we can tell; but if they assume it completely (as must be supposed, and which nothing forbids) how can we be generally the wiser? How can we detect them? This is evidently beyond human abilities, unless it be part of their commission to leave indications of their superior nature. This produces the enquiry—By what tokens have angels made themselves known? On which we remark:

(1) Such discovery has usually been after they

they had delivered their message, and always for the purpose of a sign, in confirmation of the faith of the party whom they had addressed. It is evident, that the angel which appeared to Manoah, was taken by both Manoah and his wife for a prophet only; till, after he had delivered his message, he took leave—"wonderfully," to convince them of his extraordinary nature. Vide JOSHUA, GIDEON, &c. Thus the angel that wrestled with Jacob, at last put the hollow of his thigh out of joint—a token that he was no mere man. The angel that spake to Zacharias, Luke, i. 20, rendered that priest dumb—a token beyond the power of mere man (e. gr. an impostor speaking falsely in the name of God) to produce; and so of others.

(2) But sometimes angels did not reveal themselves fully: they gave, as it were, obscure and very indistinct, though powerful, intimations of their presence. When angels had in commission, to appear to certain persons only, others who were in company with those persons, had sensations which indicated an extraordinary occurrence: although the appearance was not to them; yet they seem to have felt the effects of it; as Dan. x. 7, "I, Daniel, alone saw the vision—the men that were with me, saw not the vision; but a great quaking fell upon them, so that they fled to hide themselves." So, Acts, ix. 7, "The men which journeyed with Saul, stood speechless, hearing a voice (a kind of voice, not an intelligible speech, μεν τῆς φωνῆς) but seeing no man;" xxii. 9, "They that were with me, saw a peculiar kind of light (μεν φως) and were afraid; but they heard not the voice (the distinct words) addressed to me;" xxvi. 14, "We were ALL fallen to the earth." The guards of the sepulchre, Matt. xxviii. seem to have been in much the same situation; they probably did not distinctly (i. e. accurately, steadily, scrutinizingly) see the angel; but only saw a general splendid appearance, enough most thoroughly to terrify them; but not enough to resist the crafty explanations of the priests, and the influence of their money. We cannot think they staid inquisitively to examine what kind of appearance this might be—what kind of being this was;—still less did they philosophically embrace this opportunity of investigating the nature of a celestial spirit—they felt his terror; and decamped with all speed.

These instances evince, that angels discovered themselves to be angels, with different degrees of clearness, as best suited their errand. Sometimes they effected their purpose, and were neither known, nor suspected, to be angels: sometimes they were conjectured to be angels, but they did not advance those conjectures into certainty; and sometimes, they left no doubt who, and what they were, and, together with their errand, they declared their nature.

V. The general token of angelic presence, seems to have been a certain splendor, or brightness, accompanying their persons: but this seems to have had either a distinction in degree, or a peculiarity, perhaps an identity, of appropriation. A dazzling splendor as of lightning, might sometimes accompany angels: but whether the mild effulgence, the radiance of the benignant Divine majesty, ever accompanied a created angel, or, rather, was not exclusively worn by a person, not only super-human, but super-angelic also, deserves much consideration. Such a person might be eminently, "the Angel of the Lord," the personator of JEHOVAH; and might be thought, and be called, and really be so connected with JEHOVAH, as to accept that sacred name without infringing on propriety.

VI. It should seem, that sometimes a person only, not a splendor, was seen: sometimes a splendor only, not a person; and sometimes, both a person and his splendor. Of the person only, we have already given instances; of the splendor only, the burning bush seen by Moses, may be one instance; though afterwards, a person spake from it: the splendor in the sanctuary, &c. might be another.

Of the person seen wearing this splendor, vide the Remarks on the History of Abraham. It seems to have been worn by Jesus at his transfiguration, Matt. xvii. 2; Mark, ix. 2;—at his appearance to Saul, Acts, ix. xxvi. 13; also, —when seen by John, Rev. 1. Was not this splendor, when worn by a person, indicative of the presence of the great Angel of the covenant?

VII. Thus we trace a gradation in the use of the word angel, which it may be proper to exhibit in connection:

1. Human messengers; i. e. agents for others.

2. Divine messengers, yet human persons; i. e. agents for God:—as prophets, Haggai, i. 13;—priests, Mal. ii. 7; Eccles. xi. 5, or 6.

3. Officers of the churches; i. e. agents for the churches.

4. Providence, in a general sense; i. e. the agency of Divine dispensations, conducting natural causes.

5. Special Providences; i. e. the agency of Divine dispensations, apparent on remarkable occasions.

6. Created intelligences; i. e. agents of a nature superior to man; performing the Divine commands, in relation to mankind.

7. The great angel between God and man; i. e. the deputed agent of God; eminently so.

Not

Not to extend this very delicate and obscure subject too far, it is sufficient, if this mode of representing it, excite the reader's consideration: we should be cautious of intruding into things not seen.

VIII. On the same rank as to nature, though very different from celestial angels as to happiness, Scripture seems to place the angels "who kept not their first estate;" but neither their number, their œconomy, nor their powers, &c. are expressed. As the nature and offices of good angels are illustrated by assimilation, so are the nature and disposition of evil angels:—e. gr.

1. If a part of a prince's court be faithful to his government, and under his obedience; another part may be unfaithful, may be in rebellion, may hate him, &c. This idea, then, is that of REBELS.

Is not what is said of Satan, and the fallen angels, his fellows and companions, analogous to such a REVOLT in a prince's court? i. e. the idea of what passes among men, is transferred to spiritual beings, in order to help us to some conception on a subject otherwise beyond our powers.

2. As revolters in provinces distant from court, may sometimes injure loyal subjects, may we suppose that evil (rebel) angels are suffered to injure individuals among mankind? May they inflict diseases? as in the case of Job: i. e. having the disposition, are they suffered to take advantage of natural disease, and to augment, and fix it, if possible? as in the case of Saul: or to render it fatal? as in the case of the lunatic, Matt. xvii. 15; Mark, v. 2, & seq.; Luke viii. Also, if the thorn in the flesh, and the angel of Satan, be the same, in the case of Paul? 2 Cor. xii. 7.

3. May we suppose, that certain diseases are generally thus promoted; so that as they prevail, an evil angel may have farther opportunity for doing harm, or as they advance toward cure, his opportunity may be restricted and lessened?

4. May we suppose, that evil angels would, if permitted, destroy all good from off the earth?—all natural good: would blast the fruits of the earth, and deform the face of nature; spread diseases, &c.—all moral good: would expel all thoughts of God, all emotions of gratitude to him, all piety, divine or human, &c.

5. May we suppose, that the endeavours of these malignant beings to destroy, are, when they attempt to exceed their limits, checked and counteracted, by the agency of benevolent spirits: or, that benevolent spirits are employed to ward off, to prevent, the evils designed by Satan and his angels?

6. Among the guards of honour around a prince, some are ministers of punishment; so

Herod sent one of his guards to execute John, in prison: such is the office of the capigis in the East, at this day. This duty is not there considered as any degradation of the person employed, but is merely that kind of service which appertains to his office. This idea, then, is that of OBEDIENCE by loyal servants, to purposes of PUNISHMENT.

7. May we suppose, the greater operations of nature, storms, tempests, pestilence, &c. are conducted, whether generally, or specially, by celestial angels obeying the commands and orders of God? and the same as to beneficial effects, especially sudden, wonderful kindnesses, deliverances, &c.?

8. Does there not seem to be a distinction in the conduct assigned in Scripture to angels, i. e. that some produce, or direct natural evils—at least on some occasions,

"And pleas'd th' Almighty's orders to perform, Ride in the whirlwind, and direct the storm."

while others propagate moral evils? John viii. 44; Eph. ii. 2; 1 John, iii. 8, 10.

9. If it may consist with the nature of good angels, sometimes to inflict punishment for sins which have been committed, can it consist with their nature ever to promote moral evil and turpitude?—and may not this be taken as a strong distinction, if not of nature, yet of disposition? Good angels may punish mankind for having yielded to sin, but cannot tempt them to the commission of a sin for which they mean to punish them afterwards: they may spread destruction over a part of the earth, if commissioned, because that may have been deserved by the sufferers; but, surely holy spirits cannot, of themselves, solicit a soul to that which would be its destruction in the sight of God: neither can we suppose that God can direct them to become tempters, with any such design: because it implies a depth of malignity, &c. diametrically opposite to the Divine goodness. Vide the FRAGMENT "of SATAN," No. CXLIH.

On the whole, we may sum up the contradictory characters of these active and intelligent agents, by combining those particulars in which Scripture supports us: no doubt, but many parts of their nature, powers, and offices, must remain hidden from the sons of men, on earth; but when we exchange earth for heaven, this subject, like many others, may be infinitely better understood by us; and, if we should not become such agents ourselves, yet we may witness the inexpressibly beneficial effects arising among our fellow mortals from that agency which now we call supernatural, and which we can only comprehend in a very small degree, and that by very inadequate comparisons.

GOOD ANGELS.

Good angels, are God's host; innumerable; they attend and obey God in heaven, where they praise him: but they occasionally do services, and give instructions, to the sons of men. Good angels attended on Christ, honoured him, ministered to him, strengthened him; accompanied his resurrection, his ascension, and shall attend his second coming; when they will separate the godly to glory, the ungodly to perdition. Good angels attend good men; defend and save them; direct them; carry their souls to heaven; will rejoice with them in glory, &c. Good angels are humble and modest; obedient, sympathising, complacent, &c. &c.

EVIL ANGELS.

Evil angels are unclean, promoters of darkness; of spiritual wickedness: they oppose good angels, and good men: they are under punishment here; they dread severer sufferings hereafter; everlasting fire is prepared for them, &c.]

ANGELS of Light, and ANGELS of Darkness. We call good angels, angels of light, their habitation being in heaven, in the region of light; they are clothed with light and glory; they stand before the throne of the Most High, and they inspire men with good actions, actions of light and righteousness. Angels of darkness, on the contrary, are the devil's ministers, whose abode is in hell, the region of darkness. St. Paul says, that "Satan sometimes transforms himself into an angel of light," 2 Cor. xi. 14, in like manner as our Saviour in the Gospel says, "that wolves sometimes put on sheep's clothing, to seduce the simple," Matt. vii. 15; but they are discovered by their works: sooner or later they betray themselves by deeds of darkness, wherein they engage with their followers.

Tongue of Angels. Vide TONGUE.

ANGER, wrath. Scripture attributes anger to God: not that he is capable of those irregular motions which this passion produces; but, figuratively speaking, after the manner of men, and because he punishes the wicked with the severity of a superior provoked to anger.

Anger is often used for its effects, i. e. punishment, chastisement. The magistrate is "a revenger to execute wrath," says St. Paul, Rom. xiii. 4; that is to say, vengeance, or punishment. "Is God unjust, who makes people sensible of the effects of his anger?" or, who taketh vengeance (speaking after the manner of men) Rom. ii. 5. "Anger is gone out from the Lord, and begins to be felt," Numb. xvi. 46; by its effects, in a plague.

Anger is often joined with fury, even when

God is spoken of; but this is by way of expressing more forcibly the effects of his anger, or what may be expected from the just occasions of his indignation, Deut. xxix. 24. "Turn from us the fury of thine anger," 2 Chron. xix. 10.

The Hebrews place the seat of anger in the nose. "Let not thy nose be disturbed, be inflamed." A choleric man is called, short-nosed; a patient man, long-nosed. Vide NOSE.

"The day of wrath," is the day of God's judgment, the day of vengeance, or punishment. John the Baptist calls it, the wrath to come: "Who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?" Matt. iii. 7. And St. Paul to the Thessalonians, "Delivered us from the wrath to come," 1. Thess. i. 10. And, "Thou treasurest up wrath against the day of wrath, or vengeance," Rom. ii. 5. "We were all children of wrath," Eph. ii. 3. And elsewhere, "We were vessels of wrath, fitted to destruction," Rom. ix. 22.

"Give way, or place to wrath," Rom. xii. 19. Provoke not the wicked, who are already sufficiently exasperated against you, but let their anger of itself sink and decline: also, do not expose yourselves unseasonably to their passion; as, when we meet a furious and unruly beast, we go out of the way, and avoid him; so behave toward your persecutors. Otherwise, "Give way to the wrath," i. e. of God; wait the time, be not too hasty to revenge yourselves, God will at a proper period do you justice.

"The weapons of God's anger," Jer. i. 25, are the instruments he uses in punishment, war, famine, barrenness, diseases, &c. but particularly war, which is the conjunction of all misfortunes, and the fulness of "the cup of God's wrath." To consummate, finish, fill, his anger; i. e. to cause the effects of it to be felt with the utmost rigour.

"The whole land is ruined and made desolate by the anger of the dove," Jer. xxv. 38; and xlii. 16, "Let us fly into our own country, from the sword of the dove," (יונה Ioneh); i. e. from the Chaldeans, who bore a dove, it is said, in their standards. But the best interpreters translate the word Ioneh (which signifies a dove) oppressor, destroyer, enemy, such as Nebuchadnezzar was, to the Jews.

ANI, or Oni, יני: poor, or afflicted.

ANI, or Hunni, a Levite, a musician who accompanied the ark, when David brought it to Jerusalem, 1 Chron. xv. 18.

ANIAM, אניאם: I am a people; from אני I, and ים, a people: otherwise, the ship of the people; from אני ani: otherwise, affliction, or strength of the people; from און anan, or anan, and ים am, the people. Son of Shemida, of Manasseh, 1 Chron. vii. 19.

ANIANUS,

ANIANUS, or ANANIAS, bishop of Alexandria after St. Mark; the history of whose conversion has been thus related. St. Mark entering Alexandria, broke his shoe, and gave it to a cobbler named Anian, to mend. This man hurt his hand with his awl, and cried out, on feeling the pain, "Ah, my God!" St. Mark took this opportunity to discourse to him of God, and the gospel; then making a little clay with his spitte, and applying it to Anian's wound, he cured him immediately. Anian, much affected by this kindness, invited St. Mark into his house, heard the word, believed, and was baptized, with all his family. The number of Christians increased so greatly, that the Heathen became jealous of St. Mark, and obliged him to retire from the city, but not till he had ordained St. Anian bishop. He governed this church eighteen years, and died A. D. 86.

ANIM, or Onim, עֲנִי: who answer, who afflict. Vide ANATH. [Perhaps fountains: i. e. more fountains than one.]

ANIM, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 50. Probably the Anam, or Anem, or Ancem, mentioned by Eusebius and St. Jerom, about eight or ten miles east of Hebron. Vide Euseb. Onomast. ad vocem Anea, Anem, & Ausem.

ANIMALS, the Hebrews distinguished animals into pure and impure, or clean and unclean; i. e. those which might be eaten and offered, and those whose use was prohibited. The sacrifices they generally offered, were, (1) of the beee kind, a cow, bull, or calf. The ox could not be offered, because it was mutilated; and when it is said oxen were sacrificed, we are to understand bulls. I do not think the mutilation of animals was permitted, or used among the Israelites. (2) Of the goat kind; a she-goat, he goat, or kid. (3) Of the sheep kind; a ewe, ram, or lamb; when it is said sheep are offered, rams are chiefly meant, i. e. in burnt-offerings, and sacrifices for sin; for as to peace-offerings, or sacrifices of pure devotion, a female might be sometimes offered, if pure and without blemish.

Beside these three sorts of animals used in sacrifice, many others might be eaten, wild or tame; such as the stag, the roe-buck; and in general, all that have cloven feet, and that chew the cud. All that have not cloven hoofs, and do not chew the cud, were esteemed impure, and could neither be offered, nor eaten. The fat of all sorts of animals sacrificed, was forbid as food. The blood of all kinds of animals, generally, and in all cases, was prohibited, on pain of death. Neither did the Israelites eat the sinew which lies on the hollow of the thigh, because, the angel that wrestled with Jacob at Mahanaim, touched the hollow of his thigh in the sinew that shrank. Neither did they eat animals, which had been taken, and touched, by a devouring or impure beast, such as a dog, a wolf, or a boar, &c.—Nor of any animal that died of itself. Whoever touched the carcase of it was impure until the evening; and till that time, and after he had washed his clothes, he did not return to the common conversation of other Jews, Levit. xi. 39, 40.

Fish that had neither fins nor scales were unclean, Levit. xi. 10.

Birds which walk on the ground with four feet, such as bats; and flies that have many feet, were impure: but the law (Levit. xi. 21, 22) excepts locusts, which have their hind feet higher than those before, and rather leap than walk. These are clean, and may be eaten; as, in fact, they were, and still are in Palestine.

Interpreters are much divided with relation to the legal purity, or impurity of animals. It is believed, that this distinction obtained before the flood; since God commanded Noah, Gen. vii. 2, to carry seven couple of clean animals into the ark, and only two of unclean. Some are of opinion, that this distinction is altogether symbolical, and that it denotes the moral purity which the Hebrews were to endeavour after, or that impurity which they were to avoid, according to the nature of these animals: so that, if a hog, for example, signified gluttony; a hare, lasciviousness; a sheep, gentleness; a dove, simplicity; &c. then the principal design of Moses in prohibiting the use of swine's flesh, was to condemn gluttony, and excess in eating or drinking; or, in recommending sheep, or doves, it was to recommend gentleness, &c. Aug. contra Faust, lib. vi. cap. vii. Iren. lib. v. adversus Hares. Origen. in Levit. Homil. 7. Cyril. lib. vii. in Levit. Barnabas, in his epistle, is very large on these symbolical significations.

Others believe, that God intended to preserve the Hebrews from the temptation of adoring animals, by permitting them to eat the generality of those which were regarded as gods in Egypt; and leading them to look with horror on others, to which, likewise, divine honours were paid. They never had any imagination of worshipping the animals they ate; still less of adoring those which they could not persuade themselves to use, even for nourishment. Theodoret, qu. 1, in Levit. Tertullian thought, that God proposed, by this mean, to accustom the Hebrews to temperance; by enjoining them to deprive themselves of several sorts of food. contra Marcion. lib. ii. cap. 18.

Many commentators discern in the animals which are forbid as unclean, merely some natural qualities which are really hurtful, or which, at least, are understood so to be by certain people.

ple. Moses, forbad the use of those beasts, birds, and fishes, the flesh of which was thought pernicious to health; those which are wild, dangerous, or venomous, or that were so esteemed. God, likewise, who designed to separate the Hebrews from other people, as a nation consecrated to his service, seems to have interdicted the use of certain animals, which were considered as unclean, that by this figurative purity, they might be inclined to another purity, real and perfect. This he intimates, Levit. xx. 24, "I am the Lord, your God which have separated you from other people; ye shall therefore put difference between clean beasts and unclean, and between unclean fowls and clean: and ye shall not make your souls abominable by beast or by fowl, or by any manner of living thing that creepeth on the ground, which I have separated from you as unclean. And ye shall be holy unto me: for I the Lord am holy, and have severed you from other people, that ye should be mine."

[Why should we not combine ALL these ideas, as reasons among others for the legal purity or impurity of animals, &c. since those which were naturally hurtful as food, might well be regarded as typically hurtful also? Since providence has thus varied the natures of animals from the very first: might not the domesticity of some render them clean, while the savage and dangerous nature of others excluded them from the table, and from the altar? See FRAGMENTS No. CCCXLII. also, the Plates of UNCLEAN ANIMALS.]

We cannot now determine precisely the creatures meant in the original under certain of the following names, as the Eastern parts of the world have many, different from those which inhabit Europe; and to which no English names can properly be given: but under their respective articles, what information we have been able to procure, will appear.

We have followed the Vulgate in this catalogue: those who please, may consult the large work of Samuel Bochart, concerning the animals mentioned in the Bible.

Matt. xxiii. 23.

ANNA, or Hannah, חַנָּה: gracious, merciful; or one that gives; from חָנַן chanan.

I. ANNA, wife of Tobit, of the tribe of Naphthali, carried captive to Nineveh, by Salmaneser, king of Assyria, Tobit, i. 1, 2, &c. After Tobit had lost his sight, and was become poor, Anna went out daily to earn money by spinning; which she brought home for her family. One day, having received a kid as a present, she brought it home; Tobit hearing it, said, "Take care that this kid be not stolen; send it back to those who own it." To which Anna with great passion replied, "Where then is the reward of thine alms? and what are become of all thine hopes?" &c. Thus was the patience of Tobit tried, amid his other afflictions.

Some time after, Tobit believing himself to be near his end, called his son Tobias, charged him to maintain a great respect for his mother; and to remember all she had done, and suffered for him: adding, "When her life is finished, bury her near me." Nevertheless, Tobit lived long after this, and Anna his wife survived him. Tobit, xiv. 12. Tobit died about A. M. 3363, ante A. D. 641. Anna, therefore must have died after this time, but before 3378, in which year Nineveh was taken: for Tobias left that city before it was taken, as his father had forewarned him.

II. ANNA, daughter of Phanuel, a prophetess and widow, of the tribe of Asher, Luke ii. 36, 37. She was married early, and lived but seven years with her husband: being then at liberty, she continued, without ceasing, in the temple, serving God, day and night, with fasting and prayers. [Her serving God in the temple, day and night, says Dr. Prideaux, is to be understood no otherwise than that she constantly attended the morning and evening sacrifice at the temple, and then with great devotion offered up her prayers to God; the time of the morning and evening sacrifice being the most solemn time of prayer among the Jews, and the temple the most solemn place for it.] She was fourscore years of age, when the holy Virgin came to present Jesus in the Temple; and entering there, while Simeon was pronouncing his thanksgiving, Anna, likewise, began to praise God, and to speak of the Messiah to all who waited for the redemption of Israel. We know nothing more of this holy prophetess. The Roman martyrology fixes her festival to September: that of Ughellus, and the Menæa of the Greeks, unite the festival of Anna, the prophetess, and that of Simeon, February 3.

III. ANNA, mother of the Blessed Virgin, and wife to Joachim. The names of Anna and Joachim are not in the New Testament, but they occur in books of some antiquity, though of no authority, particularly in the Western church. The fathers have quoted them; and tradition has preserved the names of Anna and Joachim, and paid honours to their memory: but we cannot adopt every story of their lives, that has been published by zeal and ignorance. What we know of Joachim and Anna, is from the Christians of the East, who have preserved several traditions, to which the Christians of the West are strangers. We shall offer a specimen, which will be quite sufficient.

We read in the spurious Protevangelium, or Preparatory Gospel, cap. i. that Joachim intending on some solemn day to present his offering in the temple, was prevented by a Jew, named Reuben; who told him, it was not lawful, because he had no posterity: Joachim, in great confusion, retired into the wilderness, where he continued forty days and nights, in fasting and prayer. In the mean while, his wife Anna, at home, was afflicting herself before God, on account of her own barrenness, and the absence of her husband. On a great festival day, Judith, her maid-servant, said to her, "How long will you continue thus sorrowful? It is not lawful for you on this day, to afflict yourself; for it is the great day of the Lord. Take this head-dress and wear it; for it does not become me to put it on, who am your servant; but it becomes you, who are of royal extraction." Anna replied, "Be gone, I will not, for the Lord hath humbled me." Her maid was provoked with this answer; and reproached her with her barrenness: Anna, on this, laid aside her mourning, dressed her head, and put on her wedding-clothes.

About the ninth hour, she came into her garden, and began to intreat that God would vouchsafe to deliver her from the ignominy of barrenness. As she was at her devotions, under a laurel-tree, she looked up, and saw a bird's nest, with young ones: this object increased her grief; she cried to the Lord, and complained bitterly that she continued barren, while animals of all kinds produced their young, and the earth brought forth its fruit in season, and blessed the Creator. "I am," says she, "as one who is accursed in Israel: I am reviled, and covered with confusion, and driven from the temple of my God: To what can I compare myself?"

Hereupon, an angel descended from heaven, and said to her, "Anna, God hath heard your prayer; you shall conceive and bear a child, and your generation shall be praised throughout the world." Anna answered, "As the Lord my God liveth, if he give me either son or daughter, I will consecrate him to the Lord, and he shall serve in his temple all the days of his life." At the same time, two angels came, and declared to her, that God had heard Joachim's prayer, and that he should return very soon with his flocks: accordingly, he returned from the mountains, and Anna went to meet him. Some few days after, she conceived, and at the end of nine months, brought forth Mary, and suckled her: at six months old, Mary began to go alone; and at the year's end Anna weaned her, made a great entertainment for the priests, and offered Mary to them. The child continued two years in her father's house; and when she was three years old, Joachim and Anna presented her in the temple, to be brought up and serve the Lord there.

[When we read such accounts as these, we can scarcely forbear reflecting on the words of Luke, in his preface to his Gospel, "Whereas, many have taken in hand to relate the things believed among us:"—and to be very thankful that we are favoured with gospels, written by those who had "perfect understanding of all things from the very first."]

Mahomet, in the Koran, and other Arabs, have preserved several traditions relating to Joachim, Anna, and Mary: they say, that Anna was the daughter of Nabor, and wife of Amram. These words might induce some to say, that Mahomet believed Amram, son of Kohath grand-son of Levi, and father of Moses, Aaron, and Miriam (Mary), to be the same with Amram, husband to Anna, and father of Mary; and, consequently, that he confounded the Virgin Mary, with (Miriam or) Mary, sister of Moses. And on this is founded the reproach with which he is charged, of having jumbled two persons together, who lived at more than sixteen hundred years distance from one another. Alcoran, Surat iii. Vide Meravius's notes on this place.

The interpreters of the Alcoran endeavour to justify Mahomet, by saying, that Amram, husband to Anna, and father to Mary, was, really, of the same family with Aaron and Moses; which is not wholly indefensible, because it is said, Luke, i. 5, that Elizabeth, who was related to Mary, was of the daughters of Aaron. They add, that Amram, father of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was son of Matthée; so that their Amram would be the same with our Joachim, husband to Anna.

They say, moreover, that Anna, when pregnant nant with Mary, devoted the child to God, without knowing whether it were a son or daughter; that God was pleased with her prayer and vow; that Anna being delivered, God himself named Mary; that Anna offered her to Zachary, the priest, who shut her up in one of the chambers of the temple. Vide MARY.

Some have said, that Anna had three husbands; Joachim, by whom she had Mary, our Saviour's mother; and Cleophas, by whom she had Mary, the daughter of Cleophas, and mother of James Minor, Joseph the Just, Simon the Zealot, and Thaddæus: also Salomas, her third husband, by whom she had a third daughter, named Mary, married to Zebedee, and mother to James Major, and John the Evangelist. Certain old verses are cited in support of this genealogy; but these verses, and this opinion, are of no authority among learned men. The verses are these: apud Joan. Gerson. Cancellar. tom. iii. p. 59.

Anna tribus nupsit, Joachim, Cleophas, Salomæque,
Ex quibus ipsa viris peperit tres Anna Marias.
Quas duxere Joseph, Alphæus, Zebedæusque;
Prima Jesum; Jacobum, Joseph, cum Simone Judam, Altera dat. Jacobum dat tertis, datque Joannem.

There is great probability, that the Marys mentioned in the gospel, and said to have been the Holy Virgin's sisters, were her relations only; probably cousins: but some have guessed that they might be other daughters of Joachim and Anna, born after the Holy Virgin, which however is not likely. We know nothing concerning the time of Joachim's or Anna's death; nor of their tomb; though monuments are shown to travellers as such, and pains are taken to persuade them that these were their sepulchres. The Latins observe the festival of St. Anna, July 26, and the Greeks that of her conception, December 9, and that of her marriage with Joseph, September 9.

IV. ANNA, or ANNO, or Thecemine, wife of Jeroboam, king of Israel. The name of this princess occurs in the Greek only. For what we know of this queen, see ABIJAH. The Greek of the first book of Kings says, that Pharaoh, king of Egypt, married his wife's eldest sister, Thecemine, to Jeroboam, while he was a refugee in Egypt.

ANNAS, Ἀναΐ: one that answers, that afflicts, and humbles; from אנה anah: or gracious, merciful; from חנה chaneh.

ANNAS, high-priest. Vide ANANUS.

ANNIUS RUFUS, succeeded Ambivius in the government of Judæa. He was sent by Augustus, A. M. 4016, and recalled by Tiberius, A. M. 4018. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 3.

ANNUNCIATION. On this festival, the Christian church celebrates the conception, or incarnation of the Son of God, in the womb of the Virgin Mary.

The angel Gabriel first announced the approach of this event to Zechariah, telling him that his son should be the fore-runner and prophet of the Messiah. Six months afterwards Gabriel was sent to Nazareth, to the Virgin Mary, of the tribe of Judah, and family of David. The angel saluted her by saying, "Hail, thou highly favoured of the Lord; the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women!" Mary, when she saw him, was troubled, and considered with herself, what this salutation could mean. And the angel said unto her, "Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found favour with God. Thou shalt conceive, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest," &c.

Then said Mary unto the angel, "How shall this be, seeing I know not a man?" The angel answered, "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore also, that Holy thing which shall be born of thee, shall be called the Son of God. And behold thy cousin, Elizabeth, she also hath conceived a son in her old age; and this is the sixth month with her; for with God nothing shall be impossible." And Mary said, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it unto me according to thy word," Luke, i. 5, 25, 26, & seq. Then the angel departed; and by the operation of the Holy Ghost, Mary conceived the only son of the Father, who had been four thousand years expected; and was to be the happiness, the light, the salvation of men.

We celebrate this festival, March 25; and Austin, de Trinit. lib. iv. says the church, on the authority of some old tradition, believed this to be the true day: in this, the Greeks, Latins, Syrians, Chaldees, and Coptics agree; and it is the consequence of placing the birth of Christ in December; vide Bolland. 25 Mart. That reasons may be urged against this opinion, we shall see hereafter.

[ADDITIONAL REMARKS.]

Mahomet in his Koran, the third Surat, has this remarkable passage: "Remember what is written of Mary—We sent to her, our spirit, in the human form; she was affrighted, and said, 'God will preserve me from you, unless you have his fear before your eyes.' But the angel answered, 'O Mary! I am the messenger of thy God, and of thy Lord, who will give thee a wise and active son!' She replied, 'How shall I have a son, without the knowledge of a man?' 'HE HAS SAID IT'—answered the angel: the event shall be, as I have announced to thee.' Then she became pregnant," &c.

As the history of the annunciation, as a part of the miraculous conception, has lately been impugned, impugned, this may serve to show, that it was extant in other authorities, beside our present gospels. Mahomet certainly found it in some ancient writings, since he says, "Remember what is written." He could hardly have adopted it, nor this appeal, had it not been the general belief, prior to his time: as its primary aspect is so favourable to Christianity.

This subject has been so often set before our eyes by representations (rather misrepresentations) of the pencil, that it seems necessary to guard ourselves against false ideas received from prints and pictures: to dismiss—the cloud attending the angel—the flowers—the brilliancy—and all such artful and artificial, but unwarrantable, accessories: and to reduce the story to the simple narrative of Luke; by which it appears, that Mary was in a house—probably, in private; (but this is not said, nor in what part of her house): for the angel entered, and advanced towards her; that he did not appear in splendor, nor in any extremely disturbing manner, so as to astonish Mary, but gave her time to consider, to reason with herself, respecting his saying: Gr. "what kind of salutation (not what kind of person, or &c.) this could be"—and to recover from her first surprise, at such a compliment paid to her. Then he proceeds to deliver his message; and she enquires of him—if, indeed, her exclamation, "How can that be!" be not rather the language of surprise. It does not appear that she knew him to be an angel (for then she would have acquiesced in his words without hesitation) but after he had, as a sign, given her information, that her cousin Elizabeth was pregnant, he departed: he did not vanish: but (ἀνῆλθεν) he went away from her.

Mary went "in haste"—directly—to visit Elizabeth (a considerable journey) from whom she could acquire information to guide her conduct in this matter: e. gr. had Elizabeth not been pregnant, then she might have thought the appearance was delusive: but finding Elizabeth really pregnant, she could learn from her what kind of vision had appeared to Zachariah in the temple, whereby to identify the person seen by herself; whom now, perhaps, she first understood might be an angel: and, as very probably, the angel informed her on the behaviour of Zachariah, by comparing that story, as received from him, the subsequent events, the dates, &c. (for Elizabeth had concealed herself, so that her condition was not generally known in the neighbourhood) she received abundant evidence in confirmation of her own experience, and of her confidence in the Divine interposition.

Thus simply considered, this story has no small resemblance to that of the annunciation of the birth of Samson, wherein the angel was repeatedly addressed as a mere man—a prophet: and was not discovered, till after his message had taken its effect. In like manner, an angel announced to Sarah the birth of Isaac; but was not known, at the time, to be an angel; Sarah hesitated, because of her great age; and the virgin Mary hesitated, because of her (early) youth. The language and expressions used in both instances, the similarity of appearances, &c. &c. Mary being a person of a reflective turn of mind, could not but ponder, and consider them very attentively.

Now, if nothing invalidates the predictions of the birth of Samson, and of Isaac, and of John the Baptist, very recently—(see also 2 Kings, iv. 16)—why should the prediction of the birth of Jesus, the MESSIAH, be thought unlikely to employ a heavenly messenger?—though so completely human in appearance, as, like his fellows in ancient time, not to be discovered, perhaps not to be suspected, till after he had delivered his message.

It ought farther to be noted, that in the cases of the wives of Abraham, of Manoah, and of Zachariah, they being all married women, and all of them advanced in years, circumstances with respect to them, admitted of far less (perhaps, of very little, or no) ambiguity: since they must have known, whether their husbands had visited them, and must often have been acquainted with the history of early pregnancy in other women: but in the case of Mary, her youth, her consequent inexperience (not to say almost ignorance) in such matters, connected with the absence of the ordinary intercourse with her husband; these considerations rendered information more than usually necessary for her: because without it, what could she have thought of consequent circumstances, and symptoms, &c. how have accounted for them? and how have understood them?

It may be observed also, that the angel constantly uses the future tense in delivering his message to her: "Thou shalt found favour with God"—and "Thou shalt conceive"—The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee—The power of the Highest shall overshadow thee:—Thus, apparently waiting her acquiescence, as a party principally concerned; certainly till that acquiescence was expressed by Mary, the event did not take place; but it might take place soon afterwards. "The name (Jesus) given him by the angel, before he was conceived in the womb," Luke, ii. 21.

N. B. As Mary was referred to Elizabeth, so Elizabeth seems to have been, in some sense, referred to Mary: how else should Elizabeth know (Luke i. 42, &c.) that Mary was the mother of her Lord—and what things were told to Mary from from the Lord; and how should she know that Mary had believed? &c.

There is also another ANNUNCIATION, which ought not to be overlooked on this article—that made in a dream, to Joseph (Matth. i. 20) probably, by the same celestial messenger, and certainly to the same import as the former ANNUNCIATION made to Mary. Now as Joseph appears to have been a thoughtful, well-informed, and considerate man, a just man (i. e. very STRICT) and, not a young man (in all probability; as well from the universal consent of tradition, as from every collateral circumstance) we may be assured, a man of his understanding, his experience in life, his reputation, (perhaps, his family pride, as descended from David) and his moderate situation in the world, would not degrade and burden himself, with a supposititious issue (and what security had he against many such, from so young a woman?) unless he had been fully convinced, that the case was miraculous.—Thus the mediocrity of Joseph's situation, in respect to property, becomes a reason of considerable weight—since he could so easily have relieved himself from the attendant expenses of a rising family, at his time of life, by fulfilling his first design of putting Mary away privily: which, in fact, unless under complete conviction, was his duty.

N. B. The angel, in speaking to Mary, uses language which may be taken in reference to a temporal Messiah—(He shall reign, &c.); but to Joseph, he seems to be more explicit, and to speak of a spiritual Messiah—“He shall save his people from their sins.” Does he not also refer Joseph to the prophecy respecting Emmanuel; and inform him, this event was the completion of that prophecy?—“THIS ALSO ALL IS COME TO PASS, that it might be fulfilled”—if so, then both Joseph and Mary well knew the prophetic writings: Mary, as appears from the allusions to them in her song; and Joseph, to whom, otherwise, the appeal to Isaiah's prophecy had been useless. Vide ALMAH, JOSEPH, MARY, &c.

As the annunciation of the birth of John the Baptist, appears very much to illustrate, and to confirm that respecting Jesus, it demands the consideration of some of its circumstances:

1. The age of Zachariah; probably above fifty, but not quite fifty-five years of age: since, after that time of life, the priests did not perform divine offices in the temple, but only superintended them (as the Rabbins relate); perhaps this was his last time of officiating: surely an age of experience! An age not likely to be imposed upon! An age not likely, through warmth of imagination, to impose on itself!

[I have let this passage stand as it stood in the first Edition; but though the Levites were dismissed from the temple service at fifty years of age, yet, I believe, there is no evidence that the priests were so dismissed; at least, the high-priest Jehoiada continued during life: he lived to the great age of 130 years. 2 Chr. xxiv. 16. Zachariah, therefore, might be much older.]

2. Elizabeth, probably near the same age as her husband; which, for a woman in the East, is a much more advanced period of life than among us: considering the early age at which the Jews married, this couple had probably lived together, barren, full thirty [or more] years.

3. The lot determined whose duty it was to burn incense: Zachariah then, could little have expected this visit—at this time:—nothing could be more contingent, in respect to him.

4. Being in the sanctuary, he there saw—a person standing—on the right side of the altar of incense—that being the most convenient situation to permit Zachariah to fulfil his office; and (as I understand it) so that the altar, and the smoke of the incense was between them.

5. The very great sanctity of this place—no person was ever admitted here, but the priests who had duty in it; (no ordinary Jew ever approached it); not even a priest had duty in it at this moment of solemn worship, except he who was engaged in that worship; and Zachariah not only must have personally known any intrusive priest, but it was his duty to punish his intrusion. The appearance of the angel (though I suppose completely human) yet was certainly different from that of a priest, in dress, manners, &c.

6. The angel's discourse to Zachariah.

7. The unbelief of Zachariah:—he urges not only his own age—implying the extinction of corporal vigour in himself; but the same impediment with respect to his wife.

8. The angel's answer:—I am Gabriel, standing before God.—Is not this a kind of asseveration? q. d. standing at this moment, in a sacred place, in the holy presence of God, &c.

9. The sign given to Zachariah. Thou shalt be dumb.—The effect of this on the people; and his telling them by action, and dumb show, that he had seen a vision. It should seem, that he was deaf also, for he received information by signs, ver. 62.

10. He remained in this state at the temple some days, till “the days of his ministration were accomplished;” so that all the priests in waiting might be informed of these circumstances: for though he could not speak, he could write the story.

11. The conception of Elizabeth: this is, indeed, the main incident in this story; for, suppose—all the former to be void of truth;—suppose suppose that a man of Zachariah's character and time of life, to make himself famous, (rather infamous) had forged all the former parts of the story—that his dumbness was obstinate, and wilful, yet what effect could all this have had to recall the departed vigour of his person? That is not all:—What effect could his relation of these things to Elizabeth, by writing, as must be supposed, have had on a woman of her time of life? If imagination had for a while invigorated Zachariah, could it have had the effect of overcoming even nature itself, in the person of Elizabeth? A woman at fifty, or more, (equal to a woman in England ten years older, at least) and long barren, was surely past both fears and hopes of child-bearing: let this be duly weighed.—Had Zachariah associated with a young woman, it might have seemed dubious; but with Elizabeth, after many years of barrenness!—

12. Elizabeth hid herself full five months: This deserves notice; because her condition could not be known, much less could it be blazed abroad. Now, in the sixth month (i. e. while Elizabeth's pregnancy was private) Gabriel visits Mary at Nazareth, and tells her the secret respecting Elizabeth: as a sign he was no impostor. Mary believed him; but Mary also took rational methods to justify that belief: she went directly to visit Elizabeth.—On enquiry and inspection, she found what Gabriel had told her to be true; and from the accounts of Zachariah and Elizabeth, she acquired information which guided her conduct.

Now if it be made a question, whether Zachariah could not be deceived, either by others, or by himself? it is best answered, by asking—when did self-deception produce such effects? He could certainly judge of his own incapacity (real incapacity) to speak: but, supposing it assumed, or fancied—what influence could this have had in forwarding the birth of John? The general inference is clear:—if the birth of John, the forerunner of Jesus, was miraculous, its whole weight is in favour of the miraculous conception, and the annunciation of Jesus.] Vide JOHN BAPTIST, &c.

To ANSWER. Beside the common usage of this word, in the sense of a reply, it has other significations. As,

To sing in two chorusses: e. gr. it is said, Exod. xv. 21, that Moses having composed a song of thanksgiving, after the passage of the Red Sea, Miriam answered them, "Sing ye to the Lord," &c.—meaning, that Moses, with the men on one side, and Miriam, with the women on the other side, sung the same song, as it were, in two chorusses, or divisions; of which one answered the other. Numb. xxi. 17, "Then Israel sang this song, Spring up, O well, answer unto it;" i. e. sing responsively; one side (or choir) singing first, and then the other. Sam. v. "Is not this David, of whom they sung one to another in dances, saying, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands"? They sung this song to his honour, in distinct chorusses. The Vulgate generally translates the Hebrew, hanah, by concinere; but it signifies, properly, to answer.

This word is taken likewise for to accuse—or defend, any one, judicially. Gen. xxx. 33, "My righteousness shall answer for me;" it shall be my advocate before thee. Deut. xxxi. 21, "The song which thou shalt compose and teach them, shall (answer) testify against them as a witness." Isaiah says, "The show of their countenance will testify against them;" their impudence will be like a witness and an accuser, who replies to what the person accused alleges in his own justification. Hosea, v. 5, says the same, "The pride of Israel doth testify (answer) to his face."

To answer, is likewise taken in a bad sense; as when it is said—that a son answers his father insolently, or a servant his master. Rom. ix. 20, "Who art thou that repliest against God?" i. e. to contest with him.—John xviii. 22, "Answerest thou the high-priest so?"

St. Paul says, that he, "had in himself the answer (or sentence) of death;" like a man who has had notice of condemnation, he had a certain assurance of dying. Others translate, "We had a fore-thought [presentiment] of death within ourselves." Heinsius maintains, that the translation ought to be, "We have had within ourselves a caution of death;" i. e. an assurance that we shall not die.

ANTARADA, a city of Syria, or Phœnicia, on the continent, opposite to, and east of the island Arada, and of the city Arada, in that island. Scripture does not speak expressly of the city Antarada; but in several places, it mentions Arada, or Arva, or the Arvadites, who are reckoned among the Canaanites, whose country God gave to the Hebrews, Gen. x. 18; 1 Chron. i. 16. Antarada is at present called Tortosa: the city is still considerable, chiefly on account of its fine harbour. See ARADUS.

ANTHEDON, a city of Palestine, lying on the Mediterranean, about twenty furlongs south of Gaza. Herod the Great called it Agrippias, in honour of Agrippa. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 21. Vide AGRIPPIAS.

ANTICHRIST, the name of that Man of Sin who is expected to precede the second coming of our Saviour; and who is represented in Scripture, and in the Fathers, as the epitome of every thing impious, cruel, and abominable. To him is referred what the prophets have said of Antiochus Epiphanes, of Gog and Magog, of the son of perdition, and of the man of sin, mentioned by St. Paul, which many have applied historically, to Nero. For it may be said, that Nebuchadnezzar, Cambyzes, Antiochus Epiphanes, and Nero, were so many antichrists, or forerunners of antichrist. Vide Hieronym. in Dan. xi. 24. St. John informs us, that in his time, there were many antichrists; meaning heretics and persecutors, 1 John, ii. 18.
of

But antichrist, the true, real antichrist, who is to come before the universal judgment, will in himself, include all the marks of wickedness, which have been separately extant in different persons, his types, or fore-runners.

St. Paul, 2 Thess. ii. 3, 4, 5, says, "That this man of sin, this son of perdition, this enemy of God, shall exalt himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so as to sit in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God," &c.

The terrible picture of antichrist drawn by St. Paul, seemed so like Nero, that many of the ancients thought that prince was antichrist, or at least his fore-runner, and that antichrist would appear very soon after him. Victorin. in Apocal. Ambrosiast. in 2 Thess. ii. Chrysost. in 2 Thess. alii. Others thought, that Nero would rise again before the consummation of ages, to accomplish what was said of antichrist in the Scriptures. Hieronym. in Dan. xi.

St. John, Rev. xi. 7, describes antichrist under the name of the "beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit, and killeth the two witnesses; who maketh war with the saints; killeth them, and leaveth their dead bodies exposed in the market-place of the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified." He afterward (chap. xiii.) represents him as "a beast rising up out of the sea, with ten horns, and ten crowns on his horns, and on his head the name of blasphemy. The dragon (or the devil) gave him his strength and power. — The beast was worshipped, and had a mouth given him, speaking great things, and blasphemies, and power to make war against the saints for two and forty months: the beast overcame, and was worshipped, for two and forty months."

In another place, he says, "that the beast should oblige all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hands, or in their foreheads; so that no one might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name. Here is wisdom; let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast: for it is the number of a man; and his number is six hundred three score and six."

Some believe this number 666, to be that of the letters in the name of antichrist, according to their numerical valuation: for the letters of the Hebrew, Greek and Latin alphabets, have their numerical values.

It has greatly perplexed the curious, to know whether the name of the beast, which St. John speaks of, should be written in Hebrew, Syriac, Greek, or Latin: whether his name be that of his person, or of his dignity, or that which his followers should give him; or that which he will deserve by his crimes. There are many conjectures on this matter; and almost all commentators have tried their skill, without being able to say, positively, that any one has succeeded, in ascertaining the true mark of the beast, or the number of his name.

The number 666, has been discovered in the names—Ulpianus Trajanus (a), Dioclesian (b), Julian the Apostate (c), Luther (d), Evanthas (e), Latinus (f), Titan (g), Lampetis (h), Niketes (i), Kakos Hodegos (k), i. e. bad guide; Arnoumai (l), I renounce; Romiit (m), Roman; Abinu Kadescha Papa (n), our holy father the Pope; and, Elion Adonai, Jehovah, Kadosch (o), the Most High, the Lord, the Holy God.

This

This last name could have been invented and calculated, only to show the vanity of all the pains taken in this enquiry ; since the number 666 is found in names the most sacred ; the most opposite to antichrist. The wisest and the safest way, is, to be silent.

I may say the same of the time when antichrist is expected to appear. We know, certainly, that he will come before the consummation of ages, before the second coming of Jesus Christ. But those who have attempted to determine the time of his appearance, have only discovered their ignorance and rashness. Ever since St. Paul's days, impostors have terrified believers, by affirming, that the day of the Lord was at hand. St. Paul writes to the Thessalonians (2 Epist. ii. 1, 2) : " We beseech you, brethren, be not soon shaken in mind, as if the day of Christ were at hand ; for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition," &c. St. John says, (1 Epist. iv. 3.) " Every spirit that confesseth not that Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God ; this is that spirit of antichrist, whereof you have heard that it should come, and even now already is it in the world." The heretics of that period were true signs of antichrist ; but these cautions show the expectations of the Christians of that time.

The same opinions and dispositions are observable in the generality of the early fathers. The churches of Vienna, and Lyons, in Gaul, seeing the violence of the persecution under Marcus Aurelius, believed, they then beheld the persecution of antichrist. Apud Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. v. cap. 1. An old ecclesiastical author, called Judas, who lived under Severus, asserted, that antichrist would very soon appear, because of the persecution then raging against the church. Judas Syrus, apud Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. vi. cap. vi. Tertullian, de Fuga in persecut. cap. ii. and Cyprian, Ep. 56. ad Tibarit. & Ep. 53, ad Fortunat. who flourished soon after, did not doubt but that the coming of antichrist was very near. St. Hilary, contra Auxentium. n. 5, observing the progress of Arianism, believed he saw those signs which were the fore-runners of antichrist. Basil, Ep. 71, Ambrose, in lib. x. Luc. cap. iii. Jerom, ad Ageruchiam. Martin, apud Sulpit. Sever. Dialog. 2. Chrysostom, homil. 33, on John, and Gregory the Great, lib. iv. Ep. 35, & 38, & homil. 1, in Evangel. were of opinion, that the end of the world was at hand, and the coming of antichrist was not distant.

After the tenth century, which concluded the sixth millenary, according to that opinion which reckoned the birth of Jesus Christ to have happened about A. M. 5000, people began to get the better of this apprehension of the end of the world, which, according to a tradition of the ancients, was to take place after a duration of 6000 years. They began to build larger churches and edifices. Jerom's translation of the Scriptures, which stated the world to have existed not above 4000 years before Christ, contributed likewise to the persuasion, that the final period of the world, and the coming of antichrist, were not extremely near : this however, did not hinder some from attempting to fix the time of antichrist's appearance. The council of Florence, A. D. 1105, condemned Fluentius, bishop of that city, for maintaining that antichrist was then born. Abbot Joachim, who lived in the twelfth century, pretended that antichrist was to appear in the sixtieth year of his time. Arnaud de Villeneuve said, antichrist would come A. D. 1326 ; Francis Melet said, in A. D. 1530, or 1540 ; John of Paris, A. D. 1560 ; Cardinal de Cusa, A. D. 1730, or 1734 ; Peter Daillé was of opinion, that, according to his calculations, he must appear in A. D. 1789 ; Jerom Cardan, in A. D. 1800 ; John Pico, of Mirandola, in A. D. 1994. Events have already confuted the generality of these predictions ; and we may affirm, without rashness, that the rest are not superior in certainty.

A tradition seems to have been received among the ancients, that antichrist should be born of some Jewish family, and of the tribe of Dan. Pseudo Hippolyt. de consumm. Mundi. Ambrosiast. in 2 Thess. xi. Hieronym. in Dan. xi. The most ancient commentators on the Revelations, such as Aretas, Bede, Primasius, Rupert, Haimo, and many others, were of opinion, that St. John's omission of the name of Dan, in his enumeration of the tribes of Israel (Rev. vii. 5, & seq.) proceeded from his fore-knowledge, that antichrist should arise from this tribe. And how should he arise from this tribe, since the Jews dwell no longer in Judæa, or, at least, are no longer masters of that country ? Why, he will come, say these fathers, from the other side of the Euphrates, from Babylonia, where some suppose that the remainder of the ten tribes, (and in particular of the tribe of Dan) subsists still. This opinion is followed by almost all who have written since St. Jerom, in whose time it was common. Nostri interpretantur hac omnia de Antichristo, qui nasciturus est de populo Judæorum, & de Babylone venturus. Hieronym. in Dan. xi.

As to the parents of antichrist, interpreters are not agreed. Some think his father will be a devil, and his mother some corrupt woman ; (Lactant. lib. xvi. cap. 18. Bede, in Apoc. xiii. Sulpit. Dialog. 2. Hieronym. in Isai. xvii.) others think, that antichrist will be himself a devil devil incarnate : Unus de hominibus in quo Satanæ habitaturus sit corporaliter, says St. Jerom. in Dan. vii. (Vide & Bedam in Apoc. xiii. Ambrosiast. in 2 Thess. ii.) Hilary, the deacon, thought, that as Jesus Christ was incarnate, and proved his divinity by his miracles, so the devil would appear in the person of antichrist, and endeavour to persuade the world that he is God, by working false miracles. In like manner as Jesus Christ was born of a virgin, says Hippolytus, will antichrist boast of having derived his birth from a mother who never had any conversation with man : but, whereas the Son of God took upon him real flesh, antichrist, says that author, will assume only the appearance, the image, or phantom of flesh. It is best to follow the opinion of Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, and others, that antichrist will be a real man, though an agent of the devil, in exercising his cruelty and malice against the faithful. Chrysost. Theodoret. Theophyl. in 2 Thess. ii.

It remains to examine the dominion of antichrist. As it has been supposed, that he will be born in Babylonia, it has been said, that he will there lay the foundation of his empire, that the Jews will be the first to declare for him, to acknowledge his dominion, and to enjoy the principal employments in his government. He will win them by his delusions, his caresses, his false miracles, and by all the appearances of goodness, piety, and clemency ; so that this unhappy people will take him for their Messiah ; and will flatter themselves with the expectation of seeing the kingdom of Israel restored by his means, to its former splendor. Aretas, in Apol. cap. ix. 14 : Lactant. lib. vii. cap. 17. Hieron. Cyrl. Jerol. Cathech. 15, Theodoret. Strab. in Dan. xi.

After he has subdued Egypt, Ethiopia, and Lybia, he will march against Jerusalem, which he will easily conquer ; and there he will establish the seat of his empire. He will then be informed, that Gog and Magog are coming to oppose him ; he will give them battle, and, without difficulty, will defeat them, in the midst of Palestine ; vide Ezek. xxxviii. xxxix. After this, he will direct all his application toward the destruction of Christ's kingdom, and the persecution of Christians : he will exalt himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped ; so that he, as God, shall sit in the temple of God :—in the temple of Jerusalem ; which he will rebuild. Some of the ancients believed, that he will be seated in the churches of Christians, [the temples of God] and there receive the adoration of great numbers of apostates, who will renounce the faith of Jesus Christ.

PART IV. Edit. IV.

Hieronym. Epist. ad Aglas. Quest. Ecumen. in 2 Thess. ii.

Scripture does not mention the duration of antichrist's kingdom : but, in several places, it seems to allow three years and a half, for the continuance of his persecutions : at least, it assigns three years and a half for the persecutions of those who are considered as figures of antichrist.

Mussulmen, as well as Jews and Christians, expect another Christ. Mussulmen call him Daggel, or Deggel, from a name which signifies an impostor, or a liar ; and they hold, that their prophet Mahomet taught one of his disciples, whose name was Tamini-Al-Dari, every thing relating to antichrist ; and, on his authority, they tell us, that antichrist must come at the end of the world ; that he will make his entry into Jerusalem, like Jesus Christ, riding on an ass ; but that Christ, who as they insist, is not dead, will come at his second advent to encounter him : and that, after having conquered him, he will then die indeed. That the beast, described by St. John in the Revelations, will appear with antichrist, and make war against the saints. That Inam Mahadi, who remains concealed among the Mussulmen, will then show himself, join Jesus Christ, and with him engage Daggel ; after which, they will unite the Christians and the Mussulmen, and of the two religions will make but one.

[This subject is confessedly obscure : there have not been wanting, some among ourselves, who observing late surprising and interesting events, have thought they pointed strongly at the near approach of antichrist : time however must ascertain whether their calculations, observations, and determinations, are coincident with those appointed by Providence ; or whether they are no better founded than propositions which events have already confuted.]

I. ANTIGONUS SOCCHEUS, master of Sadoc, who founded the sect of the Sadducees. Antigonus taught, that the worship paid to God should be pure and disinterested. "Be not like slaves," said he to his disciples, "let not the expectation of rewards only, be the motive of your obedience ; obey without self-interest, without the hope of receiving any recompence for your labours. Let the fear of the Lord be upon you." Sadoc, his disciple, unable to reconcile his sentiments to such disinterested spirituality, interpreted his master's maxim in a sense altogether opposite. He concluded from this principle, that neither rewards nor punishments were to be expected in another life ; and that in this life, it was necessary to do good, and to avoid evil, without being influenced by motives either of hope or fear. This, say the Jews, was the origin of the sect of the Sadducees. Antigonus was a great master and teacher of the Jewish law, and succeeded Simon the Just; who was high-priest from A. M. 3702, to 3711: ante A. D. 213.

II. ANTIGONUS, son of John Hircanus, and grandson to Simon Maccabæus. His brother, Aristobulus, made him his associate in the kingdom; but their union was interrupted by the envy, and false accusations of their enemies, who attempted to render Antigonus suspected by Aristobulus. Nevertheless, Aristobulus would never hearken to their evil reports of his brother, till Antigonus, returning from war, in a suit of rich armour, attended by a numerous retinue, went directly to the temple, armed as he was, on the day of the Feast of Tabernacles: Antigonus's enemies represented to Aristobulus, who was then indisposed, that his brother evidently affected the royal power, and assumed the airs of sovereignty; and that he would soon come with a number of soldiers, to kill him. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 18, 19.

Aristobulus, though he could not believe the things reported, yet thought proper not entirely to neglect this intelligence. He ordered, therefore, some of his guards to be posted in an obscure subterraneous place, through which Antigonus was to pass; with directions to seize and kill him, if he came armed: but if he came unarmed, to let him pass. Now Aristobulus lay in the tower, afterwards called Antonia. He sent, therefore, to his brother, desiring him to visit him without arms: but, on the contrary, the queen, and Antigonus's enemies, informed him, that the king having understood that he had the finest arms in the world, desired he would visit him with them. Antigonus, without distrust, went, armed as he was, to wait on the king; but as he passed under the tower, called Strato's, he was killed by Aristobulus's guards.

There was at that time one Judas, at Jerusalem, who had foretold future events: he, being on this day with his disciples, and seeing Antigonus going, as we have said, to the Temple, cried out—that he could not survive his own shame; for, whereas he had formerly foretold, that Antigonus should, on this day, be killed in Strato's tower, he now saw him living, and in perfect health: but, presently after, it was known that this prince was massacred in Strato's tower, which confirmed the opinion some had entertained, of his predictions. This happened A. M. 3899; ante A. D. 105.

III. ANTIGONUS, son of Aristobulus, who was brother to Hircanus and Alexandra. Pompey having taken Jerusalem, and seized Aristobulus, and his two sons, Alexander and Antigonus, Alexander, in the way to Rome, escaped; but Aristobulus, with Antigonus his son, were carried prisoners to Rome, which they quitted privately, and returned into Judæa, five or six years after. Here they endeavoured to re-establish their affairs, by the assistance of their friends; but they were defeated, and taken by Gabinius, who sent them again to Rome. Aristobulus continued there, but Alexander, with Antigonus his son, were allowed to return into Judæa, because Gabinius signified, that he had given a promise to this effect to their mother. See Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 11, & de Bello, lib. i. cap. 6.

Cæsar sent Aristobulus, and his son Antigonus into Judæa, A. M. 3955, ante A. D. 49, that he might bring over this province to his party, and might raise an insurrection there against Pompey: but Aristobulus was poisoned by Pompey's party: his eldest son, Alexander, was beheaded at Antioch, by Scipio; and Antigonus seeing himself expelled from Judæa, by Antipater and his sons, had recourse to Cæsar: to whom he represented the misfortunes which his father and brother had undergone on his account: but Cæsar, having greater regard to Antipater's reasons, rejected the petition of Antigonus. About six years afterwards, Antigonus being assisted with troops by his father-in-law, Ptolemy, son of Mennæus, made an irruption into Judæa, but was repulsed with loss, by Herod, son of Antipater, who, at that time, was only a private person. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 13, 21. de Bello, lib. i. 7, 10. Dio. lib. xli.

The year following, Antigonus having promised the Parthians a thousand talents of silver, and five hundred women, if they would establish him in the kingdom of Judæa, in the stead of his uncle Hircanus, and would put Herod and his relations to death; Pacorus, the king of Parthia's son, entered Judæa, and advanced to Jerusalem. Herod, with his brother Phasael, after a vigorous resistance, retired to the temple, where they were besieged by an army, consisting of Parthians, and Jews in the interest of Antigonus, who had joined them. Hircanus and Phasael having imprudently relied on the Parthians' word, were seized; Phasael killed himself; and Hircanus had his ears cut off, to prevent him at any future time from exercising the high-priesthood; the law excluding from this office all who had any bodily defect. Herod was obliged to retire to Idumæa, with his relations. Thus Antigonus was established king of Judæa, and high-priest, by the Parthians, who returned into their own country, carrying the late high-priest, Hircanus, with them.

In the mean time, Herod, departing for Rome, left his mother and his wife with his brother, Joseph, in the castle of Massada, where they were besieged by Antigonus; but Herod, by the influence of Antony and Cæsar, having obtained from the senate of Rome the title of king of Judæa, Antigonus was declared by the senate, an enemy to the Roman commonwealth. A. M. 3965. Herod returned speedily into Judæa, and with succours received from Ventidius and Silo, marched immediately to Massada, to deliver his relations, shut up in that castle; having effected this, he besieged Jerusalem: but Silo, who had been corrupted by Antigonus, refused to continue the siege; the Roman army went into winter quarters, and Antigonus himself received them into some of his cities. Some time after, Herod going to reinforce Mark Antony, who was then employed in the siege of Samosata, was honourably received by him, and when the war was ended, was sent back into Judæa. Moreover, Antony gave orders to Sosius, governor of Syria and Cilicia, to assist Herod with all his forces against Antigonus.

He returned, therefore, into Judæa, and overcame Antigonus in a set battle; and, if he had not been hindered by the rigour of the season from pursuing his victory, he might have taken Jerusalem, and finished the war. The year following, Sosius having joined Herod with his troops, they marched together to besiege Antigonus in Jerusalem; the city held out five months, after which the lower city, and the outward part of the temple, were taken: but Antigonus, and the Jews in his interest, continued masters of the upper city, and the interior of the temple. Herod attacked those quarters of the city, which still held out for Antigonus, with so much vigour, that at last he took them on the first day of A. M. 3967; ante A. D. 37. Joseph. Antig. lib. xiv. cap. 24, 25, 26.

After this, Antigonus in despair, descended from the tower where he was, and threw himself at Sosius's feet, who despising his mean spirit, called him Antigona, instead of Antigonus. He ordered him to be put in chains, and carried with him to Antioch, where Mark Antony then was, who designed to keep Antigonus for an ornament of his triumph, when he returned to Rome; but, Herod, fearing lest Antigonus might exhibit too effectually his right to the kingdom of Judæa, and might find protection from the senate of Rome, he prevailed on Antony, by great sums of money, to put Antigonus to death. This unhappy prince, therefore, was beheaded at Antioch, A. M. 3967; ante A. D. 37. Joseph. Antig. cap. ult. lib. xx. cap. 8. de Bello. lib. i. cap. 13.

ANTI-LIBANUS. The Greeks give this name to that chain of mountains east of Libanus, which, properly speaking, forms, together with Libanus, but one ridge of mountains, extending from north to south, and afterwards from south to north, in the shape almost of a horse-shoe, for the space of about fourscore leagues, See Plin. lib. v. cap. 20. Ptolem. & Euseb. & Hieronym. in Libano & Anti-libano. Maundrel's Travels. Reland, Palestina, lib. i. cap. 48.

The western part of these mountains was called Libanus; the eastern was called Anti-libanus: the former reached along the Mediterranean, from Sidon, almost to Arada, or Symira. The Hebrew text never mentions Antilibanus; but uses the general name Libanus: and the coins struck at Laodicea and Hierapolis, have the inscription "cities of Libanus," though they belong rather to Antilibanus. The Septuagint, on the contrary, put Anti-libanus often instead of Libanus.

The valley which separates Libanus from Anti-libanus, is very fruitful: it was, formerly on the side of Syria, inclosed with a wall, whereof there are now no traces. Pliny, lib. v. cap. 20. Strabo says, lib. xvi. that the name of Cælo-Syria, or "the hollow Syria," belongs principally to the valley between Libanus and Anti-libanus.

ANTIOCH. There were several cities of this name; but Scripture mentions only that Antioch which was the capital of Syria; and another Antioch in Pisidia.

ANTIOCH of Syria, was formerly called, Riblath, according to St. Jerom. in Ezek. xlvii. & in Isai. xiii. 1, & in Amos, vi. 2.

Antioch is mentioned only in the books of the Maccabees, and in the New Testament; but Riblath, or Riblatha, is mentioned, Numbers, xxxiv. 11; 2 Kings, xxiii. 33; xxv. 6, 20, 21; Jer. xxxix. 5; lii. 9, 10, 26, 27. Theodoret says, that in his time there was a city of Riblah, near Emesa, in Syria; which is contrary to Jerom. However that might be, it is certain Antioch was not known under this name, till after the reign of Seleucus Nicanor, who built it, and called it Antioch, in consideration of his father Antiochus, before J. C. 301. The kings of Syria, successors to Alexander the Great, generally resided at Antioch. There the disciples of Jesus Christ were first called Christians. Indeed, this city seems to have been a kind of head quarters to Christianity, and from hence they sent missionaries in various directions. Acts xi. &c.

[This city was built, say some, by Antiochus Epiphanes, but others say, by Seleucus Nicanor, first king of Syria, in honour of his father Antiochus. It was the royal seat of the kings of Syria: in power and dignity, says Strabo, lib. xvi.

xvi. not much inferior to Seleucia or Alexandria. Josephus, lib. iii. cap. 1, characterises it as the third city of the Roman provinces. In fact, it was long the most powerful city of the East. It was famous among the Jews for the Jus Civitatis, or right of citizenship, which Seleucus had given to them in common with the Greeks and Macedonians, and which Josephus informs us (Ant. lib. xii. cap. 13.) they continued to retain. These privileges, no doubt, contributed to render this city so desirable to the Christians, who were every where considered as a sect of Jews; since here they could perform their worship in their own way without molestation, or interruption: and we may add, that this contributes to account for the importance attached by the apostles to the introduction of the gospel into Antioch; and for the interest taken by them in its promotion and extension, in a city so distant from Jerusalem.]

Antioch was almost square, had many gates, and part of it, on the north side, stood on a high mountain. It was adorned with galleries, and five fountains. Ammianus Marcellinus says, lib. iv. & xxii. it was celebrated throughout the world; and that no city exceeded it, either in fertility of soil, or richness of trade. The emperors, Vespasian, Titus, and others, granted very great privileges to Antioch: but it has likewise been exposed to very great revolutions. It was almost demolished by earthquakes, in the years of J. C. 340, 394, 396, 458, 526, and 528. The emperor Justinian repaired it A. D. 529, and called it, says Evagrius, Theopolis; i. e. The City of God. Cosroes, king of Persia, took it A. D. 548, massacred the inhabitants, and burnt it. Justinian ordered it to be rebuilt A. D. 552: Cosroes took it a second time, A. D. 574, in the reign of Justin, and destroyed its walls. A. D. 588, it suffered a dreadful earthquake, whereby above 60,000 persons perished. It was again rebuilt, and again was exposed to new calamities. The Saracens took it A. D. 637, or 638, in the reign of Heraclius: Nicephorus Phocas retook it A. D. 966. Cedrenus relates, that A. D. 970, an army of 100,000 Saracens, besieged it, without success; but that afterwards they subdued it, added new fortifications to it, and made it almost impregnable. Godfrey of Bouillon, when engaged in the conquest of the Holy Land, besieged it A. D. 1097. The siege was long and bloody; the Christians, by their indefatigable labours, and by a secret correspondence in the place, carried it, on Thursday, June 3, A. D. 1098. This city being frequently attacked by the Saracens, was taken May 29, A. D. 1268, by the sultan of Egypt, who demolished it. It has ever since lost its reputation and magnificence, and has groined under the dominion of the Turk.

Antioch abounded with great men, and the church in this city was long governed by illustrious prelates; but it suffered much on several occasions, sometimes being exposed to the violence of heretics, and, at other times, being rent by deplorable schisms.

This city, formerly so beautiful, so flourishing, so illustrious, is scarcely any thing at present but ruins: the city walls are standing; but the interior is nothing but ruins, gardens, and some bad houses. The river Orontes runs near the city, on the outside of it. The bishop of Antioch has the title of Patriarch; and, constantly, has had a great share in the affairs of the Eastern church.

"This city, anciently renowned for the luxury of its inhabitants, is now no more than a ruinous town, whose houses, built with mud and straw, and narrow and miry streets, exhibit every appearance of misery and wretchedness. It is situated on the southern bank of the Orontes, at the extremity of an old decayed bridge, and is covered to the south by a mountain, upon the slope of which is a wall, built by the crusaders. The distance between the present town and this mountain, may be about four hundred yards; which space is occupied by gardens and heaps of rubbish, but presents nothing interesting."]

See the PLATES, MEDAL OF ANTIOCH.

II. ANTIOCH, of Psidia. Paul and Barnabas preached in this city; but the Jews, angry to see that some of the Gentiles received the gospel, raised a tumult, and obliged the apostles to leave the city. Acts xiii. 14. It is at present called Versategli, according to some; but, as others say, Tahoya, or Sibi, or Antiochio.

ANTIOCHIS, was concubine of Antiochus Epiphanes, who gave her the cities of Tarsus and Mallo, that she might receive their revenues for her own private service. This disposal of these places by the king, was regarded by their inhabitants as an insupportable mark of contempt: they took arms against Antiochus Epiphanes, who was obliged to march in person, to reduce them. 2 Macc. iv. 30. It was a custom with the kings of Persia, to give their wives particular cities; some for their table, some for their head-dress, some for their attire, others for their girdles, &c. Uxoribus attribunt civitates hoc modo: hæc civitas mulieri in redimiculum præbeat; hæc in collum; hæc in crines. Ita populos habent universos non solum conscios libidinis suæ, sed etiam administratos, says Cicero, in Verrem, 5. [The idea was somewhat analogous to our pin-money. The Psalmist seems to hint at something like it, Psal. lx. 8. "Moab is my wash-pot," &c.

ANTIOCHUS, Ἀντίοχος: one who is equal in speed with a chariot.

I. ANTIOCHUS. There were many kings of this name in Syria, after Seleucus Nicanor (reckoned the second king of Syria; Alexander the Great being the first) who was father to Antiochus Soter. This Antiochus was surnamed Soter, or Saviour, says Appian, Syriac. p. 130, for having hindered the invasion of Asia, by the Gauls. It happened, probably, on this occasion (2 Macc. viii. 20): the Galatians having marched to attack the Jews, in Babylonia, whose army consisted only of 8000 men, reinforced with 4000 Macedonians, the Jews fell on the Galatians so briskly, that they killed 120,000 men. It was, perhaps too, on this occasion, that Antiochus Soter made the Jews of Asia free of the cities belonging to the Gentiles, and permitted them to live according to their own laws. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 3. This privilege is recorded under A. M. 3743; ante A. D. 261.

II. ANTIOCHUS II. surnamed Theos (the divine) son and successor of Antiochus Soter, married Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt. Laodice, his first wife, seeing herself despised, poisoned Antiochus, Berenice, and their son, who was designed to succeed in the kingdom. After this, Laodice procured Seleucus Callinicus, her son by Antiochus, to be acknowledged king of Syria. These events were foretold by Daniel (xi. 6.) "And in the end of years, the king of Egypt (or of the South) and the king of Syria (or of the North) shall make an alliance together; and the daughter of the king of the South, shall come to the king of the North, to make an agreement: but she shall not retain the power of them, neither shall he stand, nor his arm; but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that begat her, and he that strengthened her in these times."

III. ANTIOCHUS THE GREAT, is celebrated in the Greek and Roman histories, on account of his wars against the Egyptians and Romans: on these we shall not enlarge; but shall attend only to what relates to Jewish history. Antiochus was son of Seleucus Callinicus, and brother to Seleucus Ceraunus. Antiochus succeeded his brother Seleucus, A. M. 3781; ante A. D. 219. He made war against Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt; but was defeated near Rapia. 3. Macc. chap. i. Thirteen years after, Ptolemy Philopator being dead, Antiochus resolved to become master of Egypt. He immediately seized Coelo-Syria, Phœnicia, and Judæa; but Scopas, general for the king of Egypt, entered Judæa, while Antiochus was occupied by the war against Attalus, and retook those places. However, he soon lost them again to Antiochus. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 3. Polyb. lib. iii. xvi. Tit. Liv. lib. xxxiii.

On this occasion happened what Josephus relates of this prince's journey to Jerusalem. After a victory, obtained over Scopas, near the springs of Jordan, he became master of the strong places in Coelo-Syria, and Samaria; the Jews submitted freely to him, received him into their city, and furnished his army plentifully with provisions, and necessaries for his elephants. As a reward, Antiochus granted them (as mentioned by Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. 3.) 20,000 pieces of silver, to purchase beasts for sacrifice, 1460 measures of meal, 375 measures of salt, to be offered with the sacrifices; and timber to rebuild the porches of the temple. The senators, the priests, scribes, and singers of the temple, he exempted from the capitation-tax; and he permitted the Jews to live according to their own laws, throughout his dominions. He remitted the third part of their tribute, to indemnify them for their losses in the war; he forbade the Heathen from entering the temple without being purified; and from bringing into the city the flesh of mules, asses, and horses to sell, under the penalty of 3000 drachmas.

Antiochus married his daughter Cleopatra to Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, A. M. 3812; ante A. D. 188. He gave Coelo-Syria, Phœnicia, and Judæa, as her dowry, on condition that the tributes of these provinces should be equally divided between himself and the king of Egypt. Three years afterwards he was overcome by the Romans, and obliged to cede all his possessions beyond Mount Taurus, and to give twenty hostages (among whom was his own son, Antiochus, afterwards surnamed Epiphanes) and to pay a tribute of 12,000 Euboic talents, each fourteen Roman pounds in weight. To defray these charges, Antiochus resolved to seize the treasures of the temple of Belus, at Elymais, which were very great: but the people of that country, informed of his design, surprised, and destroyed him, with all his army, A. M. 3817; ante A. D. 187. Vide Diodor. in Excerptis Vales. p. 292, 298. Strabo, lib. xvi. Justin, lib. xiii. &c.

He left two sons, Seleucus Philopator, and Antiochus Epiphanes, who succeeded him.

IV. ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES, son of Antiochus the Great, referred to in the former article, and brother to Seleucus Philopator, king of Syria. Having continued as an hostage at Rome fourteen years, his brother, Seleucus, resolved to procure his return to Syria. It is thought he intended to use him in a design of conquering Egypt, which the kings of Syria had long regarded as an object worthy their ambition, However

However that might be, Seleucus sent his own son, Demetrius, as an hostage to Rome, instead of Antiochus; but while Antiochus was on his journey to Syria, Seleucus died, (A. M. 3829; ante A. D. 175) so that when he landed, the people received him as some propitious deity, come to assume the government, and to oppose the enterprizes of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, who threatened to invade Syria; hereupon Antiochus received the surname of Epiphanes (the illustrious) that is, of one appearing as it were like a god.

This prince quickly turned his attention to the acquisition of Egypt, then under Ptolemy Philometor, his nephew, son to his sister Cleopatra; he sent thither Apollonius, one of his officers, apparently to honour Ptolemy's coronation; but, in reality, to observe how the great men of the kingdom were disposed towards him, and to sound them, whether they inclined to place the government of Egypt in his hands, during the minority of the king, his nephew: but Apollonius found them loyal; on which Antiochus declared war against Philometor. He came to Jerusalem, 3831; ante A. D. 173, and was received there by Jason, to whom he had sold the high-priesthood. He designed to attack Egypt, but returned without effecting any thing.

The ambition of those Jews who sought the high-priesthood, and bought it of Antiochus, was the beginning of those calamities which overwhelmed their nation, under Antiochus Epiphanes. Jason procured himself this dignity, instead of his brother, Onias III: Menelaus offering a greater price, Jason was deprived, and Menelaus was appointed in his place. These usurpers of the high-priesthood, to gratify the Syrians, assumed the manners of the Greeks, their games, and their exercises, and neglected the worship of the Lord, and the temple-service.

After war broke out between Antiochus Epiphanes, and Ptolemy Philometor, Antiochus entered Egypt, A. M. 3833, and reduced it almost all to his obedience. Vide 2 Macc. iv. v. 3, 4, 5. The next year he returned, and while engaged in the siege of Alexandria, a false report was spread of his death: the inhabitants of Jerusalem showing their joy on this occasion, Antiochus, when returning from Egypt, entered that city forcibly, treated the Jews as rebels, and commanded his troops to slay all they met; 80,000 were killed in three days' time; 40,000 were made captives; and as many sold. [The construction of the Greek intimates, that 80,000 was the sum total of those who suffered on this occasion: 'Ὅκτω μυριάδες κατεφθάρσαν τέσσαρες μὲν ἐν χιρῶν νομαῖς. 'Οὐκ ἦντων δὲ τῶν ἐσφραγισμένων ἐσφραγισμένων.] He entered into the holy of holies, being conducted by the corrupt high-priest, Menelaus, from whence he took, and carried off the most precious vessels of that holy place, to the value of 1800 talents.

A. M. 3835, Antiochus made a third expedition against Egypt, wherein he subdued it entirely. (Polyb. Legation. Diodor. in Excerptis Valesii.) The year following, he sent Apollonius into Judæa (2 Macc. v. 24, 25,) with an army of 22,000 men, with orders to destroy all who were of full age, and to sell the women and young men. Apollonius executed his commission but too punctually. It was now, that Judas Maccabæus retired into the wilderness, with his father and his brethren, 2 Macc. v. 29. These misfortunes were but preludes of what they were to suffer: for Antiochus, apprehending that the Jews would never be constant in obedience to him, unless he obliged them to change their religion, and to embrace that of the Greeks; issued an edict, enjoining them to conform to the laws of other nations, and forbidding their usual sacrifices in the temple, their festivals, and their sabbath. The statue of Jupiter Olympus was placed at the altar of the temple, and the abomination of desolation polluted the house of God. Many corrupt Jews complied with these orders, but others opposed them: Mattathias and his sons, retired to the mountains; old Eleazar, and the seven brethren, Maccabees, suffered death with great courage, at Antioch, 2 Macc. vii.

Mattathias being dead, Judas Maccabæus beheaded those Jews who continued faithful: he opposed the generals whom king Antiochus sent into Judæa, with success. The king, informed of Judas's valour and resistance, sent new forces. Finding his treasures exhausted, he resolved to go into Persia, to levy tributes, and to gather large sums, which he had agreed to pay the Romans. Knowing there were very great riches in the temple of Elymais, he determined to carry them off. But the inhabitants of the country made so vigorous a resistance, that he was forced to retreat towards Babylonia. When he was come to Ecbatana, he received news of the defeat of Nicanor and Timotheus, and that Judas Maccabæus had retaken the temple of Jerusalem, and had restored the worship of the Lord, and sacrifices.

On receiving this intelligence, the king, transported with indignation, commanded the driver of his chariot to urge the horses forward, and to hasten his journey, threatening to make Jerusalem a grave for the Jews. But Divine vengeance soon overtook him; he fell from his chariot, and bruised all his limbs. He was tormented with such pains in his bowels, as allowed allowed him no rest: grief and vexation concurring with his disease, reduced him speedily to death's door. In this condition, he wrote to the Jews very submissively, made them large promises, and engaged even to turn Jew, if God would restore him to health. He recommended to them very earnestly, his son Antiochus, his heir apparent, and intreated them to favour him, and to continue faithful to him. He died, overwhelmed with pain and grief, in the mountains of Paratacene, in the little town of Tabes, A. M. 3840; ante A. D. 164.

V. ANTIOCHUS EUPATOR, son of Antiochus Epiphanes, was but nine years old when his father died, and left him the kingdom of Syria. Lysias, who governed in the name of the young prince, led against Judæa, an army of 100,000 foot, 20,000 horse, and thirty elephants, 1 Macc. vi. 2 Mac. xiii. He besieged, and took the fortress of Bethsura; from thence he marched against Jerusalem, and notwithstanding the valour and resistance of the Maccabees, the city was ready to fall into his hands, when Lysias received news, that Philip (whom Antiochus Epiphanes, a little before his death, entrusted with the regency of the kingdom, during the minority of his son) was come to Antioch to take the government, according to the disposition of the late king; whereupon he proposed an accommodation with the Jews, that he might return speedily to Antioch, and oppose Philip: having thus made peace, he immediately led the young king and his army, into Syria.

In the mean time, Demetrius Soter, son of Seleucus Philopator, nephew of Antiochus Epiphanes, to whom, by right, the kingdom belonged (for Antiochus Epiphanes procured it by usurpation from his nephew); Demetrius, I say, having escaped from Rome, where he had been a hostage, came into Syria: here finding the people disposed for revolt, he headed an army, and marched directly to Antioch, against Antiochus and Lysias; but the inhabitants not waiting till he besieged it, opened the gates, and delivered to him, Lysias, and the young king, Antiochus Eupator, who were put to death by his orders, without suffering them to appear before him. Antiochus Eupator reigned but two years, and died A. M. 3842; ante A. D. 162.

VI. ANTIOCHUS THEOS, or the Divine, son of Alexander Balas, king of Syria, was brought up by the Arabian prince, Elmalchuel, [Simalcue, Eng. Tr.] 1 Macc. xi. 39, 40, &c. Demetrius Nicanor, king of Syria, having rendered himself odious to his troops, one Diodotus (otherwise Tryphon) came to the Arabian king, and desired him to entrust him with young Antiochus, promising to place him on the throne of Syria, then possessed by Demetrius Nicanor, A. M. 3859; ante A. D. 145. Elmalchuel at first was unwilling, fearing lest Tryphon should destroy this young prince, after he had used his name to divest Nicanor of the kingdom: but at last, he entrusted him. Tryphon carried Antiochus to Syria, and put the crown on his head. The troops which Demetrius had dismissed, came and joined him; and having formed a powerful army, he marched against Demetrius, who was overcome, and forced to retreat to Seleucia. Tryphon seized his elephants, and made himself master of Antioch.

Antiochus Theos, to strengthen himself in his new acquisition, sent letters to Jonathan Maccabæus, high-priest and prince of the Jews, confirming him in the high-priesthood, and granting him four toparchies (or considerable districts) in Judæa; received him into the number of his friends, sent him vessels of gold, permitted him to use a gold cup, to wear purple, and a golden buckle; and gave his brother, Simon Maccabæus, the command of all his troops on the coast of the Mediterranean, from Tyre to Egypt. Jonathan, engaged by so many favours, declared resolutely against Demetrius, for Antiochus, or rather for Tryphon, who reigned under the name of this young prince; and on many occasions, attacked Demetrius's generals, who still possessed several places beyond Jordan, and in Galilee, 1 Macc. xi. 63, & seq.; xii. 24, 34.

Tryphon seeing young Antiochus had obtained the kingdom of Syria, resolved to usurp his crown. He thought it necessary, first, to secure Jonathan Maccabæus, one of the most powerful supporters of Antiochus's throne: he came, therefore, with troops into Judæa, invited Jonathan to Ptolemais, and there, on frivolous pretences, made him prisoner. However, Simon, Jonathan's brother, headed the troops of Judæa, and opposed Tryphon, who intended to take Jerusalem. Tryphon, being disappointed, put Jonathan to death at Bassa, or Bascama, and returned into Syria, where, without delay, he executed his design of killing king Antiochus. He corrupted the royal physicians, who, having published that the young prince was tormented with the stone, murdered him, by cutting him without any necessity. Thus Tryphon was left master of Syria. A. M. 3861; ante A. D. 143.

VII. ANTIOCHUS SIDETES, or Soter (the saviour) or Eusebes (the pious) for he is mentioned by the ancients under these different names; was son of Demetrius Soter, and brother to Demetrius Nicanor. Tryphon, the usurper of the kingdom of Syria, having rendered himself odious to his troops, they deserted him, and offered their services to Cleopatra, wife of Demetrius

Demetrius Nicanor, who lived in the city of Seleucia, shut up with her children, while her husband, Demetrius, was a prisoner in Persia, where he had married Rodeguna, daughter of Arsaces, king of Persia. Cleopatra, therefore, sent to Antiochus Sidetes, her brother-in-law, and offered him the crown of Syria, if he would marry her, to which Antiochus consented. He was then at Cnidus, where his father, Demetrius Soter, had placed him with one of his friends: he came into Syria, and wrote to Simon Maccabæus, to engage him against Tryphon, 1 Macc. xv. 1, 2, 3, & seq. He confirmed the privileges which the kings of Syria had granted to Simon, permitted him to coin money with his own stamp, declared Jerusalem and the temple exempt from royal jurisdiction, and promised other favours, as soon as he should become peaceable possessor of the kingdom which had belonged to his ancestors.

Antiochus Sidetes being come into Syria, married his sister-in-law, Cleopatra, A. M. 2865. Tryphon's troops resorted to him in crowds, and Tryphon, thus abandoned, retired to Dora, in Phœnicia, whither Antiochus pursued him with an army of 120,000 foot, and 8,000 horse, and with a powerful fleet. Simon Maccabæus sent him 2000 chosen men, but Antiochus refused them, and revoked all his promises. He sent Athenobius to Jerusalem, to oblige Simon to restore Gazara and Joppa, with the citadel of Jerusalem; and to demand 500 talents, as tribute for the places Simon held out of Judæa: and 500 talents more, as reparation for injuries the king had suffered, and as tribute for his own cities; threatening war against him, if he did not comply. Simon showed Athenobius all the lustre of his wealth and power, told him he had no place in his possession, which belonged to Antiochus; and as to Gazara and Joppa, which cities had done infinite damage to his people, he would give the king one hundred talents for the property of them.

Athenobius returned with great indignation to Antiochus, who was extremely offended at Simon's answer. In the mean time, Tryphon having stolen privately from Dora, embarked in a vessel and fled. Antiochus pursued him, and sent Cendebeus with troops into the maritime parts of Palestine, with orders to build Cedron, and to fight the Jews. John Hircanus, son of Simon Maccabæus, being then at Gazara, gave notice to his father of Cendebeus's coming. Simon furnished troops to his sons, John Hircanus and Judas, and sent them against Cendebeus, whom they routed in the plain, and pursued to Azotus.

Antiochus followed Tryphon, till he forced him to dispatch himself, after five or six years' reign. Strabo, lib. xiv. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 12, & Appian. Syriac. p. 132. After this, Antiochus thought of nothing but reducing those cities; which, in the beginning of his brother's reign, had shaken off subjection. Justin. lib. xxxvi. cap. i. A. M. 3869; ante A. D. 135.

Simon Maccabæus, prince and high-priest of the Jews, being treacherously killed by Ptolemy, his son-in-law, in the castle of Docus, near Jericho, the murderer sent immediately to Antiochus Sidetes to demand troops, that he might recover for him the country and cities of the Jews. Antiochus came in person with an army, and besieged Jerusalem: John Hircanus defended it with vigour; and the siege was long protracted: the king divided his army into seven parts, guarding all the avenues to the city. It being the proper time for celebrating the Feast of Tabernacles, the Jews desired of Antiochus a truce of seven days; which was granted: and this prince sent them bulls with gilded horns, and vessels of gold and silver, filled with incense, to be offered in the temple: he ordered likewise such provisions to be given to the Jewish soldiers, as they wanted. This courtesy of the king, so won the hearts of the Jews, that they sent ambassadors to treat of peace, and to desire that they might live according to their own laws.

Antiochus required of them to surrender their arms, to demolish the city walls, to pay tribute for Joppa, and the other cities they possessed out of Judæa, and to receive a garrison into Jerusalem. They consented to these conditions, the last excepted; for they could not bring themselves to see an army of strangers in their capital: they rather chose to give hostages, and 500 talents of silver. The king entered the city, beat down the breast-work above the walls, and returned to Syria, A. M. 3870; ante A. D. 134.

Three years afterwards, Antiochus marched against the Persians (or Parthians?) demanding the liberty of his brother, Demetrius Nicanor, made prisoner long before, by Arsaces; and detained by the king of Persia, against his inclination, because he intended to use him, on some favourable occasion, in exciting a war against Antiochus. Justin. lib. xxxviii. cap. 9 & 10. Livy lib. lix. Appian. Syriac. p. 132. Antiochus, to prevent him, raised an army of 80,000 (Orosius, lib. v. cap. 10, says 100,000) men; their equipment was so numerous and magnificent, that some say there were 200,000 servants, others, 300,000, the greater part being cooks, confectioners, and comedians. Antiochus entertained the officers in his camp, with as much delicacy and profusion, as he could have done in his capital. His army imitated the extravagance of their their prince: the generality of the soldiers had nails of gold in their shoes, used plate, and their tents were adorned with embroidery. As soon as he appeared on the frontiers of Persia, several Eastern kings came and surrendered, detesting the pride and avarice of the Persians. Antiochus defeated his enemies in three engagements, and took Babylon: John Hircanus, high-priest of the Jews, accompanied him in these expeditions; and it is believed, that he had from hence the name of Hircanus, or Hircanion, which probably he acquired by some gallant action. Nicolaus Damasc. apud Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 16. Euseb. in Chronic. Sever. Sulpit. Hist. lib. ii.

As Antiochus's army was too numerous to continue assembled in any one place, he was obliged to divide it, to put it into winter-quarters. These troops behaved with such insolence, that they alienated the minds of all men. The cities wherein they were quartered, privately surrendered to the Persians, and all resolved to attack on one day, each the particular garrison in it; that the troops, being separated, might not assist one another. Antiochus, at Babylon, had intelligence of this design, and endeavoured to succour his people, with the few soldiers about him. Phraates, king of Persia, attacked him in the way, whom he fought with very great bravery: but, at last, being deserted by his own forces, he was overpowered and killed by the Persians (or Parthians) according to the generality of historians; Jul. Obsequens, lib. de prodigiis. Justin, lib. xxxviii. & xxxix. Josephus, Ant. lib. xiii. cap. 16. Euseb. in Chronic. Oros. lib. v. cap. 10: or, according to Appian, Syriac. p. 132, he killed himself; or, as Ælian says, de Animalib. lib. x. cap. 34, he threw himself headlong from a precipice. A. M. 3874; ante A. D. 130.

Demetrius Nicanor, or Nicator, re-ascended the throne, after the death of Sidetes.

VIII. ANTIOCHUS GRYPHUS, or Philometor, son of Demetrius Nicanor and Cleopatra, avenged the death of his father on Alexander Zebinna, who had usurped the kingdom of Syria: he attacked him, defeated him, and compelled him to shut himself up in Antioch; whence he was very soon forced by the multitude of people, which flocked together, on notice that he intended to carry off a very massy golden statue of Jupiter. In his flight by sea, he was overtaken by a violent storm, was deserted by his people, taken by pirates, and carried to Antiochus Gryphus, by whose direction he was put to death: Justin, lib. xxxix. cap. 2. Josephus says, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 13, Zebinna was killed in a battle fought against Gryphus; but Porphyrus says, he poisoned himself; not being able to survive the loss of his army, Porphyr. in Græcis. Euseb. Scaliger, p. 227.

Cleopatra, mother of Gryphus, envying the success of her son, one day, as he came from some exercise, presented him a cup of poisoned liquor, of which, Gryphus having been previously informed, refused to drink, but forced Cleopatra to quaff it herself: she died instantly. Justin, lib. xxxix. Appian, Syriac. p. 132. After this, Gryphus enjoyed the kingdom peaceably eight years, A. M. 3882, to 3890.

After this time, as he was preparing for war against the Jews, he understood that Antiochus of Cyzicus, his brother, by the mother's side (the son of Cleopatra and Antiochus Sidetes) was preparing to march against him: Gryphus anticipated him, attacked, defeated, and obliged him to fly. He then laid siege to Antioch, where Cleopatra, wife to Antiochus of Cyzicus, had shut up herself: the city being taken, Cleopatra retired for sanctuary to a temple, thinking herself secure there, from the violence of the conqueror: but Tryphena, her sister, wife of Gryphus, whether her husband would or no, sent soldiers into the temple, who killed Cleopatra, at the feet of the statue of the goddess, which she clasped in her arms. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 17. Justin, lib. xxxix. 3.

The year following, the two brothers, Antiochus Gryphus, and Antiochus of Cyzicus, coming to an engagement, Gryphus lost the battle; and Tryphena, his wife, falling into the hands of Antiochus of Cyzicus, was by him slain, to avenge the murder of Cleopatra, committed by her (Tryphena) order. This victory rendered Antiochus of Cyzicus, master of Syria; and Gryphus, his brother, retired to Aspendus, where he continued till the next year, when he returned into Syria, and divided the kingdom with his brother: Gryphus remaining master of Syria, and Antiochus of Cyzicus possessing Cœlo-Syria. While the two brothers mutually weakened each other, John Hircanus fortified Judæa, and every day made new progress. Justin, lib. xxxix. Appian, Syriac. p. 132. Porphyr. in Græc. Euseb. p. 227. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 17.

Antiochus Gryphus, after he had lived forty-five years, and reigned eleven years alone, and fifteen with his brother, was slain by Heraclion's means, who drew him into an ambuscade, A. M. 3907; ante A. D. 97. Joseph. Widem. & Euseb. Græc. p. 227.

Gryphus left five sons: 1. Seleucus, who succeeded him; 2 and 3, Antiochus and Philipp, who were twins; 4. Demetrius Eucærus; 5. Antiochus, surnamed Dionysius.

IX. ANTIOCHUS OF CYZICUS, (brother, by the mother's mother's side, to Antiochus Gryphus, and) son of Cleopatra and Antiochus Sidetes, his uncle, was educated at Cyzicus, by his mother, Cleopatra, who was apprehensive lest Demetrius Nicanor, her first husband, should kill him. Hence he is called of Cyzicus: Cyzicus is a city in Asia Minor, on the Propontis. Antiochus Gryphus having attempted to poison Antiochus of Cyzicus, his brother, the latter levied troops, and prevented the effects of Gryphus's ill will. Justin, lib. xxxix. cap. 3. We saw in the preceding article, that Gryphus, after winning the first battle, was defeated in a second; that afterwards the two brothers were reconciled; that Syria continued in the possession of Gryphus, and that the Cyzicentian had Coelo-Syria. This last seeing himself in tranquillity, practised debauchery of all kinds, excess in eating and drinking, hunting, shows, buffooneries, and the making of machines and clock-works, which performed very surprising movements. Diod. Sic. in Excerpt. Valesii, p. 385.

John Hircanus, prince and high-priest of the Jews, besieged Samaria, A. M. 3895; ante A. D. 109; and that city being reduced by famine to extremities, the Samaritans invited Antiochus of Cyzicus to their assistance: this prince advanced speedily to help them; but was overcome by Antigonus and Aristobulus, sons of John Hircanus, who commanded the siege, and who pursued him to Scythopolis: after which, they resumed the siege of Samaria, and blocked up the city so closely, that the inhabitants were again obliged to solicit Antiochus of Cyzicus. This prince having received 6000 men from Ptolemy Lathyrus, son of Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, wasted the lands belonging to the Jews, designing thereby to oblige Hircanus to raise the siege of Samaria: but his troops were at last dispersed, and Samaria was taken by storm, and razed by Hircanus. A. M. 3895; ante A. D. 109. Antiochus was conquered, and put to death by Seleucus, son of Antiochus Gryphus, A. M. 3910; ante A. D. 94. Justin says, Antiochus of Cyzicus died in battle; Josephus says, he was taken and executed by Seleucus; Porphyry, in Eusebius, says, he killed himself, being on the point of falling into his enemy's hands. He reigned eighteen years. He left a son named Antiochus, surnamed Pious: he is not mentioned in Scripture, and his story has no relation to the History of the Jews. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 18, 21. Porphyry. apud. Euseb. Græc. p. 227. Justin, lib. xl. Prolog.

X. ANTIOCHUS, a Jew of Antioch, son to the chief Jew of that city, accused his father, and other Jews, in a full assembly of the people, with a design of setting fire to the city. The people of Antioch hearing this accusation, fell on the Jews present, and killed many of them; but Antiochus, who intended not so much to procure their destruction, as to oblige them to forsake their religion, told the inhabitants of Antioch, that the way to distinguish those engaged in this conspiracy, from the innocent, was, to compel them to sacrifice after the manner of the Gentiles: and that all who refused, were guilty. Many perished on this occasion, choosing to die, rather than to sacrifice to idols: others apostatized, and saved their lives by sacrilege. This happened about A. D. 35. Vide Joseph. de Bello, lib. vii. cap. 21. in Lat. seu Græc. &c. in Græc.

ANTIPAS, 'Αντίπας: for all, and against all; a Greek word compounded of αντι, against, and πας, all. The name Antipas is the same with Antipater, which signifies equal to the father, or comparable to the father. In my opinion, the Hebrew name answering to Antipater, is Abihu, אביו, he is my father, he shall be instead of a father to me.

I. ANTIPAS HEROD, or Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great, and Cleopatra of Jerusalem. Herod the Great, in his first will, declared him his successor in the kingdom; but afterwards named Archelaus, king of Judæa, giving to Antipas, only the title of tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa. Archelaus going to Rome, to persuade Augustus, the Emperor, to confirm his father's will, Antipas went thither likewise, and the emperor gave Archelaus one moiety of what had been assigned him by Herod's will, with the quality of Ethnarch, promising to grant him the title of king, when he had shown himself deserving of it, by his virtuous conduct. His revenues amounted to 600 talents. To Antipas, Augustus gave Galilee and Peræa, which produced 200 talents: lastly, he gave Philip, Herod's other son, the Batanaëa, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, and some other places, whose income was 100 talents. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xvii. 18.

Antipas returning to Judæa, took great pains in adorning and fortifying the principal places of his dominions; he gave the name of Julias to Bethzaida, in honour of Julia, wife of Augustus; Cinnereth, he called Tiberias, in honour of Tiberius, afterwards emperor. He married the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia, whom he divorced, about A. D. 33, to marry his sister-in-law, Herodias, wife to Philip, his brother, who was still living. John the Baptist exclaiming against this incest, was seized by order of Antipas, and imprisoned in the castle of Machærus. Josephus says, Antipas caused John to be taken, because he drew too great a concourse of people after him, and Antipas was afraid he should use his influence over the people, to induce them to revolt. But Josephus has reported the pretence —not the true cause; for the evangelists (better informed than he was, and eye-witnesses of what passed, and acquainted particularly with John and his disciples) assure us, that the true reason of imprisoning John was, the aversion of Herod and Herodias against him; for his freedom in censuring their scandalous marriage. Matt. xiv. 3, 4: Mark, vi. 14, 17, 18: Luke, iii. 19, 20. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 2.

The virtue and holiness of John, even Herod feared and respected. Moreover Herod did many things out of regard to him: but his passion for Herodias had certainly much sooner prevailed against his life, had he not been restrained by his fears of the people, who universally esteemed John the Baptist as a prophet, Matt. xiv. 5, 6, &c. On a time when the king was celebrating his birth-day, with the principal persons of his court, the daughter of Herodias danced before them, and pleased him so well, that he swore to give her whatever she should ask. Her mother, Herodias, advised her to ask the head of John the Baptist. The king was vexed at this request; but in consideration of his oath, and of the persons at table with him, he sent one of his guards, who beheaded John in prison: the head was brought in a large basin, and given to this young woman, who carried it directly to her mother.

Aretas, king of Arabia, to revenge the affront which Herod had offered his daughter, declared war against him; and vanquished him, in a very obstinate fight. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 7, assures us, that the Jews considered the defeat of Antipas as a punishment for the death of John the Baptist.

Some years afterwards, A. D. 39, Herodias, being jealous of her brother Agrippa's prosperity (who, from a private person, was become king of Judæa) persuaded her husband, Herod Antipas, to visit Rome, and to desire the same dignity from the emperor Caius. She intended to accompany him, hoping her presents and appearance would contribute to procure the emperor's favour: but Agrippa, being jealous also, though in another manner, wrote to the emperor, and accused Antipas. Agrippa's messenger arrived at Baizæ, where the emperor was, at the very time when Herod received his first audience. Caius, on the reception of Agrippa's letters, read them with great earnestness; in these, Agrippa accused Herod Antipas of having been a party in Sejanus's conspiracy against Tiberius, and that he still carried on a correspondence with Artabanus, king of Parthia, against the Romans. As a proof, he said that Antipas had in his arsenal, arms for 70,000 men. Caius being angry, demanded of Antipas, if it wore true, that he had such a quantity of arms? and the king not daring to deny it, was banished instantly to Lyons, in Gaul. As for Herodias, he ordered the money which belonged to her, to be returned; and promised to forgive her, in consideration of her brother Agrippa: but she chose rather to follow her husband, and to share his fortune in banishment. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 2.

This is that Antipas who, being at Jerusalem at the time of our Saviour's passion, ridiculed Jesus, whom Pilate had sent to him, dressed him in worn-out royalty, and sent him back to Pilate, as a mock king, whose ambition gave him no umbrage. Luke, xxiii. 7—11. The year of Antipas's death is not known, but it is certain, he died in exile, as well as Herodias. Josephus, de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 16, says, Antipas was further banished into Spain; and died there. Perhaps, Caius, who came into Gaul that year wherein Antipas was exiled thither, might then order him from Lyons to Spain. Tillemont, Ruine des Juifs, art. xvii. p. 44.

II. ANTIPAS, a faithful witness, or martyr, mentioned Rev. ii. 13. It is said, he was one of our Saviour's first disciples, and that he suffered martyrdom at Pergamus, whereof he was bishop. His festival is April 11. His acts relate, that he was burnt in a brazen bull.

ANTIPATER, Ἀντιπατρις: equal to his father; compounded of two Greek words, ἀντί, against, and πατήρ father.

I. ANTIPATER, son of Jason, sent by Simon Maccabæus, to the Lacedæmonians. 1 Macc. xiv. 17, 22.

II. ANTIPATER, an Idumæan, father to Herod the Great. This Antipater was son of another Antipas, or Antipater, appointed governor of Idumæa, by Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 2. de Bello, lib. i. cap. 5. He was, both for antiquity of family, and for riches, the principal person of Idumæa. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. cap. 6, and Julius Africanus, call the father of Antipater, Herod, a Heathen, and a citizen of Ascalon. They say, that a company of robbers having pillaged a temple near Ascalon, carried off young Antipater, the father of Herod the Great, who was minister of this temple; that his father, Antipater, not being able to redeem him, this crew of thieves carried him into Idumæa, where he settled; and that being attached to Hircanus and his party, against Aristobulus, he made his fortune in the following manner.—But we had better depend on Josephus, who could be no stranger to the history of Antipater. As to his religion, no question but he was a Jew, and circumcised; for the Idumæans, long before, had received circumcision and Judaism, under Hircanus, when he conquered their country. Josephus, Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 17.

Antipater, of whom we are speaking, was strongly attached to the party of Hircanus, king and high-priest of the Jews, against Aristobulus, who disputed with him the sovereign authority. Aristobulus, who had much more wit and valour than Hircanus, having levied an army, and worsted his brother's troops, a treaty of accommodation was proposed; whereby, Aristobulus was to have the title of king and high-priest, and Hircanus was to continue quietly at home, and enjoy his fortune. Antipater fearing the power and enterprize of Aristobulus, and having long been his secret enemy, was always exciting the most powerful of the Jews against him, and soliciting Hircanus to recover those privileges of which Aristobulus had unjustly deprived him. He represented to him, that his life was not safe at Jerusalem, and offered him a secure retreat in Arabia, with Aretas, Antipater's good friend.

Being arrived in Arabia, Antipater pressed Aretas to re-establish him in his dominions, and Hircanus promised, as a compensation, to restore twelve cities, which his father Alexander Jannæus, had taken from the Arabians. Aretas hereupon marched against Aristobulus, and overcame him. Aristobulus, forsaken by the greater part of his troops, retired to Jerusalem and the temple, where he was besieged by Aretas: in the mean while, Pompey having sent Scarus into Syria, and coming thither himself soon after, Hircanus and Aristobulus both went to Damascus, to justify their conduct. Antipater, on all occasions, strongly supported the party of Hircanus; and Pompey, without openly declaring for either side, dismissed them both, telling them, he should soon visit their country, and there he would end the dispute. He came accordingly, took Jerusalem, and carried Aristobulus and his children prisoners to Rome: but Alexander, son of Aristobulus, having escaped from those who had the charge of him, returned into Judæa, and had raised new troubles there, if Antipater, with the Roman soldiers in the province, had not opposed him.

During the war of Julius Cæsar in Egypt, Antipater did him great services, accompanying Mithridates of Pergamus, who brought him succours from Syria. He engaged the Jews of Egypt to declare for him, and to furnish him assistance. In the battle fought in the Delta, Antipater commanded the left wing, and came so seasonably to the aid of Mithridates, who commanded the right wing, that he recovered the battle. Cæsar was so much obliged to Antipater for this important service, that he gave Hircanus the office of high-priest, offered Antipater what government he pleased, and gave him the administration of Judæa. He also permitted Hircanus, at the request of Antipater, to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, and appointed a rescript to be drawn up for this purpose, in terms very much to the honour of Hircanus and the Jewish nation. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiv. 15.

As soon as Antipater returned to Jerusalem, he took care to rebuild the city walls, which had been demolished by Pompey's orders; he procured the government of Jerusalem, and the country adjacent, for his eldest son Phasaël: and the government of Galilee for his other son, Herod, who was not at that time above fifteen years of age. After the death of Julius Cæsar, Cassius, one of his murderers, came into Judæa, and exacted great sums: Antipater, like an expert politician, managed so well, that his sons, Herod and Phasaël, were among the most diligent and early to supply this requisition: to complete which he contributed a hundred talents out of his own purse, whereby he very much gained the affections of the Romans: but Malichus, who was employed in levying this tax, conceived so much jealousy against Antipater, that he resolved to put him to death. Antipater distrusted him, and assembled troops to defend himself. Malichus affirmed, with many oaths, that he had no ill design against Antipater, and pretended to be reconciled, by the mediation of Marcus, governor of Syria: but this was only the better to conceal the snare he was laying for him. He corrupted Hircanus's cup-bearer, and engaged him to give Antipater a cup of poison, while they were together at this prince's table. As soon as Antipater was dead, Malichus took possession of the government of Jerusalem, and denied strongly, that he was concerned in his death. Herod and Phasaël pretended to believe him; but a little time after, he was killed, by their directions, near Tyre, to avenge his murder of their father. A. M. 3961; ante. A. D. 43. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 20.

III. ANTIPATER, son of Herod the Great, and grandson of the Antipater of the former article, was born of Doris, Herod's first wife. His father made him marry the daughter of Antigonus, who had been beheaded at Antioch by order of Antony. As Antipater's mother was not of quality, and as he was born while Herod was a private man, that prince kept him and his mother at a distance from the palace, and never determined to call him to court, till it appeared, that Alexander and Aristobulus, his two sons by Mariamne, had talked in such a manner, as raised some distrust in him of their submission to his will; and till they had been rendered suspected, unsuspected, by ill reports carried to him of their conduct. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 6. § de Bello, lib. i. cap. 17.

Then he began to treat Antipater with distinction, and encouraged him to hope, that he might declare him his successor. When he visited Agrippa, who was returning to Rome, he carried Antipater with him, recommended him to Agrippa, desired him to present him to Augustus, and to procure for him the emperor's favour. When Antipater saw the preference thus given to him over his brothers, he plotted their destruction, that he might have no competitors for the crown. He accused them to Herod, though he was absent; and Herod, who, on other accounts, was not very well disposed toward them, carried them to Rome, to accuse them before Augustus. However, the emperor reconciled them to their father, and Herod brought them back from Rome, and Antipater with them: at his return, he called the people together in the temple, and declared, that his sons should reign after him in their order; first, Antipater, then the two brothers, Alexander and Aristobulus. A. M. 3993: ante A. D. 11.

Antipater's ambition soon filled Herod's palace with troubles, by calumnies against his brothers. Herod, who placed considerable confidence in him, heard his accusations without distrust, because Antipater feigned often to take their part, and to defend them in the king's presence, against those who said any thing to their disadvantage. At last, he accomplished their destruction, and they were strangled at Sebaste, by Herod's order, A. M. 3999, one year before the birth of our Saviour. This being accomplished, the wretch had only one thing more to do, which was to procure his father's death, that he might the sooner possess the kingdom. He formed a conspiracy, therefore, against him, with his uncle Pheroras, Herod's brother: but some concerned in the plot, were discovered and punished. The king forbade Antipater any correspondence with Pheroras; and Antipater, to remove all suspicion from himself, prevailed on his friends at Rome, to demand his presence in that city; they accordingly wrote to Herod, that he must immediately send his son to the emperor's court.

Antipater, therefore, departed from Jerusalem with great presents, taking with him Herod's will, wherein he was declared immediate successor to his father: and next to him was named, Herod, son of Mariamne, daughter to the high-priest, Simon. During Antipater's absence, Herod discovered clearly, that he had conspired against him, and had procured poison to dispatch him. Bathyllus, Antipater's slave whom he had made free, coming from Rome, confessed that he had brought to Doris and Pheroras, poison for the king; if the first dose which they were to give him, (and which, as he supposed, they had given him) had not operated. Herod, no longer doubting his son's wickedness, wrote to him, without revealing any thing he knew, desiring he would return with all speed, lest something should happen in his absence, that might give him disturbance. Antipater returned into Judæa, without learning what had passed, though seven months had intervened between the discovery of the treason, and his return. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 6, § de Bell. lib. i. cap. 2.

Antipater being arrived at Casarea, was surprised that no one came forward to meet him, or to do him honour. At Jerusalem, when he came thither, his friends were not admitted into the palace with him; and when he would have embraced the king, he thrust him from him, reproached him with the death of his brothers, Alexander and Aristobulus, and with the parricide which he had intended. The next day, he was ordered to appear before Varus, governor of Syria, Herod himself being his accuser: the poison he had prepared for his father was produced, and a criminal under sentence of death, was compelled to take it, who died instantly. Antipater unable to justify himself, was loaded with iron, and imprisoned: and Herod wrote to Augustus, to acquaint him with his son's proceedings. In the mean time, the king fell sick, and was carried for cure by his own appointment to Jericho. Not long after, the ambassadors he had sent to Rome, returned, and reported, that Augustus left him at liberty to do what he thought proper with Antipater; to send him into banishment, or put him to death, as he should judge fitting.

This news was agreeable to Herod: but his indisposition increasing daily, he called for an apple and a knife, as if with design to pare it; but when he was preparing to stab himself with this knife, Achiah, his grandson, who was present, held his arm, and made a great outcry: whereupon it was concluded, that the king was dead: this rumour reached Antipater's prison, who begged his keeper to set him at liberty, making him large promises, both for the present, and for the future: Herod being informed of this, raised himself on his elbow, and sent one of his guards that instant to dispatch him. Such was the end of Antipater, Herod's eldest son, A. M. 4001, of J. C. 1. He was buried without ceremony, in the castle of Hircanum. Herod died a few days after. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 9.

[The history of these times, and of the troubles in Herod's family, greatly illustrate the gospel accounts accounts of the cruelty, &c. of Herod: they show, that his bloody jealousy at Bethlehem, was nothing extraordinary, for him; and that no safety for the infant Saviour was to be expected from his fury, short of a residence in Egypt. In what times, and under what tyranny, was the Prince of Peace born!]

[ANTIPATRIS, for the father, or against the father.

It is scarcely possible that any son, meaning to honour his father, should name a town, "against the father:" the particle anti must, therefore, have an honourable signification, and mean, "on behalf of the father;" q. "father's town:" the same when given to a son, "the father's own boy;" Antipater.]

ANTIPATRIS, called anciently, Cafar-Saba. Acts, xxiii. 31. Josephus says, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 23, it was about 150 furlongs, or 17 miles, from Joppa. The old itinerary of Jerusalem places it ten miles from Lydda, and twenty-six from Cæsarea. Herod the Great changed its name to Antipatris, in honour of his father Antipater, of whom we have spoken above. Antipatris was situated in a very fruitful and agreeable plain, watered with many fine springs and rivulets, and pretty near the mountains, in the way from Jerusalem to Cæsarea. Josephus, de Bello, lib. i. cap. 16.

ANTONIA, a tower or fortress at Jerusalem, on the west and north angle of the temple, built by Herod the Great (and named Antonia, in honour of his friend Mark Antony) on an eminence, cut steep on all sides, and inclosed by a wall three hundred cubits high; it contained many apartments, bagnios, and halls, so that it might pass for a palace. It was in form a square tower, with a turret at each of the four corners. It was so high, that one might look from thence into the temple; and there was a covered way of communication, between this tower and the temple: so, that as the temple was, in some sort, a citadel to the town, the tower of Antonia was a citadel to the temple. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 14, & de Bello, lib. vi. cap. 12.

There is frequent mention in Josephus, of the tower of Antonia, particularly in his history of the Jewish war. The Romans generally kept a garrison in it; and from hence it was, the tribune ran with his soldiers, to rescue Paul out of the hands of the Jews, who had seized him in temple, and designed to kill him. Acts, xxi. 31, 32. See the PLATES; PLAN of JERUSALEM, and FRAGMENT. No. CXXXVII.

ANTONINUS PIUS, emperor of Rome, adopted by Adrian, was originally of Nîmes. The Jews relate many apocryphal things of him: as that he received circumcision; that he always favoured their nation; but persecuted the Christians: that he became a disciple of Judah the Holy, and made himself eminent in the study of the law: that he circumcised himself, to be qualified for eating the paschal lamb: that he dissembled his religion, and while he worshipped idols, privately professed himself a Jew: that he was so learned in traditions, as to be employed with his master, in the composition of his Mishna: that he went every day to Judah's house, through a subterraneous passage from his palace, to study with him, and set two centinels, one at his palace-gate, the other at the Rabbins', that no one might perceive his going backward and forward so frequently; and lest his guards should reveal his secret, at his return, he killed them.

One day, he found the Rabbins Chanina, at the house of Judah the Holy, and was inclined to kill him, to prevent his discovering the correspondence of the emperor, with this Jew. Chanina, hereupon said to him, "I am not a man, but an angel." "Go, then," replied Antoninus, "and raise him from the dead, whom I have killed at the entrance of the subterraneous passage." Chanina went, and raised him. The emperor, in conversation with his rabbin, maintained, that the soul and body after death, might each excuse themselves, and impute the guilt of their sin to the other; the soul affirming, that it was the body which had sinned, for, from the time of its separation, it had continued free; and the body, on the contrary, that it had done nothing since death had made this division: but the rabbin undeceived him, by the parable of a certain master, who trusted a blind man, and a lame one, with the keeping of his fruit; the blind man took him who was lame on his shoulders, whereby the fruit was reached, and eaten: their master discovered their cunning, and punished them both. Basnage, Hist. des Juifs, lib. ii. iv. cap. 9. ex Gantz Zemach David. & Gedalia Schial. Schelet Kabbala.

[All this is fable, and entirely unaccountable. Relations of this kind, where fiction so obviously occupies the place of fact, render suspected whatever these authors relate, even though it may seem to have something of historical truth in it. Those must be trusted with very great caution, who are capable of giving credit to, and of reporting as true, such manifest impositions as the above. Neither does the reason of this invention appear; nor any service to the Jewish nation derived from it: it neither redounds to the honour, nor does it seem to have been productive of advantage to that nation.] Capitolinus informs us, that the Jews rebelled in the reign of Antoninus; that this prince defeated them, nevertheless he left them the liberty of using circumcision, which he denied nied to the Samaritans; whom he forbade likewise to receive proselytes, and to make themselves eunuchs.

ANTONY, MARK, of the illustrious family of the Antonii at Rome, is celebrated in Roman and Grecian history. We shall notice him no farther, than as he was concerned in Jewish affairs. After the battle of Philippi, ante A. D. 45, wherein Brutus and Cassius were defeated, Mark Antony came into Asia. In Bithynia, he found envoys from all the nations of Asia, and among others, from the Jews, who exhibited accusations against Herod and Phasael; who, they said, assumed the whole authority of their government, and left Hircanus the name only of king: but Herod so wrought upon Antony, by his presents, that he would not give audience to his accusers, but confirmed the two brothers, Herod and Phasael, in their government.

Some time afterwards, A. M. 3963, ante A. D. 41, Hircanus sent an embassy to Antony, to desire he would issue orders for restoring those Jews who had been unjustly carried into captivity by Cassius, and dispersed in Asia. Antony granted his request, and wrote to Hircanus, to the Tyrians and Sidonians, to Antioch, and to Aradus, that they should set those at liberty, who had been sold by Cassius. Towards the end of the same year, when Antony was at Daphne, near Antioch, in Syria, a hundred principal Jews came before him with fresh accusations against Herod and Phasael; but Antony asking Hircanus—who first governed the province, Herod and his brother, or his accusers? Hircanus replied, Herod and Phasael; whereupon, Antony confirmed their authority, and established them tetrarchs over all Judæa. He even wrote letters in their favour, and ordered fifteen of their warmest accusers to be put in chains. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 22, 23.

At last, when Antony came to Tyre, the Jews sent to him a deputation of a thousand, the most considerable among them, to complain against the two brothers; but Antony having been previously engaged and persuaded by Herod, commanded the magistrates of Tyre to punish the malcontents, and to support the tetrarchs he had appointed. Herod advised the Jewish deputies to retire, which they disregarding, the Jews, and other inhabitants of the city, fell upon them, as they were on the sea shore, killed some, and wounded others. The Jews made a great noise about the treatment of their envoys, whereupon Antony ordered those whom he kept in fetters, to be killed. So Herod and Phasael retained their governments.

The next year, the Parthians having entered Syria, and Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, having promised them a thousand talents, and five hundred women, if they re-established him on the throne of his ancestors; they entered Judæa, took Hircanus and Phasael, and obliged Herod to fly to Rome, where he found Mark Antony and Augustus ready to grant him their protection, as much from aversion to Antigonus, whom they regarded as a very turbulent spirit, and an enemy to the Romans, as for services which Antony and Augustus had formerly received from Antipater, Herod's father. Thus disposed, they procured Herod to be declared king of the Jews, by the senate; and Antigonus an enemy to the Roman commonwealth. Antony and Augustus conducted Herod between them to the capitol; and when they had offered the usual sacrifices, and had there deposited the act of his election by the senate, they entertained him magnificently.

Herod returned to Judæa, with mandatory letters from Antony to the Roman officers, enjoining them to assist him in acquiring his kingdom; and, when, by the help of his own party, and of the Roman troops, he had mastered Jerusalem and Antigonus, he prevailed with Antony to have Antigonus's head struck off, by that means to deliver him from his greatest enemy. After this, Antony made war against the Parthians, but performed nothing memorable; and his return was more like a real flight, than an honourable retreat. Abandoning himself to his passion for Cleopatra, he dismissed his wife Octavia, and plunged into excesses of all kinds. At last, being defeated by Augustus, at Actium, he returned to Egypt, where, having tried several means of accommodation, he was forced to kill himself. A. M. 3974; ante A. D. 31. For particulars of his life, consult Plutarch, Dion, and Usher, Ann. 3965.

ANTOTHLAH, or Onethuthieh, אַנְתוֹתִיָּה; answers, songs, &c. of the Lord. Vide ANATH.

ANUA, a village, fifteen miles from Neapolis, otherwise called Sichem, or Naplouze, in the way to Jerusalem. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiv. 25.

ANUB, or Onoob: עֲנֹב: a grape; from עָנָב anob; otherwise, a knot, in the Syriac. Son of Coz of Judah, I Chr. iv. 8.

ANUS of the Philistines. 1 Sam. v. 6, אָנֹס בְּעַפְלִים לִי אֶתֹם לִי LXX. Ἐὰς τὰς ἐδοῶς αὐτῶν. Vulg. In secretiori parte natum. The ark having been taken by the Philistines, and being kept at Ashdod, the hand of God was heavy on the people of that city, and others of the Philistines, and afflicted them with a painful disease in the anus, or in the most secret part of the passage which discharges the excrements. Interpreters are not agreed on the signification of the original, translated anus; nor on the nature of this disease. The Hebrew properly signifies, signifies, that which is obscure and hidden. Some are of opinion, God sent the inward, or hidden piles; others, the dysentery; others, a fiatula, or condyloma, i. e. a preternatural descent of the fundament. The Psalmist seems to describe a fiatula (Psalm lxxviii. 66) "He smote his enemies in the hinder parts; he put them to a perpetual shame." The LXX. and Vulgate, add to verse 9, that the Philistines made seats of skins, upon which to sit with more ease, by reason of their indisposition. Herodotus, Antiq. lib. vi. cap. 1, seems to have had some knowledge of this history; but has assigned another cause. He says, the Scythians having plundered the temple of Askalon, a celebrated city of the Philistines, the goddess who was worshipped there, afflicted them with a peculiar disease. The Philistines, perhaps, thus related the story: but it evidently passed for truth, that this disease was ancient, and had been sent among them by some avenging deity.

To remedy this suffering, and to remove the ravages committed by rats, which wasted their country, the Philistines were advised by their priests and soothsayers, to return the ark of God to its station in Israel, with presents, (1 Sam. vi. 1, 2, 3, &c.) viz. five figures, of a golden Anus, i. e. of the parts afflicted, and five golden rats; hereby acknowledging, that this plague was the effect of Divine justice. This advice was followed. Josephus, Antiq. lib. vi. cap. 1, and some interpreters after him, believed, that the five cities of the Philistines made each a statue, which they consecrated to God, as votive offerings for their deliverance: but this seems to have originated from the figures of the rats, &c. The Heathen often imitated this conduct of the Philistines, in offering to the gods, figures representing those parts of the body which had been diseased. Vide Theodoret, lib. viii. de Græc. affection. curand. [Such kinds of ex votos are frequent also in Catholic countries, being consecrated in honour of some saint, who is supposed to have wrought the cure; they are images of wax, or of metal, exhibiting those parts of the body wherein the disease was seated.]

APADNO, אֶפְדֹּנִי: our ornament; from אֶפְדֹּנִי ephod, an ornament, and the affix וְ no, our's. This is not a Hebrew word. St. Jerom translates it, his throne, his habit, or his covering.

APADNO, Daniel, xi. 45, speaking of Antichrist, as understood by some commentators; or of Antiochus Epiphanes, according to the literal meaning, says (as the Vulgate reads) "He shall plant his tabernacles at Apadno, between the seas, in the glorious holy mountain; that he shall ascend to the very top of it, and none shall help him." The question is, where is this Apadno? Some understand by it, the mount of Olives: others, take Apadno in an appellative sense for his palace; [and thus it is construed by our English translators: "He shall plant the tabernacles of his PALACES between the seas, and the glorious holy mountain." It seems rather to mean a royal tent, or moveable residence for royalty; not properly a palace: and may import as much as, the curtains, or sides of a tent which belongs to a chief, whether general, or king. Arab. Takht-Revân.] Porphyry says, Apadno was the name of a place in the mountains of Elimæa (or Persia) where Antiochus Epiphanes pitched his tents, between the Euphrates and the Tigris, when he undertook to pillage the temple of Elimaïs; but was obliged to retreat. Porphy. apud Hieronym. in Dan. xi. Vide ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES.

We may translate the Hebrew thus: "He shall pitch his tents in Apadno of two seas;—or, in Padan of two rivers;"—i. e. in Mesopotamia, situated between the Euphrates and the Tigris, two large rivers, justly compared to seas, particularly at the time of their inundations. Antiochus Epiphanes, on his expedition against Artaxias, king of Armenia, who had rebelled, encamped in Mesopotamia, between the Tigris and Euphrates: when he was returning from Persia to Babylon, he fell from his chariot, and bruised all his limbs: of which accident he died miserably, on the mountain of Tabes; as historians inform us. Appian, Syriac. p. 117, 131. Porphyry, apud Hieronym. in Dan. ix Polyb. in excerptis Valesii, p. 114.

APAMEA, or APAMIA, Ἀπάμεια, one that drives away, that puts at a distance.

APAMEA, a city of Syria, on the Orontes, built, as is believed, by Seleucus I. king of Syria: or by his son, Antiochus Soter, in honour of queen Apamea, wife of Seleucus, and mother of Antiochus. It was probably the same with Shepham, a city of Syria. Numb. xxxiv. 10, 11.

[The river Orontes, on which this town is situated, runs northward from Lebanon: from its situation, this city is likely to have been ancient; yet I do not perceive that it is mentioned in Scripture, though it is in early Ecclesiastical History.]

II. APAMEA, a city of Phrygia, on the river Marsyas. Some have been of opinion, that Noah's ark rested near Apamea: whence this city took the surname of (Kibotos) Ark; and its medals present the figure of an ark. [This subject is not only curious in itself, but it deserves consideration as one of the traditional memorials of the Deluge: in which light we shall somewhat particularly consider it.]

On a medal, struck in honour of Adrian, is the figure of a man, representing the river Marsyas, having this inscription — ΑΠΑΜΕΩΝ ΚΙΒΩΤΟΣ ΜΑΡΣΥΙΑ. — A medal of the Apameans;—the Ark,—and the river Marsyas. In the Sybilline verses, whose author is pretty ancient, we read that mount Ararat, where the ark settled, is on the confines of Phrygia, at the sources of the river Marsyas. This opinion is not to be defended; mount Ararat was in Armenia, not in Phrygia, [Nevertheless, that this was one of the commemorative notices of the ark, and of the deluge, may be admitted, in the sense, that traditionary shrines, or memorials of the ark, were here very ancient; and that, journeying direct from Shinar, Babylon, or &c. here one of the arks, commemorative of the original ark, rested and settled at once: i. e. here was the Arkite worship commenced, before it spread over the neighbouring country.

In reference to the medal, marked Apameon Kibotos Marsyas, mentioned above, we may add, that Strabo says, lib. xii. that the ancient name of Apamea, was Kibotos; by which name, the ark (probably of Noah) was understood. Kibotos is apparently, not a Greek term; and it might be the name of the temple, in which commemoration was made of the ark, and of the preservation of mankind by it.

There are several medals of Apamea extant, on which are represented the ark, with a man in it, receiving the dove, which is flying to him; and part of their inscription is the word NOE: but either this should be read NEO, an abridgement of Neokoron; or, it is the end of a word, ΑΠΑΜΕΩΝ; or (some of the medals are spurious; which has been suspected. Nevertheless, as they are from different dies, yet all referring to Apamea, it should seem that their authors had a knowledge of the tradition or commemoration respecting the ark, preserved in this city. I doubt not, that many more such commemorations of an event so greatly affecting mankind, were maintained for many ages, though we are now under great difficulties in tracing them. In fact, many cities boasted of these memorials; and referred to them as proofs of their antiquity, and of their settlement in early ages. Vide Lucian, de Dea Syria.] See the PLATES, with further Discussions on these MEDALS.

APE, Simia; in Hebrew, כֶּפֶז Koph. Scripture says, that Solomon's fleet brought—ivory and—apes. The Greek writers mention a sort of ape, native of Ethiopia, and around the Red Sea, called Kephos, or Keipos, or Kebos, which comes pretty near the Hebrew Kuph, or Koph. It was about the size of a roe-buck. The Egyptians of Babylon, in Egypt, adored a kind of ape, which Strabo calls Keipos. Vide 1 Kings x. 22, 2 Chron. ix. 21, also Bochart, de Animal. Sacr. par. 1. lib. ii. cap. 23, 31.

Among the animals, an ape most nearly resembles the human figure. There are several sorts; some without tails (apes); some with short tails (baboons); others with long tails (monkies). Some have long heads, like a dog; others have rounder heads, and flatter noses. Their toes are as long as their fingers. They live commonly on the tops of trees, leaping from branch to branch with admirable dexterity. Some kinds have, on each side of the jaw, a pouch, or pocket, where they secrete any thing they would keep. The females bring one young one, which they carry on the back: when they would suckle it, they take it in their paws, and present the breast to it, like a woman.

The Egyptians are not the only people who have adored apes: they are still worshipped in many places of India. Maffeus, Hist. Ind. lib. i. describes a magnificent temple of the ape, with a portico for receiving victims sacrificed to it; supported by seven hundred columns, not inferior, he says, to those of the Pantheon, at Rome. When the Portuguese, A. D. 1554, pillaged the island of Ceylon, there was a magnificent temple on the top of Adam's peak, wherein they found a little box, full of gold and jewels, containing also an ape's tooth: the kings of the country, desirous of redeeming this tooth, which they worshipped, offered 700,000 ducats for it: but the bishop to prevent this redemption, had the tooth burnt, and the ashes thrown into the sea. Lymchot. F. Syrrard. The inhabitants of Goa did not dare to kill apes, no more than serpents: because they believed them to be the residences of spirits, created by God to afflict mankind in punishment for their sins.

[There are at this day, in India, temples, in which, with their precincts, not less than ten thousand apes are kept, and maintained as sacred animals: and in many others a smaller number, not less privileged and venerated. The worship, or sanctity, of these animals is founded on the history of the assistance anciently given by Hanuman, king of the apes, with a vast army of his subjects, to Rama, (one of the Hindoo gods) when he went to Ceylon, in search of his wife Sita. Figures of apes are also made and revered as idols, of which there are several, inter alia, in Moor's "Hindoo Pantheon:" also in the avatars, given in Maurice's "History of India," &c. In some parts of the country, the apes are held sacred, though not resident in temples; and several incautious English gentlemen, by attempting to shoot these apes, [rather, perhaps, monks] have been exposed, not only to all manner of insults and vexations, from the inhabitants of the villages, &c. adjacent, but have even been in danger of their lives; from which they have escaped with difficulty.]

APELLES, Ἀπέλλης: from the verb ἀπέλλω, I exclude, I separate; or from ἀπελλαί, public discourse.

APELLES, mentioned by St. Paul, Rom. xvi. 10, who calls him approved in Christ, or an honest man, probum in Christo. The Greeks believe Apelles was one of the seventy-two disciples, and bishop of Heraclea. They observe his festival October 31. In the Roman martyrology, he is placed April 22; and September 10, with Luke or Lucius.

APHACA, or Aphek, a city of Syria, in mount Libanus, between Heliopolis and Biblos. Vide APHEK.

APHARA, a cow, or fruit bearing, or increasing, or irritating. Josh. xviii. 23. "PARAH," Eng. Trans.

[Rather "THE heifer," or young cow. It is well known that the LXX read Baal the heifer, in some places, where we understand Baal the young bull: sex making no difference, in the idols of the heathen. Was it a temple of the cow, i. e. where the cow was the symbol adopted? or, might it be in English, "Cow-town"? Is it an allusion to the Hindoo "cow of plenty"? As the heave, by its labours in the plough, was the cause of fertility, so the same word which denotes a cow, seems to import also, "the fertiliser."]

APHARSACHITES, or Apharsathachæi, אפרסאכאי, אפרסאי, אפרסאי: one that divides or tears the peacocks; from פָּרַס paras, to cut, to divide, and תִּךְ thoc, whence תִּכּי thuchiim, peacocks: otherwise, parrots, or birds of prey. These etymologies are foreign from the Hebrew language. From Apharsachites comes the word Satrapas.

APHARSACHITES, or Apharsathchites, people sent by the kings of Assyria, to inhabit Samaria, instead of those Israelites who were removed beyond the Euphrates, Ezra. v. 6. They, with other Samaritans, opposed the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem, Ezra. iv. 9. Perhaps, also, they were named Prosochytes.

APHEK, or ΑΡΗΕΚΑ אפֿהק, אפֿה, אפֿה: a stream, a rapid torrent; [the deep Sea] otherwise, strength, vigour: in Syriac, going out.—There are several cities of this name mentioned in Scripture.

I. APHEK, in Judah. Here the Philistines encamped, when the ark was brought from Shiloh, which was taken in battle by the Philistines, 1 Sam. iv. Probably this is the Aphekah of Josh. xv. 53.

II. APHEK, in the valley of Jezebel. Here the Philistines encamped, while Saul and his army lay near Jezebel, on the mountains of Gilboa, 1 Sam. xxix. 1, &c.

III. APHEK, a city of Asher, near the country of the Sidonians, Josh. xiii. 4; xix. 30. Perhaps this was the

IV. APHEK, a city of Syria, one of the principal in Ben-Hadad's kingdom, not far from which the battle was fought between Ahab and Ben-Hadad, wherein the Syrians were beaten (1 Kings, xx. 26, &c.) and, as they retreated with precipitation into the city, the city wall fell upon them, and crushed 27,000. Probably, in this city Aphek, or Aphaca, situated in Libanus, on the river Adonis, stood the famous temple of Venus, the Aphacite. That city lay between Heliopolis and Biblos. Sozomen, lib. xi. cap. 55; & Theophan. in Chronico, p. xviii.

APHIEREMA, one of the three toparchies added to Judæa, by the kings of Syria, 1 Macc. xi. 34. Perhaps, the Ephram, or Ephraim, mentioned John xi. 54.

APHES-DAMMIM, אֶפְסֵי-דָמִים or Phes-domim, Ephes-dommim, or Dommim, the portion or effusion of blood, or drop of blood; from פָּסַס pasas, diminution, or פָּס pas, portion, and דָּם dam, blood.

APHES-DAMMIM, a place belonging to Judah, between Shocoh and Azekah, where the Philistines encamped, when Goliath insulted Israel. 1 Sam. xvii. 1, 2.

APHIAH, אֶפְיָה: that blows, or breathes, or speaks; from פָּוַח puach: or that ties, or chains; from פָּחַח pach. A Benjaminite: 1 Sam. ix. 1.

APHRAIM, Eusebius places a town of this name six miles from Legio, north.

APHISES, or Ephje, אֶפְסֵס: one that diminishes, tears away, destroys; from פָּצַח patsa, or petjeh; whence פָּצַם patsam, to destroy. Head of the eighteenth sacerdotal family, of the twenty-four which David chose for temple service. 1 Chron. xxiv. 15. Comp. Josh. xix. 21.

APHUTEI, אֶפְטֵי: fat, big: from פָּתַח path.

APHUTEI, Israelites, who returned from the captivity, and settled in their own country. There is some probability, that Aphutæi is derived from Jiphtah, a city, Josh. xv. 53.

APIS. The Egyptians worshipped a steer or young bull. They maintained at Heliopolis, a bullock consecrated to the sun, which they called Mnevis: at Memphis, they maintained another, named Apis, dedicated to the moon. Osiris was adored under the figure of this animal; yet it was not altogether a common bull; but was distinguished from the rest of its species by the following marks: the whole body was black, except, say some, a white square spot on the forehead forehead (say others, a spot like the figure of an eagle on its back: but rather—a crescent-like spot, on its forehead) the hairs of the tail were double, and it had the form of a beetle under its tongue. Herod. lib. iii. cap. 38. Plin. lib. viii. cap. 46. Strabo, lib. xvii.

When, after very diligent search, a calf was found with these marks on it, it was carried with great joy to the temple of Osiris, where it was fed, and worshipped as a representative of that god, so long as it lived: after its death, it was buried with great solemnity and mourning: this done, they carefully sought another with the same marks. Sometimes they were many years before they found one; but when they had succeeded, there was a great festival over all the country.

[It has been supposed, that art was occasionally used by those concerned, to produce the characteristic marks of Apis; the fact is credible; yet the long intervals in which a proper subject was not found, seems to militate against that supposition. It has been generally thought, the golden calf which Aaron made for Israel in the wilderness, and the calves set up by Jeroboam, to be worshipped by the ten tribes, were imitations of the Egyptian Apis.] Vide CALF, CHERUB.

[The worship of Apis was certainly derived from India to Egypt: the resemblances between the two living deities are well stated, from personal observation, by Fra Paolino da San Bartolomeo. Voyage to the East Indies, chap. 2. Eng. Edit. p. 21. He says,

"On the day of my return to Pondicherry, I had an opportunity of seeing a very singular scene: as on that day the god Apis was led in procession through the city. This deity was a beautiful fat red-coloured ox, of a middle size. The Brahmans generally guard him the whole year through in the neighbourhood of his temple; but this was exactly the period at which he is exhibited to the people with a great many solemnities. He was preceded by a band of Indian musicians; that is to say, two drummers, a fifer, and several persons who with pieces of iron beat upon copper basons. Then came a few Brahmans, and behind these was an immense multitude of people. The Pagans had all opened the doors of their houses and shops, and before each stood a small basket with rice, thin cakes, herbs, and other articles in which the proprietors of these houses and shops used to deal. Every one beheld Apis with reverence; and those were considered fortunate of whose provisions he was pleased to taste a mouthful as he passed. Philarchus conjectured, as we are told by Plutarch in his treatise on Isis and Osiris, that Apis was originally brought from India to Egypt by the inhabitants of the latter. Plutarch himself asserts that the Egyptians considered Apis as an emblem of the soul of Osiris: and, perhaps, he here meant to say, that under this expression they understood that plastic power by which Osiris had produced and given life to every part of the creation.

"Pliny in his Natural History, speaking of Apis, makes use of the following remarkable words: "When he eats out of the hand of those who come to consult him, it is considered as an answer. He refused to receive any thing from the hand of Germanicus Cæsar, and the latter soon after died." From this it appears that the Egyptians entertained the same opinions respecting Apis as the Indians do. In Egypt, as well as India, people were accustomed to consider him as an oracle; to place food before him, and, according as he accepted or refused it, to form conclusions in regard to their good or bad fortune.

"The ox [bull] which represents Apis, must every three years give place to another. If he dies in the course of these three years of his deification, he is committed to the earth with all that pomp and ceremony observed at the interment of persons of the first rank. Various pagodas, or pagan temples, have on their front the figure of a cow, or perhaps two, of a colossal size."

[Dr. Forster (the translator of Fra Paolino) points out several differences between the practice of the Hindoos and the Egyptians: he says,

"The sacred ox of the Indians, for example, remains only three years in life; whereas that of the Egyptians, according to Plutarch, remained twenty-five, after which he was drowned, then embalmed, and deposited in a subterranean burying-place destined for that purpose near the village of Abusir, the ancient Busiris, not far from Memphis. The coffin of an Apis ox was found there by Paul Lucas and Wortley Montague." [The Indian ox is red; the Egyptian was black.]

APOCALYPSIS, Ἀποκάλυψις: revelation; from ἀποκαλύπτω, I reveal, I discover.

APOCALYPSIS, is particularly referred to the Revelation which St. John had, in the isle of Patmos, whither he was banished by Domitian, between the years of J. C. 95 and 97.

Caius, priest of the church of Rome, (apud. Euseb. lib. iii. cap. 28. Hist. Eccl.) about the end of the second century, seems to say, that the Revelations were written by the arch-heretic Cerinthus. Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, says also, that some attributed them to Cerinthus; that for himself, he believed they were written by a holy man, named John, but he would not affirm, that they were really the work of John the Apostle and Evangelist. It passes, however, in in the church, for certain, that the Revelations were composed by John, son of Zebedee, and brother of James; and, notwithstanding the doubts of Caius and Dionysius, the ancients [at length] unanimously acknowledged him as the author.

The Apocalypse was not at all times, nor in all churches admitted as canonical. St. Jerom, Amphilochius, and Sulpitius Severus, remark, that in their time, many churches in Greece did not receive this book. It is not in the catalogue of the council of Laodicea; nor in that of St. Cyril of Jerusalem; but Justin, Irenæus, Origen, Cyprian, Clemens of Alexandria, Tertullian, and after them all the Fathers of the fourth, fifth, and following ages, quote the Revelations as a book in their time acknowledged to be canonical: from which we conclude, that though it was long in establishing itself, yet at last it prevailed. Nevertheless, some continued to reckon it among the books spoken against; or disputable. The Alogi, the Marcionites, the Cerdonians, Lutherans, and others, have likewise rejected the Revelations; but even this proves, that it was generally received by the Catholic churches; and Protestants themselves forsake Luther in this particular; for Beza has strongly maintained against his objections, that the Apocalypse is authentic and canonical.

The book of the Revelations contains twenty-two chapters; the first three are epistolary admonitions and instructions to the angels of the seven churches in Asia Minor,—Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea. The fifteen following chapters contain representations of the persecutions which the church was to suffer from Jews, Heretics, and Heathen; principally from the emperors Dioclesian, Maximian, Herculus, Galerius Maximian, Severus, Maxentius, Maximinus, and Licinius; and, lastly, from Julian the Apostate. After this, we have a display of the Divine vengeance against persecutors, the Roman empire, and the city of Rome, described under the name of Babylon, the great whore, seated on seven hills: and the whole is terminated by a description of the victories of the church, and its triumph over its enemies; of the marriage of the lamb, and the celestial happiness of the church triumphant.

II. APOCALYPSIS, or Revelations of St. Peter, an apocryphal book mentioned by Eusebius, and Jerom, and cited by Clemens of Alexandria, in his Hypotyposes. There is none of it remaining, that we know of. Euseb. lib. iii. cap. 3. Hist. Eccl. Hieronym. in Catalog. Scriptur. Eccl. Clemens, apud Euseb. lib. vi. cap. 14. Hist. Eccl.

Sozomen says, lib. vii. cap. 19, that in his time there was an APOCALYPSE of St. Paul read on Good Fridays in the church; when all the people fasted religiously, in memory of our Saviour's passion.

III. APOCALYPSIS, or Revelation of St. Paul, an apocryphal book, used among the Gnostics and Cainites. Epiphan. Hæres. xviii. cap. 38. G. Eycar. part II. animal, p. 120. Aug. tract. 98. in Joan.

This book contained, as the heretics pretended, those ineffable things which the Apostle saw during his ecstasy, and which he informs the Corinthians, he was not permitted to divulge, 2 Cor. xii. 4. Sozomen says, that several monks, in his time, set a great value on this work, and affirmed that it was discovered by revelation, in the reign of Theodosius, at Tarsus, in St. Paul's house, where it had been hid in a marble coffer, under ground: but Sozomen enquiring into this fact, of an old priest belonging to the church at Tarsus, the priest answered, that he had never heard any thing of it, and believed the story to have been the invention of heretics. Sozomen, lib. vii. Hist. Eccles. c. 19.

IV. APOCALYPSIS, or Revelation of St. John, different from the true Apocalypse; Lambecius says, there is a MS. of it in the emperor's library. Cod. 119. Biblioth. fol. 108. . . . 15. .

V. APOCALYPSIS, or Revelation of Cerinthus. This arch-heretic composed certain Revelations, wherein he spoke of an earthly kingdom, and certain sensual pleasures, which the saints should enjoy for a thousand years at Jerusalem. It has been observed, under APOCALYPSIS I. that some of the ancients suspected Cerinthus to have been the author of St. John's Revelations; perhaps the mistake arose from this imitation by him of that work, and the ill use which that heretic had made of the apostle's writings, the better to authorize his own visions.

VI. APOCALYPSIS, or Revelation of St. Thomas, is known only by pope Gelasius's decree, which ranks it among apocryphal books.

VII. APOCALYPSIS, or Revelation of Adam. The Gnostics, as Epiphanius informs us, Hæres. xxxi. cap. 8, had such an Apocalypse: taking occasion, doubtless, of forging it, from what is said in Genesis, of the Lord's causing a deep sleep to fall on Adam, or, as the LXX have it, an ecstasy.

VIII. APOCALYPSIS, or Revelation of Abraham. The Sethian heretics had, in like manner, a spurious Apocalypse of Abraham, which Epiphanius describes as abounding with filth and nastiness. Hæres. xxxix. cap. 5.

IX. APOCALYPSIS, or Revelation of Moses. Georgius Syncellus (p. 27) speaking of this Apocalypse, says, the passage of St. Paul to the Galatians, is taken from it, c. vi. 15. "Neither circumcision circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature." Cedrenus says, some authors will have this Apocalypse to be the same work as Genesis the Less, another apocryphal book extant among the ancients.

X. APOCALYPSIS, or Revelation of Elias. St. Jerom tells us, that the passage of St. Paul to the Corinthians (1 Cor. ii. 9) "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive what God hath prepared for those that love him," is borrowed from the Revelation of Elias. Hieron. Ep. 101, ad Pammach. Origen, in his citation of them, tells us, that these words are no where found, but in the secret books of Elias. Hom. ult. in Matt. xxvii. 9.

[From this great number of books called by the name of Apocalypsis, or Revelations, it should seem that the title, and perhaps, the work itself, of the Revelations of St. John, was more popular among the early Christians, than is usually understood; it is, at least, certain that the Mosaic ornaments of the most ancient churches now existing, have more frequent allusions to scenes in the Revelations, than to any other book in the New Testament. Imitations so numerous, might render the question of genuineness and authenticity difficult in those days: this lays succeeding ages under the greater obligations to the considerate and sedate decision of the early Christians, and to the preference they have adjudged to the book now universally received.]

APOCRYPHAL, Ἀποκρυφός: hidden or secret: from ἀποκρύπτω, to hide or conceal.

APOCRYPHAL, properly signifies HIDDEN, according to the sense of the Greek, from which it is derived. Books are called apocryphal on the following accounts: (1) when the author is not known; whether he has affixed no name to his work, or has affixed a false name. (2) Those which have not been admitted into the canon of Scripture, nor publicly read in the congregation, although they may have been read in private. (3) Those which are not authentic, and of Divine authority; even, if they may be thought the works of eminent or of sacred authors: for example, the Epistle of Barnabas. (4) Those which were composed by heretics, to authorize, or to justify, their errors. Vide Hieron. Ep. ad Lætam. Aug. de Civit. lib. xv. cap. 23.

There are apocryphal books, therefore, of several degrees. Some are absolutely false, dangerous, and impious, composed to defend error or to promote superstition: others are simply apocryphal, and not contrary to faith and good manners: [others, after having been long contested by some, have been by others received as canonical; as the church of Rome admits many, which are by all protestants regarded as apocryphal, though printed with our English Bibles, and parts of them read in our church service:] all of which, St. Jerom reckons among apocryphal writings, and says, the church reads them, but without receiving them into the canon:—Ecclesia quidem legit, sed intra canonicas Scripturas non recipit. Præfat. in lib. Salomon.

There are some small parts of Scripture, which are at this day contested, and which are received by some as canonical, by others are considered as apocryphal; such as the titles to the Psalms, the preface to Jeremiah, Ecclesiasticus, the additions to Esther and Daniel, &c.

[Among the books claiming to belong to the Old Testament, the Jews reject all those of which no Hebrew original can be found: hence the books of the Maccabees, though admitted to contain true history, are Apocryphal. The Apocryphal books of the New Testament are numerous; and are, probably, imitations of older writers. See Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigraphus Veteris Testamenti, and Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti.]

APOLLO, one of the gods worshipped by the Heathen, to whom they attributed oracles, and divination. Vide PYTHON and SPIRIT of PYTHON. Acts xvi. 16; likewise Deut. xviii. 11; 1 Sam. xxviii. 7; 2 Kings, xxi. 6.

APOLLONIA, Ἀπολλωνία; perdition, destruction.

[Rather "the city of Apollo:" who being the god of day, of arts and sciences, was a deity of importance; and was worshipped in this city: yet, as Apollo was famous for his exploit, the destruction of the great serpent, Python, from which he was named Pythones, the idea of destruction might possibly be associated with his name. There were at least four Apollos.]

I. APOLLONIA, a city of Macedonia, through which Paul passed in his way to Thessalonica, Acts, xvii. 1. [There were several in Macedonia.]

II. APOLLONIA, a city of Palestine, situated near the sea, between Joppa and Cæsarea, almost at an equal distance from each. Josephus, Pliny, and Ptolemy speak of it. Some, very improperly, confound it with Antipatris. Josephus Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 23, speaks of Antipatris and Apollonia, as of two different places. It is not mentioned in Scripture.

APOLLONIUS, an officer belonging to Antiochus Epiphanes, whom Grotius believes to have been governor of Mysia. He is called, Misarches, in the Greek (1 Macc. v. 24) as if Misarches; which may be understood either in the interpretation above, or, as signifying the chief of a crew of villains.

Antiochus Epiphanes having resolved to draw great sums from Jerusalem, sent Apollonius to execute execute his design, (A. M. 3836; ante A. D. 167,) he came thither at the head of 22,000 men; pretended he would continue there, without giving any disturbance; and waited peaceably till the sabbath-day; when he fell on the people, and put great numbers to the sword: the city was burnt and pillaged, 10,000 persons were taken, carried captive, and sold to the king's profit. Two years afterwards, Judas Maccabæus having gathered an army of 6000 Jews, who continued faithful, Apollonius, at that time in Samaria, marched against him: but Judas defeated Apollonius, killed him, dispersed his army, carried off a very rich booty, and took Apollonius's sword, which he had used in the action, 1 Macc. i. 30, 31. A. M. 3838; ante A. D. 165.

II. APOLLONIUS DAUS, governor of Cælo-Syria, and general of Demetrius Nicanor (son of Demetrius Soter) having abandoned the party of Alexander Balas, and gone over to Demetrius Nicanor, he headed a powerful army, to compel the Jews to declare for Demetrius. A. M. 3856, ante A. D. 148. He encamped at Jamnia, and wrote to Jonathan Maccabæus, prince of the Jews, challenging him to descend into the plain, and reproaching him for continuing among rocks and mountains. Jonathan, stung by these reproaches, with his brother Simon, and 10,000 troops, sat down before Joppa. The garrison being Apollonius's troops, shut the gates: but the citizens seeing Jonathan preparing to force them, opened the gates, and received him. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 8. & 1 Macc. x. 69.

Apollonius being informed that Jonathan had taken Joppa, advanced to Azotus with 3000 horse, and 8000 foot;—he left 1000 horse in ambuscade near a brook, to attack the Jews in their rear: but Jonathan having intelligence of this design, ranged his troops in such a manner, that they could face the enemy on each side, and forbade them to quit their ranks: commanding them to stand firm, and receive the first onset. Apollonius's horse were tiring themselves all day, with throwing darts and arrows against Jonathan's troops, who received them on their bucklers, being but little incommoded by them. Towards evening, Jonathan charged the enemy; the horse fled, and the infantry were defeated: some who escaped, threw themselves into the temple of Dagon, near Azotus; whither Jonathan pursued them, and burned them, with the temple. He took, likewise, the city of Azotus, pillaged, and burned it. In this action, Apollonius lost 8000 men. On this victory, Alexander Balas bestowed new favours, and new praises, on Jonathan: he sent him a golden buckle, such as the king's relations wear, and gave him the property of Accaron.

APOLLOS, Ἀπολλῶς; one that destroys and lays waste; from ἀπολλῆμαι, I perish, or am destroyed; or ἀπολλύνω, I destroy.

APOLLOS, a Jew of Alexandria, who came to Ephesus, A. D. 54, during the absence of St. Paul, who was gone to Jerusalem. He was an eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures; Acts xviii. 24. He was instructed in the way of the Lord; spoke with zeal and fervour, and taught diligently the things of the Lord: but he knew only the baptism of John: so that he was, as it were, only a Catechumen, and not fully informed of the higher branches of gospel doctrine: but he knew Jesus to be the Messiah, and declared himself openly as his disciple. Therefore, at Ephesus, he began to speak boldly in the synagogue, demonstrating by the Scriptures, that Jesus was the Christ. Aquila and Priscilla having heard him there, took him home with them, and instructed him more fully in the ways of God.

Some time after he inclined to go into Achaia, and the brethren wrote to the disciples there, desiring them to receive him: he was very useful at Corinth, where he watered what St. Paul had planted. It has been supposed, that the great fondness his disciples had for him, almost produced a schism, (1 Cor. iii. 4—7) “some saying, I am of Paul; others, I am of Apollos; others, I am of Cephas.” But this division, which St. Paul mentions and reproves in his First Epistle to the Corinthians, did not prevent Paul and Apollos, personally, from being closely united by the bands of Christian charity and affection. Apollos hearing that the apostle was at Ephesus went to meet him, and was there when St. Paul wrote the First Epistle to the Corinthians, wherein he observes, that he had earnestly entreated Apollos to return to Corinth, but had not prevailed upon him; that, nevertheless, he gave him room to hope, that he would visit that city at a favourable opportunity.

[Some have supposed, that the apostle names Apollos and Cephas, not as the real persons in whose names parties had been formed at Corinth, but that, in order to avoid provoking a temper which he desired might subside, he “transfers, by a figure, to Apollos, and to himself,” what was said really of other parties, whom, out of prudence, he declines naming. It might be simply thus:—but the reluctance of Apollos to return to Corinth, seems to countenance the other, which is the general opinion.]

St. Jerom, ad Tit. iii. says, Apollos was so dissatisfied with the division which had happened on his account at Corinth, that he retired into Crete, with Zeno, a doctor of the law; but that this interruption of Christian harmony having been appeased by the letter of St. Paul to the Corinthians, Corinthians, Apollos returned to that city, and afterwards was bishop there. The Greeks, in their calendars, make him bishop of Duras; but, in their Menæa, they describe him as second bishop of Colophon, in Asia. Ferrarius says, he was bishop of Iconium, in Phrygia; others say, he was bishop of Cæsarea; consequently, we have no certainty on this subject.

APOLLYON, Ἀπολλύων, 'the destroyer;' answering to the Hebrew אבaddon, Abaddon; which signifies the same. St. John, Rev. ix. 11. says, that "an angel having opened the bottomless pit, a thick smoke issued out of it, and, together with this smoke, locusts, like horses prepared for battle, which were commanded by the angel of the bottomless pit, called in Hebrew, Abaddon; and in Greek, Apollyon." Vide FRAGMENT, No. XLIV.

APOSTATE, Ἀποστάτης: from ἀποστήμι, to depart, or separate.

APOSTATE. Apostates are described as, (1) Those who forsake Christianity to embrace a false religion: e. gr. idolatry, or Mahometanism, &c. (2) Those who forsake any holy profession, whereunto they had engaged themselves by solemn vows; and who return to a secular, worldly, irreligious way of life.

In Scripture, the name apostate is not always taken in this sense: so Job, xxxiv. 18,—'to say to a king, thou art an apostate,' (as the Vulgate translates) but the Hebrew imports only, "who says to the king, Beſial, thou worthless wicked headstrong, licentious, man." Proverbs vi. 12, "The man who is an apostate, is good for nothing;" Hebrew, "the man of Beſial, the wicked unrestrainable, man." Ezekiel, ii. 3. Gentes apostatrices, i. e. "Nations that have rebelled against the Lord." And when it is said, "wine and women will make wise men apostatize," the meaning is, that these are the most dangerous temptations man is exposed to: and the most likely to engage him deepest in sin.

APOSTLE, Ἀπόστολος, a missionary, messenger, or envoy.

[Apostle is applied to Jesus Christ, who was God's envoy to save the world, Heb. iii. 1; though more commonly the title is given to persons who were envoys, commissioned by him. Herodotus, lib. i. cap. 21., uses this word to denote a public herald, an ambassador, or nuncio.]

The Hebrews had apostles, sent by their patriarch to collect a certain yearly tribute, which the Jews paid, called aurum coronarium. L. xiv. Codic. Theod. de Judeis. Some assert, that, before Jesus Christ, they had another sort of apostle, who collected the half shekel, which was paid by every Israelite to the temple. Gothofred, Notas in Cod. Theod. lib. xiv. These might be called apostles: but I cannot perceive distinctly, that this name was given to them, as it certainly was to other officers, belonging to the high-priests and heads of the people, who were sent to carry their orders to distant cities and provinces, in affairs relating to religion.

For example, St. Paul was deputed to the synagogues of Damascus, with directions to seize and imprison all who professed the religion of Christ; i. e. He was the apostle of the high-priest, &c. at Jerusalem, for this purpose: and he alludes to this custom, according to Jerom, in the beginning of his Epistle to the Galatians; saying, "that he is an apostle, not of man, neither by [commissioned from] man, but by [commissioned from] Jesus Christ;" q. d. an apostle, not like those among the Jews, who derived their mission from the chief priests, or from the principal men of the nation; but an apostle sent by Jesus Christ himself. Hieronym. in Epist. ad Galat. v. 1.

Eusebius and Jerom, in Isai. xviii. speak likewise of apostles sent by the Jews, to defame Jesus Christ, his doctrine, and his disciples. Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue against Trypho, says, they sent persons whom they called apostles, to disperse circular letters, filled with calumnies, against the Christians; and to this, it is supposed there is a reference, "we have not received letters, &c. concerning thee from Jerusalem;—but this sect is every where spoken against," Acts, xxviii. 22. Epiphanius, speaking of these apostles, observes, that this was a very honourable and profitable employment among the Jews.

APOSTLES of Jesus Christ, in which sense the word is now commonly used; these were his chief, his most distinguished disciples: he invested them with his authority, filled them with his spirit, trusted them particularly with his doctrine and services, and chose them to raise the edifice of his church. Jesus Christ, after his resurrection, sent his apostles into all the world, commissioned to preach, to baptize, to work miracles, &c. The names of the twelve apostles are,—

- | | | |
|------------|-----------------|---------------------|
| 1. Peter; | 5. James Major; | 9. Simon; |
| 2. Andrew; | 6. Bartholomew; | 10. Jude; |
| 3. John; | 7. Thomas; | 11. James Minor; |
| 4. Philip; | 8. Matthew; | 12. Judas Iscariot. |

This last betrayed his master, and hanged himself: Matthias was chosen in his place.

[The order in which the Apostles are named, is not the same in all places, Matt. x. 2. Mark iii. 16. Luke vi. 14. Acts i. 13. This, though a very simple fact and observation, yet has its import, in shewing that the Evangelists neither wrote in concert, nor copied one another. If they had done so, nothing could be more probable hable than their repetition of a list already formed to their hands, of a number of names so well known as those of the Apostles; and the order of which was so perfectly indifferent to any personal object. They all begin with Simon Peter; and end with Judas Iscariot.

From the application of the title apostle, as given above, we may perceive in what sense the apostle Paul claims it—"Am not I an apostle?"—a missionary, an envoy, a person authorized by Christ to proclaim his will, &c. In the same meaning he applies the title to Barnabas, whom he includes—"or I only and Barnabas, have not we power to be accompanied by a wife, &c." so that there are, perhaps, three or four persons called apostles in this sense, besides the twelve mentioned in the gospels, as having been chosen to that office by Jesus Christ himself in his life time.]

APPAIM, אַפַּיִם: countenance, visage: from אַף aph, the nose; or anger, אַנַּף anaph, wrath: otherwise, a baker, from אָפָה apha. Son of Nadab, 1 Chron. ii. 30.

APPHUS, Σαπφης: counsel of indignation; otherwise, one that usurps the counsel, or that penetrates: from אָפַשׁ chaphash, to penetrate.

APPHUS, a surname given to Jonathan Macca-bæus, 1 Macc. ii. 5. Apphus may signify—one who faints away; or, one who abounds; or, one who scatters and disperses; according to the different ways of writing it: אָפּוּס, deficiens; אָפּוּשׁ, abundare; אָפּוּס, spargere.

APPHIA, Ἀφία: that produces, or fruitful. APPHIA, wife of Philemon, St. Paul's friend. It is believed, she suffered martyrdom with her husband, Philemon; their festival is observed November 22. [Some say she was of the noble family of Appius: related to Appius Claudius, a distinguished Roman character; and consul.]

[APPII FORUM. Acts xxviii. 15.]

"The Forum, built by Appius," the consul; the same, who having constructed a great road, it was called after him, "the Appian Way."

The uses to which the Romans put those structures, which they called forums, were so various, that it is not easy to ascertain the nature of this building. It might be a place for distribution of justice; or for holding a market. Horace thus mentions it, lib. i. Sat. 5.

Egressum magna me accepit Aricia Roma
Hospitio modico: rhetor comes Heliodorus,
Græcorum lingue doctissimus, inde Forum Appii
Differtum nautis, cauponibus atque malignis.

The Three Taverns were nearer to Rome than Appii Forum, as Cicero intimates, who going from Rome "ab Appii Foro, hora quartâ dederam aliam paulò ante à tribus Tabernis," a little before he came to the Forum of Appius he arrived at the Three Taverns, so that probably the chief number of Christians waited for the apostle Paul at a place of refreshment; while some of their number went forward to meet him, and to acquaint him with their expectation of seeing him among them, for which they respectfully waited his coming.]

APPLE, Pomum, Malum. The word malus or malum, is sometimes taken generally, [in the Vulgate] and answers to the Hebrew פֶּרִי peri, fructus, pomum, fruit; sometimes for an apple and apple-tree; and answers to the Hebrew תַּפְּחֻאֵהוּ taphuah, pomum, malus.

Moses blessing Joseph, wishes him "the precious fruits brought forth by the sun and moon," i. e. by the rains and dews of heaven; by the gentle influences of the sun and moon: literally "the precious fruits brought forth by the sun, and the precious things put forth by the moon." The Vulgate reads, de pomis cæli; de pomis fructuum solis & lune. The Chaldee, and others, by the fruits of the moon, understand those which come monthly, and by the fruits of the sun, those which come yearly. Some trees, such as the fig, and the orange, have fruit almost constantly on them. Moses adds, "the fruits of the ancient mountains," probably the vine, olive, and other trees, which grow on mountains.

The spouse says, (Cant. vii. 13.) "she has all sorts of fruits (poma, apple, Vulgate) new and old, at her house, laid up for her beloved." In portis nostris omnia poma, &c.—but the Hebrew reads מַגִּדִּים magadim, things delicious, delicacies.

Solomon says, (Prov. xxv. 11.) that "a word fitly spoken, is like apples of gold in pictures of silver." The Vulgate renders, in lectis argenteis, in silver beds; Heb. like apples of gold in baskets (or net-work, fillagree-work) of silver. These golden apples were, probably, oranges, or citrons. The first fruits, say the Rabbins, were carried to the temple in silver baskets.

God commanded the Hebrews, when they planted fruit-trees, not to eat of them during the first three years. In the fourth year, the fruit was consecrated to the Lord; and in the fifth year, the proprietor gathered it for his own use.

APRIES, king of Egypt, called Pharaoh-Hophrah, in the sacred writings, Jer. xlv. 30. Apries was son of Psamais, and grandson of Nechos, or Necho, who fought Josiah, king of the Jews. He reigned twenty-five years, and was long considered as one of the happiest princes in the world: but having equipped a fleet, with design to reduce the Cyrenians, he lost almost his whole army in this expedition. The Egyptians, resolved to make him responsible for this want of success, rebelled; pretending he undertook the war only that he might get rid of his subjects, and govern the remainder more absolutely. He deputed Amasis, one of his principal officers, to meet them, in hope of bringing them to their duty: but, while Amasis was haranguing them, one of the multitude placed a diadem about his helmet, and proclaimed him king; the rest applauded him, and Amasis did not oppose the action. He put himself at their head, marched against Apries, defeated him, and took him prisoner. Amasis, treated him with kindness; but the people were not satisfied till they had taken him from Amasis and strangled him. Such was the end of Apries, according to Herodotus. Jeremiah threatened this prince with being delivered into the hands of his enemies, as he had delivered Zedekiah, king of Judah, into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. Herodot. lib. ii. cap. 161, 162, & 169.

This prince had made a league with Zedekiah, and promised him assistance (Ezek. xvii. 15); Zedekiah, relying on his forces, revolted from Nebuchadnezzar, A. M. 3414; ante J. C. 584; who, early in the year following, marched against Zedekiah; but as other nations of Syria had likewise shaken off their obedience, he first reduced them to their duty; then, towards the end of the year, he besieged Jerusalem. 2 Kings, xxv. 5; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17; Jerem. xxxix. 1; lii. 4.

Zedekiah defended himself in Jerusalem, long and obstinately, in order to give time to Pharaoh-Hophrah, or Apries, to come to his assistance. Apries advanced, with a powerful army; and the king of Babylon raised the siege, to meet him; but Apries, not daring to hazard a battle against the Chaldeans, retreated into Egypt, and abandoned Zedekiah. Ezekiel, chap. xxix. reproaches Egypt severely with this baseness; threatening,—since it had been “a staff of reed to the house of Israel, and an occasion of falling; for when they took hold of thee by thy hand, thou didst break and rend all their shoulder;” that Egypt should be reduced to a solitude; that God would send the sword against it, which should destroy man and beast in it. This was afterwards accomplished, first, in the person of Apries; secondly, in the conquest of Egypt, by the Persians. To this king, likewise, are applied the words of Habakkuk (ii. 15): “Woe unto him that giveth his neighbour drink; that putteth thy bottle to him, and maketh him drunken also, that thou mayest look on his nakedness,” Vide FRAGMENT, No. LVII. i.

AQUILA, a Latin word signifying Eagle.

AQUILA, a native of Pontus, in Asia Minor, converted by St. Paul, with his wife, Priscilla. Acts, xxviii. 2, &c. As Aquila was by trade a tent-maker, which was also the occupation of St. Paul, the apostle lodged with him at Corinth. Aquila had come thither, not long before, from Italy, being obliged to leave Rome, by the edict of the emperor Claudius, which banished all Jews from that city. Sueton. Claud. cap. 25. St. Paul afterwards quitted Aquila's house, and abode with Justus, near the Jewish synagogue, at Corinth, perhaps, because Aquila was a convert from Judaism, whereas Justus was a convert from Paganism; on which account the Gentiles might come and hear him with more liberty. When the apostle left Corinth, Aquila and Priscilla accompanied him to Ephesus, where he left them to profit that church by their instructions and example, while he went to Jerusalem. They did him very great services in this city, and even exposed their own lives to preserve his, Rom. xvi. 4. [Some say, on occasion of the tumult raised by Demetrius and his craftsmen in behalf of their goddess Diana.] They had returned to Rome, when St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans, A. D. 58, wherein he salutes them with great encomiums: but they did not continue there; for, they were come to Ephesus again, when St. Paul wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy, A. D. 64, wherein he desires him to salute them in his name, 2 Tim. iv. 19. What became of them afterwards, is not known. The Greeks call Aquila, bishop and apostle, and honour him July 12. The festival of Aquila and Priscilla is placed in the Roman calendar, July 8. [which denotes him bishop of Heraclea.]
PART IV. Edit. IV.

II. AQUILA, a celebrated translator of the Old Testament, from Hebrew into Greek. Being made surveyor of the works, by the emperor Adrian, when the city of Jerusalem (i. e. Ælia) was rebuilt by his orders, Aquila had opportunity, while in this employment, to become acquainted with the early disciples of Jesus, the purity of whose lives, and the eminence of whose virtues, so affected him, that he embraced Christianity. Being much addicted to judicial astrology, the governors of the church remonstrated to him, that this curious and unprofitable art was inconsistent with the profession of Christ; but, he still retaining it, was expelled the church. Being unable to endure the shame of this excommunication, Aquila renounced Christianity, embraced Judaism, and received circumcision: he then applied himself to study the Hebrew language: of which having acquired an accurate knowledge, he translated the Old Testament, and designing to conceal the ignominy of his apostacy, he endeavoured, says Epiphanius, (Lib. de ponderib. & mensuris) from whom we learn these particulars, to distort those passages which relate to our Saviour; and to interpret them in a sense different from that of the LXX. This he executed, as is believed, in the emperor Adrian's time.

When Aquila commenced his translation, he designed to preserve closely the meaning of the text, but to render it in a free and easy manner: after which, he undertook a more exact version, wherein he attempted to render the most minute terms, strictly and literally; this, the Jews called an accurate translation, and valued it above all others. Aquila contentiosus interpres, qui non solum verba, sed etymologias quoque verborum transferre conatus est, says St. Jerom, in his epistle to Pammachius. Notwithstanding, in other places, Jerom commends Aquila's scrupulous and literal exactness. Aquila, qui non contentiosius ut quidam putant, sed studiosius verbum interpretatur ad verbum. And, whereas the ancients generally accuse him of changing the sense of such passages as favour Christianity, Jerom writing to Marcella, says, "that he was continually examining Aquila's translation, and every day discovered many things in it, which confirm our belief:" Ut amica menti fatear, quæ ad nostram fidem pertineant roborandam plura reperio. Origen, ad African. Hieron. in Ezechiel. Idem ad Pammach. Idem ad Damas.

We do not know, certainly, whether Aquila were a Jew, or a Gentile, before he embraced Christianity. Epiphanius makes no doubt that he was a Gentile; but others urge such difficulties against that opinion, as are not easily solved. It has been doubted, likewise, whether he might not be the same person with Onkelos, the celebrated paraphrast of the Pentateuch. Some Rabbins and Christian authors are for the affirmative, others for the negative: but, by the accounts of the generality of the Jews, Onkelos is more ancient than the Aquila we are speaking of; and, besides, many places in Onkelos and Aquila are translated with differences which do not seem to have been the work of the same person. Consult F. Montfaucon's Dissertation, before his Hexapla, p. 51, and Walton's and Serrarius's Prolegomena.

AQUILO, the north-wind. The Hebrews generally denote the north, by the left hand; the south, by the right hand; the west by behind; and the east by before; according to the disposition of a man whose face is turned toward the rising sun.

AR, or Aur, ער: awakiny, watching, evacuation, uncovering. [Ar was not attacked by Israel, from respect to the memory of Lot; to whose posterity God had assigned it. Deut. ii. 9.]

[Or the city, or competition. Numb. xxi. 15, 28. Deut. ii. 9, 18, 29. Isaiah xv. 1.]

Rather, to be raised: the city which is elevated, whether by its site; or by the assistance of art,

"High-town," Some suppose that this term was used by the Moabites, of whose dominions this city was the capital, as denoting "THE city:" in like manner as Rome was called Urbs, the city; so was Athens, Constantinople, &c. Perhaps the fact was, that the Moabites sometimes called this "the passage," sometimes "the passages:" and perhaps, to go to one part of the city they had only one passage to cross; but to another part of the city they had two passages. Vide AROER.

AR, Areopolis, Ariel of Moab, or Rabbath-Moab. These names signify the same city, the capital of the Moabites, on the river Arnon, which divided it in two. Theodoret, in Isai. xv. & xxix. calls it, simply Ariel: Eusebius, in Areopolis, the same, adding, that the idol of these people, probably Moabites, was called Ariel. Epiphanius, lib. i. contra Hæres. p. 40, says, that a small tract of land, adjoining to Moab, Ituræa, and the country of the Nabathæans, is called Arielitis. Isaiah, xvi. 7, 11, calls it "the city with walls of burnt brick;" ad muros cocti lateris; in Hebrew, Kirharescheth, or Kirjath-hares. St. Jerom says, in loc Hebr. this city was destroyed by an earthquake, when he was young. We believe Charac-Moab, or Charax-Moab, to be the same with Ar and Areopolis.

ARA, ארא: cursing, one that curses; from ארר arar, according to some: otherwise, seeing; from ראה raah.

ARA, son of Jether, of Asher, 1 Chron. vii. 38. [ARA, Mountain, or pregnant, or demonstration. 1 Chron. v. 26. Some think it denotes a crowd, a throng, of people. Vide AR, and AROER. Query, hot, or hot-bed? Vide HARA.]

ARAB, ארב: one that lays snares: otherwise, one that multiplies; from רבב rabab: otherwise, one that multiplies; from רבב rabab: otherwise, locusts; from ארבה arbeh: otherwise, a window; from ארבה aruba. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 52.

[Rather, a place where many crevices, holes, or pits, or other excavations, afforded opportunity for lurkers to hide themselves: "the Haunts;" from which they could spring side-long, unawares, on the unguarded.]

ARABAH, הרבה, Ἀρεβᾶ: great, or powerful; from רבב rabab, or רבה rabab: otherwise, contentious or disputative; from רוב rub. A city of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 22.

ARABIANS, ארביים, ארבי: the evening; or, a place wild and desert: or, hostages, pledges, ravens, mixtures, mild: this word has all these significations.

[Oreb, from which Arabia is derived, signifies to mix or mingle, it might, possibly, take its name from the different tribes of people which early mingled themselves here: and which which do now, from time to time, unite into one body, or separate from other tribes, as circumstances induce them. The Hebrew Orebeh, signifies a wilderness, desert, or uncultivated country; and as this is a general description of most parts of Arabia, it bids fair to have been the origin of this name. Vide also ARAB. The Arabs have always been famous for haunting the deserts; and especially those passages where they expected to find travellers, and plunder.

Simon, thinks that the name Arabia imports sweetness, perfume, 2. Chron. ix. 14; observing, that this country is called odorifera, by Pliny, lib. v. cap. 11, and by Strabo, lib. xvi. aromatophoros. Herodotus, lib. iii. describes Arabia as wonderfully scented with reviving odours: and this character it also has in Diodorus Siculus, lib. iii. Dionys. Alex. de Situ Orbis, v. 936: and in various other writers. It is demonstrable, that this character could only appertain to a very small part of what passes under the name of Arabia; as deserts and sands are little likely to abound in odoriferous exhalations: and as to perfumes from flowers, they must needs be almost unknown.]

ARABIA, a considerable part of Western Asia, lying south-east of Judæa. It is distinguished into three parts, Arabia Deserta—Petræa, and —Felix.

Arabia Deserta has the mountains of Gilead west, and the river Euphrates east: it comprehends the Itureans, the Edomites, the Nabathæans, the people of Kedar, and others, who lead a wandering life, having no cities, houses, or fixed habitations; but wholly dwelling in tents; in modern Arabic, such are called Bedoueens. This country seems commonly to be described in Scripture by the word Arab, which signifies, properly, in Hebrew, the west; or people gathered together. They may have taken the name of Arabim, or westerns, from their situation, being west of the river Euphrates; and if so, their name Arab is prior to the settlement of Israel in Canaan. In Eusebius, and authors of that and the following ages, the country, and greater part of the cities beyond Jordan, and of what they call the Third Palestine, are considered as parts of Arabia.

Arabia Petræa lies south of the Holy Land. Petra was its capital. This country contained the southern Edomites, the Amalekites, the Cushites [improperly called Ethiopians, by our translators, and other interpreters of Scripture] the Hivites, the Meonians, or Maonim, &c. These people are at present known under the general name of Arabians: but it is of consequence to notice the ancient inhabitants of these districts, as they are mentioned in the text of Scripture. In this country was Kadesh-barnea, Gerar, Beersheba, Lachish, Libnah, Paran, Arad, Hasmona, Obotoh, Phunon, Dedan, Segor, &c. also, mount Sinai, where the law was given to Moses.

Arabia Felix lay still farther south: being bounded east by the Persian Gulph; south by the ocean, between Africa and India: and west by the Red Sea. As this Arabia did not immediately adjoin the Holy Land, it is not so frequently mentioned as the former Arabias. It is thought, that the queen of Sheba, who visited Solomon, 1 Kings, x. 1, was queen of part of Arabia Felix. This country abounded with riches, and particularly with spices.

The Scripture mentions frequently the Arabians (meaning those adjoining Judæa) as a powerful people, who valued themselves on their wisdom. Their riches consisted principally in flocks and cattle: they paid king Jehoshaphat an annual tribute of 7,700 sheep, and as many goats, 2 Chron. xvii. 11. The kings of Arabia furnished Solomon with a great quantity of gold and silver, 2 Chron. ix. 14. They loved war, but made it rather like thieves and plunderers, than like soldiers. They lived at liberty in the field, or the desert, concerned themselves little about cultivating the earth, and were not very obedient to established governments. This is the idea which Scripture gives of them, Isai. xiii. 20: and the same is their character at this day.

The inhabitants of Arabia, who dwelt there before Abraham came into Canaan, were descended from Ham. We find there Midianites, of the race of Cush, among whom Moses retired. Abimelech, king of Gerar, is known in the time of Abraham; and the Amalekites, in the time of Moses. The Hivites, the Amorites, the Kenites, Meonians, or Mahonians, extended a good way into Arabia Petræa; the Horim occupied the mountains which lie south of the land of Canaan, and east of the Dead Sea. The Rephaïm, Emim, Zuzim, and Zamzummim, Gen. xiv. 5; Deut. ii. 8, 9, &c. inhabited the country called afterwards Arabia Deserta, and subsequently peopled by the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites.

Arabia is generally stony, rocky, and mountainous; principally in parts now remote from the sea, though formerly adjacent to it. In the course of ages, a vast plain has been interposed between the mountains, now in the midst of the country, and the sea, which has gradually retired from them. This is now the most fruitful and best cultivated part; but it is also the hottest: for up in the mountains, the air is much cooler than below in the plains: they also contain plants and animals of different kinds. The plain is called TEHAMA; or "the Levels." Vide FRAGMENT, No. XXXIX.

Arabia Petrea, and Arabia Felix, were possessed by the descendants of Ishmael, who were more particularly known by the name of Arabians. Vide ISHMAELITES.

The Arabians themselves thus relate their own history: Bibl. Orient. p. 120, 121.

The first (whom they call pure and unmixed) Arabians, descended from Cahtan, or Joktan, son of Eber, and brother of Peleg; who, after the division of languages, peopled this peninsula of Asia.

The second Arabians, combined with these, are descendants of Ishmael, son of Abraham and Hagar, who came and settled among the ancient Arabians, and was father of the mixed Arabians, or Mota-Arabes, or Mosta-Arabes, or Ishmaelites. [N. B. Very different from the modern Mosarabians, or Mostarabians; so called by the Spaniards, because they are Arabians blended with other nations.]

[I learn also, that among the Malays, and other natives of the Islands, &c. in the Indian ocean, that to call another "an Ishmaelite," as they sometimes will do, when they quarrel, is a term of very great offence and reproach; and for which the party thus offended would revenge himself, even by the death of the offender. Query, Does this look as if in ancient time Ishmael and his descendants had settled themselves by force in these countries, and had expelled their original inhabitants; the animosity attending which still exists, though the cause be forgot? It seems congenial with the character of Ishmael, as a wild man, his hand against other men, &c.]

The pure and ancient Arabians were divided into tribes, as well as the sons of Ishmael. Some of these tribes still exist in Arabia, others are lost and extinct.

The Ishmaelites formed twelve tribes, according to the number of the sons of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 13, 14: viz. Nebajoth, Kedar, Abdiel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hadar, Tema, Jetur, Naphish, and Kedemah: but although these people very carefully preserve their genealogy, yet they cannot trace it up to Ishmael; they are obliged to stop at Adnan, one of his descendants; the genealogy, even of Mahomet, rises no higher.

Besides the descendants of Ishmael, who peopled the greater part of Arabia, the sons of Abraham and Keturah, of Lot, of Esau, of Nabor, and others, dwelt in the same country, and mixed with, or drove out, the old inhabitants.

The inhabitants of Arabia are divided into (1) those who dwell in cities, and (2) those who live in the field and desert: the latter abide continually in tents, and are much more honest and simple than the Arabians, who live in towns. Of these, some are Gentiles, others Mussulmans; the former preceded Mahomet, and are now called among them Arabians of the Days of Ignorance; the others who have received the doctrines preached by Mahomet are called Moslemoun, or Mussulmans, i. e. believers; these are the people who conquered, and who still possess, great part of Asia and Africa; and who founded the four great monarchies, of the Turks, the Persians, Morocco, and Mogul; not to mention lesser kingdoms.

Arabia Deserta is called Hegiaz, and is become the most celebrated, by reason of the cities of Mecca, and Medina, which are situated in it. Arabia Petrea is now known by the name of Hagar, or Hagiar; which signifies stone, or rock: but Arabia Deserta, as understood by the ancients, extended much farther towards Syria and the Euphrates.

Joktan, son of Eber, having settled in Yemen, erected a kingdom there, and was himself the first monarch. His son, Jarab, succeeded him: He introduced the Arabian language, which took its name from him, as did the whole country. The third king was Jaschab; the fourth was Abd-al-schams, surnamed Sobas; from him the old Sabæans derived their name. His descendants reigned in Yemen, above 2000 years before the rise of Mahometanism. Bibl. Orient. Jaman, or Jeman.

The Arabians in general are cunning, witty, generous, and ingenious; lovers of eloquence and poetry; but superstitious, vindictive, sanguinary, and given to robbery (i. e. of those not under the protection of some of their own people) which they think allowable, because Abraham, the father of Ishmael, say they, gave his son nothing, Gen. xxv. 5, 6.

The ancient Arabians were idolaters: they worshipped a stone, says Clemens Alexandrinus, in Protreptico, 29. οἱ Ἀραβες τὸν λίθον. Maximus Tyrius, and the modern Arabians, accuse them of the same. The black stone, which has the repute of having been, from time immemorial, the object of their worship, is still to be seen in the CAABA at Mecca. They say, this stone was originally white, but has wept itself black on account of the sins of mankind. Herodotus says, lib. i. & iii. cap. 8, they had only two deities—Bacchus, and Venus, Alilat, or Alilatta. Strabo tells us, lib. xvi. that they adored only Jupiter and Bacchus: which Alexander the Great being informed of, resolved to subdue them, that he might oblige them to worship him as their third deity.

The modern Arabians descended from Ishmael, mention other names of ancient deities adored adored in Arabia; as Lakiah, whom they invoked for rain;—Hafedah, for preservation from bad accidents in journeys;—Razora, for the necessaries of life;—Lath, or Ablat, which is a diminutive of Abla, the true name of God:—Aza, or Uza, from Aziz, which signifies the mighty God;—Menat, from Menan, distributor of favours. It is very probable, that they adored likewise the two golden antelopes, which are frequently mentioned in their histories, and which were consecrated in the temple at Mecca.

The ancient Midianites, among whom Moses retired, when he was received by Jethro, worshipped Abda and Hinda. Urotalt, mentioned by Herodotus, denotes, probably, the sun; and Alilat, the moon. The first of these words, may signify the God of light; the second, the God, or Goddess, eminently. Vide ABRAHAM.

Since the time of the gospel, many Arabians have embraced Christianity: we know of some bishops and martyrs of Arabia. In Origen's time, a council was held here against certain heretics. Dem. p. 852, Thanouk. The Mahometans acknowledge, that before Mahomet, there were three tribes in this country which professed Christianity, viz. those of Thanouk, Bahora, and Naclab. That of Thanouk having had some difference with their neighbours on the subject of religion, retired to the province of Baharain, on the Persian Gulph.

ADDITIONAL OBSERVATIONS.

[A History of Arabia, is that of human nature in its earliest stages of association: and with as little change of manners from generation to generation, as may be.

"If any people in the world," says Niebuhr, "afford in their history an instance of high antiquity, and of great simplicity of manners, the Arabs surely do. Coming among them, one can hardly help fancying one's self suddenly carried backwards to the ages which succeeded immediately after the flood. We are tempted to imagine ourselves among the old patriarchs with whose adventures we have been so much amused in our infant days. The language, which has been spoken for time immemorial, and which so nearly resembles that which we have been accustomed to regard as of the most distant antiquity, compleats the illusion which the analogy of manners began." Trav. vol. ii. p. 2.

"All that is known concerning the earliest period of the history of this country, is, that it was governed in those days by potent monarchs, called Tobba. This is thought to have been a title common to all those princes, as the name Pharaoh was to the antient sovereigns of Egypt." Ib. p. 10.

"The country which this nation inhabits, affords many objects of curiosity, equally singular and interesting. Intersected by sandy deserts, and vast ranges of mountains, it presents on one side nothing but desolation in its most frightful form, while the other is adorned with all the beauties of the most fertile regions. Such is its position, that it enjoys, at once, all the advantages of sultry and of temperate climates. The peculiar productions of regions the most distant from one another, are produced here in equal perfection. Having never been conquered, Arabia has scarcely known any changes, but those effected by the hand of nature; it bears none of the impressions of human fury, which appear in many other places.

"The natural and local circumstances of Arabia are favourable to the spirit of independence which distinguishes its inhabitants from other nations. Their deserts and mountains have always secured them from the encroachments of conquest. Those inhabiting the plains have indeed been subdued; but their servitude has been only temporary; and the only foreign powers to whose arms they have yielded, have been those bordering on the two gulphs between which this country lies." Ib. p. 99.

"The most antient and powerful tribes of this people are those which easily retire into the desert when attacked by a foreign enemy." Ib. p. 168. [This procedure explains what is intended by the prophet Jeremiah, xlix. 8, when he says, "Flee ye, turn back, dwell deep, O inhabitants of Dedan: for I bring calamity," &c. This deep, is not deep underground, but deep in the recesses of the desert, to which this people might flee from the devastations of their enemy.]

"The Bedouins, who live in tents in the desert, have never been subdued by any conqueror; but such of them as have been enticed by the prospect of an easier way of life, to settle near towns, and in fertile provinces, are now, in some measure, dependent on the sovereigns of those provinces.

"Such are the Arabs in the different parts of the Ottoman empire. Some of them pay a rent or tribute for the towns or pasturages which they occupy. Others frequent the banks of the Euphrates, only in one season of the year; and in winter return to the desert. These last acknowledge no dependence on the Porte." Ib. p. 164.

"Of all nations the Arabs have spread farthest over the world, and in all their wanderings, they have better than any other nation preserved their language, manners, and peculiar customs. From east to west, from the banks of the Senegal to the Indus, are colonies of the Arabs to be

be met with; and between north and south, they are scattered from Euphrates to the island of Madagascar. The Tartar hordes have not occupied so wide an extent of the globe."

The customs of the Arabians are allied in many respects to those which we find in Holy writ; and are greatly illustrative of them; many being, indeed, the very same, retained to this day. Their personal and domestic maxims, their local and political proceedings, are the same now as heretofore: and the general character antiently attributed to them of being plunderers, yet hospitable; greedy, deceitful, and vindictive, yet generous, trust-worthy, and honourable, is precisely the description of their nation at present. Vide ARABIANS.

[ARABIA, to which St. Paul withdrew, Gal. i. 17, was, probably, not far from Damascus; some sequestered spot, or residence, where the apostle might prepare himself for the exercise of that new course of life and ministry, in which he was now about to engage. The opposition he expected to meet with, his foresight of the obstinacy, prejudices, false reasonings, and perversenesses, which he must needs encounter, seems to have rendered a temporary seclusion as proper to the Apostle as to Jesus himself, who was, we know, in the wilderness of Judea forty days; and probably, no longer time was spent by St Paul, in Arabia, at this period: though some suppose he dwelt three years there. But, it seems more likely, that from a short residence elsewhere, St. Paul returned immediately to Damascus, "and straightway preached Christ in the synagogues" and assemblies of that city. Comp. Acts xxvi. 20.]

[ARABIANS. The language and manners of this people are so capable of explaining many particulars, and incidents, in Scripture, that it is a great pity their history is so little known among us. The Arabs derive their remotest origin from the patriarch Heber, whom they call Houd, and who at the distance of four generations was the father of Abraham. He settled, say they, in the southern parts of Arabia, and died there about 1817 years before A. D. His son Joctan, named by the Arabs Kathan, or Kathlan, being the father of a numerous family, became also the first sovereign of the country: his posterity peopled the peninsula; and from him many tribes of Arabs boast their descent. They say too, that the name Arabia is derived from Jarab, one of his sons.

The Arabs of the second race derive from Ishmael, son of Abraham and Hagar; who came and settled among the former tribes. Of his posterity, some applied themselves to traffic and husbandry; but the far greater part kept to the deserts, and travelled from place to place, like the modern Bedoweens.

It is probable, that a third description of Arabs might arise from the sons of Abraham by Keturah, as they would naturally associate, more or less, with their brethren the Ishmaelites. Other occasional accessions, of a like nature, might augment the migratory population.

The present Bedoweens are fond of tracing their descent from Ishmael, and consider their numbers as fulfilling the promise made to Hagar, of a numerous posterity to issue from her son. Their character too, agrees with that of their alleged progenitor, for their hand is against every man; and they dwell in the presence of (i. e. in spite of the enmity of) all their brethren, round about. Their disposition leads them to the exercise of arms, and warlike habits; to the tending of flocks; and to the keen examination of the tracts and passages of their country, in hopes of meeting with booty. They despise the arts of civilized and social life: nor will they intermarry with settled tribes, nor with the Turks, nor with the Moors, lest they should degrade the dignity of their pedigree. Their families are now dispersed over Syria, Mesopotamia, Palestine, Egypt, and great part of Africa, beside their original country, the Arabias. They have, indeed, but few kingdoms in which they possess absolute power, but they are governed by (princes) emirs, and by (elders) scheiks; and though no where composing an empire, yet in the whole they are a prodigious multitude of men. An undeniable fulfilment (in conjunction with the Jews) of the promise made to Abraham, that his posterity should be innumerable, as the stars in heaven, or as the sand of the sea.

The Arabs have various traditions among them of Scripture personages and events. They relate adventures of Abraham their progenitor, of Moses, of Jethro, of Solomon, and others. They have seen originate in their country those modes of religion to which a great portion of mankind adhere: the Jewish, the Christian, and the Mahometan.

We have no complete list of their kings, nor history of their country; but some few fixed periods have been discovered by the learned, of which the mention of a part may be acceptable. A complete history would throw great light on Scripture: and notwithstanding the broken and divided nature of its subject, in relation to various governments, yet the general picture of life and manners which it would exhibit, could not fail of being both interesting and entertaining.

1817 ante A. D. JOCTAN, son of Heber: he was succeeded by his son, his grandson, and his great grandson.

Kabr-Houd, the tomb of Heber, is said to be be extant, at the extremity of a district named Seger, situated between Hadramaut and Marah.

1698. HAMYAR, son of Abd-el-shams; whose family possessed the sovereignty 2200 years: but not without intervals of privation.

1458. AFRIKIS, contemporary with Joshua. The Arab writers say that he granted an asylum to a tribe of Canaanites expelled by Joshua.

980. BALKIS, the queen of Sheba, who visited Solomon.

MALEK, brother of Balkis: who lost an army in the moving sands of the desert.

890. AMRAM, not of the Hamyarite family.

860. AL ALKRAM, of the Hamyarite family.

DHOUHABCHAN, his son. In his reign a prodigious inundation, from a collection of waters, overwhelmed the city of Saba, the capital of Yemen, and destroyed the adjacent country.

A. D. 436. DHOULNAOVAS, deprived of his dominions by the Ethiopians, threw himself into the sea.

502. The Hamyarites cease to reign in Arabia, which is now governed by Ethiopian viceroys.

590. Mahomet born: he invents and propagates a new religion, which he spreads by conquest.

The early successors of Mahomet removed the seat of empire into Syria, and afterwards to Bagdad; where it continued till the taking of that city by the Tartar HOULOGAN, in the fourteenth century.

The Arabs glory in the fertility of their language, which certainly is one of the most ancient in the world: and is remarkable for a multitude of words which express the same thing. We read in Pococke's Notes on Abulpharagius, that Ibn Chalawaisch composed a book on the names of the lion, which amounted to 500; and those of the serpent to 200. Honey is said to have 80 names; and a sword, 1000. It is probable, that the major part of these names is metaphorical: and they might be useful in explaining the metaphorical appellations found in S. S. Some specimens of their poetry are thought by Schultens to be of the age of Solomon. The present Arabic characters are modern. The ancient writing of Arabia was mostly without vowels, like the Hebrew. The Arabs studied astronomy, astrology, divination, &c. They suffer no figure on their coins.

There are many other particulars in which this people appear to resemble their collateral relations, the Jews; and probably the worship of the true God was long preserved among them,—to the time of Jethro, at least; but the prevalence of Mahometanism has given a certain character to them, which renders them obdurate against the Gospel. The true Arabians, are not however so intolerant as the Turks: and should be carefully distinguished not only from the Turks, the Saracens, and the Moors; but also, among the Arabs themselves, since the proportion of vices and virtues which characterize them, differs among the tribes, no less than among individuals.]

ARACEANS, or Arkites, people descended from Arak, son of Canaan, who dwelt in the city Arce, or Arca, at the foot of mount Libanus. Josephus and Ptolemy both speak of this city. Antoninus's Itinerary places it between Tripolis and Antaratadus. Josephus, Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 14, produces a fragment of the history of Assyria, wherein it is related, that the inhabitants of Arce submitted to the Assyrians, together with those of Sidon and the ancient Tyre. He says also, De Bello, lib. vii. cap. 14, that the river Sabbaticus empties itself into the Mediterranean, between Arce and Raphanea. This, is, probably, the Arce mentioned Antiq. lib. v. cap. 1, said to belong to the tribe of Asher, and otherwise called Antipas. In Solomon's time, Baariah was superintendent of the tribe of Asher, according to the Hebrew, 1 Kings, iv. 16; but Josephus says, Antiq. lib. viii. he was governor of the country around the city of Acre, which lies on the sea. In the later times of the Jewish commonwealth, this city was part of Agrippa's kingdom. De Bello, lib. vii. cap. 24.

ARACH, a city of Chaldaea, built by Nimrod, grandson of Cush, Gen. x. 10. In all probability, it is the town of Aracca, placed by Ptolemy, in the Susiana, on the Tigris, below the place of its confluence with the Euphrates. Ammian calls it Arecha.

Ardet Aracteis aut unda per hospita campis. TIBULL.

From this city, the Aractean plains, which abound with naphta, and sometimes take fire, derive their name: and, probably, from hence the Arabians have named Iraca or Eraca, a large province of Asia, in length, twenty days' journey: in breadth, eleven days' journey, extending along both shores of the Tigris. The capital of this province, under the Chaldeans and Assyrians, was Babylon; under the princes named Cosroës, was Madain; and under the Arabians, was Bagdat. This province is called Chaldaea, or Babylonia, by the Greeks and Latins. Bibl. Orient.

[Irac is rather an ancient name of part at least, if not the whole, of the old Assyrian territory.]

ARAD, or Aured, ארד: a wild ass, in Syriac, a dragon.

[Perhaps here the wild ass was worshipped: the ass is a frequent attendant on the deity Pan; and partakes of the honours paid to his master. As wild asses are not found, that we know of, in this desert, or in its neighbourhood, this place place could not receive its name from any haunt of this animal. Possibly it might be named after a person called Arad. For the Natural History of the wild ass, Vide the PLATES.]

ARAD, Arada, Arath, Adraa, or Adra, a city south of the tribe of Judah, and the land of Canaan, in Arabia Petræa. The Israelites having advanced towards Canaan, the king of Arad opposed their passage, defeated them, and took a booty from them. But they devoted his country as accursed, and destroyed all its cities, when they became masters of the land of Canaan, Numb. xxi. 1. Arad was rebuilt; and Eusebius places it in the neighbourhood of Kadesh, four miles from Malathis, and twenty from Hebron.

[ARADO. Stupor, or trembling, or descent, or the lord. 1 Macc. xv. 23. "Aradus," E. Tr.

Probably "the mountain of descents," or what we sometimes call "the steps:" unless it be related to the Arad above, which seems probable enough.]

ARADUS, a city and island in the Mediterranean, on the coast of Phœnicia, over against Antadus. The isle of Aradus is but seven furlongs, or 875 paces, about, and is 200 paces distant from the continent. The Aradians, or Arkites, descendants of Canaan, dwelt at Aradus, Gen. x. 17. This country was promised to the Israelites; but they did not possess it, till, perhaps, the reign of David, or that of Solomon. See the PLATES, MEDALS of ARADUS.

ARAH, ארה, way, path: or, daily provisions: from ארוח aruchah: or, to exhale, from ריח riach.

I. ARAH, son of Ullah, a grandson of Asher. 1 Chron. vii. 39.

II. ARAH. His descendants returned from Babylon, to the number of 775. Ezra, ii. 5.

ARAM, ארם, elevation, magnificence; from רם ramam, or רום rum; or, one that deceives, from רמה ramia: or, their curse, from ארר arar, and the pronoun מ am, their's.

ARAM, ארם, 'Apau: from the same.

I. ARAM, fifth son of Shem, was the father of the people of Syria, who, from him, are called Arameans. There are many countries of this name, distinguished in Scripture; as—Aram Naharaim, or Syria of the Two Rivers, i. e. of Mesopotamia: Aram of Damascus; Aram of Saba: Aram Bethrehob; and Aram of Maachah, were in Syria; or, at least, because Syria contained the provinces of Saba, Maachah, Rehob, &c. Homer and Hesiod call Arameans, those whom the more modern Greeks call Syrians. The prophet Amos, ix. 7, seems to say, that the first Arameans dwelt in the country of Kir, in Iberia, where the river Cyrus runs; and that God brought them from thence, as he did the Hebrews out of Egypt: but at what time this happened is not known. Moses always calls the Syrians, and inhabitants of Mesopotamia, Aramites. The Arameans often warred against the Hebrews: David subdued them, and obliged them to pay him tribute. Solomon preserved the same authority: but, after the separation of the ten tribes, it does not appear that the Syrians were generally subject to the kings of Israel; unless, perhaps, under Jeroboam II. who restored the kingdom of Israel to its ancient boundaries, 2 Kings, xiv. 25.

II. ARAM, son of Esrom, and father of Amminadab. Ruth, iv. 20; Matt. i. 34; Luke, iii. 33.

ARAMITESS, ארמיטס, Σύρα: a Syrian woman. Vide ARAM. The word Syria, comes probably from the Hebrew אר tsur, a rock, or fortress; which is also the name of the city of Tyre, formerly very famous in Syria and Phœnicia. [From which, perhaps, the Greeks gave name to the whole country.]

ARAN, ארן, ark; from ארן arwn; or, song, shouting for joy; from רנן ranan: or, their curse; from ארר arar, to curse, and the affix מם their's. Son of Dishan, and brother of Uz, of the race of Esau: Gen. xxxvi. 28.

ARAPHA, or rather Rapha, father of the giants, or Raphaim. The word Rapha may likewise signify a giant: possibly, the giants of Anak's race, in Palestine, were called Raphaim, because of their gigantic stature; or of the general signification of the name Rapha. Vide RAPHAÏM.

ARARAT, אררס, 'Apapâ: Vulg. Armenia: the curse of trembling; from ארר arar, to curse, and אררס aretheth, fear, trembling. Vide ARMENIA. According to the Syriac, the light of him that runs; from אור aur, light, and ירר jarath, or irath, to run, to go out; according to others, ררס ratheh, to run.

[Rather, perhaps, "mount of trembling;" of great perplexities and confusion. I cannot, however, help hinting the possibility that this word denotes "the mountain of mucilage," ooze, or very soft mud: which would be a just description of a mountain lately overspread by a flood, and now covered with the sediment left behind by the waters; and such, no doubt, was the first idea which struck the mind of Noah, at his exit from the ark; on beholding that mountain, whereon he landed.]

ARARAT, a famous mountain in Armenia, on which the ark is said to have rested, after the deluge, Gen. viii. 4. It is affirmed, but without proof, that there are still remains of Noah's ark on the top of this mountain: but M. de Tournefort, who visited this spot, has assured me there was nothing like it; that the top of mount Ararat is inaccessible, both by reason, reason, of its great height, and of the snow which perpetually covers it. Mount Ararat is twelve leagues from Erivan, east, and is situated in a vast plain, in the midst whereof it rises.

The Eastern people call mount Ararat, on which the ark settled, Ar-dag, or Parmak-dagh, the finger mountain; because it is straight, and stands by itself, like a finger held up: [q. is it not rather the mountain of Dag? Vide DAGON] it is visible at the distance of ten days' journey. The city of Tauris is not very distant. Voyage de la Boulaye, p. 42, Bibl. Orient. p. 404. Tavernier says, Voyage de Perse, tom. i. there are many monasteries on mount Ararat; that the Armenians call it Meresoussar, because the ark stopped here. It is, as it were, taken off from the other mountains of Armenia, which form a long chain: from the top to the middle, it is often covered with snow three or four months of the year. He adds, tom. 4, p. 39, that the city of Nêkgivan, or Nakschivan, three leagues from mount Ararat, is the most ancient in the world; that Noah settled here, when he quitted the ark; that the word Nak-schivan, is derived from Nak, which signifies ship, and schivan, stopped or settled, in memory of the ark's resting on mount Ararat. Others call this mountain Gioud, or Giouda, in the country of Moussul, or Diarbecr, in Mesopotamia; at the foot hereof is a village, named Thamanin and Corda; by Thamanin meaning eight, in memory of the eight persons who came out of the ark: Corda denotes the Gordian mountains, so famous among the ancients. Bibl. Orient. p. 404. Gioud. We have noticed their opinion, who affirm, that the ark rested on a mountain near Apamea, in Phrygia. Vide APAMEA. See Saurin's Dissert. Hist. p. 115, 131.

The Persians call Ararat, "mount Asis;" as if they should say "the happy or fortunate mountain" [which, perhaps, is not far from the etymology of Asia, q. d. the happy country] alluding to the choice which God made of it, as a port for Noah. The Armenians maintain, by tradition, that, since Noah, no one has been able to climb this mountain, because it is perpetually covered with snow, which never melts, unless to make room for other snow, newly fallen; that Noah, when he left the ark, settled at Erivan, twelve leagues from Ararat, and that, at a league from this city, in a very happy aspect, that patriarch planted the vine, in a place which at present yields excellent wine.

directed the prophet Gad, to bid David go, and raise an altar to the Lord, in the threshing-floor of Araunah, the Jebusite, 1 Chron. xxi. 18, & seq.; and 2 Sam. xxiv. 18. Araunah was, probably, an antient inhabitant of Jerusalem, whose habitation and threshing-floor, were on mount Moriah (where afterwards the temple was built). David went immediately toward the residence of Araunah, to execute this order. When Araunah perceived him, he ran to meet him, prostrated himself, and asked what he desired of him? David answered, he came to purchase his threshing-floor, with intention to erect there an altar to the Lord, that he might be pleased to stop the plague. Araunah offered him not only the threshing-floor, but wood likewise, and oxen. [Vide FRAGMENT, No. XLVIII.] But the king would not accept them, till he had settled their price; for, said he, "God forbid, that I should offer to the Lord that which cost me nothing." David, therefore, bought the threshing-floor and the oxen, for fifty shekels of silver; to which he afterwards added the grounds about it, which belonged to Araunah, and which cost him in all—the whole of the two purchases together—as the Chronicles have it, six hundred shekels of gold.

ARAXES, a celebrated river, which rises in mount Ararat, six miles from the source of the Euphrates, and falls into the Caspian sea. This river is so large and rapid, when swelled by the melted snow, that the banks raised to direct it, &c. are carried away by it, says Chardin, Voyage de Perse: the noise of its waters terrifies those who hear it: the current drives boats with such impetuosity, as to waft them half a mile in an instant. Attempts have been often made to build bridges over this river, but they have constantly been overset by its waters. Notwithstanding, Paul Lucas says, tom. i. cap. 27, that at present there is a bridge over the Araxes: also, that there is a tradition in the country, that the spring-head of this river, is in the place where Paradise was situated. It is believed to be the Gihon mentioned by Moses, Gen. ii. 13. Gihon, in Hebrew, signifies to flow with impetuosity, as does Araxes in Greek. [q. the river Swift, or Dart.]

ARBACES, general of the Medes, and governor of Media, under Sardanapalus, king of Assyria. Observing the softness and the effeminate manners of Sardanapalus, he could not brook obedience to him any longer. He took arms, in conjunction with the principal officers of the Median army: made an alliance with Belesis, governor of Babylon, and both together attacked Sardanapalus, with an army of 400,000 men. Arbaces was worsted in the first three battles fought against the king: but in the fourth,

fourth, the Bactrians deserting to him, he attacked Sardanapalus suddenly in the night, and drove him from his camp. The king retired to Nineveh, and gave the command of his army to Salamenes, his wife's brother. Salamenes lost two battles against the conspirators, and almost all his troops. Nineveh was besieged three years, from A. M. 3254, to 3257; but this last year, the river Tigris being swelled in an extraordinary manner, by the rains, overflowed its banks, and beat down twenty-two furlongs, or 2550 paces, of the city wall. The conspirators hereupon entered the breach, and saluted their principal commander, Arbaces, as king. But Arbaces was content with having restored his country to its liberty, and would not assume the title of king. After his death, was an interregnum, which lasted to A. M. 3296, when Dejoces was acknowledged king of the Medes. Diodor. Sic. lib. ii. Herodot. lib. i. Justin. lib. i

Dr. Prideaux asserts, that Tiglath-pileser and Arbaces are the same person, under two names; contrary to the opinion of archbishop Usher, who supposes one to have possessed Media, the other Assyria. Diodorus Siculus positively tells us, that Arbaces had Assyria, as well as Media, for his share in the partition of the former empire; therefore there is no room for a Tiglath-pileser, or a Ninus Junior, distinct from him, to reign in Assyria during his time. Prid. Connect. part i. book i.

ARBATTIS, Ἀρβάτις: caution, answering; from אֲרָב aurah. A city of Galilee, taken and destroyed by Simon Maccabæus, 1 Macc. v. 23.

ARBE, or AUREBO, אֲרֵב, a city. See KIRJATH-ARBAH, or HEBRON and MAMRE; the city of the four; from רָבָו rabo: or, lying down, from רָבַצַּב rabatz.

[But, it might be named from its figure, four square: and in this case, it might be so named before the four illustrious persons were interred in it.]

ARBE, otherwise HEBRON. Arbe was, probably, the founder of Hebron. It was first possessed by giants of the race of Anak; afterwards it was given to the tribe of Judah, and the property of it was transferred to Caleb. The Rabbins have a tradition (related by St. Jerom, in his Hebrew questions on Genesis) that Hebron was called Arbe, i. e. FOUR, because the four most illustrious patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were buried there; or, as others say, because FOUR of the most celebrated matrons of antiquity were interred there, viz. Eve, Sarah, Rebecca, and Leah: but there is no accounting for these Rabbinical traditions.

ARBELA, Ἀρβηλα: renewing of old age; from אֲרָב aur, to awake, and בֵּלָה bala, old age: or snares; from אֲרָב arab: or, the plain of God; from עֲרֵבָה, and אֵל: or, the locust of God; from אֲרֵבָה, a locust.

I. ARBELA. We know more than one city of this name in Palestine. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 18. xiv. cap. 27, speaks of an Arbela, in Galilee, near Sephoris. Bacchides, in his way from Antioch to Judæa, encamped at Arbela. There were caverns near Arbela, of difficult access, whither thieves retired. Herod forced them from thence, but they returned, and did great mischief in the country. Josephus says, that being sent governor of Galilee, in the beginning of the war against the Romans, he fortified a place called Arbela. De Bello, lib. ii. cap. 25, & de Vita sua, p. 1013.

II. ARBELA, a city in the great plain, nine miles from Legio, probably east. Eusebius and Jerom.

III. ARBELA, a city beyond Jordan, belonging to the region of Pella. Eusebius.

IV. ARBELA, a place mentioned Hosea x. 14; where we read in the Vulgate, sicut vastatus est Salmana à domo ejus, qui vindicavit Baal: "As Shalmana was overcome by him who made war against him, after having destroyed the altar of Baal," designing to describe Gideon (Jud. vi. 25; vii. viii. 10, &c.) but the Hebrew imports, "As Shalmana spoiled Beth-ARBEL in the day of battle." Some explain this passage, as relating to the taking of the city Arbela, by Salmaneser: but this event is not noticed in history. Jerom, and the Alexandrian MS. read Jerobaal; and understand it with the Vulgate, of the victory obtained by Gideon over Zalmunna.

Arbela, or Arbah-el, signifies—fine countries, countries of God: for which reason, we find many places named Arbela. It is said, 1 Macc. ix. 2, that Bacchides and Alcimus came into Galilee, and encamped at Maseloth, which is in Arbela. The city Masal, or Misheal, was in the tribe of Asher, near to which were very fine fields, and a place called Arbela, Josh. xix. 26.

[ARBI, Locust, or window, or insinuating, or multiplying. 2 Sam. xxiii. 35. Arb, or Areb, was a city of Judah.

Probably, places for lying in wait, or ambushes: lurking places. Vide ARBELA I. and ARAB.]

ARBITE, אֲרֵבִי: from the same.

ARGA, a city of Phœnicia. Vide ARACA. It was allotted to Asher. It is situated between Arad and Tripolis.

ARCE (from ARKE) otherwise called Rekem, by change of pronunciation, or Petra, the capital of Arabia Petræa. Vide REKEM and PETRA.

ARCH, TRIUMPHAL. It is said, 1 Sam. xv. 12, that Saul, after the defeat of the Amalekites, erected a triumphal arch on Carmel: Eo quod venisset Saul in Carmelum & crexisset sibi fornicem fornicem triumphalem.”—Hebrew, “he lifted up a hand;” [in our English translation, “set him up a place,” i. e. a monument.] We know not the nature or form of this monument: it was probably, some heap of stones, or a column, to preserve the memory of his victory. The author of the Hebrew traditions on the books of Kings, says that Saul’s triumphal arch was composed of branches of myrtle, palm, and olive-trees.

[The story acquires additional force, by this notice of the trophy; since we find hereby that Saul in the midst of his triumph, was punished by the predictions, &c. of Samuel. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCXVIII. 6, 7. Was not the hand erected by Moses on, or over against, the throne of the Lord, Exod. xvii. 16, of the same nature as this hand erected by Saul?] For the TRIUMPHAL ARCH of TITUS, after the destruction of Jerusalem, see the PLATES: ROMAN MONUMENTS OF JUDEA CONQUERED.

ARCHELAIS, Ἀρχελαΐς. See ARCHELAUS.

ARCHELAIS, a city of Judæa, built by Archelaus, ethnarch of the country, son to Herod the Great, some time before his exile to Vienne, in Dauphiny. Probably it stood in that large plain which lies on the western shore of the Jordan.

ARCHELAUS, Ἀρχελαός: prince of the people; from ἀρχων, chief, prince, and λαός, the people.

I. ARCHELAUS, king of Cappadocia, father of Glaphyra, wife of Alexander, son to Herod the Great. Archelaus, was a wise and judicious prince; being informed of Herod’s anger against Alexander, his son-in-law, he came to Jerusalem, at first seemed to adopt Herod’s passion, declared he was ready to divorce his daughter from Alexander, condemned extremely the young prince, and commended Herod; then—when he saw the king softened—he dexterously shifted the accusations from Alexander, to those who were about him; and Pheroras, Herod’s brother, visiting Archelaus, to desire him to make his peace with his brother, Archelaus induced him to confess to Herod, that he had been the cause of trouble in his family, and to beg his pardon: and, that then, he Archelaus, would assist him in recovering the king’s good graces. Thus, Archelaus, by his prudence, re-established peace, in Herod’s court; reconciled him to his sons, Alexander and Aristobulus; and to Pheroras, his brother. Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 12. & de Bello, lib. i. cap. 17.

Some time afterwards, Alexander being accused to Herod, of designing to retire, with his wife, to her father, Archelaus, which he acknowledged, Herod conceived great suspicions against Archelaus; and, in the last assembly convened by him at Berytus, where the death of Alexander and Aristobulus was determined, he would not suffer Archelaus to be present, though the emperor, Augustus, had expressly written that he should be so. Vide ALEXANDER. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 16. in fine, 17. initio. De Bello, lib. i. cap. 17.

II. ARCHELAUS, son of Herod the Great, and Maltace, his fifth wife. Herod having put to death his sons Alexander, Aristobulus, and Antipater, and expunged out of his will Herod Antipas, whom he had declared king, he substituted Archelaus, and gave Antipas the title of tetrarch only. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 10. After the death of Herod, Archelaus ordered that king’s will to be read, wherein he, Archelaus, was declared king, on condition that Augustus consented. Hereupon the assembly cried, “Long live king Archelaus!” and the soldiers promised the same fidelity to him, as they had shewn to his father. Archelaus buried his father magnificently, came to Jerusalem, and there mourned seven days, according to custom. He then gave a splendid entertainment to the people. He went to the temple, harangued the multitude, promised them good treatment, and declared, he would not assume the title of king till the emperor had confirmed it. A. M. 4001; ante A. D. 3.

The people, notwithstanding, tumultuously demanded the execution of those who advised Herod to slay certain zealots, who had pulled down a golden eagle from one of the temple gates. They also required Archelaus to divest Joazar of the high-priesthood; and they vehemently reproached the memory of the late king. Archelaus sent troops to suppress the mutineers, who killed near 3000 of them, about the temple. After this, he embarked at Cæsarea, for Rome, to procure from Augustus the confirmation of Herod’s will. Antipas, his brother, went to Rome likewise, to dispute his title, pretending that Herod’s first will should be preferred to his last, which, said he, was made by him when his understanding was not entire.

The two brothers, Archelaus and Antipas, procured able orators to display their pretensions before the emperor; and when they had done speaking, Archelaus threw himself at Augustus’s feet; Augustus gently raised him, said he would do nothing contrary to Herod’s intention, or his interest: but, refused to decide the affair at that time. Some time afterwards, the Jews sent a solemn embassy to Rome, to desire Augustus would permit them to live according to their own laws, and on the footing of a Roman province; without being subject to kings of Herod’s family, but only to the governors of Syria. Augustus heard them, and likewise heard Archelaus in reply; then broke up the assembly without declaring himself.

After some days, he sent for Archelaus, gave him the title, not of king, but of ethnarch, with one moiety of the territories which his father, Herod, had enjoyed; promising him the crown likewise, if his good conduct deserved it. Archelaus returned to Judæa, and, under pretence that he had countenanced the seditious against him, he deprived Joazar of the high-priesthood, and gave that dignity to his brother Eleazar. He governed Judæa with so much violence, that, after seven years, the chiefs of the Samaritans and Jews accused him before Augustus: the emperor immediately sent for his agent, at Rome, and without condescending to write to Archelaus, he commanded the agent to depart instantly for Judæa, and order Archelaus to Rome to give an account of his conduct.

On this prince's arrival at Rome, the emperor called for his accusers, and permitted him to defend himself; which he did so insufficiently, that Augustus banished him to Vienne, in Gaul; where he continued, in exile, to the end of his life; the year whereof is not well known. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. ult. & de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 6.

ARCHEVITES, ארכיטות, long: from ארך erac: otherwise, that cure, from ארכל arocal.

ARCHI, ארכי, Ἀρχι: length, or extent; from ארך arach: also, health; otherwise, a scar; from ארוכה aruca. A city of Manasseh, beyond Jordan. Josh. xvi. 2.

[ARCHI-ATAROTH. Length of crowns, or of circles; otherwise, health, or circatrix of crowns, or of circles. Josh. xvi. Vide ATAROTH. A boundary town of Joseph.

ARCHIPPUS, chief of the stables, or master of the horse; from ἀρχων, chief, or prince, and ἵππος, a horse.

ARCHIPPUS: of whom St. Paul speaks, Col. iv. 17. Some are of opinion he was bishop of Colosse; others, only deacon of that church. The Apostolical Constitutions, lib. vii. cap. 46, describe him as bishop of Laodicea, in Phrygia. The Greeks observe his festival, November 22; and say, he suffered martyrdom at Colosse, in the reign of Nero. The Latins honour him March 22.

[From the expression of St. Paul respecting Archippus, Col. iv. 17. "Look to the deaconship (δουκωνίαν) which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it," it is certain that he was then in the office of deacon, at Colosse: but, he might afterwards be bishop of that Church, or of any other. From the allusion in the Epistle to Philemon, ver. 1, it might be thought that Archippus had formerly been in the military service; whether, or not, he were so at this time: St. Paul describes him as "our fellow-soldier" but, does not add "in Christ," or any other term restricting this description to the Christian ministry; nor does he say "fellow-labourer," as he does to Philemon.]

ARCHISYNAGOGUS, chief of the Synagogue: the title of an officer among the Jews. There were generally, in the synagogues, many men of eminence, who presided in them; and in all assemblies held in them. Their number depended on the extent of the cities where they were, or on the number of the people who frequented the synagogue. In some synagogues there might be seventy elders, who presided; in others, perhaps, ten; in others four or five; or no more than one, i. e. the Archisynagogus. They are sometimes called angels, or princes, of the synagogue, by the Jews (see ANGELS) likewise Chachamim, i. e. wise men. They presided in the religious assemblies, and invited those to speak who were thought capable of that office; they also judged on affairs relating to money, thefts, and some other matters. They had power to inflict whipping on those convicted of acting contrary to the law. They likewise could excommunicate and expel from the synagogue those who deserved that punishment. Vide Basnage's Hist. of the Jews, lib. vii. cap. 7. & Vitringa, de Synagog. Mention is made of this officer in an epistle of the emperor Adrian, cited by Vopiscus Saturnin. cap. 8; Nemo illo (in Egypto) Archisynagogus Judæorum.

ARCHITRICLINUS, Ἀρχιτρικλινος: prince of the triclinium, or triple bed; from ἀρχων, head, or chief; τρεῖς, three; and κλίνη, a bed, or couch.

ARCHITRICLINUS, generally translated steward, signifies rather the master, or superintendent of the feast; one, says Gaudentius, of Brescia. tract. ix. who is the husband's friend, and commissioned to conduct the order and œconomy of the feast. He gave directions to the servants, superintended every thing, commanded the tables to be covered, or to be cleared of the dishes, as he thought proper: whence his name, as regulator of the triclinium, or festive-board. He tasted the wine, and distributed it to the guests. The author of Ecclesiasticus thus describes this office (chap. xxxii. 1, 2): "If thou be made the master of a feast, lift not thyself up, but be among them as one of the rest; take diligent care of them, and so sit down. And when thou hast done all thy office, take thy place, that thou mayest be merry with them, and receive a crown for the well-ordering of the feast." [This office is mentioned, John ii. 8, 9. Theophylact has a pretty remark here: "That no one," says he, "might suspect that their taste was vitiated, by having drunk to excess, so as not to know water from wine, our Saviour orders it to be first carried to the governor of the feast, who certainly was sober; for those those who on these occasions are entrusted with this office, observe the strictest sobriety, that they may be able properly to regulate the whole."

ARCTURUS, signifies, properly, the bear's tail, and denotes a star, behind the great bear's tail, the rising and setting whereof presaged, as was said, storms and bad weather:

*Arcturus signum sum omnium quam acerrimum.
Vehemens sum, cum exorior, cum occido, vehementior.*
PLAUT. in Rudente, Prolog.

Job is thought to speak of Arcturus, or the bear, under the name of Ash (עֶשׂ) chap. xi. 9.

ARD, or Ared, אֲרַד, 'Arað: one that commands; from רָדָה rada: or, he that descends; from יָרַד jarad.

I. ARD, youngest son of Benjamin, Gen. xlv. 21.

II. ARD, son of Bela, of the tribe of Benjamin, head of a family, Numb. xxvi. 40, called ADDAR, 1 Chron. viii. 3.

ARDON, son of Caleb and Azuba, 1 Chron. ii. 18.

[AREBBA, great, or many, or projecting, or litigious; otherwise, a mountain in her. Josh. xv. 52. ARAB, Eng. Tr. Perhaps, "the mountain of strife," or contention by words: i. e. disputation. It is possible that some court of judicature, or pleading, was held on this hill; we have traces of several such among the antiquities of Britain.]

[ARECON, Vacuum, or mountain of lamentation, or of possession. Josh. xix. 46. a city of Dan, on the shore of the Mediterranean.

The ideas of vacuum, and of possession, are so contradictory, that certainly both cannot be correct; perhaps neither is. This name may be taken for the mountain of lamentation over the dead Adonis; a very ancient religious ceremony, of which we have abundant evidence. But, nothing that I know of prevents its being a "hill of lamentation," on account of deceased relatives: according to the usage of the women at Ramah, Vide the PLATES, on Matt. ii. this custom being very common in the east. Simon thinks, a shore, an extreme bank: "shore-town:" and this appears very probable.]

ARELI, אֲרֵלִי, אֲרֵלִי, the same as Ariel, the light of God; from אֵר, aur, light, and אֵל, God: or, the vision of God; from רָאִי rai, or, אֲרָא raah, vision, &c. Youngest son of Gad, Gen. xlv. 16.

AREOPAGUS, the place, or court, in which the Areopagites, the celebrated and supreme judges of Athens, assembled. [It was on an eminence, formerly almost in the middle of the city; at present it is out of Athens. There are some small remains of the foundations of buildings upon it still visible; but nothing whereby to determine its form or construction, as appears from Stuart's Ruins of Athens.] It is said, the judges pronounced sentence in the dark, that they might not be affected by the sight of the persons engaged in the prosecution. [It is also said, that before any person could be elected a judge of the Areopagus, he must have discharged the office of Archon, or chief magistrate of the city; but, this was not attended to, in later ages. However, it probably, gives a character to Dionysius, who was converted by St. Paul. The Areopagites took cognizance of murders, impieties, and immoralities: they punished vices of all kinds—idleness included:—they rewarded or assisted the virtuous:—they were peculiarly attentive to blasphemies against the gods, and to the performance of the sacred mysteries. It was, therefore, with the greatest propriety, St. Paul was questioned before this tribunal.]

St. Paul having preached at Athens against the plurality of gods, and declared, that he came to reveal to the Athenians that God whom they adored without knowing him, was carried before the Areopagites, as the introducer of new deities, Acts xvii. 19, 22, §. seq. He spoke there with so much wisdom, that he converted Dionysius, one of the judges, and was dismissed, without any interference on their part.

[AREOPAGUS, signifies, the hill of Mars. (Mars, it is said, was one of the first tried here.) Our translation, by giving the import of this title "Mars' hill,"—has lost the correct representation of the passage; since Mars' hill might not be a court of justice; and beside this, the station of Dionysius, as one of the Areopagites, is lost on the reader.] Vide ALTAR to the Unknown God, and ATHENS.

AREOPOLIS, the same as Ar, or Ariel, or Rabbath-Moab. See AR.

ARETAS, Ἀρετας: from ἀρετος, one that is agreeable, that pleases, that is virtuous.

I. ARETAS, king of Arabia. There were many princes of this name: Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 2, 3, 4, speaks of a king Aretas, Antipater's great friend, who not only received Hircanus, the high-priest and prince of the Jews, when dispossessed of his dignity by his brother Aristobulus, but likewise undertook to reinstate him: he marched against Aristobulus, with an army of 50,000 Arabians, defeated him, and obliged him to fly to Jerusalem, whither Aretas followed, and besieged him, A. M. 3939; ante A. D. 65. The city was already in possession of the king of the Arabians, and Aristobulus continued master of the temple only, where he defended himself, with the priests, when Scaraus, sent by Pompey, came to Damascus: Aristobulus and Hircanus sent ambassadors sadors to him, and promised large sums of money to engage him in their party: Scaurus preferred the offers of Aristobulus, whose wealth and liberality were well known to him; and in consequence, he obliged Aretas to quit the siege of the temple, threatening, in case of his refusal, to declare him an enemy to the Roman people. Aretas, therefore, returned into his own country, but not without interruptions: for Aristobulus marched against him and Hircanus, with a powerful army, and attacking him in a place called Papyron, killed about 7000 of his men.

Three or four years afterwards, Scaurus, whom Pompey had left governor of Judæa, marched against Aretas; but as he could not reach Petra, the capital of Arabia Deserta, by reason of the difficulty of the ways, he pillaged the neighbouring places. His troops at last suffering by famine, he deputed Antipater to Aretas, to engage him to make a peace, and to pay a sum of money, to prevent the farther ravaging of his country. Aretas gave 300 talents, and so the war ended, as much to the advantage of Scaurus as of Aretas. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 9, & de Bello, lib. i. cap. 6.

II. ARETAS, previously called Æneas, king of Arabia, son, or grandson, to him of whom we have been speaking, succeeded Obodas in the kingdom of Arabia. Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 15. One Syllæus having prejudiced Augustus against him, by accusing him of having assumed the crown of Arabia, without waiting for the emperor's consent, he was for some time very much perplexed, not being within distance of vindicating himself, and confuting the calumnies of his enemy. But the emperor having at length discovered the impostures of Syllæus, confirmed Aretas in the kingdom. Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 16. Herod Antipas married Aretas's daughter, A.M. 3998; but some time after divorced her; and took Herodias, his sister-in-law, his brother Philip's wife. Aretas's daughter retiring to her father, he declared war against Antipas, under pretence of difficulties concerning the limits of Gamala; and Antipas was entirely defeated. All the world thought this a just punishment for the murder of John the Baptist, whom Herod had beheaded for his reproof of his incest. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 7.

Antipas wrote to Tiberius an account of this war, and what had happened; which so provoked the emperor, that he ordered Vitellius, then governor of Syria, to make war against Aretas, and if he could take him alive, to send him in person; if not, to send his head: Vitellius advanced with his army to Ptolemais; and the Jews intreating him not to pass through their country with his troops, by reason of the images borne in their standards, he marched through the great plain, designing, in all probability, to pass the Jordan at Scythopolis. Vitellius himself, went with his friends to Jerusalem, where he continued three days. During his stay here, news was brought of Tiberius's death, and of Caius's elevation to the empire. Whereupon Vitellius commanded his army to return, being unwilling to begin this war without orders from the new emperor.

The year following, A. D. 38, the apostle Paul, who had been some time at Damascus, and preached the gospel with much zeal, was persecuted by the Jews of that city, which was then under the dominion of Aretas; they prevailed on the governor to keep the gates shut day and night, to prevent Paul from escaping; but he, being informed of their design, was let down in a basket over the city walls by the brethren: and happily avoided their snares, Acts ix. 23, 24, &c.; 2 Cor. xi. 13.

ARETH, or Hareth, a forest of Judah, 1 Sam. xii. 5. Here, David secured himself from Saul.

ARGOB, ארגוב; a turf of earth; from רגב regeb; or fat land, or curse of the well; from ארג arar, a curse, and גבה gebu, a well: or, exalted light; from אור aur, light, and גבה gabah, or gebah, elevation, height. [a clod, or gravel.]

[This being the name of a region, is probably derived from its character, that of abounding in gravel: but it may be compounded of Ar, a river, or valley where a river runs, and gob, a prominence, swelling, or mount. Some derive it from Ari, a lion, and gub, a cave, or den; and they observe that this region is described as abounding in caves, by Josephus, de Bello, lib. xvi. cap. 9. lib. xxii. cap. 15. Also by Strabo, and by William of Tyre.]

I. ARGOB, a district beyond Jordan, in the half-tribe of Manasseh, and in the country of Bashan, one of the most fruitful territories on the other side Jordan. In this district were the sixty towns called Havoth-Jair, which had walls and gates; without reckoning villages and hamlets, not inclosed. There are some remains of the word Argob, in Ragaba, a city beyond Jordan.

II. ARGOB, the capital of the region of Argob, Deut. iii. 4, 14; and 1 Kings iv. 13. Eusebius says, that Argob was fifteen miles from Gerasa, west. It is probably the same as Ragab, or Ragabak, mentioned in the Mishna, in Menachoth, viii. 3, and Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 23. The Samaritan translation, instead of Argob, generally puts Rigobah.

III. ARGOB, a place in Samaria, near the royal palace, where Pekah, son of Remaliah, assassinated Pekahiah, son of Menahem, king of Israel, 2 Kings xv. 25.

ARIAL, אֲרִיאֵל; the lion of God; from אֲרִיָּה ariah, a lion; and אֵל el, God. "Or, a very great lion."

[Some suppose this should be Har-el, "mountain of God."]

ARIAL of Moab. There are two Arials of Moab, mentioned in Scripture, which are the same city: Ar, or Areopolis, the capital of Moab, was divided by the river Arnon into two towns. Vide AR.

II. ARIAL, is understood of the altar of burnt offerings; or, of the city of Jerusalem, Isaiah xxix. 1, 2, 7; Ezek. xl. 15, 16.

[Something of the nature of this appellation, applied to the altar, appears in the apostrophe of Mary the daughter of Bilgah, who apostatized, and married a Greek soldier. She came, and struck the top of the altar, crying out, "O wolf! O wolf! thou that devourest the wealth of Israel, and yet in the time of her extremity cannot help her!" Targum Jerus. Succah. fol. 55.]

III. ARIAL, Eusebius says, is the name of an idol worshipped by the Moabites; whose capital city was Ariel. Euseb. in Ariel.

ARIARATHES, king of Cappadocia, son of another Ariarathes. He of whom we are speaking, was expelled his dominions, by Orophernes, and was restored by the Romans. A. M. 3846. Appian, Syriac. c. 118. Polyb, Legat. 126. The Roman senate wrote to him, in favour of the Jews, about A. M. 3861, 1 Macc. xv. 22.

ARIDAI, אֲרִידַי; a lion abounding; from אֲרִיָּה ariah, a lion, and דַּי di, abundance. A Persian word; its true etymology not known. Ninth son of Haman, who, with his brethren, was hanged on a gibbet, Esth. ix. 9.

ARIDATHA, אֲרִידַתָּה; law of the lion; from אֲרִיָּה ariah, a lion, and דַּת dath, a law: or, the law of the curse; from אָרַר arar, a curse. A Persian name, its true etymology not known. Sixth son of Haman, Esth. ix. 9.

ARIEL. Vide ARIAL.

ARIEH, אֲרִיָּה; lion: otherwise, light of the Lord; from אֹר aur, light, and יָה jah, the Lord.

ARIMANON, a city of refuge beyond Jordan: probably the same as Ramoth, in Gilead, Joshua xxi. 38. Joseph. Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 7.

ARIMATHÆA, Ἀριμαθῆα; a lion dead to the Lord; from אֲרִיָּה ariah, a lion, מוּת muth, death, and יָה jah, the Lord: or, the light of the death of the Lord; from אֹר aur, light, &c.: or, simply, Ramath, or Ramah, elevation; from רָמַם ramam.

ARIMATHÆA, or Ramatha, a city, from whence came Joseph, the counsellor, mentioned Luke xxiii. 50. St. Jerom, in Epitaphio Paulæ, places it between Lydda and Joppa. Modern travellers mention a city called Ramatha, between Joppa and Jerusalem, on a mountain.

The name Ramatha, whence Arimathæa, signifies height: but this place is very different from Ramathaim-Zophim, Samuel's country. Arimathæa lay west of Jerusalem, and Ramathaim north, in the mountains of Ephraim, 1 Sam. i. 1. Besides, the way which Saul travelled, when seeking his father's asses, will not allow us to place Ramathaim west of Jerusalem; for, setting out from Gibeah, he advanced north to the mountains of Ephraim; then he turned to Shalisha, west of Jerusalem, and passed through the land of Shalim, or Salem; i. e. the country about Jerusalem; proceeding toward the east, he went through the tribe of Benjamin; and, intending to return toward Gibeah, he came north into the land of Zuph, or Zophim, near Ramathaim-Zophim, where he spoke with Samuel. (It is my opinion, that the city Ramathaim-Zophim, is the same as Ramah, near Bethel, four leagues from Jerusalem, 1 Kings, x. 2, 3.) When he went from thence, Samuel told Saul, that as he returned to Gibeah, he would meet two men, who came from Rachel's sepulchre, in the neighbourhood of Bethlehem, and by these he would be informed, that his father's asses were found; and a little farther, he should meet three men, going on pilgrimage to Bethel; and, that at last, he should come to an eminence above Gibeah, then in possession of the Philistines.

ARIOCH, or Arinch, אֲרִיִּךְ; long, great, tall; from אָרַךְ arak; otherwise, your lion; from אֲרִיָּה ariah, a lion, and the affix יָךְ ca, your's.

I. ARIOCH, king—of the Elicians, according to the Vulgate,—of the Elymeans, according to the Syriac. We find Arioch, king of Ellasar, Gen. xiv. 1. Of the country of the Elicians, we have no knowledge; of the Elymeans or Elamites we have; it is that of the ancient Persians. Judith, i. 6, mentions a battle between Arphaxad, king of the Medes, and Nabuchodonozor, king of Assyria, fought at Ragau, near the Tigris and Euphrates, in the plain of Arioch, king of the Elimeans.

II. ARIOCH, king—of Pontus, according to the Hebrew,—of Ellasar, according to the paraphrast Jonathan,—of Telassar, according to the Syriac. Telassar was a province beyond the Euphrates, towards Armenia; for, Isaiah, xxxvii. 1, 2, speaks of the children of Eden at Telassar. Arioch was in league with Chedorlaomer, in the war against the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, Gen. xiv. 1, &c.

III. ARIOCH, general of king Nebuchadnezzar's troops, Dan. ii. 15. Vide DANIEL.

ARISAI, אֲרִיסַי; spouse, a Persian word, its etymology not in the Hebrew. Seventh son of Haman, hanged with his father and his brethren, Esther ix. 9.

ARISSA,

ARISSA, wife of Japheth, according to a tradition in the East. Euseb. patriarch of Alex. tom. i. Annal.

ARISTARCHUS, Ἀριστάρχης: a good prince; from ἀριστάρχης, I govern well; compounded of ἀρίστη, good, well, best, and ἀρχίζω, I govern.

ARISTARCHUS, mentioned by St. Paul, Col. iv. 10; and Philemon, ver. 24, also in the Acts, xix. 29, xx. 5; xxvii. 2. He was a Macedonian, a native of Thessalonica. He accompanied St. Paul to Ephesus, and continued with him the two years of his abode there, partaking of his labours and dangers. He was near being killed in a tumult raised by the Ephesian goldsmiths. He left that city with the apostle, and accompanied him into Greece and Asia, and to Rome. Ado, and the Roman martyrology, call him bishop of Thessalonica: but the Greeks say, he was bishop of Apamea, in Syria; and was beheaded with St. Paul, at Rome, under Nero.

ARISTEAS, from Ἀρίστας, best.

ARISTEAS, author of the history, or rather romance, concerning the version of the Septuagint (i. e. of its inspiration, the seventy cells, for the Seventy Interpreters, &c. Vide SEPTUAGINT) of whose origin, age, and country, we are ignorant. He calls himself an Egyptian, one of Ptolemy Philadelphus's life-guard, a favourite of that prince, and a Heathen. But, in his work and discourses, we easily discover the sentiments, language, and expressions of a Jew. We know not when he lived; whether under Philadelphus, king of Egypt, or Philometor, as is differently related; or later. Dodwel, in his Dissertation on Aristeas, cap. 1, thinks he lived after Philo, the first writer who mentions a translation of the Scriptures into Greek, by direction of Ptolemy Philadelphus. Aristobulus, supposed to be a Jew of the Peripatetic sect of philosophers, cited in Eusebius, Præparat. Evangel. lib. iii. cap. 9, speaks likewise of this translation: but he names neither Aristeas, nor Philo. Josephus, the historian, is the first who has particularly mentioned him. This is sufficient here, to show, that what is said of Aristeas, is very perplexed and fabulous.

ARISTOBULUS, Ἀριστοβούλος: a good counsellor, good advice; from ἀρίστη, well, good, and βούλη, counsel.

I. ARISTOBULUS, a Jew, of the race of the priests, a philosopher, and preceptor of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, 2 Macc. i. 10. Clemens, of Alexandria, Stromat. lib. i. cites the first book of Aristobulus, dedicated to king Philometor, wherein he affirms, that before the translation procured by Demetrius Phalereus, there was another, out of which Pythagoras and Plato had borrowed many of their opinions. Anatolius, quoted in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. vii. cap. 32, says, this Aristobulus was one of the Seventy Interpreters, and that he wrote comments on the books of Moses; which he dedicated to Ptolemy, son of Lagus, and to his son Ptolemy Philadelphus. Clemens and Eusebius believe this to be the Aristobulus mentioned in the preface to the second book of Maccabees, called, "king Ptolemy's master, who was of the stock of the anointed priests," i. e. of the priests of the God of Israel, consecrated by holy unction. Clem. Alex. Stromat. v. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 9.

It is generally asserted, that the Ptolemy, to whom Aristobulus was preceptor, was surnamed Philometor. The letter wherein we find his name, is dated in the year 188 of the Greeks; or A. M. 3880. Philometor died A. M. 3860, twenty years before; notwithstanding which Aristobulus may be styled this prince's preceptor, as having held that office. But the difficulty lies here: how shall we say, that Aristobulus lived to 3880, since he dedicated books to Ptolemy, son of Lagus, who died in 3720—160 years before? He must have been, at least, twenty years of age, when he composed and dedicated these books; so, that in 3880, he would have been a hundred and eighty years old; which seems incredible. We had better, therefore, acknowledge, that the Aristobulus in the Maccabees, is not him of whom Clemens and Eusebius speak; or, that the latter is a spurious author, under whose name several works were published, written long since the Maccabees, and unknown to all the ancients before Clemens.

II. ARISTOBULUS, of whom St. Paul speaks, Rom. xvi. 11, was, according to the modern Greeks, brother to Barnabas. They say—he was one of the seventy disciples; was ordained a bishop, by Barnabas, or by Paul, whom he followed in his travels; was sent into Britain, where he laboured very much, made many converts, and at last died. They keep his festival, March 13, 16, and, again, October 31.

[See the History of the INTRODUCTION of CHRISTIANITY into Britain. There seems to be no reason for doubting the character of Aristobulus as a Christian minister; who was gone into Britain, with part of the family of Brennus, the British king, at the time when St. Paul saluted his family. The evidence of the Welsh Triads is clear to this effect; and there seems to be no cause of suspicion, either of the falsity of the assertion, or of any interpolation of these documents: and, certainly, the Greeks and the Britons are witnesses perfectly independent of each other; so that collusion is out of the question. If Aristobulus were ordained by St. Paul, we see how the Britons might be "disciples of the tent-maker," as they are called by Theodoret, ret, even if St. Paul never visited Britain in person.]

Others have doubted, whether Aristobulus, of whom St. Paul speaks, were a Christian; because Paul does not salute him, but those only of his house. Vide Paræum, in Rom. xvi. 11. Others guess him to be the same with Zebedee.

III. ARISTOBULUS, otherwise called Judas (and Philellen, or lover of the Greeks) son of Hircanus, and grandson of Simon Maccabæus, high-priest and prince of the Jews; gave proofs of his valour, in his father's life time, during the siege of Samaria, which lasted a whole year, from 3894 to 3895, which he directed, together with his brother Antigonus. After that city was taken, Hircanus demolished it, and cast the materials into the brooks which run along the foot of the mountain on which it was built. Three years afterwards, A. M. 3898, Hircanus died, and Aristobulus succeeded him: but he reigned one year only. He imprisoned his mother, and three of his brothers; cruelly starved his mother in her confinement, but gave his brother Antigonus a large share of the government. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 18, 19.

He made war with the Itureans, a people descended from Jethur, son of Ishmael, who dwelt in Arabia, beyond Jordan, between Damascus, to the north, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, to the south. He subdued them, and forced them to receive circumcision; by offering them the alternative, either of embracing Judaism, or of quitting their country; they chose to remain. He procured the death of his brother Antigonus, by a tragical accident, in Straton's tower. (Vide ANTIGONUS.)

No sooner had Aristobulus committed this crime, but severe repentance seized him; which contributed not a little to increase his indisposition, and to shorten his life. One day, when a servant was carrying out some blood, which this prince had vomited, he accidentally let it fall on that very spot where the marks of Antigonus's blood were still visible. They who saw this, made a great outcry, which was heard by the king; who, enquiring the cause, and understanding what it was, it so affected him, that, with many tears and sighs, he broke out into this exclamation: "Great God! thou dost revenge very justly the fratricide which I have committed! How long will my guilty soul be thus confined within my body?" Directly as he had pronounced these words, he expired. A. M. 3899. He was succeeded by his brother Alexander Jannæus, whom Salome (or Alexandra) wife of Aristobulus, took out of prison immediately after the king's death.

high priest. Under the article ALEXANDRA, the reader has seen the opposition of Aristobulus to the proceedings of the queen his mother, with his application to her in favour of the old servants of his late father. He was also sent by his mother to protect Damascus against Ptolemy, son of Mennæus, king of Chalcis, which afforded him an opportunity of ingratiating himself with the troops. Immediately before his mother's decease, he procured the acknowledgement of many fortresses in his favour; and he continued to augment his military power: notwithstanding the Jews seized his wife and children, and lodged them in the fort adjoining the temple, at Jerusalem.

Queen Alexandra bequeathed the kingdom to her eldest son Hircanus; but Aristobulus after a while, [Josephus, Antiq. lib. v. cap. 9. says, three months, but Usher, in his Annals of this year, thinks we should read three years] fought and conquered his brother, and obtained the kingdom; while Hircanus retired to privacy. Aristobulus enjoyed the crown and high-priesthood three years and three months, when Aretas, king of Arabia, incited by Antipater the Idumean, father of Herod the Great, attacked him, for the purpose of restoring Hircanus. Aristobulus was vanquished, and reduced to the necessity of defending himself in the temple, with the priests of his party. Some months afterwards, Scaurus being sent by Pompey into Syria, the brothers appealed to him, each making him very high offers for his decision. Aristobulus offered three hundred talents; and Scaurus declared for him. Aretas, therefore, drew off his forces, and thus the temple was relieved. About the end of the year, Pompey came to Damascus, where he heard the reports of both parties, with their respective pleas, and mutual accusations. He heard also a deputation from the Jews, who complained of both the brothers. At length, he ordered Aristobulus to deliver up his forts; which he did with so ill a grace, that both parties prepared for war. Pompey marched to Jerusalem, in expectation of receiving possession of the city, and of a large sum of money, promised by Aristobulus; but the troops of the latter shut the gates, which obliged Pompey to besiege the city in form. It was taken, after a siege of three months. Hircanus was re-instated as prince and high-priest, and Aristobulus, with his two sons, Antigonus and Alexander, and two daughters, was carried prisoner to Rome. Alexander escaped by the way. Aristobulus remained prisoner at Rome eight years, but at last escaped, and returned to Judea, where he levied troops, and endeavoured to establish himself.

To prevent his purposes, Gabinius, governor of Syria, sent forces against him; and he was taken, severely wounded, in the castle of Machærus, after a siege of two days. He was again sent to Rome, where the senate decreed that he should be kept in fetters, but his sons should return to Judea, that having been stipulated by Gabinus with their mother, as a condition of her surrendering certain towns. Aristobulus was set at liberty by Julius Cæsar, after a captivity of seven or eight years. He was appointed to oppose Pompey's party in Syria, and two legions were assigned him for the purpose; but he was poisoned by that party before he could quit Rome. He received the honours of a funeral from those in the interest of Cæsar; and, his body, being embalmed in honey, remained at Rome, till Mark Anthony caused it to be carried to Judea, to be interred in the sepulchres of the kings. He died A. M. 3955, ante A. D. 49. Dio, lib. xli. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 13. de Bello, lib. i. cap. 7.

V. ARISTOBULUS, son of Alexander, and grandson of Aristobulus, second son of Alexander Jannæus; his mother was Alexandra, daughter of Hircanus;—Mariamne, wife of Herod the Great, was his sister. Aristobulus was one of the handsomest princes of his time. As he was the last of the Asmonæan family, Herod, his brother-in-law, exerted himself to prevent his possessing the high-priesthood, which he had, by birth, a right to expect. Nevertheless, being overpowered by the solicitations of his wife, Mariamne, and his mother-in-law, Alexandra, he invested young Aristobulus with this dignity, who was then but seventeen years of age. However, having observed in the people too great an inclination toward this young prince, he conceived such jealousy of him, that he resolved to procure his destruction; for which he found an opportunity, at Jericho. Aristobulus desiring to bathe, with other young people, in a conservatory of water, near the palace, Herod gave orders, secretly, to have him drowned, by plunging him under water, as if in mere diversion: A. M. 3970; ante A. D. 34. Aristobulus had not been high-priest a whole year. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. xvi. cap. 3.

VI. ARISTOBULUS, son of Herod the Great, and Mariamne, and brother to Alexander. The ill fortune of these two brothers was common, and the events of their lives were constantly intermixed. Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. ult. & de Bello, lib. i. cap. 17. Vide ALEXANDER.

ARIUS, or Arcus, king of Sparta, mentioned 1 Macc. xii. 7; and, by Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 5. This prince wrote a letter to the high-priest, Onias, the contents whereof are given, 1 Maccabees xii. 20. One particularity in it, is, that the Lacedæmonians are acknowledged brethren to the Jews; i. e. sprung from the same origin, having Abraham for their father. The reader may see CALMET's Dissertation concerning the relation between the Jews and Spartans, in the beginning of the books of Maccabees. Likewise, consult Scaliger on this subject, Canon. Isagog. p. 332. Bochart, in Chanaan. lib. i. cap. 22. Huet, in Demonstr. Evang. prop. iv. sect. 10; and more particularly, Seiden, in his second book de Synedriis, cap. iii. sect. 5; and Grotius, in loc. Arius's letter was written on a square piece of paper; the seal was an eagle, holding a dragon in his claws. The date of this letter we do not know, nor to which Onias it was addressed, or by what Arius it was written: but we know that Onias III. was made high-priest, A. M. 3805, and was deposed in 3829; and that Arius II. king of Lacedæmon, reigned after the year 549, from the foundation of Rome, which corresponds to A. M. 3805. He died at eight years of age. Acrotatus H. was his father and predecessor, and Leonidas, son of Cleonymus, was his successor: so that, if this letter be his, it must be rather from his council, than from himself, since he died so young. We know, also, another Arius, king of Lacedæmon, who is more celebrated in history. In his reign we find Onias I. who was high-priest from A. M. 3682, to 3702; and, as Arius I. began to reign in 3700, we may fix the epoch of this letter, under Onias I. in the first or second year of this Arius. See LACEDÆMONIANS.

ARK, (Noah's) in Hebrew תבת thebath. Græc. Κιβωτός, a chest; or Λάραξ, a coffer. The term used by Moses is different from the common name whereby he describes a coffer. He uses the same Hebrew word, thebat, when speaking of the little wicker basket wherein he was exposed upon the Nile, [whence some have thought the Ark was of wicker work.] It was a sort of bark, in shape and appearance much like a chest, or trunk. The ancients inform us, that the Egyptians used barks made of bulrushes, on the Nile, which were so light, as to be carried on their shoulders, when they met with falls of water, which prevented their passage. See Herodot. lib. ii. Diodor. lib. i. Plin. lib. vii. cap. 56. & lib. xiii. cap. 11. See the PLATES and FRAGMENTS.

As to Noah's Ark, it was, in all probability, in form like these Egyptian boats, but infinitely larger. If we reckon the Hebrew cubit at twenty-one inches, Noah's Ark was 512 feet long, 87 wide, and 52 feet high; and the internal capacity of it was 357,600 cubical cubits. If we suppose the cubit to be only eighteen inches, its length was 450 feet, its width 75 feet, and its height 45 feet. Its figure was an oblong square, but the covering might have a declivity declivity to carry off water. Its length exceeded that of most churches in Europe. The height might be divided into four stories, allowing three cubits and a half to the first; seven to the second; eight to the third; and five and a half to the fourth; and allotting five cubits for the thickness of the top and bottom, and the floors.

The first story might be the bottom, or what is called the hold of ships; the second might be a granary, or magazine; the third might contain the beasts; and the fourth the fowls. But the hold not being reckoned as a story, and serving only as a conservatory of fresh water, Moses says, there were but three stories in the ark: and when interpreters say four, they include the hold. Some reckon as many stables as there were kinds of beasts, which is not necessary; because many kinds of birds and beasts, which use the same food, might very well live together.

The number of beasts received into the Ark is not so great as some have imagined. We know about a hundred and forty or a hundred and fifty species of quadrupeds; of birds, more in number, but smaller in size; of reptiles, thirty or forty species. We know not of more than six species of beasts larger than a horse; very few equal to a horse, and many much smaller, even under the size of a sheep: so that all the four-footed beasts, including 3650 sheep, if they be supposed necessary for the nourishment of such animals as live on flesh, at the rate of ten sheep daily, scarcely occupy more room than 120 oxen, 3730 sheep, and 80 wolves.

Among birds, few are larger than a swan, and most are less.

Reptiles, or creeping animals, are generally small; many can live in the water, and these it might not be necessary to receive into the Ark.

All the beasts might easily have been lodged in 36 stables, and all the birds in as many lofts; allowing to each apartment 25½ feet in length, 29 in width, and 13½ in height.

There might be more than 31,174 bushels of fresh water in the hold; which is more than is sufficient for drink to four times as many men and beasts, for one year, as were in the Ark.

The granary in the first story might contain more provisions than were necessary for all the animals in the Ark, during one year; whether they all lived on hay, fruits, and herbs (which is very probable, at this juncture, there being none which, in cases of necessity, might not subsist well enough without flesh) or whether there were sheep designed for the food of such animals as live on flesh.

Beside places for the beasts and birds, and their provisions, Noah might find room on the third story for thirty-six cabins occupied by household utensils, instruments of husbandry, books, grains, and seeds; for a kitchen, a hall, four chambers, and a space of about forty-eight cubits, in length, to walk in.

[Modern discoveries have greatly augmented the number of species of beasts and birds, since the days of Calmet and of Bishop Wilkins. Some of them are of large size. Nor should we overlook the evidence of those fossil remains, which are deemed by learned naturalists to be vestiges of powerful creatures, which once inhabited our globe. Nevertheless, the number of these is not sufficiently great to annul the argument adduced in this article. Many animals which feed on flesh can endure long fasting; others are torpid in certain degrees of cold; others fold themselves into a very small compass, and pass their time with little or no motion. We must also recollect, that the innumerable varieties of species now known, are greatly the effect of climate, of food, of habit, whether roving or domesticated; and these would allow for considerable deductions from the general mass of creatures in the Ark. As to trees, plants, and vegetables, in general, we know, that most of their seeds can endure water for a long while without rotting; that the taller trees were not long wholly covered with the water of the deluge; and that the eggs, &c. of insects, though extremely numerous, might be attached in various corners of the Ark, and occupy very little space.]

There are several difficulties relating to Noah's Ark;—for example: how long was Noah in building it? Interpreters generally believe that he was one hundred and twenty years; this opinion is founded on Gen. vi. 3: "My spirit shall not always strive with man; his days shall be a hundred and twenty years." They suppose that God hereby predicted an interval of only one hundred and twenty years to the deluge; and that this time was necessary for Noah to make preparations, to build the ark, to preach repentance, to collect provisions, animals, &c.

But how shall we reconcile this with what is said Gen. v. 32, of Noah's being five hundred years old at the birth of Shem, Ham, and Japheth? And when God commands him to build the ark, he says, "And thou shalt come into the ark, thou and thy sons, and thy wife, and thy sons' wives with thee," Gen. vi. 18. Therefore, at that time, his three sons (who were not born till after the five hundredth year of his age) were all married; nevertheless, the deluge happened in the six hundredth year of Noah. It is impossible, therefore, that he should have received orders to build the ark a hundred and twenty years before the deluge; [unless, in fact, Noah had other sons; but only these three attended to his orders. Vide the case of Lot's daughters, married in Sodom. Gen. xix. 14.]

Or it may be said, that when Noah is declared to have begot Shem, Ham, and Japheth, at five hundred years of age, it should be translated—he had begot, instead of he begot.

As to the sort of wood whereof the ark was built, the Hebrew imports, that it was gopher wood; Gen. vi. 14. גפר LXX. ἐξ ὕλων τετραγώνων. Alius ἐξ ὕλων ἀσήπτων. Quid forte. Theodot. ἐκ πλακων πυξίνων; the LXX translate, square pieces of wood; others render it, cedar, or box, or woods that do not perish easily. Bochart maintains, that gopher signifies cypress. In Armenia and Assyria, where it is supposed, with reason, that the Ark was constructed, cypress is the only wood fit to make a long vessel of, such as the Ark. Alexander the Great, designing to build a fleet, could find no wood proper for this use in Babylonia, but was forced to use cypress brought from Assyria. Arrian, in Alex. lib. vii. Strabo, lib. xvi. Others are of opinion, that the Hebrew, gopher, signifies, in general, oily and gummy woods; such as the pine, the fir-tree, and the turpentine-tree. The word gophrit, which comes very near gopher, signifies sulphur, and, in a larger sense, may be taken for rosin, pitch, and other combustible matters drawn from wood. St. Jerom translates it here, polished wood, but elsewhere, wood coated over with bitumen, ligna bituminata. Hieronym. Quest. Hebr. The paraphrasts Onkelos and Jonathan, and some others, thought this wood was cedar: the point remains undecided; but, if I were to choose, I should prefer the cypress. The Mahometans explain it by the word Sag, or the Indian plane-tree. They say, also, that while Noah was employed about this building, the wicked rallied him, some saying, “to what purpose is a vessel built in the open plain, at such a distance from the waters?” Others exclaimed, in a way of ridicule, which has become proverbial, “You have made a ship, now bring the water to it.” Others, “that after having long practised the trade of a husbandman, he was at last reduced to that of a carpenter.” But his answer to them was, “I shall have my turn; and you will learn, at your expence, who he is that punishes the wicked in this world, and reserves chastisements for them in the other world.”

The greatest difficulty relating to Noah's ark, refers, principally, to its size and capacity; and how he was able to build a vessel sufficient to contain the men and beasts, with provisions requisite for their support, during a whole year. To resolve these difficulties, it has been requisite to enquire very particularly into the measure of the cubit mentioned by Moses, into the number of the beasts, &c. admitted into the ark, and into the dimensions of this vast building. After the nicest examination and computation, and taking the dimensions with the greatest geometrical exactness, the most learned and accurate calculators, and those most conversant in building of ships, conclude, that if the ablest mathematicians had been consulted about proportioning the several apartments in the ark, they could not have done it with greater correctness than Moses has done; and this narration in the sacred history is so far from furnishing deists with arguments wherewith to weaken the authority of the Holy Scriptures, that, on the contrary, it supplies good arguments to confirm that authority; since it seems, in a manner, impossible for a man, in Noah's time, when navigation was not perfected, by his own wit and invention, to discover such accuracy and regularity of proportion, as is remarkable in the dimensions of the Ark; it follows, that the correctness must be attributed to Divine inspiration, and a supernatural direction. Wilkins, Bishop of Chester's Essay towards a real Character, part ii. cap. 5. Saurin, Discours Historique, &c. tom. i. pages 87, 88.

Some have started difficulties with regard to the square and oblong figure of the Ark: but these persons did not consider that this vessel was not designed for sailing, or rowing, but chiefly for floating on the water a considerable time. Besides, it may be proved, by instances, that its form was not less commodious for rowing, than capacious for carrying. George Hornius, in his “History of the several Empires,” tells us, that in the beginning of the 17th century, one Peter Hans, of Horne, had two ships built after the model and proportions of the Ark; one was 120 feet long, 20 wide, and 12 deep. These vessels had the same fate with Noah's, they were, at first, subjects of ridicule and railery; but experience demonstrated, that they carried a third part more than others, though they did not require a larger crew: they were better sailers, and made their way with much more swiftness. The inconveniency found in them, was, that they were fit only for times of peace, because they were not proper to carry guns. Le Pelletier, Dissert. sur l'Arche de Noe, cap. ii. p. 29, 30.

[The proportions of this vessel pretty nearly agree with those of the human figure, so that it resembled a dead body laid out for burial: 300 cubits in length is six times its breadth, 50 cubits. Now the body of a man lying on the water, flat on his back, will float without any exertion, so far as to keep the mouth above water, water, and the nose free for the purpose of breathing. It should seem, therefore, that similar proportions might suit a vessel whose purpose was floating only:—and I do not know, whether we have not been betrayed into erroneous conceptions of the structure of the Ark, by supposing it to pass violently from one place to another, to be driven by storms, &c. whereas, it is not impossible that it might be as if at anchor all the time; and the surges might not greatly, if at all, exceed those we are now acquainted with; as fifteen cubits, or twenty-two feet of water, could hardly form such a high sea as some have imagined.]

The number of men and animals included in the ark, plentifully supplies matter of dispute. As to the number of men, if we kept to the texts of Moses and Peter, we should have no contest about it; Moses expressly says, that Noah went into the ark, himself, his wife, his three sons, and their three wives: and Peter tells us, that there were but eight persons saved from the deluge. But the mind of man, fruitful in imaginations, always curious, and perpetually unquiet, has considerably augmented this number. Some have hereby thought to do God service; supposing eight persons were not sufficient to supply the wants of so many animals. Others have imagined, that to affirm eight persons only to have been preserved from the deluge, was to set too narrow bounds to God's mercy. The Mahometan interpreters believe, that beside the eight persons whom we have mentioned, there were seventy-two more who entered; not the sons only of Noah, but their servants likewise.

It is, beyond comparison, more difficult to fix the number of animals, than that of men. Moses himself helps to perplex us, in these words: "Of every clean beast thou shalt take to thee seven seven, the male and his female; and of beasts not clean, two, the male and his female." He places two here but once: but the Samaritan, the LXX, and Vulgate, read two twice; and the Hebrew itself, chap. vii. ver. 9, reads two two, went in—which leaves the difficulty in all its force; the text bearing equally to be construed seven and seven; in like manner, as it is said in the gospel that our Saviour sent his disciples away two and two; and they went away two and two, not four and four together.

This opinion is followed by almost all commentators. (Joseph. Antiq. lib. i. cap. 3. Chrysost. Hom. xxiv. in Genes. Theodor. qu. 50. in Gen. Hieron. lib. i. contra Jovinian. Augustin. de Civit. lib. xv. cap. 27, &c.) Nevertheless, the contrary opinion is not without defenders, and the original text may signify, fourteen clean beasts, or seven pair; and of unclean, two pair; or, only one pair. Origen, lib. iv. contra Cels. the Author of "Questions to the Orthodox" under the name of Justin, q. xliii. Abenezra, Dionysius the Carthaginian, Oleaster, and some others, have followed this last opinion.

But what are we to understand by clean and unclean beasts in this history? Was this distinction, declared by Moses in the law, known and practised before the deluge? or, did Moses mention it as known and understood by the persons for whom he wrote? It is probable, that this distinction was known to Noah; and that the same animals were esteemed pure, (while others were impure) both by Noah and by Moses. Now it is manifest, that by pure, or clean, animals, in general, those only were meant which might be offered in sacrifice, as bulls, sheep, goats, and their several species; and the like among birds, as pigeons, doves, hens, and sparrows. For the common uses of life, as food, &c. Moses allows a great number of animals; but I question, whether in this place, we are to extend the pure animals beyond those admitted in sacrifice. The pair of unclean could be only one male and one female; but the seven clean beasts might be two males and five females; one male for sacrifice, the other for multiplication of the species. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XX. CCVII. and the PLATES, "CONSTRUCTION OF NOAH'S ARK."

ARK. The Latin word arca, signifies a coffer, and this is the true meaning of the Hebrew, אֲרֹן, arvn, by which Moses denotes the coffer, or chest, wherein the tables which contained the commandments were deposited. This coffer was of Shittim wood, covered with plates of gold; it was two cubits and a half in length, a cubit and a half wide, and a cubit and a half high. On the top of it, all around it, ran a kind of gold crown; and two cherubim were over the cover. This coffer had four rings of gold, two on each side, through which staves were put, by which it was carried. Such was the Ark of the Covenant.

After the passage of the Jordan, the Ark continued some time at Gilgal; whence it was removed to Shiloh. From hence the Israelites took it to their camp: they gave battle to the Philistines, and the Ark of the Lord was taken by the enemy. The Philistines, oppressed by the hand of God, returned the Ark, and it was lodged at Kirjath-jearim. It was afterwards, in the reign of Saul, at Nob. David conveyed it from Kirjath-jearim, to the house of Obed-edom; from thence to his palace at Sion; and, lastly, Solomon brought it into the temple at Jerusalem. Vide ARMIES, ad fin.

It remained in the temple, with all suitable respect, respect, till the times of the later kings of Judah, who, abandoning themselves to idolatry, were so daring as to establish their idols in the holy place itself. The priests, unable to endure this profanation, removed the Ark, and carried it from place to place, to preserve it from the pollution and impiety of these princes. Josiah commanded them to bring it back to the sanctuary, and forbade them to carry it, as they had hitherto done, into the country, 2 Chron. xxxv. 3.

It is questioned, with good reason, whether the Ark were replaced in the temple, after the return of the Jews from Babylon? Dr. Prideaux is of opinion, that as the Jews found it necessary for the celebration of their worship in the second temple, to have a new altar of incense, a new shew-bread table, and a new candlestick, they had likewise a new Ark. He asks, since the holy of holies, and the veil drawn before it, were wholly for the sake of the Ark, what need had there been of these in the second temple, if there had not been the Ark also to which they referred? &c. Connect. &c. part i. p. 117.

Some think that Nebuchadnezzar conveyed the Ark to Babylon, among the spoil of rich vessels carried off by him from the temple: others, that Manasseh having set up idols in the temple, took away the Ark, which was not returned during his reign. The author of Esdras (2 Esd. x. xxii.) represents the Jews lamenting, that the Ark of the covenant was taken by the Chaldeans, among the plunder of the temple.

The Gemara of Jerusalem, cap. 1, and that of Babylon, both acknowledge, that the Ark of the covenant was one of the things wanting in the second temple. The Jews flatter themselves, that it will be restored by their Messiah, says Abarbanel, in Daniel ix. but Jeremiah, chap. iii. 16, speaking of the time of the Messiah, says, they shall neither talk nor think of the Ark, or remember it any more. Esdras, Nehemiah, the Maccabees, and Josephus, never mention the Ark in the second temple; and Josephus says expressly, that when Jerusalem was taken by Titus, there was nothing in the sanctuary. De Bello, lib. v. cap. 14. in Græco.

Lastly, the Rabbins agree in saying, that, after the captivity of Babylon, the Ark was not at Jerusalem: and that the foundation-stone, which they believe to be the centre of the holy mountain, was placed in the sanctuary in its room. The Fathers, and Christian commentators, agree generally with the Jews on this point.

Beside the tables of the covenant, placed by Moses in the sacred coffer, God appointed the blossoming rod of Aaron to be lodged there, and the omer of manna which was gathered in the wilderness.

The Heathen, likewise, had, in their religious rites, little chests, or cistæ, wherein they locked up their most sacred things. Vide Spencer, de legib. Hebræorum. Apuleius, de Asino aureo, lib. ix. et lib. xi. says, that in certain processions in Egypt there was a chest-bearer, who carried a box, inclosing the richest things for their religious uses. Plutarch, on the rites of Isis and Osiris, says the same. Pausanias, lib. vii. mentions a chest, in which the Trojans locked up their mysteries, which, at the siege of Troy, fell to Euripulus's share. The ancient Hetrurians had also cistæ; so had the Greeks and Romans: but these chests often enclosed things profane, superstitious, and ridiculous: whereas, the Ark of God contained the most sacred and serious things in the world, such as the tables of God's law, &c. Clem. Alex. in Proptetico. Euseb. Præpar. Evang. lib. ii. cap. 5.

[Whether the sacred chests of the Heathen did not originally refer to the Ark of Noah, rather than to the ark of Moses has been justly doubted; as instances of commemoration, they seem to be much more probably representative of the former, of which the tradition was constant and general, than of the latter, of which the knowledge and the interest was very feeble, if indeed it were sensible, in distant, and especially in Heathen countries.]

ARKI, or Aurki, אַרְקִי, Ἀρκαῖος: sinew, artery: from אַרַק arak, or orek: fugitive, according to the Syriac.

ARMAGEDDON, Ἀρμαγεδδών: mountain of Megiddo, mountain of the gospel: from אֶר ar, a mountain, and הַגִּיד haggid, I proclaim, I reveal: otherwise, mountain of fruits, or of apples. [Probably this should be understood as composed of Ar, a river, or valley where a river runs, and Megiddo, the name of a place. Vide MEGIDDO.]

ARMAGEDDON, a place mentioned Rev. xvi. 16. Megiddo is a city in the great plain, at the foot of mount Carmel. Here good king Josiah received his mortal wound, in the battle against Necho, king of Egypt, 2 Chron. xxxv. 22, 23.

ARMENIA, אֲרָמִיָּה: Vulgate, Ararat.

ARMENIA, a province of Asia; wherein are the sources of the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, with those of the Araxes and Phasis, wherein we suppose Eden to have been situated, and also Paradise. The name Armenia, is derived either from Aram, father of the Syrians, or from Harminni, mountain of the Mineans. Minni, or the Mineans, are noticed Jer. li. 27. In Gen. viii. 4, Moses says the ark rested on the mountains of Armenia. In the Hebrew, the mountains tains of Ararat; and 2 Kings xix. 37, it is said, the two sons of Sennacherib, after having killed their father, escaped into Armenia; in the Hebrew, the land of Ararat.

ARMIES. The Lord, in Scripture, assumes the name Jehovah of Hosts: יהוה צבאות. The Hebrew word zebaoth, which signifies armies, is often understood of flocks of sheep; and in several places, armies are compared to flocks, Cant. ii. 7; Jer. iii. 19, &c. Jeremiah, iv. 3, says of the Assyrian army, "it shall come before Sion like a flock under the conduct of its shepherd." The Hebrew nation, in many places, is called the army of the Lord, because God was considered as its head and general: who named the captains of its armies: who ordained war and peace: whose priests sounded the trumpet, &c.

The armies of Israel were not composed of regular troops kept constantly in pay; the whole nation were fighting men, ready to march as occasion required. The army expected no reward beside honour, and the spoils taken, which were divided by the chiefs. Each soldier furnished himself with arms and provisions, and their wars were generally of short duration: they fought on foot, having no horse, till the reign of Solomon. David is the first who had regular troops; his successors, for the most part, had only militia, excepting their body guards, which were not numerous.

When they expected to give battle, proclamation was made at the head of every battalion, according to Deut. xx. 5.

The ark of God was often borne in the army; it was not out of the camp during the whole time of Israel's abode in the wilderness. Joshua ordered it to be carried almost continually with him, in his wars against the Canaanites. The Israelites being vanquished by the Philistines in the time of Eli, the high priest, 1 Sam. iv. 4, 5, they sent for the ark; on the coming whereof, they were filled with joy, while the camp of the Philistines was filled with terror. David commanded it to be carried to the siege of Rabbah (2 Sam. xi. 11: xv. 24); and being compelled to fly before his son, Absalom, the high-priest, Zadok, brought out the ark to him, but David ordered it back to Jerusalem. The Israelites of the ten tribes, in imitation of Judah, carried their golden calves with them in their camp, as the Philistines did their idols, 1 Chron. xiv. 12; 2 Chron. xiii. 8.

ARMON, הרמון, τὸ ὄρος τὸ ῥιμμόν: a pomegranate tree; from רמון rimmon: the mountain of enumeration, or of preparation: from הר ar, a mountain, מנה manah, to number, to prepare; otherwise, the mountain of the gift; from מנח manach, an offering, a gift. [Amos iv. 3. This is the opinion of the old interpreters: others translate the passage thus, "And shall cast them into the palace, saith the Lord."

Perhaps, this compound is derived from Hor, a mount, and Rimmon, the pomegranate: so that it might be understood as "the mount of Rimmon"—but, as Rimmon itself is a compound word, implying, "the exalted Aun," it is probable that this name should be understood as "the mount of M'-aun," the great Aun; the sovereign potentate venerated under that character. The compound M'-aun, or M'aun, occurs in other languages, as Palemon: Pale-m'aun; "the old M'aun," &c.]

ARMON, or Armoni, son of Saul and Rizpah: hanged, with his brethren by the Gibeonites, 2 Sam. xxi. 8.

ARMONI, ארמוני: my palace; from ארמון armon: otherwise, curse of the enumeration, and of the preparation; from ארר arar, a curse.

ARMS of the Hebrews. The Hebrews used in war offensive arms of the same kinds as were employed by other people of their time, and of the east: swords, darts, lances, javelins, bows, arrows, and slings. For defensive arms, they used helmets, cuirasses, bucklers, and armour for the thighs. At particular periods, especially when under servitude, whole armies of Israelites were without good weapons. In the war of Deborah and Barak, against Jabin, there were neither shields nor lances among 40,000 men, Judg. v. 8. In the time of Saul, 1 Sam. viii. 22, none in Israel, beside Saul and Jonathan, was armed with swords and spears; because the Philistines, who were then masters of the country, forbade the Hebrews from using the trades of armourers and sword-cutlers; and even obliged them to employ Philistines to sharpen their tools of husbandry; but these, being their masters, would make no arms for them. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XCI.

Arms were anciently made either of brass or iron. We meet in Scripture with brazen shields, helmets, and bows. Goliath's helmet, greaves, and target, were of brass. The Hebrews were expert archers and slingers; witness David's exploit against Goliath (see also Job xx. 24; Psal. xvii. 35; 1 Kings xiv. 27); and the Benjaminites, who could throw stones to a hair's-breadth without missing, 1 Sam. xvii. 5, 6, 7. The Scripture adds, that they mostly used both hands alike, Judg. xx. 36.

OF THEIR BUCKLERS.

In the original Hebrew, we meet with four terms to signify bucklers: צידון ciden, מגן magen, זינן zinna, סכרה scherah. There were, doubtless, differences between them; but it is difficult to fix fix their particular forms and uses. They were made of wood or ozier, and covered with brass, iron, or leather: sometimes bordered with metal, and, at other times, with several foldings of leather. Goliath's shoulders were covered with a large shield of brass.

OF THEIR CUIRASSES.

These were sometimes made of linen, woollen, or cotton, beaten like felt; at other times, of brass, or copper, like coats of mail; or even composed of scales, or thin plates, laid one over another; and sometimes they were solid plates of copper, iron, or steel. Goliath had a coat of mail, 1 Sam. xvii. 5. Saul had one of very solid and almost impenetrable linen, 2 Sam. i. 9. Tenent me angustæ. Heb. אֲחוּזִי דְּשֶׁבֶץ. The Hebrew שֶׁבֶץ shebetz, signifies an embroidered coat. Exod. xxviii. 3, and Psalm xlv. 14. It was customary to hang arms and shields on the towers of strong places: there is mention in the Canticles of bucklers hung on David's tower. Ezekiel, xxvii. 10, speaks of the bucklers and helmets which the Tyrians, Persians, Libyans, and Lydians, hung on the walls of Tyre. The Maccabees, 1 Macc. iv. 57, having purified and dedicated the temple, adorned the portal with gold crowns and bucklers. Simon Maccabæus embellished the mausoleum erected for his brethren with arms, and ships carved on the stone, 1 Macc. xiii. 29. Vide ARSENAL. Vide also FRAGMENTS, Nos. CCXVIII. CCXIX. on ANCIENT ARMOUR, also Nos. CCXVII. CCXXI.

St. Paul has frequent allusions to arms, war, military exercises, and public games. He exhorts Christians to use their members as the armour of righteousness, on the behalf of God, not as the armour of iniquity, on the part of sin. To put on the armour of light; as being to engage not with enemies of flesh and blood, but with the rulers of darkness; he says, 1 Thess. v. 18. "Take the armour of God, put on the breast-plate of righteousness, and have your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace: take the helmet of salvation, the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God," &c. And 1 Cor. ix. 25, "Let us put on the breast-plate of faith and love, and for a helmet, the hope of salvation. They, who combat in the public games, abstain from many things to obtain a perishable crown," &c. 2 Tim. xi. 5, "He who contends in the public games, is not crowned, unless he has contended according to the rules established," &c.

ARNAN, אָרָן: their chest, their casket, from אָרֹן aron, a chest, and the pronoun ׁן, an, their's: otherwise, cry of joy; from רָאָן: or curse; from אָרַר arar; otherwise, light of the son; from אֹר aur, light, and נִין nin, son.

ARNON, אָרְנוֹן: leaping for joy; or, their chest; from אָרֹן aron, a chest; and the pronoun ׁן, an, their's: otherwise, the cry of joy; from רָאָן ranan.

ARNON, a river or brook, frequently mentioned in Scripture. Its spring-head is in the mountains of Gilead, or of Moab. It runs at first from north to south, then from east to west, and falls into the eastern part of the Dead Sea.

[1. ARNON, a river of the Moabites. Deut. ii. 24. Some think a continual noise and roaring. This may characterise a river, in some parts, well enough; but it does not so well apply to a city; unless the idea of stir, bustle, tumult, and so of "the busy hum of men," may be attached to it. Vide AROER.

2. ARNON, a city. Numb. xxi. 13. Josh. xii. 1. xiii. 8, 9. Judges ii. Jer. xvi.

This word, I incline to think, may be analyzed by taking Aren for the pine tree, and Aun for On, the great origin of human posterity: q. "the pine tree of Aun:" in which case this name will coincide perfectly with some of the medals of Corinth [see the Plates], which shew this pine tree, and its connection with Aun; and where, indeed, Pale-m'AUN was worshipped, who was, as I believe, the same deity.

There is another acceptation of this word: Arun signifies a coffer or chest; and, no doubt, this was originally made of the pine tree, Aren, so that the two ideas coalesce: but the coffer, chest, or ark, of Aun, is precisely similar to that of Adonis or Tammuz; and indeed the reference is to the same event. The medals of Corinth equally shew this chest, or ark; and equally indicate its being made of the pine tree: "the Aun in the chest," or "the chest of Aun;" referring to the tree: "the Aun of the chest," or "the chest of Aun;" referring to the ark which preserved mankind: but vide AROER and ARNON.]

ARNONA, a district beyond Jordan, along the river Arnon. Vide RELAND. Palest. tom. i. lib. ii. cap. xii. p. 495.

AROD, or Arodi, אָרֹד: Vide ARAD.

AROD, fifth son of Gad, Numb. xxvi. 17.

AROER, or Auroor, אֲרֹעַר: heath, tamarisk: otherwise, nakedness of the skin; from הֶרְוָה heruah, nakedness, and אֲרֹעַר our, the skin; otherwise, exultation: from אֲרֹעַר our: or, nakedness of the watch, or of the enemy; from אֲרֹעַר our, nakedness, or enemy, and from אֲרֹעַר our, watch.

I. AROER, a city of Gad, on the north bank of the brook Arnon, at the extremity of the country, which the Hebrews possessed beyond Jordan, Numb. xxii. 34. Eusebius says, that, in his time Aroer was seated on a mountain. [Judg. xi. 26, called also Arour. Some think it imports extremely naked, very barren: but this would hardly be adopted as the name for the capital of a kingdom; and certainly it cannot apply to any region near Damascus, the paradise of the east.]

II. AROER. Reland, tom. ii. page 583, thinks there was a city of this name near Rabbah, of the Ammonites, otherwise called Philadelphia; and that this is the Aroer meant, Joshua xxiii. 25; Judg. ii. 33.

III. AROER, of Judah, I Sam. xxx. 28: may be understood, likewise, of Aroer, beyond Jordan. David dwelt some time in the land of Moab, and might have left some of his relations at Aroer. But, in Joshua, xv. 22, and in the LXX. we read Aroer, or Aroel; which may be Aroer of Judah. Eusebius and St. Jerom speak of Arur, twenty miles from Jerusalem, north. Aroer, in Hebrew, signifies Heath; it is very possible, therefore, that several places were named Aroer, from this circumstance.

[AROER, a region near Damascus; or, as others think, of Arnon; J. Isaiah, xvii. 2.

This word seems to import repeated liftings up, or risings, and it might be the character of the city Aroer, as well as of a region, to consist of small hills, or risings, or what we term knolls, or haughs.

This seems more probable than the idea of bustle, or stir, occasioned by crowds of people; for though this agrees sufficiently with the city Aroer, yet it does not well describe a region. As the city Aroer was divided by the stream on which it stood, I would query, whether the duplicate form of the word does not denote two passages; which agrees well enough with the radical idea of bustle: "THE FERRIES." Vide AR, and REHOBOTH Oir, or Ar.—But,

A further thought has struck me on considering this name and its derivation; we have not, that I know of, in the Hebrew, any word which certainly denotes a bridge, or construction, whether of arches, or otherwise, for passing over rivers: yet, undoubtedly, this convenience must have been known, since the very laying a plank across a stream would lead to it, and to a proper name for it, by way of distinction. But, if the root, Ar, or Oir, import lifting up, or rising, then it well expresses the elevated nature of a bridge; which, being laid from bank to bank of a river, is certainly lifted up over the stream. Whether, when plural, it imports any thing like arches, may be left undetermined; that form of construction appearing in no truly ancient Egyptian structure, with which we are acquainted. By way of corroborating this idea, we may examine a few instances of the application of the name Ar, or Oir.

1. AR, the city of the Moabites, was properly, called Rabba, or Rabbath, and, if this name imports great town, Megalopolis, yet the name Ar might allude to its bridge. This is perfectly agreeable to what we read Numb. xxi. 15. "The stream of the brooks (plural) which go down to the termination, (or point of land diminishing into nothing by the union of these streams) of Ar,"—so that Ar stood on such a point of land. Deut. ii. 18. "Thou art to pass over (the river) through Ar, the termination, or bound, of Moab:"—now it is impossible to suppose that the termination of the territory of the Moabites was immediately at this their capital city: but, the point of land on which this city stood might terminate there.

In like manner, Aroer is described, Deut. ii. 36, as being "by the brink of the river of Arnon, even the city which is in the torrent;"—"in the middle of the torrent." Josh. xii. 2. "Aroer that is upon the bank of the river Arnon, even the city that is in the midst of the river." Josh. xiii. 9, and still more particularly, 2 Sam. xxiv. 5. "Aroer, the city which lieth in the midst of the river of Gad." From these places it is clear that Aroer was surrounded by water: i. e. it stood on a point of land formed by the junction of two streams: so that, to enter it, one bridge over one of the streams must be passed; hence its distinction Ar, "Bridge-town:" but, after a bridge was built over each stream, it would naturally receive this distinction in a duplicate form, Ar Ar,—Oir Oir; "Bridges-town."

This acceptance of the word Oir as signifying a bridge is of further use in that very perplexing question, why it is appended to Rehoboth, Gen. x. 11? Rehoboth Oir. Under its proper article the reader will see how this addition has embarrassed the learned: but, if we take it as a mark of distinction "Bridge Rehoboth," all becomes easy; and matter of fact agrees with it, as the situation to which we have assigned it, Altun Kieupri, "the bridge of gold," is thus distinguished to this day.

I need not point out the similarity of the appellation Rehoboth Oir, to the Rabbath Oir of the Moabites; but it serves to confirm the notion that these descriptive appellations might arise from the same cause, the peculiarity of the situation of the cities they described.

Possibly, some of the names into which Oir, or Ar, enters in composition, might be explained on this principle.

The derivation from stir, or bustle, is no obstacle to this interpretation: no place being more remarkable for bustle than a bridge, where passengers are both more constant and more conspicuous, than in any other part of a city.]

tion; from אור aur, light, and פדה padah, to redeem: otherwise, that lies down; that makes his bed; from רפד raphad.

[Or covering: meaning of something which may be used for the purpose of reclining in. Some think, a spreading, a solid stratum, from the Arabic, to spread, to cover a place.]

ARPAD, this town, in Scripture, is always placed in connection with Hamath. 2 Kings, xviii. 34; xix. 13; Isai. x. 9; xxxvi. 19; xxxvii. 13; Jerem. lxix. 23. Sennacherib boasts of having reduced Arpad and Hamath. Hamath, we know, is Emesa; and, we conjecture that Arpad may be the city Arad, or Arvad, as it is sometimes called in Hebrew. Others think, it is the town of Arphas, noticed in Josephus, as limiting the provinces of Gamalitis, Gaulanitis, Batanea, and Trachonitis, north-east. De Bello, lib. iii. cap. 2. p. 834, a. This agrees well enough with Arpad near Hamath; and Josephus had obliged us, if he had told us more exactly the position of Arpad. My conjecture is, that this Arphas mentioned by Josephus, is Rephanæa, or Raphan, between mounts Casius and Anticassius. Josephus says, de Bello, lib. vii. cap. 24, the river Sabbaticus runs between Arce and Raphanæa; and Stephens, the geographer, sets Raphanæa near Epiphania, near Arad. Stephan. in Εμφάνεια.

[The name of an island in Phœnicia, situated not far from Damascus. Pliny, lib. v. cap. 81. Pomponius Mela, lib. i. Called Aradus, 2 Kings, xviii. 34. xix. 33. Isaiah, x. 9. xxxv. 19. Jer. xlix. 23. 1 Macc. xv. 23. Ezek. xxvii. 8, 11.

It appears to me that Raphad, from which comes Araphad, or Arphad, means, to roll, as Job xvii. 13. "if I unroll my bed in the darkness," alluding to the manner of the eastern nations, which unroll and spread out their beds, or slight kind of mattresses, when they wish to sleep: and after having done with them, roll them up again; to be laid in a place of small dimensions: So, chap. xli. 20, "the (crocodile) Leviathan rolleth about sharp pointed things in the mire"—he sprawleth them about with his feet, without receiving any injury, or laceration: and particularly, I think, it means in Cant. iii. 10, the roller, or curtain, of an eastern vehicle: which, hanging on the top of the carriage, when it is to be let down, to close the carriage is unrolled; and it is rolled up again, when replaced in its situation; so that now the carriage is open. I presume then, that this name may refer to "the Deity of the curtain, or canopy." The medals of Sidon clearly shew this deity, sitting in such a carriage; no doubt, in a public procession. See the PLATES.

I must, however, note, that the name Aradus seems to me not entirely to agree with the Hebrew Arphad, as the p is too powerful a letter to be dropped in pronunciation; yet the deity of the place is so conformable to that of Tyre and Sidon, that it is difficult to deny the identity of the object of worship in these cities, and consequently their neighbourhood to each other.]

ARPHAXAD אֶרֶפְחָאד: one that heals, from רפא rapha: otherwise, one that releases, from רפה rapha; and כשל chashal, he that overthrowes; and דד dad, a ripple. This word is not Hebrew; and its original is not in that language.

I. ARPHAXAD, son of Shem, and father of Salah: born A. M. 1658, one year after the deluge; died A. M. 2026, aged 438 years. Gen. xi. 12, &c.

II. ARPHAXAD, king of Media, mentioned Judith, i. 1: probably the same with Phraortes, son and successor of Dejoces, king of Media. Herein CALMET differs in opinion from the learned Prideaux, who thinks Arphaxad to be Dejoces, and not Phraortes, his successor; for, as he observes, Arphaxad is said to be that king of Media who was the founder of Ecbatane, which all other writers agree to have been Dejoces; and the beginning of the twelfth year of Saosduchinus, exactly agrees with the last year of Dejoces, when this battle of Ragau is said to have been fought, &c. Connect. Part I. b. 1, Vide Herodotus, lib. i. cap. 97. He says, Phraortes first subdued the Persians, and afterwards almost all Asia; but at last coming to attack Nineveh, and the Assyrian empire, he was killed, in the twenty-second year of his reign. The book of Judith informs us, that he built Ecbatane, and was defeated in the great plains of Ragau, those, probably about the city of Rages [Rey] in Media. Tobit, i. 16; iii. 7; iv. 11.

ARROWS. Divination with arrows. Ezekiel informs us, chap. xxi. 21, that Nebuchadnezzar, marching against Zedekiah, and the king of the Ammonites, coming to the head of two ways, mingled his arrows in a quiver, to divine from them, in which direction he should pursue his march; that he consulted Teraphim, and inspected the livers of beasts, in order to determine his resolution. Jerom, Theodoret, and modern commentators, believe that this prince took several arrows, and on each of them wrote the name of the king, or city, &c. which he designed to attack: as on one—Jerusalem; on another—Rabbah; on another—Egypt, &c. These being put into a quiver, were hustled together, and one of them drawn out; that which came first, was considered as declarative of the will of the gods, to attack first that city, province, or kingdom, whose name was upon the arrow. Hieronym. Theodoret. & alii in Ezek. xxi. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CLXXIX. [There are many other other ways of divination by arrows; such as shooting one, or more, into the air, and watching on which side it (or the greater number) fell, &c. &c. Comp. also 2 Kings xiii. 14—19.]

ARSACES, Ἀρσάκης: who lifts up the buckler: from ἀρᾶς, a lifting up, and ἀκῆ, the point of a lance, or sword. A Persian word; its root not in the Hebrew.

ARSACES, otherwise Mithridates, king of the Parthians, 1 Maccabees, xiv. 2. He considerably enlarged the kingdom of Parthia by his good conduct, and his valour. Demetrius Nicanor, or Nicator, king of Syria, having invaded his country, at first obtained several advantages. Media declared for him, and the Elymæans, Persians, and Bactrians, joined him: but Arsaces having sent one of his officers to him, under pretence of treating for peace, he fell into an ambuscade; his army was cut off by the Persians, and he himself fell into the hands of Arsaces. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 9. Justin. lib. xxxvi. & xli.

ARSENAL. The ancient Hebrews had each man his own arms, because all went to the wars: they had no arsenals, or magazines of arms, because they had no regular troops, or soldiers, in constant pay. There were no arsenals in Israel, till the reigns of David and Solomon. David made a large collection of arms, and consecrated them to the Lord, in his tabernacle. The high-priest, Jehoida, took them out of the treasury of the temple, to arm the people and Levites, on the day of the young king Joash's elevation to the throne, 2 Chron. xxiii. 9. Solomon collected a great quantity of arms in his palace of the forest of Lebanon, and established well-provided arsenals in all the cities of Judah, which he fortified, 2 Chron. xi. 12. He sometimes enforced the conquered and tributary people to forge arms for him, 1 Kings, x. 25. King Uzziah not only furnished his arsenals with spears, helmets, shields, cuirasses, swords, bows, and slings, but also lodged such machines in them as were proper for sieges. Hezekiah had the same precaution, he made stores of arms of all sorts. Jonathan and Simon Maccabæus had arsenals stored with good arms, not only such arms as had been taken by them from their enemies, but others which they had purchased, or commissioned to be forged for them.

ARTABA, Ἀρτάβαι: its etymology is not in the Hebrew. A measure used by the Babylonians. They offered every day twelve artabas of fine flour, to their god Bel. Dan. xiv. 3, Vulg. But Daniel discovered the roguery of the priests; who took the flour and wine for their own use. An artaba contained seventy-two sextarii, according to Epiphanius, de Ponderib. & Mens. and Isidore of Sevil, lib. xvi. Origin: or, according to Dr. Arbuthnot's tables, one bushel, one gallon, and one pint; allowing, with him, four pecks and six pints to the medimnus, and one pint to the choenix.

ARTAXERXES, ארתחשטרא: a name common to kings of Persia. Ezra, iv. 7. Silence of light, or, light that imposes silence; from אור aur, light, and ערש cheresh, silence: otherwise, joy in haste; from ערש chush, and שוש shush, joy. In Ezra, vii. 21, the same name is written ארתחשטתא, Artachsastatha, and signifies the same. The true etymology of this name is not in the Hebrew tongue; it is a Persian title.

L. ARTAXERXES, otherwise AHASUERUS. The Greek of Esther, calls him always Artaxerxes; the Hebrew and Vulgate, Ahasuerus. We are of opinion, that this celebrated king of Persia is, in profane authors, named Darius, son of Hystaspes. Vide AHASUERUS.

II. ARTAXERXES, surnamed LONGIMANUS, reigned from A. M. 3531, to 3579; ante A. D. 425. He permitted Ezra to return to Judæa, with all who inclined to follow him, Ezra vii. viii. A. M. 3537. Afterwards, Nehemiah also obtained leave to return, and to re-build the walls and gates of Jerusalem, A. M. 3550 (the twentieth year of his reign) Neh. i. 11. From this year, chronologers reckon the beginning of Daniel's seventy weeks, Dan. xi. 29. These are weeks of years, which make 490 years: q. d. after four hundred and ninety years, or seventy weeks of seven years, the Messiah will be put to death, in the middle of the seventieth week. This seventieth week begins at Jesus Christ's baptism, A. M. 4033. His death is the middle of it, i. e. A. M. 4036, and a half. It ended A. M. 4040, which is 490 years after the twentieth of Artaxerxes Longimanus. Dr. Prideaux, who discourses very copiously, and with great learning on this prophecy, maintains, that the decree mentioned in it for restoring and rebuilding Jerusalem, cannot be understood of that granted to Nehemiah, in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes; but of that granted to Ezra, by the same Artaxerxes, in the seventh year of his reign. From thence, to the death of Christ, are exactly four hundred and ninety years, to a month: for in the month Nisan, was the decree granted to Ezra; and, in the middle of the same month, Nisan, Christ suffered; just four hundred and ninety years afterwards. Connect. Part I. b. v.

The Eastern people believe, that this surname was given him by reason of the extent of his dominions, Bibl. Orient. p. 170, as it is commonly said that "princes have long hands;" but the Greeks maintain, Plutarch, in Cimone, Strabo, lib. xv. that this prince really had longer hands [or arms] than usual, and that when he stood upright, he could touch his knees. He is said to have been the handsomest man of his time. The Eastern people call him Bahaman, and surname him Ardschir-diraz-dest; i. e. the long-handed. He was the son of Asfendiar, sixth king of the second dynasty of the Persians. After having extinguished the family of Rostam, which was formidable to him, on account of the great men whereof it was composed, he carried his arms into the western provinces, Mesopotamia and Syria, which were part of his empire. He took the government of Babylon from Belshazzar, son of Nebuchadnezzar, by reason of the ravages committed by his father in Syria, and Palestine; and put Kyresch, by us called Cyrus, in his place.

Some Persian historians assert, that the mother of Artaxerxes was a Jewess, of the tribe of Benjamin, and family of Saul; and that the most beloved of his wives was of the tribe of Judah, and race of Solomon, by Rehoboam, king of Judah; wherefore, it is no wonder he should recommend to Cyrus, who was himself born of a Jewish mother, to favour that nation: which Cyrus performed, by sending the people back into their own country, and permitting them to rebuild their temple. But the truth of this assertion we shall not warrant.

Some have believed this to be the prince who married Esther. Vide DARIUS, son of Hystaspes. Artaxerxes reigned forty-one years, and died A. M. 3572; ante J. C. 428.

III. ARTAXERXES. Ezra thus names the Magus called by Justin, Oropastes; by Herodotus, Smerdis; by Æschylus, Mardus; by Ctesias, Sphendadates. This Magus, after the death of Cambyses, usurped the government of Persia, pretending to be Smerdis, son of Cyrus, whom Cambyses had put to death. This is the Artaxerxes who wrote to his governors beyond the Euphrates, signifying, that having received their advices relating to the Jews, he required them to forbid the Jews from rebuilding Jerusalem. Thus, from A. M. 3483, the Jews did not dare to forward the repairs of the city walls, till 3550; when Nehemiah obtained permission to rebuild them, from Artaxerxes Longimanus, Neh. i. ii.

ARTEMAS, Ἀρτεμᾶς; a good man, one without reproach, holy, agreeable, and handsome.

ARTEMAS, St. Paul's disciple, was sent by the apostle into Crete, in the room of Titus, while Titus continued with St. Paul at Nicopolis, where he passed the winter, Tit. iii. 12. We know nothing particular either of his life or death.

ARVADI, ארדי; fulness of curse; from ארר arar, a curse, and רה ravah: otherwise, that defends, or forbids; from ירד iarad: otherwise, that commands; from רד rud.

ARUBOTH, ארובות, Ἀραβῶθ: cataracts, windows, locusts; from ארבה arubah: otherwise, snares; from ארב areb.

[Perhaps, the Mixers; those who mingle, or unite, persons;—"the match-makers." This name may denote Hymen, the god of marriage; or rather the goddess of marriage, Juno Pronuba. Yet being in the plural form feminine, I suspect it hints at connections less honourable. I would willingly refer it to "the evening goddesses," of which Diana is one, of course: This is one meaning of the Hebrew root: but may it import clefts, caverns, skulking places: for unchaste purposes? Vide ARAB.]

ARUBOTH, or ARABOTH, is thought to be a city or country belonging to Judah, 1 Kings, iv. 10: but the true situation of it is not known.

ARUMAH, otherwise Rumah, a city near Shechem, Judg. ix. 41: here Abimelech encamped.

ARZA, or Arsa, ארצא: the earth; from ארץ eret, or aretz: otherwise, will; from רצה ratzah, to be willing: otherwise, courses, from רץ rutz, to run.

ARZA, governor of Tirzah, formerly the capital of the kingdom of Israel. In the house of Arza, Zimri killed Elah, king of Israel, 1 Kings, xvi. 9. A. M. 3075; ante A. D. 929.

ASA, אסא: physician; cure, according to the Syriac.

ASA, son and successor of Abijam, king of Judah, 1 Kings, xv. 8, & seq. He began to reign A. M. 3049; ante A. D. 955. He reigned forty-one years at Jerusalem. Asa did right in the sight of the Lord: he expelled those who, from sacriligious superstition, prostituted themselves in honour of their false gods; he purged Jerusalem from the infamous practices attending the worship of idols; he deprived his mother of her office, and dignity of queen (vide FRAGMENTS, No. XVI.) because she erected an idol to Astarte: which idol, he burnt in the valley of Hinnom. Scripture, nevertheless, reproaches him with not destroying the high places, which Asa, perhaps, thought it was necessary to tolerate, to avoid the greater evil of idolatry: he carried into the house of the Lord, the gold and silver vessels, which his father, Abijam, had vowed he would consecrate.

Asa fortified several cities, and repaired others, encouraging his people to this labour, while the kingdom was at peace, and the Lord honoured them with his protection. After this, he levied 300,000 men in Judah, armed with shields and pikes; and 280,000 men in Benjamin, armed with shields and bows, all men of courage, and valour. About this time, Zerah, king of Ethiopia (or, Cush, i. e. part of Arabia, vide CUSH III.) marched against Asa with a million million of foot, and 300 chariots of war, and advanced as far as Mareshah: probably in the fifteenth year of Asa's reign. See 2 Chron. xv. 10; A. M. 3064. Asa advanced to meet him, and encamped in the plain of Zephathah (rather Zephalah) near Mareshah. Asa prayed to the Lord, and God terrified Zerah's army by a panic fear; it began to fly, and Asa pursued it to Geran. There was an infinite number slain.

After this, Asa's army returned to Jerusalem, loaded with booty; 2 Chron. xv. 1. The prophet, Azariah met them, and said, "Hear, Asa, and all Judah and Benjamin: The Lord is with you, while ye be with him; and if ye seek him, he will be found of you; but if ye forsake him, he will forsake you: arm yourselves with courage; for your works shall not continue unrewarded," &c.

Asa, after this exhortation, being animated with new courage, destroyed the idols of Judah, Benjamin, and mount Ephraim; repaired the altar of burnt-offerings; and assembled Judah and Benjamin, with many from the tribes of Simeon, Ephraim, and Manasseh, and on the third month, in the fifteenth year of his reign, celebrated a solemn festival. Of the cattle taken from Zerah, they sacrificed 700 oxen, and 7000 sheep; they renewed the covenant with the Lord; they swore to the covenant, the cymbals and trumpets sounding; and declared, that whosoever would not seek the Lord, should be put to death. God gave them peace; and the kingdom of Judah, according to the Chronicles, was quiet till the thirty-fifth year of Asa. [But there are difficulties concerning this year; and it is thought probable, that we should read the twenty-fifth, instead of the thirty-fifth, since Baasha, who made war on Asa, lived no longer than the twenty-sixth year of Asa, 1 Kings, xvi. 8.]

In the thirty-sixth (rather, says CALMET, the twenty-sixth) year of Asa, Baasha, king of Israel, began to fortify Ramah, on the frontiers of the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel, to hinder the Israelites from resorting to the kingdom of Judah, and the temple of the Lord at Jerusalem. Whereupon, Asa sent to Benhadad, king of Damascus, all the gold and silver of his palace, and of the temple, to prevail on him to break his alliance with Baasha, and to insult his territories, that Baasha might be obliged to abandon his design at Ramah. Benhadad accepted Asa's presents, and invaded Baasha's country, where he took several cities belonging to Naphtali. Wherefore Baasha was forced to retire from Ramah, to defend his dominions nearer home. Asa immediately ordered his people to Ramah, carried off all the materials prepared by Baasha, and employed them in building Geba and Mizpah.

At this time, the prophet Hanani came to Asa, and said (2 Chron. xvi. 7.) "Because thou hast relied on the king of Syria, and not on the Lord thy God, herein thou hast done foolishly; therefore, from henceforth, thou shalt have wars." Asa, offended at these reproaches, put the prophet in chains, at the same time, ordering the execution of several persons in Judah. Toward the latter part of his life, he was incommoded with the gout in his feet, and the disorder rising upward, killed him. Scripture reproaches him with having recourse rather to physicians, than to the Lord. He was buried in the sepulchre which he had provided for himself, in the city of David; and, after his death, great quantities of perfumes and spices were placed on the bed, with which his body was burned; then his bones and ashes were collected, and put into his grave. He died A. M. 3090 ante A. D. 913.

ASAHIEL, or Ausheal, אַשְׁחֵאל; works, or creature of God; from אָשָׁה hashah, to make, and אֱלֹהִים God. Son of Zeruiah, and brother to Joab; killed by Abner, at the battle of Gibeon, 2 Sam. iii. 18, 19, &c.

ASAHIAH, or Aushieh, אֲשָׁחִיָּה; a prince, a creature of the Lord; from אָשָׁה hashah, to make, and הָיָה the Lord. Sent by king Josiah, to consult Huldah, the prophetess, concerning the book of the law, found in the temple, 2 Kings, xxii. 14. A. M. 3380; ante A. D. 623.

ASAPH, אֲסָפָה; one that assembles together; otherwise, one that finishes and completes.

I. ASAPH, father of Joab, who was secretary to king Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 20, 31.

II. ASAPH, son of Barachias, of Levi, father of Zaccur, Joseph, Nethaniah, and Asarelah. Asaph was a celebrated musician, in David's time. In the distribution of the Levites, which that prince directed for the service of the temple, he appointed Kohath's family to be placed in the middle, about the altar of burnt-sacrifices; Merari's family to the left; and Gerson's family to the right. Asaph, who was of Gerson's family, presided over this band: his descendants had the same place and rank.

We find several Psalms with Asaph's name prefixed to them, (as the 50th; and the 73rd to the 83rd) whether Asaph composed the words, together with the music, or, David the words, and Asaph the music, or, which some think most probable, some of Asaph's descendants wrote them, and prefixed to them the name of that eminent master of the temple music: or of that division of singers, of which Asaph's family was the head. We observe that all these Psalms do not suit Asaph's time; but were written, some during during the captivity, others in Jehoshaphat's time, &c. "A Psalm for Asaph," might mean a Psalm for Asaph's family.

ASARELAH, אֶסְרֵאלָה; beatitudo, or conduct of God: otherwise, he that regards the oak, or the strong; from אֱלֹהִים allah, an oak, and אֵל el, strong; otherwise, he that beholds God, or the felicity of God.

ASARELAI, fourth son of Asaph, master of the temple music, 1 Chron. xxv. 2.

[ASARMEL, Blessings of the people of God, or, the remain of circumcision, 1 Mach. xiv.

Rather, the restraint or confinement of the cutting off, or circumcision. Perhaps, there was in Jerusalem a house or hospital, where this operation was practised. See SARAMEL.]

ASCENSION of our Lord, a festival celebrated forty days after the Resurrection, in memory of what happened when our Saviour, having conversed with his apostles forty days, led them from Jerusalem to Bethany, and the mount of Olives, about a mile, or two miles, from Jerusalem, (Luke, xxiv. 50); then lifting up his hands, and blessing them, he was raised up to heaven in their sight, Acts, i. 4, &c. Tradition relates, that when he ascended, he left the impressions of his feet on the stones, which have remained there ever since. Sulpit. Sever. lib. ii. cap. 48, Hist. Paulin. Ep. 11. Optat. lib. vi. Aug. in Joan. homil. 47.

Some have added to this miracle, and tell us, that the empress, Helena, having built a magnificent church over this place, in the midst whereof the impressions of our Saviour's feet were seen, this spot never could be paved, though often attempted: whatever was put there to adorn it, immediately removing from it; so that they were forced to leave it as it was. Euseb. vit. Constant. lib. iii. cap. 43. Others add, that no one could close the roof over this place, and that all that space through which Christ ascended up to heaven was left open. Hieronym. seu quis alius in locis Act. Beda, locis SS. cap. 7. [This seems to be merely an allegory, denoting his spiritual opening of the way to glory.] St. Austin, apud Prosper. Sentent. 209, believed that Jesus Christ sanctified noon, by ascending to heaven at that time of the day. The Apostolical Constitutions, lib. v. cap. 19, appoint the festival of the Ascension to be observed on Thursday. This solemnity is so ancient, that its beginning is not known; which has been considered as some reason to believe that it came traditionally from the apostles.

ASENATH, אֶסְנַת; peril, or misfortune: from אָסָה ason. This word is Egyptian; and its root not in the Hebrew.

ASENATH, daughter of Potiphar, and wife of Joseph, Gen. xli. 45. She was mother of Ephraim and Manasseh. It is questioned, whether Asenath be the daughter of the same Potiphar who bought Joseph, and afterwards, being imposed on by his wife, threw him into a dungeon? The Hebrews, cited in Origen, relate, that Asenath discovered to her father, Potiphar, what had passed between Joseph and her mother, and convinced him that his suspicions were entirely groundless. Origen, in Caten. MSS. in nov. edit. Hexapl. Jerom. Abbot Rupert, Tostatus, and some others, are persuaded likewise, that Asenath is the daughter of Potiphar, Joseph's master. Hieronym. Qu. Hebr. vide & Auth. Testamenti XII. Patriarch.

But the generality of the Fathers and expositors are of a contrary opinion; because, first, the name of Potiphar, Joseph's father-in-law, is written with some difference from the name of that Potiphar who bought him, (פֹּטִיפָר, not פֹּטִיפָר); secondly, Scripture not having noticed this as the same Potiphar, is one reason to believe it may be another; thirdly, St. Austin, quest. 136, in Genes. observes, that the character of priest of On, ascribed to Potiphar, Joseph's father-in-law, does not seem consistent with the quality of captain of Pharaoh's guards, which is given to Potiphar, Joseph's master. Fourthly, the city of On is too remote from Tanis, where the king of Egypt kept his court, to suffer the same Potiphar who attended the king in this employment, to reside at On, above fifteen leagues from court. These reasons determine in favour of the opinion that Asenath was not daughter of that Potiphar to whom Joseph was sold. These arguments however, are not without reply. Vide POTIPHAR.

ASEROTH, אֶשְׂרוֹת, Ἀσροθ; Vulgate, Astaroth: a grove dedicated to false gods; from אֶשְׂרָה asherah, a wood, or grove. Vide ASTARTE.

ASHAN, אֶשֶׁן, Ἀσσην; smoke, or that smokes.

[This word also imports rage, or anger: may it denote what in the Greek mythology is intended by the Furies? or, was it a town of smoking furnaces, as the word imports; where some manufacture was carried on which produced smoke in abundance? Might the deity of such a town be Vulcan, the god of blacksmiths? Was fossil coal found hereabouts?]

A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 42; but, perhaps, afterwards yielded to Simeon, Josh. xix. 7. Eusebius says, that, in his time, Beth-Ashan was sixteen miles from Jerusalem, west.

ASHBEL, אֶשְׁבֵּל, Ἀσβελ; fire of old age; from אֵשׁ esh, fire, and בָּלָא balah, to grow old; otherwise, one that consumes and extinguishes himself; from בָּלָא bala, and אִישׁ ish, man. Second son of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 1; Numb. xxvi. 38.

ASHDOD, [Expulsion, exile. A city of the Philistines. Josh. xi. 12. xv. 46. 1 Sam. v. 1. This city city, says Herodotus, lib. ii. 157, sustained the longest siege of any city in the world, against Psammeticus, king of Egypt. Vide Azotus.

Probably, this name imports, "the fire of affliction:" which might be the name of some temple, originally.

Perhaps, the Egyptians might make a lasting settlement in this town. Comp. Nehem. xiii. 24.]

ASHDOTH, אַשְׁדּוֹת; effusion; from אַשְׁד eshod, inclination, leaning: otherwise, a wild open place, or pillage; from שָׁד shod, to pillage, to plunder.

ASHDOTH. This word signifies plains, or springs, or places fruitful and well watered by adjacent springs. A city of this name in the tribe of Reuben, was called Ashdodth-pisgah: because it was seated in the plains at the foot of mount Pisgah: or, at the springs of Pisgah.

[1. A region and city in the tribe of Reuben, Josh. x. 40, "the springs," Eng. Tr.

2. A town of the Amorhites. Josh. xii. 3. xiii. 20.

Rather, ash, fire, Sheduth, the (female) dispensers of it; i. e. "those who shed forth, or diffuse fire," or light. There is no need to prove that this title eminently describes the sun and the moon; perhaps the word ash, in composition, implies the lustre, brilliancy, or illumination, of fire.——Otherwise

Ashdodth may be taken as Sheduth, for effusions of water, or springs; or rather, perhaps, properly for rills, which, falling from some height, form small cascades in their descent, and, dashing in their fall, shed their waters around.]

ASHER, אָשֶׁר; happiness.

I. ASHER, son of Jacob and Zilpah his wife, who had been Leah's servant. We know no particulars of his life or death. Asher had four sons, and one daughter, Gen. xlix. 20; Deut. xxxiii. 24. The inheritance of this tribe lay in a very fruitful country, with Phœnicia west, mount Libanus north, mount Carmel and the tribe of Issachar south, Zebulun and Naphtali east. The tribe of Asher never possessed the whole range of district assigned to it, which extended to Libanus, Syria, and Phœnicia.

II. ASHER, a city between Scythopolis and Shechem; consequently remote from the tribe of Asher. Josh. xvii. 7. [It is stated in the Old Itinerary to Jerusalem, as being between Scythopolis and Neapolis. Reland, Palest. p. 596.]

III. ASHER. Eusebius says, there was a large town of this name between Azoth and Askelon.

ASHES. To repent in sackcloth and ashes, as an external sign of self-affliction for sin, or of suffering under some misfortune; and to sit upon some coarse stuff, or in ashes, are expressions common in Scripture. "I am but dust and ashes," said Abraham to the Lord, Gen. xviii. 27: indicating his deep sense of his own meanness in comparison to God. God threatens to shower down dust and ashes on the lands, instead of rain (Deut. xxviii. 24); thereby to make them barren instead of blessing them, to dry them up, instead of watering them. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CLXXII. Tamar, after the injury she had received from Amnon, covered her head with ashes, 2 Sam. xiii. 19. The Psalmist, in great sorrow, says poetically, "he had eaten ashes, as it were bread," Psalm cii. 9. He sat on ashes, he threw ashes on his head; his food, his bread, was sprinkled with the ashes wherewith he was himself covered: so Jeremiah (Lam. iii. 16) introduces Jerusalem, saying, "the Lord hath fed her with ashes." And Job declares (chap. xxxiv. 15) "that man, who is but dust and ashes, shall turn again to dust."

[Sitting on ashes, or lying down among ashes, was a token of uncommon grief. We find it adopted by Job, chap. ii. 8; by many Jews when in great fear, Esther, iv. 3; and by the king of Nineveh, Jonah iii. 6. He arose from his throne, laid aside his robe, covered himself with sackcloth, and sat in ashes. This token of affliction is illustrated by Homer's description of old Laertes grieving for the absence of his son,— "Sleeping in the apartment where the slaves slept, in the ashes, near the fire:

— οὐδ' ἄνδρες ἐνὶ οὐκῷ,
ἐν κονί, ἀγχι πυρός——

Comp. Jer. vi. 26. "Daughter of my people,—wallow thyself in ashes."]

There was a sort of ley and lustral water, made with the ASHES of the heifer, sacrificed on the great day of expiation; these ashes were distributed to the people, and used in purifications, by sprinkling, to such as had touched a dead body, or had been present at funerals, Numb. xix. 17.

The ancient Persians had a punishment, which consisted in executing certain criminals by stifling them in ashes. Vide Valerius Maximus, lib. ix. cap. 2. Thus, the wicked Menelaus was dispatched, who caused the troubles which had disquieted Judæa, 2 Macc. xiii. 6, 6. He was thrown headlong into a tower, fifty cubits deep, which was filled with ashes to a certain height. The action of the criminal to disengage himself, plunged him still deeper in the whirling ashes; and this agitation was increased by a wheel, which kept the ashes in continual movement, till he was entirely stifled.

ASHIMAH, אֲשִׁימָה; crime; from אָשָׁם asham: otherwise, position; from שָׁם shum, to put; otherwise, otherwise, fire of the sea; from עש esh, and בא am, the sea. This word is foreign to the Hebrew language.

ASHIMAH, a deity adored by the men of Hamath, who were settled in Samaria, 2 Kings xvii. 30. Some of the Rabbins, as Rabbi Solomon, and Kimchi, say, Ashimah had the shape of an ape; others say, that of a lamb, a goat, or a satyr. See Selden, de Diis Syr. Syntagm. ii. cap. 9, § additiones And. Beyr. ibidem. They who think this divinity was an ape, seem to have had regard to the sound of the word Sima, which has some relation to the Greek word for an ape, Simia:

Effigies sacri nitet aurea cercopithæci.

JUVENAL. SAT. x.

but the Hebrews have another word for an ape. Vide Levit. xvii. 7. Both the ape and goat were worshipped in Egypt, and in the East. Diodor. Sicul. lib. i. Basnage, Antiq. Jud. tom. i. p. 190.

Selden being persuaded that the ancient Persians worshipped fire, and imagining Ashimah to signify that element, which the Samaritans likewise adored, instead of Ashimah, chose to read Ashitah, which he explains of the fire of heaven; or Eschiomah, the daily fire, but if he will discover the word fire in Ashimah, it is more natural to say, Esch-schamai, the fire of heaven; according to the following derivation: Ashima אֶשְׁמָה, — Aschita אֶשְׁחִיתָה, — Aschioma אֶשְׁחִימָה, — Esch-Schamai אֶשְׁחִימָה.

Observe, further, these people came from Hamath, or Emesa, a city of Syria, on the river Orontes, and we read, that the sun was adored in this city, under the name of Elah-Gabalah: whence the emperor Heliogabalus took his name. This god, Elagabal, was represented by a large stone, round at bottom, which rising insensibly to a point, terminated in a conic or pyramidal figure, says Herodian. His worship became celebrated at Rome, from the time of Heliogabalus, who caused a magnificent temple to be erected to him. Around this temple were several altars, on which hecatombs of bulls and great quantities of sheep were sacrificed every morning; abundance of excellent wine and spices was poured on the altars: choirs of musicians, and people playing on instruments, surrounded the altar; Phœnician women danced in a circle, playing on cymbals and dulcimers, before the senate and Roman knights. Such was the worship which Heliogabalus appointed to his god, which he brought from Emesa.

The name of Ashimah may very well be understood of fire from heaven, or the sun: or it may be derived from the Persian Asuman. This is the name of an angel, or genius, who, according to the ancient Magi of Persia, presides over the 27th day of every solar month, in the Persian year; which, therefore, is called by the name of this genius. The Magi believe Asuman to be the angel of death, which separates the souls of men from their bodies. The Persians likewise call heaven Asuman, and Suman; which comes pretty near to the Hebrew Schamaim. Bibl. Orient. p. 141, col. 2, Asuman.

ASHKENAZ, אֶשְׁכֶּנֶז: fire that spreads; from עש esh, fire, and נזח nazah, to imbue. [Fire, as it were distilling, or as it were scattering. Gen. x. 3. Jer. li. 27. Spelled ASHCENAZ, in Eng. Tran.

Rather, ash, fire, shacen, inhabiting, or dwelling, otz, strength;—light, or “fire dwelling in its strength.”

The Arabic interpreters of Jeremiah refer Ashkenaz to that part of the Caspian Sea where it is entered by the river Wolga.]

ASHKENAZ, eldest son of Gomer, Gen. x. 3. We conjecture, that he is the father of the Ascantes, a people who dwelt about Tanaïs, and the Palus Mœotis. Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 1.

ASHNAH, אֶשְׁנָה, ‘Asonah, a fire now; from עש esh, fire, and נא na, now; otherwise change; from שנה shannah, to change; otherwise duplicity; from שני sheni, double. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 33.

[Perhaps, “fire of the tooth,” or the tooth of fire, or light, or radiance: meaning, the elephant’s head, employed to mark the august personage who is commemorated under the symbol of lustre, or illuminating fire. This is the regular form of Ganesa, among the Hindoos, at this day: and if, as Sir W. JONES supposed, Ganesa was the Janus of the western mythologists, then, the addition of the idea of fire to his emblem is perfectly appropriate, and marks not only the person thus alluded to, but also, that part of the world wherein he resided. We shall see this idea occur repeatedly in the words compounded of shen, the tooth, or tusk, or horn: i. e. of the elephant. 1 Kings x. 18. Some suppose the idea intended is firmness, stability, hardness. Vide the PLATES: BETH-SHEN: Also CAUCASUS, No. 10.]

ASHPENAZ, אֶשְׁפָּנָז: a quiver; from אשפה ashpah: otherwise interpreter, or astrologer; from אשף ashaph, aspersion, and נזח nazah. This word is Assyrian; its true etymology not in the Hebrew.

ASHPENAZ, intendant, or governor of king Nebuchadnezzar’s eunuchs. He changed the names of Daniel and his companions, Dan. i. 3.

ASHTEMOH, אֶשְׁתֶּמוֹחַ: fire of admiration; from עש esh, fire, and תמה thamah, admiration; or man of admiration or perfection; from תמה thamam, perfection; and איש ish, a man. [Written ЕШТЕМОХ, in Eng. Trans. Josh. xv. 50.]

ASHUATH,

ASHUATH, or Asoth, or Aushut, אשחוט: who makes, or who is made; from אשח hashah, to make: otherwise, moth that consumes garments; from אש hash, a moth, or maggot. Third son of Jephlet, and grandson of Heber, 1 Chron. vii. 33.

ASHUR, אשור, 'Ašûp: brown, black; from שחר shachar: otherwise, fire of whiteness, or fire of the hole or cave; from אש esh, fire, and חור, chur, a cave, or חר char, whiteness: or fire of liberty; from חרר charar, free. 1 Chron. ii. 24. [ASHER. Eng. Tr. father of Tekoa.]

ASHUR, אשור: one that is happy, that walks, that looks; from אש esh, to be happy, to look, to walk, [or goes forward]; meaning, as some suppose, the increase of a family; progression in fertility. Plural ASHURI, ASHURIM: Vide ASSYRIA.

This name seems to resolve itself into ash, "fire," and aurim, "lights;" i. e. "lights of fire." It probably, in this acceptation, denotes, the region where the early beams of the sun first appeared to those among mankind who had travelled westward from Kedem, the original country: q. d. "the land of the day-break." It is remarkable, that one part of Mount Meru, the mountain of the gods (i. e. the fathers of mankind) of the Hindoos, is marked by a bull; [See the PLATES; MEDALS, Emblems of INDIA] which supports our conjecture, that this part might be known as Ai Shur, "the land, or region; of the bull:" in Chaldee, Ai Tur; whence the name Mount Taurus, or Bull-Mount. This is not inconsistent with our derivation above, which is deduced from the formation of the word: since the bull was, among the antients, the symbol of radiating fire, or light; and the image of the bull often occurs with the sun surrounded by rays, on his head. See the PLATES: Mount TAURUS, Nos. 18, 21.

Or if this name be taken as differently compounded: ash, "fire," shurim, "regulators," or, "lords of," it will still refer to the original station of mankind, i. e. Mount Caucasus, where dwelt the personage who was commemorated under the symbol of Apollo, the lord of fire and light. The plural form Shurim, may refer to this deity with his male companion the moon. The following is from Chardin, Trav. p. 350.

"Assyria, is a part of the Upper Armenia. The Persians affirm, that this place was called Azer Beyzan: that is, "the country of fire," by reason of the famous temple of fire which was there erected, where was kept that fire, which the fire-worshippers held to be a god; and because the chief pontiff of that religion resided there. The Guebres are all that are left of the fire-worshippers; they shew this place about two days' journey distant from Shamaki. They assure us for a certain truth, that the sacred fire is still there; that it resembles a mineral and subterranean fire, and that they who repair thither out of devotion, see it in the form of a flame. Nay, they add one particular more, which is a sort of pleasing story: that if you make a hole in the ground, and set a pot over it, that the same fire will cause it to seethe, and boils all that is in the pot." So far Chardin. There is abundant evidence that this is true of lands about Baku; where the principle of Naptha, and its ignition, is abundant. It is still occasionally visited, and worshipped, by Hindoo votaries. The fire appears on the top of a hollow reed, or cane, set in the ground, and ignited.]

ASHUR, son of Shem. He gave name to Assyria. It is believed, that he dwelt originally in the land of Shinar, and about Babylonia; but was compelled by Nimrod to remove from thence, higher, towards the springs of the Tigris, in the province of Assyria, so called from him: here he built Nineveh, Rehoboth, Calah, and Resen. This is the sense generally received from those words of Moses, Gen. x. 11, 12. "Out of that land (Shinar) went forth Ashur, and builded Nineveh," &c.

[For Ashur, the Samaritan reads Asetun, which seems somewhat to approach the Asued or Aswed of the Arab writer, quoted in our FRAGMENTS on the Settlements of Nations: it shews, at least, that the reading Ashur, or Assyria, is not without contrariety.]

But others explain the text differently: understanding it to speak of Nimrod, who left his own country and attacked Assyria, which he overcame, and where he built Nineveh, &c. Here he established the seat of his empire, and became the most powerful, and, probably, the first monarch of the East. The prophet Micah, chap. v. 6, calls Assyria the land of Nimrod. See Bochart, in Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 12.

Suidas, in Thuras, John Malala, p. 20, and Cedrenus, p. 15, relate, that Thuras reigned at Nineveh, after Ninus. He warred against Caucasus, of the race of Japheth, conquered, and killed him. After the death of Thuras, the Assyrians called the planet Mars by his name; and adored him under that of Baal, i. e. the god of war. Daniel speaks of this Baal, as worshipped at Babylon. This we learn from Suidas. It is generally believed, that Thuras and Ashur were the same, [and, perhaps, the name is the same, only transposed] that the Baal of the Assyrians and Babylonians was the founder of their monarchy: but instead of making Thuras the son and successor of Ninus, it should be said, that Ninus was son and successor of Thuras, or Ashur. Herodotus lib. i.

cap,

cap. 95. For, historians all agree in making Ninus a son of Belus, though some confound Ninus with Ashur. But care should be taken to distinguish the old Belus, who is probably the same with Evechoüs, king of Chaldæa, from Belus the Assyrian, father of Ninus. Evechoüs reigned at Babylon 440 years before Belus the Assyrian.

The empire of the Assyrians is thought to be the most ancient in the East. Herodotus, who is generally followed in this matter, says, that Ninus, son of Belus, founded the Assyrian empire; which subsisted 520 years. Usher fixes the beginning of this empire to A. M. 2737, ante A. D. 1267. Ninus was succeeded by his wife Semiramis, who reigned forty-two years. After her, Ninus, her son, reigned thirty-nine years. He is said to have had thirty-six kings, his successors down to Sardanapalus. See Julius Africanus, & Eusebius.

Scripture speaks of the foundation of the Assyrian empire by Nimrod, long before Ninus (Gen. x. 8, 9, 10, 11); i. e. about the time when the tower of Babel was building, A. M. 1757: before the taking of Babylon, by Alexander the Great 1903 years. We find that from this time, the Babylonians made observations on the heavens; and of those sent by Callisthenes to Aristotle, the earliest dated from that period of years. Of Nimrod's successors we are ignorant; we read, Gen. xiv. that in Abraham's time, about A. M. 2092, Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, in confederacy with certain kings, attacked the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the neighbouring cities, which had rebelled. Under the Judges (Judg. iii. 8) about A. M. 2591, the Lord delivered Israel into the hands of Cushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, who oppressed them eight years. Julius Africanus says, that Evechoüs reigned in Chaldæa 224 years before the Arabians, i. e. A. M. 2242, in the time of Isaac. The Arabians conquered the Chaldæan empire, A. M. 2466, and kept it about 216 years, to A. M. 2682. Belus, the Assyrian, succeeded the Arabians fifty-five years before the foundation of the Assyrian empire by Ninus.

Dionysius Halicarnassæus, Antiq. Rom. lib. i. observes very well, that the Assyrian empire was, in the beginning, but of small extent; and what we have said, confirms this, since we see kings of Shinar, Elam, Chaldæa, and Ellasar, at a time when the Assyrian empire, founded by Nimrod must have subsisted; and before Ninus, son of Belus, had founded, or rather aggrandized, the only empire of Assyria known to profane authors; for they had no notice of that established by Nimrod.

During the reigns of David and Solomon, the Assyrian monarchs possessed nothing on this side the Euphrates. David subdued all Syria, without their concerning themselves about it. When he attacked the Ammonites, they sent for succour to the other side of the Euphrates, (2 Sam. x. 16) but David defeated those troops; and even obliged certain people on the other side the river to pay him tribute. The first king of Assyria mentioned in Scripture is the sovereign who reigned at Nineveh, when Jonah went thither, about A. M. 3180. The prophet does not inform us what was his name; but he describes the city as prodigiously large. We learn from 2 Kings xv. 19, and 1 Chron. v. 26, that Pul, king of Assyria, invaded the territories of Israel, under the reign of Menahem. It is conjectured that Pul was the father of Sardanapalus; who began to reign, according to Usher, A. M. 3237, which was the fifth year of Menahem; and Pul's invasion of Israel was in the beginning of Menahem's reign.

The measure of Nineveh's sins being completed, God raised up enemies against Sardanapalus, which obliged him to kill himself. Arbaces, governor of Media, observing with disdain the effeminacy of Sardanapalus's life, which he passed in the most sequestered parts of his court, confederated with Belesis, governor of Babylon, to overthrow the Assyrian power: after several combats, Sardanapalus was constrained to shut himself up in Nineveh; and in the third year of the siege, the Tigris having overthrown the city walls above twenty furlongs in length, Sardanapalus burnt himself in his palace, with his wealth, his eunuchs, and his concubines. The city being taken, Belesis and Arbaces assumed the title of king, and dismembered the ancient empire of the Assyrians, which had lasted from Nimrod, about 2500 years; and from Ninus, son of Belus, about 520 years, Herodot. lib. i. cap. 95. This ancient empire of Assyria still maintained itself with splendor at Nineveh, under young Ninus and his successors. We believe this Ninus to be the Tiglath-pileser mentioned, 2 Kings xv. 29. This prince came to the assistance of Ahaz king of Judah, and defeated and pillaged the kings of Israel and Damascus. Salmaneser succeeded Tiglath-pileser, A. M. 3236, ante J. C. 764. Sennacherib, the successor of Salmaneser, is famous in sacred and profane writings. He was killed by two of his sons, and was succeeded by another son, Esarhaddon; who, after he had reigned some time at Nineveh, took Babylon, and re-united the dismembered empires of Chaldæa and Assyria. Berosus, apud Joseph. Antiq. lib. x. cap. 1. He left the throne to Saosduchinus, who reigned twenty years. This is supposed to be the prince who is named Nebuchodonosor, in Judith. Saosduchinus Saoduchius was succeeded by Sarachus, or Chynaladanus, who reigned twenty-two years.

Nabopolassar, otherwise Nebuchadnezzar, governor of Babylon, and Astyages, otherwise Ahasuerus, son to the king of Media, besieging Nineveh, took the city, and divided the monarchy of the Assyrians. Nabopolassar had Nineveh and Babylon; and Astyages had Media, and the neighbouring provinces. Nabopolassar was father of Nebuchadnezzar, who took Jerusalem: Evilmerodach succeeded him, and Belshazzar succeeded Evilmerodach; after Belshazzar was Darius the Mede. Hitherto we have the authority of Scripture, clearly in respect of Nebuchadnezzar, Evilmerodach, Belshazzar, and Darius the Mede.

But profane authors relate the series of Evilmerodach's successors differently. Megasthenes, apud Euseb. Præpar. lib. ix. cap. 41, says, that Evilmerodach was slain by Neriglissor, his brother-in-law, who reigned four years. He was succeeded by Labassoarachus, who was killed by conspirators, which gave the crown to one of their own number, named Nabonidas, or Nabannidoch, or Labinith. From this last Cyrus conquered Babylon. Berosus, apud Joseph. lib. i. contra Appion, gives almost the same account as Megasthenes. According to him, Neriglissor reigned four years; Laborosardoch nine months; Nabonidas seventeen years. After which Cyrus made himself master of the Chaldean empire, and re-united the empires of Assyria, Chaldæa, and Persia, under one extensive government.

Rather perhaps, "lights of fire," from ash, "fire;" and auri, "lights," i. e. a temple to the worship of fire and light; or, "the reflections of fire." Vide ASSYRIA. ASIA, Asia: muddy, boggy; from the Greek ἄσκιος.

ASIA, the largest continent of the old world. The ancient Hebrews were strangers to the division of the earth into parts, or quarters: we never find the name Asia in any Hebrew book. They seem to have thought, that the continent consisted only of Asia and Africa: the rest of the world, and even, occasionally, Asia Minor, was comprised under the name of the Isles of the Gentiles, Gen. x. 5. We are not acquainted with the true etymology of the word Asia: this name occurs only in the books of the Macca-bees, and in the New Testament. Asia is regarded as that part of the world which has been most favoured. Here the first man was created; here the patriarchs lived; here the law was given; here the greatest and most celebrated monarchies were formed; and from hence the first founders of cities and nations in other parts of the world, conducted their colonies. In Asia Jesus Christ appeared; and here he wrought salvation for mankind; he died, and rose again; and from hence the light of the gospel has been diffused over the world. Laws, arts, sciences, and religions, almost all had their origin in Asia.

[I can hardly bring myself to think, that any people would name the whole land on which they lived, to which they owed all their enjoyments, and which was mountainous at least as much as it was boggy, by a name implying mud. If some spots of this extensive country might deserve that description by their quality, yet the more solid parts must surely be otherwise denoted, and otherwise named. I incline, therefore, to accept the Chaldee import of this word, Ashia, as it occurs Ezra, iv. 12, v. 16, vi. 3. I would not, indeed take it, as is usually done, for foundations, but for continuity, extent: because, in the passage alluded to, the foundations could not be joined, after the walls were set up. In Ezra iv. 12, v. 16, the sense of extended dimensions is equally suitable with that of foundations, perhaps preferable: and Jer. l. 15, the ashiuth are spoken of as fallen down, which is inapplicable to foundations; but the circuit, or extent, or contiguities of walls might fall. Perhaps it means united courses of stones, &c. composing an enclosure. This leads to my idea of the word Asia, as implying the "continuity," the extensive country; in short, THE CONTINENT, in superiority and pre-eminence above all others: and to this idea the natural dimensions, situation, and character of this country eminently agree. It distinguishes this country equally from the minor continent of Africa; and from the islands of the Indian Sea, &c. which we know are large and numerous.]

[II. ASIA is especially taken for Pro-consular ASIA; and this is the province intended in Acts xix. It contained thirteen cities. In a monument yet remaining, erected in honour of Tiberius, who had restored them from the effects of an earthquake, by which they had been ruined, they appear to have been, among others, Magnesia, Temnos, Philadelphia, Egea, Appollonia, Hiero-cæsaræa, Myrina, Cyme, Tmolus. Tacit. Ann. lib. xi. Ephesus is added by Eusebius, in Chron. Pliny tells us, that these were all overthrown in one night, lib. xi. 36. The number he mentions is twelve. Smyrna was, probably, another.]

[III. ASIA is taken for the Eastern part of the Roman Empire—the Romans divided it into Asia cis (or intra) Taurum; and Asia ultra (or extra) Taurum, Liv. xxxvii. 39. Herodotus appears to consider “Hither Asia,” as being within the river Halys, i. 28; so Strabo, xii. init. xvii. fin. So we have medals marked CÆSAR. IMP. VI. ASIA. RECEPTA. the compliment is to Augustus, who included eastern Asia in his Empire; and this reference is to the submission of Asia, after the defeat of Antony. Cicero, Flacc. 27, speaks of Asia as a province, comprehending only the countries along the Propontis and the Egean Sea.

How far this latter Asia may be that intended by the Apostle Peter, 1 Epist. i. l. it is not easy to say: certainly Proconsular Asia is too distant from Cappadocia and Bythynia to be united with them; or with any other province mentioned in his salutation. Not to say, that Proconsular Asia was previously occupied and taught by St. Paul, and afterwards by St. John.]

ASIARCHÆ, Asia Principes, as they are called in the Latin version of the Acts—were high-priests of Asia, chosen somewhat like our stewards of public assemblies, into an office of distinction, to celebrate public and solemn games at their own expence. Vide Grotius and Hammond on Acts xix. 31. These chiefs of Asia, then holding such games at Ephesus, out of friendly consideration for St. Paul, restrained him from appearing, as he proposed, in the theatre, during the sedition raised by Demetrius, the goldsmith, respecting Diana of Ephesus.

Asiarchs were officers of a religious nature, and frequently were priests of the religion whose games they celebrated: thus, in the martyrdom of Polycarp, Philip the Asiarch (a little afterwards called the high-priest) is solicited to let out a lion against Polycarp, which he declares he could not do, because that kind of spectacle was over.

[These ASIARCHS should by no means be confounded with the Archon, or chief magistrate of Ephesus; for they were representatives, not of a single city, but of many cities united. Hence we find on medals and inscriptions the dignity of Bithyniarches; also, Galatarches, Gruter, Inscrip. p. 415, and in our Plate of CRETE No. 10, the Reader will see a Cretarchas (for Cretarches) whose name was Kydas. This name occurs also in Polybius, Livy, and Cicero. The Asiarchs were elected in the following manner. Each of the cities of Asia, about the beginning of their year, which was at the autumnal equinox, held a council, in which a proper person from among their own cities was proposed; these names being transmitted to the general council of Proconsular

Asia, one of them was fixed on. The dignity was great; but the expence also was great; so that only men of wealth could undertake it. Hence we find Aristides exerting himself strenuously to be discharged from this costly office, to which he had been three or four times nominated. This notion of the Asiarchs is confirmed by a medal of Rhodes, struck under Hadrian, on the reverse of which we read “a coin struck in common by thirteen cities, in honour of the Magistrate of Rhodes, Claudio Fronto, ASIARCH and High Priest of the thirteen cities.” Harduin, de Numm. p. 421.

The consideration of these Asiarchs for the Apostle Paul, during the tumult, is not only extremely honourable to his character, and to theirs, but is also a strong confirmation of the remark made by the Evangelist, verse 10, that “all they who dwell in Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks.” It shews also in what light the riot of Demetrius was beheld, since he took special care to observe that all Asia worshipped their Goddess:—yet were the very Asiarchs now engaged in this very worship, intent on securing the man whom Demetrius represented as its most formidable enemy. Though there was, properly speaking, only one Asiarch at a time, yet those who had passed through the office retained the title; for which reason they are mentioned in the plural by the Evangelist.]

ASKELON, אשקלון: weight, or balance; from שָׁקַל shakal: otherwise fire of infamy; from אֵשׁ esh, fire, and קָלֹן kalon, infamy.

[Some think it means a steady settlement; the end of wanderings. It was certainly built by the Philistines, foreigners; and was, says Josephus, de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 2, very strongly fortified. Judges, i. 18. xiv. 19. Jer. xxv. Amos. i. 8. Zephaniah, ii. 4. 1 Sam. vi. 17. Zach. ix.

ASCALONA, the same city, 1 Macc. x.

Rather, ash fire, kel activity, heat, energy; lun, a station; q. “the station of the most active fire,” or light, or radiance of illumination. There can be no doubt that the Semiramis who was worshipped at Askalon, was the same as the Venus of some other places; the medals of that city perfectly agree with this notion: and indeed, it will be found very often, that this goddess, though not accompanied by rays on her image, yet denotes splendor, brilliancy, or warmth: She is accordingly worshipped in India, at this day, with fires and lights; and her name signifies “the fire in the pine-tree.” See the PLATES; MEDALS of ASCALON; also of CRETE.

Ascalon,

Ascalon, in the Samaritan Interpreter, is confounded with Gerar. Gen. xx. 1.

Benjamin of Tudela, says, p. 80. "from Azotus, New Ascalon is distant eight miles. This was built by Ezra, the priest of blessed memory, at the sea shore: and is distant from Old Ascalon four leagues. That Old Ascalon of which Scripture speaks, is distant from Azotus twenty-four miles."

The Rabbins reputed all south of Ascalon to be heathen land: indeed, Ascalon itself was reputed heathen; but some of the grounds about it were considered as being in the land of Israel; and their productions, whether fruits, or corn, were accepted as first fruits. Rab. Nissin, in Gittin. cap. 1. Hieros. Sheviith. fol. 36. 3.

The temple at Ascalon was reckoned among the five most famous temples; which were, that of Bel in Babylon; that of Nebo in Cursi; that of Tiratha in Maphog; [probably Mabog; i. e. Mahabaga of the Hindus,] that of Zeripha in Ascalon; and that of Nishra in Arabia.

The fabulous history attributed to this city, ascends to the highest antiquity, and places its origin in very early ages. It is certain, that it subsisted one thousand five hundred years at least before the Christian Era. We cannot tell whether it coined money before the Greek language was predominant in Palestine: but it is possible, that some of the medals having Phenician characters on them, may determine that point.]

ASKELON, a city in the land of the Philistines, between Azoth and Gaza, on the coast of the Mediterranean; 520 furlongs from Jerusalem. Joseph. de Bell. lib. iii. cap. 1. After the death of Joshua, the tribe of Judah took Askelon; but it became afterwards one of the five governments belonging to the Philistines, Judges i. 18. The ancients praise the shalot, which takes its name from Askelon. (Athen. lib. ii. cap. 28. Plin. lib. xix. cap. 6. Strabo, lib. xvi. alii.) The wine of Askelon is mentioned with applause; and the cypress tree, a shrub much esteemed, was common there. Origen notices wells to be seen at Askelon, said to have been dug by Abraham and Isaac, lib. iii. contra Celsum. Vide & Euseb. Onomast. ad vocem φελαπ. Askelon is often mentioned in the sacred writings: it subsists still, but is inconsiderable. There was near Askelon, a pond, filled with fish, consecrated to the goddess Derceto, of which the people of the country never dared to eat, nor of the pigeons consecrated to the same deity. *Diodor. lib. i. ASMODEUS, אַשְׁמֹדֵי, Ἀσμοδαῖος: one that measures the fire; from שׂא ash, and מָדַד madad, to measure: otherwise, crime abounding, from אַשָׁם asham, crime; or, rather, destroyer, exterminator, from שָׁמַד shamad.

ASMODEUS, the name of an evil spirit, mentioned Tobit vi. 14, which beset Sarah, the daughter of Raguel, and killed her husbands, before Tobias; but was expelled by the smoke arising from the gall of a fish, buried by Tobias, and was bound by the angel Raphael, in the deserts of Upper Egypt. Several curious questions are proposed, concerning this evil spirit, Asmodeus. Some think this name was derived from the Hebrew אַשְׁמֹדֵי Esh-madai, the fire of Media, because he inflamed the people of that country with impure love: others derive it from the Hebrew, schamad, to exterminate, so that by the name Asmodeus אַשְׁמֹדֵי, is denoted the destroying angel.

The Rabbins say, that Asmodeus was born from the incest of Tubal-cain, and Noema, his sister; and that being enamoured of Sarah, the daughter of Raguel, he killed all who approached her, and by the licentiousness of their passion, gave him advantage over them: for which reason, the angel says to Tobias, "They who marry, forget God, and think only of satisfying their passion; upon such as these this evil spirit exercises his power: but for you, rise up both of you, pray to God," &c.

We are of opinion, that the effect of the smoke from the fish's gall, which is said to expel Asmodeus, terminated on the senses of Tobias and Sarah; that it deadened in them the zest of pleasure, and grosser inclinations; and that the chaining up Asmodeus, is an allegorical action, signifying the termination of his incentive powers.

The Rabbins relate, says the Gemara, cód. Gitthim. that the demon, Asmodeus, drove Solomon out of his kingdom, and took his place; but, that Solomon, on his return, dethroned him, and loaded him with fetters: farther, that this prince forced Asmodeus to serve him, in building his temple: that, by some secret, which he learned of this demon, he built it without using iron, or making any noise, according to the expression, 1 Kings vi. 7. He used, they tell us, the stone schamir, which cut stones asunder, as easily as a diamond cuts glass.

[From these Rabbinical tales and allusions, it is evident that the demon Asmodeus is a figurative personage: that, when Solomon was overcome by his attachment to his strange wives, he is said to be under the power of Asmodeus; from which power he is liberated, by his his returning sense of duty, and his repentance. It is, therefore, probable, Asmodeus is the demon of licentious disposition, and is significative to the same purpose in Tobit: as, perhaps, the angel Raphael, is significative of a contrary virtue; or, a dutiful reliance on divine providence. Vide ANGEL; also FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXXI. No. 17. with the observations annexed.]

ASMONEANS, a name given to the Macca-bees, descendants of Mattathias. Authors are not agreed concerning the origin of this term: some, as Drusus, Præfat. in 1 Macc. think it was derived from the town of Assamon, in Judah; whence their family might come. Noldius conjectured, that they took this name from mount Asamon, mentioned by Josephus, de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 28, which he places in the midst of Galilee near Sephoris. Kimchi on Psalm, lxxviii. 32, maintains, that this was a title of honour given to Mattathias, and from him derived to his descendants. Chaschmanim signifies, in Hebrew, Princes. But Josephus's opinion, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 8, is more generally followed: he relates, that Mattathias was the son of John, the grandson of Simon, and great grandson of Asmonæus: also, he seems to make Mattathias come immediately from Asmonæus, De Bello, lib. i. cap. 1; whereas, others make him the son of John, and grandson of Hesenai.

The family of the Asmonæans became very illustrious in the later times of the Hebrew commonwealth; it was the support of the religion and liberty of the Jews; and possessed the supreme authority, from Mattathias to Herod the Great. Vide MACCABEES. It is no where said, whether the Asmonæans were of the race of Jozadeck, in whose family the office of high-priest continued in a lineal descent, till Alcimus was promoted to that dignity. This is certain of the Asmonæans, that they were of the course of Joarib, which was the first class of the sons of Aaron; and, therefore, on failure of the former pontifical family (which had now happened, by the flight of Onias, son of Onias, into Egypt) they had the best right to succeed to that station. And under this right, Jonathan took the office, when nominated to it by the reigning king in Syria; being also elected thereto, by the general suffrage of the people. Præd. Connect. &c. Part II. book iv.

ASNAH, אֲסָנָה: bush; from אֲסָנָה senah: otherwise, misfortune; from אֲסָנָה ason. Ezr. ii. 50. [The Aruch describes this as a species of palm.]

ASNAPPAR, or Asenaphar, אֲסָנָפָר: unhappiness, misfortune of the bull; from אֲסָנָה ason, misfortune, and פָּר par, a bull or calf: otherwise fruitfulness, or increase of danger; from אֲסָנָה ason, danger. An Assyrian name, and not properly derived from the Hebrew.

ASNAPPAR, king of Assyria, who sent the Cuthæans into Israel; Ezra iv. 10. Many think this was Salmanassar, others, with more probability, think it was Esar-haddon.

ASP, a kind of serpent, whose poison is of such rapid operation, that it kills almost instantly as it penetrates; without a possibility of remedy. It is said to be very small. Scripture often mentions it. The most remarkable place is Psalm, lviii. 5, where it is said "to stop its ears, that it may not hear the voice of the charmer." It is affirmed, that this creature stops its ears with its tail, to prevent its hearing. To explain this passage farther:—some are of opinion, that there is a sort of asp really deaf, which is the most dangerous of its kind, and that the psalmist here speaks of this. Vide Bochart, de Animal. Sacr. Part II. lib. iii. cap. 6, and Kimchi. Others think that the asp, becoming old, becomes deaf; as the Rabbins, Salomon, and Kabucnachi; others think that the asp, as well as other serpents, hears exquisitely well; but, that when any one attempts to charm it, it stops its ears, by applying one very close to the earth, and stopping the other with the end of its tail. Aug. Cassiodor. Beda. Isidor. alii. See the LIST OF SERPENTS, and the NATURAL HISTORY, PLATES, &c.

[This expression is, probably, taken from actual observation of nature: that serpents are overcome, as if charmed, so that while they would bite some persons with great violence, they are harmless to others, is a known fact: but the mode of producing this effect, has not yet been communicated to European travellers. A Hottentot told me, that in his country, the naja, or hooded snake, was charmed by a peculiar whistle, which he repeated several times: but from his description of the attitude and situation of the creature, as hiding itself behind rocks, in holes, &c. and putting out its head from its retreat, as if to listen, I could find no charm, strictly so called: the attention of the creature seemed to be excited by the whistled tune, and that instant opportunity taken to knock him on the head; but if there be a kind of asp, over which such a whistle, &c. has no power to excite his attention, but he steadily keeps himself safe within his hole of concealment, this may coincide with the psalmist's idea, and justify the expression used by him. Such a serpent, so hid in the cleft of a rock, may look at his enemy and may preserve himself motionless and secure, notwithstanding every art to entice him from his hiding place.]

asaph: otherwise, to finish, to consume; from ספס saphah. This name is not Hebrew. Esther ix. 7.

ASPHALTUS, Ἀσφάλτος, Ἀσφάρ: eagerness of the bull; from αἶς utz, eagerness, and παρ par, bull or heifer. But rather from the Greek, in which it signifies bitumen.

ASPHALTUS, a kind of bitumen, which rises from the Lacus Asphaltites, or, lake of Sodom. Sometimes large pieces of bitumen float on the waters, at other times smaller pieces, which being collected, are much employed in the preparation of medicines, and particularly, in embalming dead bodies. Joseph. lib. v. de Bello, cap. iv. seu cap. v. in Lat. p. 892.

The asphaltus of the Dead Sea is thought to be the best of any: it rises at particular seasons from the bottom of the lake. The Arabians fish for it diligently, or gather it on the shore, whither the wind drives it. It is shining, dark, heavy, and of a strong smell when burnt.

The lake ASPHALTITES receives all the water of the Jordan, of the brooks Arnon and Jabbok, and others, from the neighbouring mountains; it has no visible issue, yet it does not overflow, [because the evaporation from its surface compensates all these influxes: perhaps, it increases in saltness, as the vapours exhaled consist of fresh water only.] "The land of Sodom, waste and smoking (says the author of the book of Wisdom) with plants bearing fruit that never come to ripeness, and a standing pillar of salt, is a monument [figurative representation] of an unbelieving soul." Vide Sodom.

As the Hebrews call nitre and bitumen—salt, the Dead Sea is called by them—the Salt Sea. Galen says, that its water is not only salt, but bitter; and so strongly impregnated with salt, that if salt be thrown into it, it will scarcely be melted. Galen, lib. iv. de Simpt. medic. Facult. cap. 19. It is called the Dead Sea, because it has been said, no animal lives in it; and, if by chance any fish come into it, they die, and swim on the surface, Jerom, in Ezechiel, xlvii. According to Josephus, the lake of Sodom is 580 furlongs in length, from the mouth of the river Jordan, to Zobar; and 150 furlongs wide.

[It is a mistake to affirm that no fishes live in the Lacus Asphaltites: M. de Chateaubriand says, he heard a noise on the lake, about midnight, which he was assured was occasioned by legions of small fish! Trav. vol. I. p. 411. We learn from Hasselquist and Maundrell, that shells are found on its shores; that birds fly over it in perfect safety; and that the fruit supposed to contain ashes, is a natural production of the vegetable kingdom.

Among other things noticed by the late adventurous traveller, M. Seetzen, who went round the Dead Sea, is the famous apple of Sodom; of which report stated that it had all the appearance of the most inviting apple; but was filled with nauseous and bitter dust, only. It has furnished many moralists with allusions; and also a poet, Milton, in whose infernal regions

A grove sprung up—laden with fair fruit—greedily they pluck'd
The fruitage fair to sight, like that which grew
Near that bituminous lake, where Sodom flam'd;
This more delusive, not the touch, but taste
Deceiv'd; they fondly thinking to allay
Their appetite with gust, instead of fruit
Chew'd bitter ashes, which th' offended taste
With spattering noise rejected:—

Our traveller explains this peculiarity. He says, The information which I have been able to collect on the apples of Sodom (Solanum Sodomaeum) is very contradictory and insufficient; I believe, however, that I can give a very natural explanation of the phenomenon, and that the following remark will lead to it.

While I was at Karrak, at the house of a Greek curate of the town, I saw a sort of cotton, resembling silk, which he used as tinder for his match-lock, as it could not be employed in making cloth.

He told me that it grew in the plains of el-Gôr, to the east of the Dead Sea, on a tree like a fig-tree, called Aoëschaer. The cotton is contained in a fruit resembling the pomegranate; and by making incisions at the root of the tree, a sort of milk is procured, which is recommended to barren women, and is called Lébbin Aoëschaer.

It has struck me that these fruits, being, as they are, without palp, and which are unknown throughout the rest of Palestine, might be the famous apples of Sodom. I suppose, likewise, that the tree which produces it, is a sort of fromager (Bombax Linn.) which can only flourish under the excessive heat of the Dead Sea, and in no other district of Palestine.

This curious subject is further explained, in a note added by M. Seetzen's Editor.

A species of Asclepias, probably the Asclepias Gigantea. The remark of M. Seetzen is corroborated by a traveller, who passed a long time in situations where this plant is very abundant. The same idea occurred to him when he first saw it in 1792, though he did not then know that it existed near the Lake Asphaltites. The umbella, somewhat like a bladder, containing from half a pint to a pint, is of the same colour with the leaves, a bright green, and may be mistaken for an inviting fruit, without much stretch of imagination. That, as well as the other parts, when green, being cut or pressed, yields a milky juice, of a very acrid taste: But in winter, when dry, it contains a yellowish dust, dust, in appearance resembling certain fungi, common in South Britain; but of pungent quality, and said to be particularly injurious to the eyes. The whole so nearly corresponds with the description given by Solinus (Polyhistor), Josephus, and others of the Poma Sodomæ, allowance being made for their extravagant exaggerations, as to leave little doubt on the subject.

The same plant is to be seen on the sandy borders of the Nile, above the first cataracts, the only vegetable production of that barren tract. It is about three feet in height, and the fruit exactly answering the above description, &c.

The downy substance found within the stem, is of too short staple probably for any manufacture, for which its silky delicate texture, and clear whiteness might otherwise be suitable.

* * It serves to stuff pillows, &c.

M. de Chateaubriand gives an analysis of the water of this lake. It is perfectly transparent :

[The Talmudists devote to the sea of Sodom, any thing which they mean to brand with irretrievable cursing. One saith, "he devoted the monies of idolatry into the Salt Sea," or, Sea of Sodom. "Hence," says Lightfoot, "is that allusion, Rev. xx. 14, Death and Hell were cast into the lake of fire,"—meaning, devoted to utter annihilation, and never to be again brought to recollection.

On the western shore of the Asphaltites dwelt the Essenes, says Pliny, lib. v. cap. 17, which Solinus expresses by saying, "The Essenes possess the inner parts of Judea which look to the west."—This, then, was the "wilderness of Judea," and here did John the Baptist make his first appearance.—This certainly favours the opinion that John, whose native town was not far distant, had received his education, and formed his manners, among the Essenes. It should appear that this is the country intended by the phrase, "deserts of Judah," Judges i. 16, into which went the sons of the Kenite, Moses' father-in-law.]

We have the bull in innumerable instances as the symbol of fire, or light: and of the place where fire or light first appeared morning by morning; i. e. to the western world,—Mount Taurus. ASS, an animal, well known for domestic uses; and frequently mentioned in Scripture. People of the best quality in Palestine rode on asses: Deborah, in her song, describes the greatest men in Israel, by "those who ride on white asses," Judg. v. 10. Jair, of Gilead, had thirty sons, who rode on as many asses, and commanded in thirty cities, Judg. x. 4. Abdon, a judge of Israel, had forty sons, and thirty grandsons, who rode on seventy asses, Judg. xii. 14.

[We read Matth. xxi. 4, that in order to accomplish a prophecy of Zechariah, ix. 9, our Saviour rode on an ass into Jerusalem, in a triumphant manner: this has been made a subject of ridicule by some; but we ought to consider, not only that the greatest men in Israel rode on asses anciently, as we have seen above, but, that God had thought fit absolutely to prohibit the use of horses, and of chariots for war, Deut. xvii. 16.—(compare also Josh. xi. 6. Judg. v. 15.)—that David rode on a mule, and ordered Solomon to use it at his coronation, 1 Kings i. 33, 34,—that afterwards, when Solomon and succeeding princes multiplied horses, they were rebuked for it, Isaiah ii. 6, 7. xxxi. 1. Hosea xiv. 3; and—that the removal of horses is promised in the days of the Messiah, Hosea. i. 7. Micah v. 10, 11. Zech. ix. 10. So that on the whole we find, that this action of our Lord is to be viewed in the light of a recurrence to ancient principles; not merely an accomplishment of a prophecy, but a revival of an ancient and venerable Hebrew custom.]

The

The ass was unclean by the law, because it did not chew the cud. To draw with an ox and an ass together, was prohibited, Levit. xi. 26.

In the gospel is mentioned the mola asinaria, (Matth. xviii. 6; Mark, ix. 41) to express a large mill-stone, turned by asses, heavier than that turned by women, or by slaves.

The Jews were accused by the Pagans, of worshipping the head of an ass. Appion, the grammarian, seems to be the author of this slander (Joseph. lib. ii. contra Appion;) he affirmed, that the Jews kept the head of an ass in the sanctuary: that it was discovered there, when Antiochus Epiphanes took the temple, and entered into the most holy place. He added, that one Zabidus having secretly got into the temple, carried off the ass's head, and conveyed it to Dora. Suidas, in Damocrito, & in Juda, says, that Damocritus, or Democritus, the historian, averred that the Jews adored the head of an ass, made of gold; and sacrificed a man to it every three, or every seven years, after having cut him in pieces.

Plutarch, Symposia, lib. iv. cap. 5. and Tacitus, Hist. lib. v. were imposed on by this calumny. They believed, that the Hebrews adored an ass, out of gratitude for the discovery of a fountain, by one of these creatures in the wilderness, at a time when the army of this nation was parched with thirst, and extremely fatigued.

The Heathen imputed the same worship to Christians: audio Christianos, (says Cæcilius, apud Minut.) turpissimæ pecudis asini caput consecratum inepta nescio quam persuasione venerari. Tertullian, Apolog. cap. 16, adds, that certain enemies to the Christians exposed to public view, a picture, wherein was represented a person holding a book in his hand, dressed in a long robe, with asses' ears, and a foot like an ass, which picture was inscribed: "The God of the Christians has an ass's hoof."

Epiphanius, de Hæres. speaking of the Gnostics, says, they taught that the god Sabaoth had the shape of an ass; but that others described him as shaped like a hog. Learned men who have endeavoured to discover the origin of this slander, are divided in their opinions. The reason which Plutarch and Tacitus give for it, would be the most plausible, were any truth in the fact whereon they ground it. But nothing in the history of the Jews can be interpreted to favour the circumstance of the ass supposed to have shown Moses a spring of water. Tanaquil Faber has attempted to prove, that this accusation proceeded from the temple in Egypt, called Onion; as if this name came from Onos, an ass: which is, indeed, very credible. The report of the Jews worshipping an ass, might originate in Egypt; we know, that the Alexandrians hated the Jews, and were much addicted to raillery and defamation: but it was extremely easy for these Alexandrians to have known, that the temple, Onion, at Heliopolis, was named from Onias, high-priest of the Jews, who built it in the reign of Ptolemy Philometer and Cleopatra, A. M. 3854; ante A. D. 150. Vide Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 6. xiv. cap. 14. de Bello, lib. i. cap. 7. vii. cap. 37.

Others have asserted, that the mistake of the Heathen proceeded from an ambiguous mode of reading, as if the Greeks, meaning to say, that the Hebrews adored heaven, Ouranon, might in abbreviation write Ounon; whence the enemies of the Jews concluded that they worshipped onos, an ass. Or, perhaps, reading in Latin authors, that they worshipped heaven,

(Nil præter nubes, et cæli numen adorant,)

Juv. Sat. xiv. 99.

instead of cælum, they read cillum, an ass; and so reported that the Jews adored this animal. Something of this we perceive in Petronius—

Judeus licet & porcinum numen adoret, Et cilli summas advocet auriculas,

where the common reading is cæli, but corrected cilli, κίλλος, whence ὄνος, an ass. Bochart, de Animal. Sacr. lib. ii. cap. 18, is of opinion, that the error arose from an expression of scripture, Isaiah i. 20, xl. 5, lviii. 14, "The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it;" in the Hebrew, Pi-Jehovah, or Pi-Jeo. Now, in the Egyptian language, pieo signifies an ass; the Alexandrian Egyptians hearing the Jews often pronounce this word pieo, believed that they called on their god; and thence inferred, that they adored an ass. These explications are ingenious, but not solid.—It is probable, that no one will ever be able to give a good reason for this accusation, [which, perhaps, might arise from a joke, or from accident.] M. Le Moine seems to have succeeded best, who says, that in all probability the golden urn containing the manna, which was preserved in the sanctuary, was taken for the head of an ass; and that the omer of manna might have been confounded with the Hebrew, hamor, which signifies an ass. Vide ASSARON, and FRAGMENT "On the Shew Bread Table." No. CCXXVIII.

BALAAM'S ASS. The reader, in the article BALAAM, may see some account of his ass. Here I shall only enquire, whether it were a reality, or an allegory; an imagination, or a vision of Balaam? St. Austin, qu. 48 & 50, in Genes. with the greater number of commentators,

tors, supposes it was a certain fact, and takes it literally. He discovers nothing in the whole relation more surprising than the stupidity of Balaam, who heard his ass speak to him, and who replied to it, as to a reasonable person: He is of opinion, that this diviner was accustomed to prodigies like this, talibus monstribus assuetus; or, that he was strangely blinded by avarice, not to be stopped by so extraordinary an event. He adds, as his opinion, that God did not give the ass a reasonable soul, but permitted it to pronounce certain words, to reprove the prophet's covetousness.

St. Gregory, of Nyssa, in vita Moysis, seems to think, that the ass did not utter words, but that having brayed as usual, or a little more than usual, the diviner, practised in drawing presages from the voices of beasts, and of birds, easily comprehended the meaning of the ass; and that Moses, designing to ridicule this superstitious art of augury, relates the matter as if the ass really spoke articulately. [But see 2 Peter ii. 16.]

Maimonides asserts this whole dialogue to be but a kind of fiction and allegory; whereby Moses relates what passed only in Balaam's imagination, as a piece of real history: and Philo, in his life of Moses, suppresses it intirely. Indeed, the major part of the Jewish authors consider it, not as an occurrence which actually did happen, but as a vision, or &c.

Le Clerc, in Numb. xxii. 28, solves the difficulty, how Balaam answered his beast, as if it were not only reasonable, but had the use of speech, by saying, Balaam believed the transmigration of souls, passing from one body into another, from a man into a beast, reciprocally: and, therefore, was not surprized at the ass's complaint, but conversed with it, as if it were rational.

Others have imagined different ways of solving the difficulties of this history.

[There is yet to be considered whether the ass uttered sounds, which, by the power of the angel then present, were conveyed to Balaam as combined into distinct words, though not such when they quitted the ass's mouth: in this case the miracle lay in the words; or the combination of sounds in the air: or, whether the miracle lay in the ears of Balaam, who heard as combined into articulate words, sounds which the ass uttered without consciousness of her speaking, or any verbal sense meant, or understood by her, the ass, beyond her ordinary braying, or those utterances whereby she had formerly been accustomed to express her complaints.

I think we may assume as facts, (1) that Balaam was accustomed to augury and presages; (2) that on this occasion he would notice every event capable of such interpretation, as presages were supposed to indicate. (3) That he was deeply intent on the issue of his journey. (4) That the whole of his conduct towards Balak was calculated to represent himself as an extraordinary personage. (5) That the behaviour of the ass did actually PREFIGURE the conduct of Balaam, in the three particulars of it which are recorded. First, the ass turned aside, and went into the field; for which she was smitten, punished, reprov'd: so Balaam, on the first of his perverse attempts to curse Israel, was, as it were smitten, reprov'd, punished, 1, by God, 2, by Balak. The second time the ass was more harshly treated for hurting Balaam's foot against the wall: so Balaam for his second attempt was no doubt still further mortified. Thirdly, the ass, seeing inevitable danger, fell down and was smitten severely; in like manner Balaam, the third time was overruled by God, to speak truth, to his own disgrace; and escaped, not without hazard of his life, from the anger of Balak. Nevertheless, as Balaam had no sword in his hand, though he wished for one, with which to slay his ass, so Balak, notwithstanding his fury, and his seeming inclination, had no power to destroy Balaam. In short, as the ass was opposed by the angel, but was driven forward by Balaam, so Balaam was opposed by God, but was driven forward by Balak, against his better knowledge. Were we sure that Balaam wrote this story, and that Moses copied his narrative, as the Rabbins affirm, (vide BALAAM) this view of the subject would remove the difficulties which have been raised about it. It might then be entitled "a specimen of Balaam's augury."

As to the notion of such an insertion,—is there not a similar one in the Mosaic narrative? Numb. xxi. 27: et. al.]

ASS, Wild, an animal formerly well known in the East, and frequently mentioned in Scripture. It lives in deserts, and is jealous of its liberty. It can hardly endure thirst; goes in herds, of which a great part is composed of females, Job xi. 12; xxxix. 5; Jer. xiv. 6; Psalm ciii. 12. Josephus relates, that Herod the Great killed forty at one hunting, de Bello lib. i. cap. 16. See the PLATES: also the FRAGMENT on this subject.

Ludolph observes that, the name zecora, by which the Africans call the zebra, is much the same with that of zechora, which Deborah mentions the she-asses used by the great men of Israel for riding. She seems to intimate, that these animals were of service in war; and there are asses still in the East, so trained. [But the zebra is not known in the North of Africa; nor nor have we any proof that the ancients were acquainted with it.]

ASSARON, or Omer, a measure of capacity, used by the Hebrews: the tenth part of an ephah, as its name denotes; for it signifies tenth, Exod. xvi. 16. It contained five pints. The assaron was the measure of manna, which God appointed for every Israelite. Assaron, and το δέκατον, signify the same as omer. Josephus, lib. iii. calls it ἑσάρων. In the Hebrew, instead of omer, assarith is often used. Josephus, lib. iii. says, that in the time of Claudius, an assaron or omer of meal, was sold for four drachmæ; i. e. about eight shillings a peck; but this was in a time of dearth. Arbuthnot's "Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights and Measures," &c. p. 101.

ASSEMOM, Asemona, Asemon, Azmon, Hashmonah, or Jeshimon: a city in the wilderness of Maon, south of Judah, 1 Sam. xxiii. 25; Josh. xv. 4. Likewise, an encampment of Israel in the desert. Azmon was the nearest city to Egypt, south. Numb. xxxiii. 29; xxxiv. 4, 5.

ASSIDÆANS, חסידים, Ἀσιδᾶες: merciful, pious, religious; from חסד chesed, piety.

ASSIDÆANS, 1 Macc. ii. 42; vii. 13. Some think this term comes from the Hebrew, חסידים, chasidim, merciful, pious. Ecclesiasticus xlv. 10, praising the greatest men of his nation, calls them merciful men; which is equivalent to Assidæans, taken in this sense. Others maintain, that the Assidæans are the same as the Essenians, whose manner of living is so much commended by Josephus, Philo, Pliny, and others.—This opinion seems confirmed by 1. Macc. vii. 13, which calls the Essenians—Asdanim. Others have thought the Assidæans were afterwards divided, and produced the Sadducees and Pharisees. The name of Sadducees, signifies just; that of Pharisees, separated; to indicate their distinction above other Jews, by their justice and sanctity.

The members of the Jewish church, after the captivity, were divided into—the Zadikim, or righteous, who observed only the written law of Moses; and—the Chasidim, or pious, who superadded the constitutions and traditions of the elders. These Chasidim were the Assidæans, or Chassidæans, here mentioned; the Hebrew cheth, answering to our ch, is expressed sometimes in Greek, by an aspirate; in Latin sometimes by an h; and sometimes is entirely omitted, as in Assidæans. Prid. Connect. &c. Part II. book iii.

Scaliger supposed the Assidæans were a confraternity of Jews, whose principal devotion consisted in keeping up the edifices belonging to the temple; and who, not content with paying the common tribute of half a shekel a head, appointed for temple reparations, voluntarily imposed on themselves other taxes. They swore by the temple: every day, except the eleventh of Tizri, they offered a lamb in sacrifice, which was called the sin-offering of the Assidæans: and from this sect sprung the Pharisees, who produced the Essenians. 1. Macc. ii. 42, represents the Assidæans as a numerous sect, distinguished for valour, and zeal: "A company of Assidæans, who were mighty men of Israel, even all such as were voluntarily devoted unto the law."

ASSIR, אסיר, prisoner, fettered; or, according to the Syriac, hindered, forbid.

I. ASSIR, son of Jeconiah, king of Judah, 1 Chr. iii. 17. Assir is brother of Salathiel, in St. Mathew's genealogy of Jesus.

II. ASSIR, son of Korah, a levite, 1 Chron. vi. 22; Exod. vi. 24.

ASSOS, Ἄσσυ: approach; from ἄσσοι, near, approaching.

ASSOS, a maritime city, by some geographers described as belonging to Mysia, by others to Troas. St. Luke, and others, went by sea from Troas to Assos; but St. Paul went by land thither, and meeting them at Assos, they went together to Mitylene, Acts xx. 13, 14; A. D. 56. [There were many cities of this name.

1. A maritime city in Lycia.

2. Another in the territory of Eolis.

3. Another in Mysia.

4. Another in Lydia.

5. Another in Epirus Minor, the native country of Cleanthis the philosopher, which also was called Apollonia, as Pliny says, lib. v. cap. 30.

To this last city, St. Paul sailed, Acts xx. 13. it was between Troas and Mitylene, therefore in the district of Troas; and is marked accordingly in the maps. I do not at present perceive any other Assos mentioned in the Acts.

Strabo says, that the luxurious kings of Persia, had the grain of which their bread was made, brought from Assos, the wine which they drank, from Syria, and the water which they drank, from the river Ulaeus. I presume, this need not be taken literally: the import of the phrase being, that their power extended over these places; and that they received tribute from them.]

ASSYRIA, see ASHUR, ASHURIM.

ASTAROTH, or Aushterut, עשתרות: flocks, or sheep; from עשתר ashtar: otherwise riches, because flocks were the wealth of their owners: otherwise, line of the law; from עש ash, a line, and תורה torah, the law: otherwise, he that makes enquiry: from עשה hashah, to make, and ערר thar, an enquiry. [Rather, aushter for ash, "fire:" taruth, "revolvers:" revolvers who shine with fire; or, "the fiery revolvers."

As this name is plural, it may, though feminine, refer to both sun and moon; and may include the planets also. Indeed, we find the sun, moon, and stars, on the same medal; and pretty frequently, on gems, especially, the moon and seven stars, meaning no doubt, the planets, as the most conspicuous of the heavenly bodies. But if the plural form be used for the purpose of intensity, then the sun is the primary object alluded to.]

I. ASTAROTH, Astaroth-Carnaïm, or Carenaïm, or Carnea, a city beyond Jordan, six miles from Adraa, or Edraï, between that city and Abila. There were two places named Astaroth, in the Batanæa, nine miles from each other, between Abila and Adraa. There was, also, a Carnaïm, as Eusebius says, not far from Jerusalem.

Astaroth-Carnaïm is supposed to be derived from the goddess Astarte (adored there) who was figured with horns, or a crescent: for car-naïm signifies horns; and the goddess Astarte was the most celebrated deity of the Phœnicians. Lucian, de Deâ Syr. thinks Astarte to be the moon: 'Ἀστάρτην δ' ἐγὼ δοκίω σελήνην αἰμεῖναι. Her image was that of a woman with the head of an ox. See the Plate of ASHTAROTH, Nos. 12, 13, 14. and BAAL, Nos. 1, 2.

Syderum Regiua bicornis.—Horn.

She was goddess of the woods, the moon, the queen of heaven, the celestial goddess, celestial Venus, or the goddess of Syria, or Venus the Syrian, wife of Adonis. St. Austin assures us, that Juno was called Astarte, by the Carthaginians. In all probability, Astarte was the same as the Isis of Egypt, who also was represented with the head of an ox, or with horns on her head. 2 Macc. xii. 26, mentions a temple of the goddess Atargatis, in Carnion. Atargatis was the same as Derceto, of Askelon, represented as a woman with the lower parts of a fish; called by the Hebrews, Dagon, or the god fish. Vide DAGON; and FRAGMENT, No. CXLV. also the PLATES; SUCCOTH BENOTH, No. 8.

[See more on this subject in Selden, de Dis Syr. Synt. ii. cap. 2; and Grotius, on Judges ii. 13; also, in Huet, Demonstr. Evang. Prop. iv. cap. 10. sect. iii. Astarte is thought by some to be the 'H Baal mentioned in the Septuagint, Tob. i. 5. ἵθουν τῇ Βαὺλ τῇ Δαμάλες: "They sacrificed to She-Baal the cow;" the sun and moon being represented anciently under that figure. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CVIII.—The Cow of Plenty of the Hindoos?]

ASTARTE, or Astaroth, a Phœnician goddess. In Scripture, this word is often plural, Astaroth; which signifies properly—flocks, of sheep, or goats, עֲשֵׂרֹת, Deut. xii. 13. Sometimes, אֲשֵׁרָה aserah, the grove; אֲשֵׁרֹת aseroth, or אֲשֵׁרִים aserim, woods; groves were her temples: in groves, consecrated to her, such lasciviousness was committed, as rendered her worship infamous. She was, also, called the queen of heaven; and sometimes her worship is described by that of the host of heaven. She is almost always joined with Baal, and is called gods: Scripture having no particular word for expressing a goddess.

Temples of the moon generally accompanied those of the sun; and while bloody sacrifices, or human victims were offered to Baal, bread, liquors, and perfumes were presented to Astarte; tables were prepared for her on the flat terrace roofs of houses, near gates, in porches, and at cross-ways, on the first day of every month; which the Greeks called Iecate's supper.

St. Jerom, in several places, translates the name Astarte, by Priapus, as if to denote the licentiousness committed in her groves. The Eastern people, in many places, worshipped the moon, as a god; represented its figure with a beard, and in armour. The statue in the temple of Heliopolis, in Syria, was that of a woman, clothed like a man, says Pliny, lib. v. cap. 23. Solomon, seduced by his foreign wives, introduced the worship of Astarte into Israel; but Jezebel, daughter to the king of Tyre, and wife to Ahab, principally established her worship.

[For instances of the bearded moon, clad also in arms, see the PLATES: PARTHIA, and MISCELLANIES, Plate II. Nos. 11, 12, 13. FRAGMENT No. CCLXXXII.]

St. Austin, qu. 16. in Judic. assures us, that the Africans (descendants from the Phœnicians) maintained, Astarte to be Juno: Juno sine dubitatione ab illis (Pœnis) Astarte vocatur. But, Herodian, lib. v. says the Carthaginians call the heavenly goddess, the moon, Astroarche. The Phœnicians asserted confidently, says Cicero, lib. iii. de Nat. Deorum, that their Astarte was the Syrian Venus, born at Tyre, and wife to Adonis; very different from the Venus of Cyprus. Lucian, who wrote particularly concerning the goddess of Syria (Astarte) says expressly, that she is the moon, and no other; and it is indubitable, that this luminary was worshipped under different names in the East.

The manner of representing Astarte on medals, is not always the same. Sometimes she is in a long habit; at other times, in a short habit; sometimes holding a long stick, with a cross on its top: sometimes she has a crown of rays; sometimes she is crowned with battlements; or by a victory. In a medal of Cæsarea Palestine, Palestine, she is in a short dress, crowned with battlements, with a man's head in her right hand, and a staff in her left. This is believed to be the man's head, mentioned by Lucian, which was every year brought from Egypt to Biblos, a city of Phœnicia. Vide ADONIS. Sanchoniathon says, she was represented with a cow's head, the horns describing royalty, and the lunar rays. Vide FRAGMENT of "ASH-TAROTH." See also the PLATES: CÆSAREA PALESTINA, Nos. 4, 5; SIDON, No. 12; and SHIPS, Plate V. No. 6.

ASTYAGES, Ἀστύαγης: the chief, or captain of the city; from ἄστυ, a city, and ἄγῳρω, head, captain. This is a Persian name; its true etymology occurs neither in Greek nor in Hebrew.

I. ASTYAGES, otherwise Cyaxares, king of the Medes, successor to Phraortes, reigned forty years, died A. M. 3409; ante A. D. 595. He had a son, called Astyages, otherwise, Darius; and two daughters, Mandane and Amyit. For Astyages (or Darius) otherwise Ahasuerus, see the following article. Amyit married Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabopolassar, king of Chaldaea, and was mother of Evil-merodach. Mandane married Cambyses the Persian; and was mother of Cyrus.

II. ASTYAGES, otherwise Ahasuerus, Tobit, ult. v. Gr. Dan. ix. 1; or, Artaxerxes, Dan. vi. 1. Gr.; or, Darius the Mede, Dan. v. 31; and, Cyaxares (by his father's name) in Xenophon; or, Apandax, in Ctesias. This Astyages was, by his father, Cyaxares, appointed governor of Media, and sent with Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, against Saracus (or, Chyniladanus) king of Assyria: these two princes besieged Saracus, in Nineveh; took that city, and dismembered the Assyrian empire. Alex. Polyhistor. apud Cedren. Astyages was with Cyrus, at the conquest of Babylon, and succeeded Belshazzar, king of Babylon, vide Dan. v. 30, 31, A. M. 3447. Cyrus succeeded him 3456, Dan. xiii. 65. See Isai. xiii. xiv. xxi. xlv. xlvii.; Jerem. i. li. Megasth. apud Euseb. Præp. lib. v. cap. 41.

ASYLUM, Gr. Ἀσύλον, from α and σῶλη, prey; q. prey not; which is deduced from ashel, אֶשֶׁל an oak, or, sacred grove of oaks. This word signifies a sanctuary, whither unfortunate persons might retire, for security from their enemies; and from whence they could not be forced. It has been supposed, that Hercules's grandsons were the institutors of these places of refuge [as, perhaps, they were in Greece, if not in Europe]; for, apprehending the resentment of those whom Hercules had ill-treated, they appointed an asylum, or temple of Mercy, at Athens: Cadmus erected another at Thebes; and, Romulus another at Rome, on mount Palatine. That of Daphne, near Antioch, was very famous; hither Onias III. high-priest of the Jews, retired, and thought himself safe; but being fraudulently persuaded to quit it, was immediately killed. 2 Macc. iv. 34.

The altar of burnt sacrifices, and the temple at Jerusalem, were sanctuaries. Hither Joab retired, 1 Kings ii. 28, 29, 31; but, Solomon observing that he would not quit the altar, ordered him to be killed there. Moses commands, Exod. xxi. 14, that any who had committed murder, and fled for protection to the altar, should be dragged from thence. Sanctuaries are not for the advantage of wicked men, as even prophane authors acknowledge; but in favour of the innocent, when attacked unjustly. Demosthen. Ep. 3, de Lycurgi liberis. When villains retired to the sanctuary of a temple, they were either starved there, or were forced from thence, by fires kindled around them. The cities of refuge were sanctuaries (asylums) appointed in the land of Israel, by God, in favour of those who had committed involuntary murder. Vide REFUGE, CITY OF REFUGE.

["The temple of Diana, at Ephesus, had the largest asylum, or place of refuge, that ever we read of, belonging to any temple. Strabo tells us (lib. xiv. cap. 41), Alexander the Great extended it to a whole stadium all round it, or one hundred and twenty-five geometrical paces. Mithridates stretched it to the distance an arrow could fly, shot from the corner of the top of the temple, which is something farther. Mark Antony enlarged it still more, and took into it part of the city. The ill consequences of such an immunity appeared presently to be, in effect, the putting the city intirely in the power of villains and robbers. Augustus took away that enlargement which Mark Antony had made. But Tiberius, at last, seeing the manifest abuse of these asylums, abolished them all without exception." MONTFAUCON, Antiq. Expt. Vol. I. Supp.]

ASYNCRITUS, Ἀσύγκριτος: incomparable. Rom. xvi. 14. The Greeks make him bishop of Hyrcania, and place his festival April 8; as do the Latins.

ATABYRIUS MONS. Vide Mount TABOR. On this mountain was a city, called Atabyrium, or Ithaburium, mentioned by Polybius, lib. i. p. 413. There are medals, representing Jupiter Atabyrius. But there were several cities of this name.

ATAD, תַּד: a thorn, [a bramble-bush; the blackberry of our country. Vide NAT. HIST. in loc. From a like origin many towns had their appellations; as Acanthus, in Thrace, Crete, and Egypt: Rubus, in Campania, &c.]

ATAD.

ATAD. Atad's threshing-floor, Gen. i. 11; גֵּרַם אֲסַר. Here the sons of Jacob, and the Egyptians who accompanied them, mourned for Jacob: whence it was afterwards called Abel-Mizraim, "the mourning of the Egyptians." Some place it beyond Jordan; but others, on this side the river. St. Jerom in Atad, fixes it between the Jordan and Jericho, two miles from the river, and three from Jericho; where, afterwards, Beth-agla was built. Procopius, of Gaza, on Gen. i, does the same. Those who place it east of Jordan, seem to mistake Jerom's words, who says, that Abel-mizraim, or the mourning of the Egyptians, or the threshing-floor of Atad, is beyond Jordan; by the words beyond Jordan, meaning with respect to those who came from Egypt; in regard to whom the threshing-floor of Atad is beyond that river, supposing they entered the land of Canaan the same way as the Israelites did.

ATARAII, or Authreh, עֶשְׂרָה: a crown. Wife of Jerahmeel, and mother of Onam, 1 Chron. ii. 26.

ATAROTH, or Autherut, עֶשְׂרֹת: crowns. The plural of Atarah, [or the reed of intoxication, or saturation: otherwise, from the Hebrew and Syriac, the counsel of intoxication, or repletion.

Rather, circlets, or diadems, simply. I suppose a female image whose head was surrounded by an ornament of double circlets. Compare the following article.]

ATAROTH. There are several cities of this name: one in the tribe of Gad, beyond Jordan, Numb. xxxii. 3, 34; the same, probably, with Atroth-Shophan, given to this tribe, verse 35; another on the frontiers of Ephraim, between Janohah and Jericho, Josh. xvi. 7: probably Ataroth-Addar, Josh. xvi. 5; xviii. 13.

ATAROTH-ADDER, or Autherut-adar, עֶשְׂרֹת-אָדָר: crowns of magnificence, or of the robe: from אָדָר, and ataroth. [Josh. xvi. 5, xviii. 13. I rather think, "the circlets of magnificence" or splendor; analagous to the rays around the head of Apollo, which may be seen on the Plates; THYATIRA, No. 29: and especially on medals of Rhodes. Whether this was usually a male or female image does not appear. It might be either; as deities were of no sex, properly speaking.

[I presume this Athar is rather a diadem than a crown, i. e. a circle or band, whether of muslin, embroidery, gold, or &c. which encircles the head of a prince, as a token of dignity. Compare FRAGMENT on Solomon's Song, No. 382. The word adar, or adir, signifies magnificent, illustrious, glorious. As Ataroth has a dual form, probably, a double circle of rays on the head of the image, (or, were there two images?) distinguished the deity of this place, gave name to the temple, and eventually, to the town, &c.

1. Ataroth, a city of the Gadites, Numb. xxxii. 3, 34. Also, verse 35.

2. Ataroth Shophan: Atroth, Eng. Tr.

3. Ataroth Adar, in Ephraim, Josh. xvi. 5, xviii. 13.

4. Ataroth Beth Joab, in Judah, 1 Chron. ii. 54. Probably some of these cities took their second name from their founder, or builder.]

ATER, אֲסַר, inclosed, shut up. His children, to the number of ninety-eight, returned from Babylon, Ezra. ii. 16.

ATHACH, or Authek, עֵתֶךְ: your hour, your time; from עֵת heth, time, and the feminine pronoun הָ ec, your's; [rather, from the Arabic root, which signifies going down to a place; the descent, or continued way down: a city in the tribe of Judah.] 1 Sam. xxx. 30.

ATHAJAH, עֵתָה, 'Aḥā: the time of the Lord; from עֵת heth, time, and יה jah, the Lord. Son of Uzziah, Nehem. xi. 4.

ATHALIAH, עֵתֶלְיָה, Ἐθελία: the time of the Lord; from עֵת heth, time, and יה jah, the Lord.

1. ATHALIAH, daughter of Ahab, king of Samaria, and wife to Joram, king of Judah. Being informed that Jehu had slain her son, Abaziah, and forty-two princes of his family, she resolved to massacre all the princes of the blood royal of Judah, that she might ascend the throne without a rival, 2 Kings xi. 1, 2, &c.: but Jehosheba, daughter of king Joram, and sister to king Abaziah, took Joash, son of Ahaziah, with his nurse, and privately recovered him from the slaughter of the king's children. Six years was he supported secretly, with his nurse, in the temple; in the seventh year, the high-priest Jehoida determined to place him on the throne of his ancestors; which he accomplished amid the acclamations of the multitude.

Athaliah hearing the noise, entered the temple; seeing the young king seated on his throne, she tore her clothes, and cried "Treason! Treason!" Jehoida commanded the Levites, who were armed, to carry her without the inclosure of the temple, and if any followed her, to put him to death: they dragged her by the way of the horse-gate, near the palace, where she was slain, A. M. 3126; ante A. D. 878. She had reigned six years.

II. ATHALIAH, of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 26. ATHAR: עֵתֶר, prayer, supplication. [Ether. Eng. Tr. Intreaty, or deprecation. Simon thinks abundance, abounding.]

ATHAR, a city of Simeon, Josh. xv. 42, xix. 7. St. Jerom. speaks of Atharus, four miles north from Sebast, or Samaria; but this is too remote from the tribe of Simeon. It is CALMET's opinion, that Athar is the Ether, or Jether, first given to Judah, afterwards to Simeon. Ethar and Asan are connected, Josh. xv. 42; as are Athar and Asan, Josh. xix. 7. Ether, or Jether, or Pethira, was, in the times of Eusebius and St. Jerom, a large town, eighteen miles from Eleutheropolis, in the south of Judah. Euseb. & Hieronym. in Jether & Ether. See the comments on 1 Sam. xxx. 27; Josh. xv. 42, 43, 47; xix. 7.

ATHENOBIOUS, Ἀθηνοβίος: the bow of Minerva; from Ἀθήνα, Minerva, and βίος, a bow.

ATHENOBIOUS, son of Demetrius, was sent by Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, to summon Simon Maccabæus to surrender Joppa, Gazara, and the fortress of Jerusalem, and to pay him tribute, &c. Vide ANTIOCHUS SIDETES.

ATHENS, Ἀθήναι: from Athene, or Athenaia, Minerva; [q. "Minerva's city."]

ATHENS, a celebrated city of Greece, some time a very powerful commonwealth, distinguished by the military talents, but still more by the learning, eloquence, and politeness of its inhabitants. St. Paul coming hither, Anno J. C. 52, found it plunged in idolatry, occupied in enquiring and reporting news; curious to know every thing; and divided in opinion concerning religion and happiness, Acts xvii. The Apostle, taking opportunities to preach Jesus Christ, was brought before the judges of the Areopagus; where he gave an illustrious testimony to truth, and a remarkable instance of powerful reasoning. Vide AREOPAGUS.

[The history of Athens is connected with the remotest periods of antiquity: for the name Athene, applied to Minerva, appears to have originated very early. We learn, that the Acropolis, or citadel, was the original city, and was named Cecropia, from Cecrops, its first king. This was also called Polis, the city, by way of eminence. The citadel was adorned with numerous edifices, the most striking of which was the (Virginian) Parthenion, a temple of Minerva. The most antient was destroyed by the Persians; Pericles built its successor, and it still remains, though in a damaged state, a model of magnificence of the Doric order. Another famous temple was that of Minerva and Neptune, in which was a miraculous fountain of salt water, said to have been produced by Neptune, with a stroke of his trident; also, the no less miraculous olive tree, produced by Minerva, as a superior blessing: with her image, which fell down from heaven, in the reign of Erichthonius. The lower city had thirteen gates; and joined the three sea ports, by walls five miles in length. The principal buildings were, the temple of Theseus, which yet remains almost entire; that of Olympian Jupiter; the Pantheon, in parts of which were stoai, or porticos, wherein certain philosophers taught, and were from thence denominated Stoics: The Propylea, or entrance to the Acropolis, which was a majestic fabric; and is not wholly destroyed, though reduced to ruin.

The schools, professors, and philosophers of Athens were very famous: the Lyceum was on the banks of the river Ilissus: here Aristotle taught philosophy, while walking, whence his disciples were called Peripatetics. The Academy was part of the Ceramicus, which being at first marshy and unwholesome, was drained and planted; in these shady walks Plato read his lectures; whence his disciples were called Academics. There were other sects of philosophers, as the Cynics, or snarling dogs: Epicureans, from Epicurus, their master, &c. See EPICUREANS, STOICS, &c.

Athens is at present subject to the Turks, who have an Aga, or Colonel, there. The various sieges it has undergone, have damaged almost all its antiquities, and have ruined many. The roof of the Propylea, after standing above two thousand years, was probably battered to pieces by the Venetians in 1687; when they took the city from the Turks; but lost it again to them the year following. The temple of Victory, at that time a powder magazine, was blown up by lightning in 1656. The temple of Minerva was blown up during the siege in 1687: but its walls remain.

As the customs of this city illustrate certain passages of Scripture, I shall add a few particulars relating to them: principally extracted from Mr. Stuart.

On the architrave of a Doric portico yet standing in Athens, are inscriptions to the following purport:

"The people [of Athens] out of the donations bestowed [on them] by Caius Julius Cæsar, the God; and by the emperor Augustus Cæsar, the son of the God; [dedicate this] to Minerva Archegetia [chief conductress] &c."

"The people [honour] Lucius Cæsar, the son of the emperor Augustus Cæsar, the son of the god."

"The senate of the Areopagus, and the senate of the six hundred, and the people [honour with this statue] Julia Goddess, Augusta, Providence, &c."

The reader will compare these public memorials with the observation of the Apostle, that Athens was too much addicted to the adoption of objects for worship and devotion: it was not indeed, singular in worshipping the reigning emperor; emperor; but flattery could be carried no higher than to characterise his descendants as deities; and, one of them, as no less a deity than Providence itself. [Comp. Luke xxii. 25.]

The great festival at Athens in honour of Minerva, called the Pan-Athenaic procession, deserves particular notice. One of its greatest ornaments was a ship, which was kept in a repository near the Areopagus, and is mentioned by Suidas, who says, among the Athenians, the Peplus is the sail of the Pan-Athenaic ship, which every fourth year they prepare for Minerva, conducting it through the Ceramicus, to the Eleusinium. The peplus was also esteemed as the veil of Minerva. This reference of a ship to Minerva, is not without its meaning: and indeed we find that almost every antient divinity is directly, or indirectly, related to the sea.

The famous statue of Minerva, of ivory and gold, was the work of Phidias. Pausanias says, it was standing erect, her garment reaching to her feet; she had a helmet on; and a Medusa's head on her breast; in one hand she held a spear, and on the other stood a victory of about four cubits high; Pliny tells us the statue was twenty-six cubits high; in which, perhaps, he included the pedestal; whereon, they both say, the birth of Pandora was represented. It is probable this statue was painted. The gold about it weighed forty talents; and might be worth 120,000*l.* sterling. Lachares stripped off the gold about one hundred and thirty years after the statue's being finished.

* * Another statue of Minerva, kept in the temple of Minerva Polias, was reported to have fallen from heaven. Compare DIANA OF EPHEBUS; FRAGMENT No. CXXVIII: and the PLATES.

The public treasure of the city was kept behind the temple of Minerva, in a building called the Opisthodomus; which properly signifies the back of a temple.

"I cannot conclude this chapter without mentioning, that while I measured the steps of the portico of the temple of Minerva, I observed the blocks of marble, of which they are composed, appeared to be united and grown together, on their contiguous edges, the whole height of the step; and this apparent junction continued to some distance within the portico. To satisfy myself in this particular, I traced the joint till no doubt remained of the separation; then returning to the edge of the step, I broke off a piece across the joint with a hammer, which verified my conjecture; for in the piece thus broken off, one half of which was part of one block, and the other part of the block next to it, the two parts adhered together as firmly as if they had never been separated." STUART'S

Antiq. Athen. vol. ii. p. 9. [Comp. 1 Peter ii. 6.]

"The Athenians have, perhaps, to this day, more vivacity, more genius, and a politer address, than any other people in the Turkish dominions. Some of their priests have the reputation of being learned and eloquent preachers. The Athenians are great lovers of music, and generally play on an instrument which they call lyra; though it is not made like the ancient lyre, but rather like a guitar, or mandolin. This they accompany with the voice, and frequently with extempore verses, which they have a ready faculty at composing." [Comp. 1 Cor. xiv. 26. Eph. v. 19. James v. 13.]

"The Turkish governor of Athens is called the Vaiwode. He is either changed or renewed in his office every year; the beginning of March. The Athenians say, he brings the cranes with him; for these birds likewise make their first appearance here about that time; they breed, and when their young have acquired sufficient strength, which is some time in August, they all fly away together: and are seen no more till the March following."

"The inhabitants of Athens are between nine and ten thousand: about four-fifths of whom are Christians. This city is an archiepiscopal see, and the archbishop maintains a considerable authority among the Christians; which he usually strengthens by keeping on good terms with the Turks in office. He holds a kind of tribunal, at which the Christians frequently agree to decide their differences, without the intervention of the Turkish magistrate." [Comp. 1 Cor. vi. 1. &c.]

"THE AREOPAGUS was not far from the ascent and entrance to the Acropolis, called the Propylea: "Going out of the gate, which is the present entrance to the Acropolis," says Mr. Stuart, "we had just before us the Areopagus, a hill which gave name, as every one knows, to the most celebrated tribunal of Athens, built either on it, or contiguous to it. This hill is almost entirely a mass of stone, its upper surface is without any considerable irregularities, but neither so level, nor so spacious, as that of the Acropolis, and though of no great height, not easily accessible, its sides being steep and abrupt. On this hill the Amazons pitched their tents, when they invaded Attica in the time of Theseus: and in after times, the Persians under Xerxes began from hence their attack on the Acropolis. Here we expected to find some vestiges of the tribunal—but were disappointed, for we did not discover the least remaining trace of building upon it. At the foot of this rock, on the part facing the north east, are some natural caverns, and contiguous to them, rather the rubbish than the ruins of some considerable buildings."

buildings. That nearest the Acropolis, tradition says, was anciently the palace of Dionysius the Areopagite. After Christianity was established at Athens, it became a church, and was dedicated to him. Near it stood the archbishop's palace, but that is at present utterly demolished. It is not improbable, that both the church and the palace were built on the ruins of the ancient tribunal called the Areopagus." Near this tribunal stood the temple of the Eumenides, or Furies: these were called by the Athenians the Severe Goddesses. Vide MEDALS of ANTIOCH in Syria, No. 8.

The reader will perceive by this description, the impropriety of our rendering, Acts xvii. 22, "Paul stood on the midst of Mars' Hill,"—whereas, in fact, though he stood in the midst of the senate of the Areopagus, he might not be on Mars' Hill at all: but in a building at the foot of it; and, that the senate of the Areopagites is intended by the Evangelical Historian is evident from verse 33, "So Paul departed from among them:"—meaning, no doubt, from among those senators at whose tribunal he had been answering concerning his doctrine, verse 19, 20.

[From the invasion of Xerxes to the irruption of Alaric into Greece, A. D. 396, Athens changed masters upwards of twenty times. It was twice burnt by the Persians; destroyed by Philip II. of Macedon; again by Sylla; the Acropolis was plundered by Tiberius; desolated by the Goths in the reign of Claudius; and the whole territory was ravaged and ruined by Alaric. That conqueror, however, spared much of Athens; and perhaps, most of the antiquities. From the reign of Justinian to the thirteenth century, the city remained in obscurity, though it continued to be a town, head of a small state. It supplied Roger, king of Sicily, with silkworms, in 1130. It was besieged by Sgure, a petty prince of the Morea, in 1204; but was successfully defended by the Archbishop. It was seized by Boniface, Marquis of Montserrat, who appointed one of his followers, Duke of Athens. It was a fief of the kingdom of Sicily, during the latter part of the fourteenth century; and then fell into the possession of Reinier Acciajuoli, a Florentine, who bequeathed it to the Venetians. Omar, general of Mahomet the Great, seized it in 1455. It was sacked by the Venetians in 1464; was bombarded and taken by them in 1687; and lost to the Turks, again, in 1688. It was always of some consideration; and those writers who describe it as reduced to a village, [Bos, Ant. Græc. p. 20] were misinformed. The name Settines, which they give it, is a corruption of Athene. The present number of houses is supposed to be nearly thirteen hundred; of which four hundred are inhabited by Turks; the remainder by Greeks and Albanians. There are four principal mosques in the city; about thirty-six churches; and five times the number of chapels. The Catholicon, or Metropolitan Church, is handsome; the rest are but ordinary. The Athenians are less oppressed than most other Greeks in the Turkish Empire.]

ATHLAI, or Auteli, ἄρτι: my time; from ἄρτι heth, time, and the affix i, my. Son of Belai, divorced his wife, a foreigner, Ezra x. 28.

ATHLETA. There is frequent mention of wrestlers, in Scripture, after the establishment of the Grecian monarchy in the East. Before that time, neither wrestlers, nor games in which they exercised, were known there. Wrestlers used this exercise, either for diversion, or for health; or to appear in the public games, and dispute the prizes proposed there. The six principal games were, wrestling, running, leaping, quoits, boxing, and boxing and kicking together. The life of a wrestler was very laborious; denying all delicacy and softness, and particularly the use of marriage. Plato, lib. viii. de legib. Pliny, lib. xxxiv. cap. 18. To this St. Paul alludes, when he says, 1 Cor. ix. 25, "every man when he striveth for the mastery, is temperate in all things. Know ye not that they which run in a race, run all, but (only) one receiveth the prize? Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown," &c. Vide Philip. iii. 14. The Athleta, who professed to practise in the games, whether running, wrestling, quoining, darting, or leaping, lived very severely, entered young on their exercises, endured cold and heat, practised almost continual labour, abstained from pleasures, wine, and strong drinks; ate by rule and measure; and rejected several sorts of food, which were thought apt to weaken them:

Qui studeat optatam cursu contingere metam,
Multa tulit seclitque puer: sudavit et alsit.
Abstiniuit Venere et Baccho,—&c.

HORAT. de Arte Poet. ver. 412.

The rewards in these games were, crowns of oak, pine, laurel, or olive; but the Athleta enjoyed other prerogatives, such as exemption from public offices; also certain honours, as being carried about in triumph, having statues erected to them, &c. Originally, the honour of the victory was the only prize; and the first Athleta lived in a much more frugal and laborious manner than those of later ages; which may reconcile those who speak of Athleta, as put out to fatten, homines attiles, as Tertullian says, with others who commend their abstinence and temperance.

[ATONEMENT: i. e. RECONCILIATION.

F F

I con-

I conceive we have lost the true import of this word in our language, by our present manner of pronouncing it. When it was customary to pronounce the word one as own—(as in the time of our worthy translators) then the word atonement, was resolvable into its parts AT-ONE-MENT, or, the means of being at one, i. e. reconciled, united, combined in fellowship. This seems to be precisely its idea, Rom. v. 11. “being (to God) reconciled—or at-one-ed, we shall be saved by his (Christ’s) life, by whom we have received the at-one-ment,” or means of reconciliation. Here, it appears, the word atonement does not mean a ransom, price, or purchase paid to the receiver, but a restoration of accord. Perhaps this is the most correct idea we can affix to the term expiation, or atonement under the Mosaic law. Sacrifices, &c. were appointed means for restoring fellowship and accord between God and the nation of Israel; in other words, of rendering God, or certain of the Divine attributes, as justice, &c. ritually propitious, capable of holding (i. e. satisfied to hold) communion with the people; by their interposition effectually restoring that one-ness which transgression had violated;—and I am not sure that in Job, xxxiii. 24, where our translators have placed in the text—ransom, and in the margin—atonement, whether they had not better have inserted the marginated word; “deliver him from going down to the pit of death, for I have accepted an atonement for his life; therefore his youth shall return—his flesh become fairer than a child’s,” &c.

To justify these ideas, read Numb. xvi. 46; “Go quickly, make reconciliation, for wrath is gone out;” Lev. xvi. 10; “Aaron shall make reconciliation for himself and his house:” Lev. iv. 20, et al. “The priest shall make reconciliation for him, and he shall be forgiven:” 2 Sam. xxi. 3, David said to the Gibeonites, “Wherewith shall I make the reconciliation, that ye may bless the inheritance of the Lord?”—i. e. that ye may be at one with the people of Israel. Eng. Tr. reads atonement.

It may be proper here to remark on the Ilasterion, or mercy seat, which was anciently in the temple, that, if we read reconciliation—residence, seat, or lid of the ark, perhaps we should come the nearest to the true idea of this subject; for it was not a seat from whence was dispensed mercy only, but oracles, and those were occasionally threatenings, i. e. until reconciliation was made: but it was the station of a person understood to be there constantly present, where he might be reconciled to those who entreated him: this was the place for those who wished for reconciliation to apply to for it; and this reconciliation-seat was itself occasionally at-one-ed with the people, &c. as when the blood of at-one-ment was sprinkled upon it, on the great day of expiation. The apostle declares, Rom. iii 25, that “God hath set forth Jesus Christ to be an ilasterion, a reconciliation—residence, through faith in his blood,” i. e. as God was understood to be constantly on the mercy-seat of old, there to be at-one-ed, so is he now in Christ; who is his residence for the same blessed purpose—that of at-one-ment.]

ATTAL, ἄτταλ, Ἐθ: my hour, my time; from ἄτταλ, time, and the pronoun ἰ, my.

ATTALIA, Ἀτταλία: that increases, or sends; from ἀτάλλω. A city of Pamphylia, whither St. Paul and Barnabas went, Acts xiv. 25; A. D. 45.

[This town subsists still under the name of Satalie. It was built (or re-founded) by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamos, who gave it his own name. The head of Neptune on our medal, with his trident, marks this as a sea port town: and probably the figure in the reverse, should be a Neptune, though his two-pronged fork makes him resemble Pluto.]

ATTALUS, Ἀτταλος: nourished, fed, fattened.

ATTALUS, king of Pergamus. There were many kings of this name at Pergamus: the Attalus mentioned 1 Macc. xv. 22, to whom the Romans wrote in favour of the Jews, is Attalus, surnamed Philadelphus, who governed the kingdom instead of his nephew, Attalus III. Philometor, son of Eumenes, king of Pergamus. This last Attalus left the people of Rome, his heirs; which, they pretended, included his kingdom also; Livius, lib. lix. The arrival of the Jewish ambassadors at Rome, to renew their alliance, in consequence whereof the Roman senate wrote to Attalus, is fixed to A. M. 3865; and Attalus Philadelphus began to govern in 3845. He governed twenty-one years; and, in 3866, resigned the kingdom to his nephew Philometor, to whom of right it belonged. Attalus Philometor died without children, A. M. 3871; ante A. D. 133.

ATTIAL, ἄτταλ, Ἐθ: my hour, my time; from ἄτταλ heth: or, to prepare; from ἄτταλ hithed.

AUGUSTUS, Ἀυγυστος: a Latin name, from augur, or from augere, to increase: increased, augmented.

AUGUSTUS, emperor of Rome, successor to Julius Cæsar. The battle of Actium, fought against Mark Antony, gave him the empire, fifteen years before J. C. A. M. 3985. He died, A. D. 14, seventeen years after the birth of Jesus Christ. Augustus was the emperor who appointed the enrollment, Luke ii. 1, which obliged Joseph and the Virgin to go to Bethlehem, the place where Messiah was to be born.

Augustus

Augustus procured the crown of Judæa for Herod, from the Roman senate. After the defeat of Mark Antony, Herod adhered to Augustus, and was constantly faithful to him. Augustus loaded him with honours and riches; and when this monarch undertook to subject Arabia to the Roman empire, Herod gave Ælius Gallus, who commanded the expedition, 500 of his guards. Augustus was pleased to undertake the education of Alexander and Aristobulus, Herod's sons, and gave them apartments in his palace. When he came into Syria, Zenodorus, and the Gadarenes, waited on him with complaints against Herod: but, Herod, by his presence, cleared himself of these accusations, and obliged his accusers to lay violent hands on themselves, to prevent being seized by him; and Augustus was so far from regarding what was charged on him, that he added to his honours and his kingdom, the tetrarchy of Zenodorus. He also examined into the quarrels between Herod and his sons, and reconciled them. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 13.

Syllæus, minister to Obodas, king of the Nabatheans, accused Herod of invading Arabia, and destroying many people there; Augustus, in anger, wrote to Herod about it, but he justified his conduct so well, that the emperor restored him to favour, and continued it ever after. Nevertheless, he greatly disapproved the rigour exercised by Herod toward his sons, in executing Alexander and Aristobulus; and, lastly, Antipater: whereupon, the emperor is said to have observed, "that it were better a great deal to be Herod's hog, than his son." Macrob. Saturn. lib. ii. cap. 4.

Augustus, after the death of Lepidus, assumed the office of high-priest among the Romans. This dignity gave him the inspection over ceremonies, and religious concerns. One of his first proceedings was, an examination of the Sybils' books, which were then in many hands, and occasioned great disorders among the people, every one taking the liberty of interpreting them, and giving them such a turn, as suited his fancy and inclination. Augustus directed a strict search after them, and it is said, he burnt near two thousand copies; preserving only such as bore the name of some particular Sybil, and were esteemed genuine, after close examination. These were put into two little gold boxes, under the pedestal of Apollo's statue, whose temple was within the inclosure of the palace. Vide SYBIL.

[This is worthy of note: if these prophecies had excited a general expectation of some great person about that time to be born; as there is reason to suppose was the fact. It should be remembered also, that Augustus had the honour to shut the temple of Janus, in token of universal peace, at the time when the Prince of Peace was born. This is remarkable, because that temple was shut but very few times.]

AVA, מַי: iniquity, [the turning aside. A city. 2 Kings, xvii. 24. Comp. Isaiah xxxvii. 14.]

[AVEN. Vide BETH-AVEN.]

AVIM, אַוִּים, מַי: the wicked; from מַי ava. A city of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 23. [More probably, named after its builder, Avens; or, was it a colony of some people? Avites, &c.]

AVIM, people descended from Hevaus, son of Canaan: they dwelt originally in the country afterwards possessed by the Caphtorim, or Philistines, Deut. xi. 23; Josh. xiii. 4. There were also Avim, or Hivites, at Shechem, or Gibeon, (Josh. xi. 10) for the inhabitants of Shechem and the Gibeonites were Hivites, Genes. xxxiv. 29. Also, some beyond Jordan, at the foot of mount Hermon. Bochart thinks, that Cadmus, who conducted a colony of Phœnicians into Greece, was a Hivite: his name Cadmus, deriving from the Hebrew, Kedem, the East, because he came from the eastern parts to Canaan; and the name of his wife, Hermione, from mount Hermon, at the foot whereof the Hivites dwelt; in which case, the metamorphosis of Cadmus's companions into serpents, is founded on the signification of the name Hivites, which, in the Phœnician language, signifies—serpents. [But, if Cadmus were of Southern Egypt, or of Ethiopia, his name might also signify—serpent; as here was a powerful monarchy of kings, whose family name was—Serpent: nor was the name uncommon elsewhere.]

[AVITES, or AVIM.]

Their country was also called Hazerim. Deut. ii. 33. In the Eastern Interpreters, and Pliny, Raphia. Their territory ended at Gaza; beginning at the river of Egypt: forty-four miles. Hazerim, seems to mean only, the villages, or fences. Sometimes this country appears to be called Shur; which the Arabic renders Gerarim. Gen. xx. 1. Vide GERAR.

AVITH, or Avith, אַוִּית, אֶתְחִי: iniquity; otherwise, temporal; from מַי haviah. The capital city of Hadad, king of Edom, Genes. xxxvi. 35.

[This is apparently the same word as the foregoing: but the former is a masculine plural, this is a feminine. As I think it extremely unlikely, that the people of any town that ever existed, should adopt such an appellation as implied perverse immorality, I rather incline to take it in a descriptive sense; a town on a declivity, or, whose ways are not equal; one side of a street being higher than the other; so that it declined: the word is used to express the contrary to equable or level, as when the beam of a balance descends at one end: q. "the shelveings;" or town of descents; which of course would produce tottering, or bowings, contortions, in those who walked on such steep.

The name is written Aviith, 1 Chron. i. 46.]

[AXE. This is a well-known instrument of iron, used for cutting down trees, &c. It is also alluded to in Scripture figuratively, for a person or power, who, as a cutting instrument in the hand of God, is employed to lop off branches and boughs, and sometimes to cut down the tree itself; so that if sinners be compared to trees in a forest, he who smiteth them is compared to an axe. Isa. x. 15, &c. This is especially apparent in the proverbial phraseology used by John the Baptist, Matt. iii. 10, Luke iii. 9, "The axe is laid to the root of the trees"—irresistible punishment, destruction, is near. I presume we risque little in referring this (ultimately) to the Roman power and armies; which, as an axe, most vehemently cut away the very existence of the Jewish polity and state. In this sense it coincides with our Lord's expression, "I am come to send a sword on the earth;" much more properly on the land; i. e. of Judæa.

This simile may be taken, 1. as addressed to each individual tree, i. e. sinner; 2. to the nation and people of the Jews, to which the plural form of the word "trees" inclines. Vide Judges ix. 8, &c. Psalm lxxiv. 5; Isaiah xiv. 6, 7, 8; Ezek. xvii. 22, 23, 24; xxxi. 3, &c.]

AZA. Gaza and Azoth are sometimes so called, Eccl. vi. 6; Ezek. xl. 24, &c. Stephan. in Gaza & Azotos. Josephus notices a mountain of this name, near to which Judas Maccabeus fought against Bacchides, in his last encounter. 1 Macc. ix. 15, this place is called mount Azotus. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 19.

AZALIAH, or Asalia, or Ezelihu, אֶזֶלִיחַ: meadow, or, delivered of the Lord; from אֶזַל atsal, or from אֶזֶל hitzil, and יָהּ jah, the Lord. Father of Shaphan, 2 Kings, xxii. 3.

AZANIAH, אֲזַנְיָה: the ear of the Lord; from אָזן ozen, an ear, and יָהּ jah, the Lord: otherwise, arm of the Lord; from זֶן zan, arm; [rather; heard of the Lord. A Levite. Nehem. x. 10.]

AZAREEL, or Autzral, אֲזַרְעֵל, 'Εσραηλ: succour, or court of God. 1 Chron. xii. 6, xxv. 18, xxvii. 22. Ezra x. 14.

AZARIAH, אֲזַרְיָה: assistance, or court of the Lord: otherwise, he that hears the Lord, or, whom the Lord hears.

I. AZARIAH, high-priest of the Jews, 1 Chron. vi. 9. Perhaps, he is the same with Amariah, who lived under Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, 2 Chron. xix. 11, about A. M. 3092.

II. AZARIAH, son of Johanan, high-priest of the Jews, 1 Chron. v. 10. Perhaps the same with Zechariah, son of Jehoiada, killed A. M. 3164, 2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 22.

III. AZARIAH, high-priest under Uzziah, king of Judah, who having undertaken to offer incense to the Lord, Azariah opposed him: and God smote king Uzziah with a leprosy, 2 Chron. xxvi. 17.

IV. AZARIAH, high-priest in the reign of Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxxi. 10, father of Hilkiab.

V. AZARIAH, father of Seraiah, the last high-priest before the captivity, 2 Chron. vi. 14.

VI. AZARIAH, son to the high-priest Zadok. We do not read that he succeeded his father, 1 Kings, iv. 2.

VII. AZARIAH, son of Nathan, captain of Solomon's guards, 1 Kings, iv. 5.

VIII. AZARIAH, or Uzziah, king of Judah, son of Amaziah, began to reign at sixteen years of age, and reigned fifty-two years at Jerusalem, 2 Kings, xv. His mother's name was Jecholiah. He did right in the sight of the Lord; but did not destroy the high places. This prince is called Uzziah, 2 Chron. xxvi. 16, 17. Presuming to offer incense in the temple, which office was peculiar to the priests, he was struck with a leprosy, and continued without the city, separated, to his death, A. M. 3221; ante A. D. 783.

Josephus adds, Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 9, that on this occasion, a great earthquake was felt; that the temple opened at the top, and a ray of light darted on the king's forehead; he appeared instantly to have a leprosy. The earthquake was so violent, as to divide the mountain west of Jerusalem; and the earth moving along a space of four furlongs (500 paces) till it met the mountain, east of the city, closed up the high way, and covered the king's gardens. We know, indeed, that there was a very great earthquake in the reign of Uzziah; Amos, i. 1; Zech. xiv. 5; the books of the Kings and the Chronicles speak expressly of it; but, that it happened at the very time when Uzziah presumed to offer incense, is uncertain.

The beginning of Uzziah's reign was very happy: he obtained great advantages over the Philistines, Ammonites, and Arabians. He added to the fortifications of Jerusalem, and had an army of 307,500 men; also great magazines of arms. He was a great lover of agriculture, had numerous husbandmen in the plains, vine-dressers in the mountains, and shepherds in the valleys. He died, A. M. 3246; ante A. D. 758. Being a leper, he was not buried in the royal sepulchres, but in a field adjacent.

IX. AZARIAH, son of John, and father of Heber, 1 Chron. xi. 29.

X. AZARIAH,

X. AZARIAH, son of Uriel, otherwise called Zephaniah, 1 Chron. vi. 36.

XI. AZARIAH, a prophet, son of Oded, by God's appointment met Asa, king of Judah, returning after his success against Zerah, king of Ethiopia, or Cush. Azariah addressed himself to Asa and his people, saying, "The Lord hath assisted you, because you adhered to him; but if you forsake him, he will abandon you," &c. 2 Chron. xv. 1, &c. A. M. 3126; ante A. D. 978.

XII. AZARIAH, son of Obed, one to whom the high-priest, Jehoida, discovered that the young prince, Joash, was living; and who contributed to place Joash on the throne, 2 Chron. xxiii. A. M. 3126; ante A. D. 978.

XIII. AZARIAH. The name of two sons of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, 2 Chron. xxi. 1, 2.

XIV. AZARIAH, son of Hoshaiah, accused the prophet Jeremiah (chap. xlii. 2) of deceiving the people; because he advised the Jews who remained after the transportation to Babylon, against going into Egypt. He carried Jeremiah and Baruch into Egypt, with the people left.

XV. AZARIAH, otherwise called Abednego, cast into the fiery furnace by Nebuchadnezzar, for refusing to adore his golden statue. (Dan. iii. 19.) A. M. 3444; ante A. D. 560.

I. AZARIAS. The angel Raphael assumed this name, when he conducted Tobias to Rages, Tob. vi. 6.

II. AZARIAS, was left by Judas Maccabæus with another captain, named Joseph, to guard Jerusalem: when they heard how successful Judas had been, wishing to distinguish themselves, they marched against the enemy; but were defeated by Gorgias, near Jamma, and lost 2000 men, 1 Macc. v. 60. A. M. 3841; ante A. D. 163.

AZAZ, my; strong; very strong. Son of Shema, of Reuben, 1 Chron. v. 8.

AZAZEL, or Hazazel; in Greek, LXX. apompaios; in Latin, emissarius. Theodoret, qu. 22. in Levit. Ἀπομπῳαῖος ἐκλήθη. ὡς ἀποπεμπόμενος εἰς τὴν ἰσημόν. Sym. Ἀπερχόμενον; abeuntem. Aquila, Ἀπολελυμένοι; dimissum, solutum.

This is commonly called the 'scape-goat. On the day of expiation, the elders of the people presented two goats, as offerings, for the sins of all Israel: of these, one was to be slain, the other banished into the wilderness; as the lot determined. This last was the Azazel, or 'scape-goat: thus the LXX. Aquila, Symmachus, Theodoret, Cyril of Alexandria, and many other interpreters, explain this solemnity: they think, that this goat, thus liberated, yet loaded with the imprecations of the high-priest, xpressing the sins of all the people, was like those animals which the Heathen consecrated to some of their deities, and left at liberty. Vide Spencer, Dissert. de Hirco Emissario. Bochart, de Animal. sacr. P. 1, lib. ii. cap. 54, 55. Marsham, Canon. Chron. Egypt. sæculo 1, §. 9, p. 204, 207.

Others think, Azazel is the name of a mountain; which, says some of the rabbins, was ninety furlongs from Jerusalem. Jonath. R. Saad. Gaon. Kimchi. R. Salomon, Abenezra, &c. Bochart affirms, that this word signifies departure, or removal. Spencer says, it signifies some demon; and that the goat sent to Azazel was given to the devil. Mark, the head of the Marcosian heretics, called the devil, whose name he used in his juggling tricks, Azazel. Epiphanius. Hæres. 34. Spencer cites the cabalists and Julian the Apostate, apud S. Cyril. lib. ix. contra Julian, as favouring his opinion. Le Clerc translates Azazel, præcipitium. He believes that the 'scape-goat was sent to some steep and inaccessible place, where it perished: because verse 21, says, the goat, Azazel, was sent into the wilderness; and, verse 22, says, into some inaccessible place. He derives Azazel from two Arabic words, aza to be hard, and azala to be in pain. But we prefer the version of the Greek interpreters, who derived Azazel from the Hebrew, haz, or hez, a goat, and azal, he went away.

The following ceremonies, the Hebrews tell us, were observed relating to the 'scape-goat. [Mishna, in Joma. Maimon. Jom. Haccipurim.] Two goats were led into the inner-court of the temple, and presented to the high-priest on the north-side of the altar of burnt offerings: they were placed one on his right, the other on his left hand: an urn was then brought and placed between them, and two lots were cast into it, of wood, silver, or gold (but, under the second temple, always of gold.) On one lot was engraved, for the Lord, on the other, for Azazel. After the urn had been well shook, the high-priest put both his hands at once into it, and in each hand drew out a lot: that in his right hand decided the fate of the goat placed on his right,—that in his left, of the goat on his left hand. The Jews relate, that during the whole pontificate of Simon the Just, the lot which he drew with his right hand, was always that inscribed for the Lord, which was taken as a happy omen; whereas, after his death, sometimes the lot for the Lord, was in the right hand, sometimes in the left.

After drawing these lots, the high-priest fastened a long fillet, or narrow piece of scarlet, to the head of Azazel, the 'scape-goat. Under Simon the Just, say the Jews, this piece appeared always white, which was a divine favour, signifying ifying that God granted the people remission of sins; whereas, under other high-priests, it appeared sometimes white, and sometimes of its natural colour, scarlet. To this, they apply the words of Isaiah: "Though their sins were as scarlet, they shall be white as snow," &c.

After the sacrifice of that goat, which the lot had determined for the Lord, the 'scape-goat was brought to the high-priest, who put both his hands on its head, and confessed his own sins, and those of the people: then it was taken into the wilderness by some fit person, and left on the brink of a precipice, at a great distance from Jerusalem; thus, by supposition, or figuratively, carrying away with it, all the sins of the people of Israel. Under Simon the Just, before the 'scape-goat, or Azazel, had got half way down the precipice from whence he was cast, he was dashed to pieces; whereas, after the death of that high-priest, he fled into the desert, and was sometimes taken and eat by the Arabs. Vide EXPIATION.

AZAZIAH, אֶזְזִיָּה: 'Ozi'as: strength of the Lord; from אַזַּז azaz, and יָהּ jah, the Lord. A zealous Levite, 2 Chron. xxxi. 13.

AZBUK, or Autzbek, אֶזְבֻּק: a goat; from אַזַּז hez: otherwise, vain and useless strength: otherwise, a strong dissipation; from אַזַּז azaz, strength, and בָּקַק bacac, to disperse, exhaust, spread; from בֹּק buc, to empty. Father of Nehemiah, Nehem. iii. 16.

AZEKAH, or Autzekah, אֶזְקָה: strength of walls; from אַזַּז azaz, strength, and קָה co, a wall: otherwise, the line used in laying out the walls of a city; from אֶזְקָה hazek: otherwise, a ring, according to the Syriac. [This might be properly understood of, "the fence," which perhaps, was originally formed of pallsadoes, or materials of a like nature; these might afterwards be exchanged for walls, yet still the town might retain its old appellation "fence-town."]

AZEKAH, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 35; 1 Sam. xvii. 1. Eusebius and St. Jerom say, that in their time, there was a city of this name between Jerusalem and Eleutheropolis.

AZEL, or Autzel, אֶזֶל: near, over-against; or separated, and taken away. Son of Elasah, of Kish's family, 1 Chron. viii. 37.

AZEM, or Ausom; אֶזֶם: strength: otherwise, shutting, or winking with the eye, from אֶזֶם hatzah; otherwise, their wood, from אֶזֶם ketz, wood, and the affix מ mem: otherwise, their council; from אֶזֶם hut. [Perhaps, substance, solidity, firmness, extremely firm: in reference to a person, THE powerful, firm, or mighty: in reference to a place, the strong, or secure.] A city of Simeon, Josh. xix. 3. The same, perhaps, as Emonia or Asmona.

AZGAD, or Autzeged, אֶזְגָּד: a strong army, or the strength of fortune; from אַזַּז azaz, strength, and גָּד gad, fortune: or, a gang of robbers, or, a troop of soldiers.

AZIZA, or Autziza, אֶזִּיזָה: strong.

AZMAVETH, or Azmuth, אֶזְמוּת: the strength of death, or of the goat; from אַזַּז hazaz, strength; or, from אַזַּז hez, and מוּת muth, death.

I. AZMAVETH, or Azmoth, or Beth-azmoth, a city, probably in Judah, adjacent to Jerusalem and Anathoth, Nehem. vii. 28; xii. 29.

II. AZMAVETH, son of Beroni, one of the thirty gallant men of David's army, 2 Sam. xxiii. 31.

III. AZMAVETH, son of Adiel, 1 Chron. xi. 32; xxvii. 25.

IV. AZMAVETH, son of Jehoadah, of Benjamin, of Saul's family, 1 Chron. viii. 30.

AZMON, or Ausemeneh, אֶזְמוֹנָה: bone, or strength, now, from אֶזְמוֹנָה atsem, and נָא now: otherwise, our bone, our force, or inclosure; from אֶזְמוֹנָה atsah, and אוֹרָה our's, from the affix נָה nah: otherwise, wood, from אֶזְמוֹנָה hetz: otherwise, the council of him who reckons, or of him who prepares; from אֶזְמוֹנָה jahatz, to counsel, and מְנוֹה manuh, he who reckons or prepares. Vide ASSEMON.

[The same as Azem, above: but, as the affix nah or neh, may import lamentation, or bewailing, this name may, in that view of it, refer to the same circumstance as the lamentation, or waiting for Tammuz, or Adonis: i. e. for Adon the lord, or mighty one: and, thus taken, it may express "the powerful one, mourned:" implying, a great personage, understood to be dead, and a public lamentation made for him, till his revival. If the word Azem be taken to mean the close shuttings of the eyes, i. e. to close the eyes strongly, it may equally allude to a supposed death, and to lamentations in consequence: if it be referred to a place, it may signify extremely strong.]

AZNOTH-TABOR, אֶזְנוֹת-תְּבוֹר; the ears of Tabor; from אֶזֶן azen, ears. [Ears of election, or of purity: otherwise, from the Hebrew, and Syriac, ears of contrition, or of breaking. Josh. xix. 34.] Or, simply Azanoth, or Aznoth. Eusebius places it in the plain, not far from Diocæsarea.

[I rather think this word means balances divided into two parts: that is to say, of which the supporting beam is in the middle, like a pair of scales; and so unlike the steelyard, or Roman balance, of which the support is near one end. Azenoth is the plural for weights, or weighers; and tabor appears to denote separations. It may, however, be taken in the sense of dismay, dread, terror, broken in pieces: i. e. "the balances which terrify:" as if the image of the deity of the place held in his hand a pair a pair of scales; the attribute and insignia of that impartial and severe justice, which might well terrify the fraudulent. This idea corresponds to that of the divine Nemesis, or vindictive retribution of the deity, q. "the awful distributor of equity: the dreadful impartialist." Hiller thinks, the stores, or safe places of Tabor: Rabbi Solomon says, the ears, or sharp erections of Tabor.]

AZOR, 'Azōp: he that helps; from עזר hazar, or encompasses; from עזר hazar, to surround or encompass. Son of Eliakim, in the genealogy, Mat. i. 13.

AZOTH, אַזוֹת Ashdod; "Ἀζωτος, pillage, theft. Josh. xi. 22, xv. 46; Acts viii. 40.

AZOTH, was assigned by Joshua to Judah, but was long possessed by the Philistines. It was a port on the Mediterranean, between Askalon and Akron; or between Jamnia and Askelon, (Judith, iii. 2, Gr.) or between Gaza and Jamnia, (Josephus, Antiq. xiii. 23) i. e. it lay between these cities, but not directly, nor in the same sense. Azotus was one of the five governments of the Philistines. Herodotus says, lib. ii. cap. 157, that Psammetichus, king of Egypt, lay twenty-nine years before Azoth; and that no city ever maintained so long a siege. 1 Macc. ix. 18, says, Judas Maccabæus was killed on mount Azotus.

AZOTIDÆ, or Ashdodioth, אֲזוֹתִיּוֹת, 'Azōtiot: women of Azoth, who pillage and destroy; from אַזר ashed: otherwise, fire of affection; from אש ash, fire, and דוד dod, affection. [The latter derivation is most probable: "the fire of affection," or of the favourite; meaning an association of the sexes.

AZOTUS is the Greek name of the same city as is called in the Hebrew אַשְׁדּוֹד. It was in the tribe of Dan, on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea. It was not taken by Joshua. Being surrounded with a wall of great strength, it was a place of importance to the Philistines. Hither was sent the ark of God, when taken from the Israelites; and here was Dagon cast down before it, 1 Sam. v. 2. However, Uzziah, king of Judah, "brake down the wall of Ashdod, and built cities about Ashdod," (what were these cities, built about another city? most probably watch towers, built at, or near this place,) 2 Chron. xxvi. 6. Ashdod was taken by Targon, general of the king of Assyria, Isaiah, xx. 1. when, it should seem, that it was very severely treated; as Jeremiah, chap. xxv. 20, gives the cup of desolation to be drunk by "the remnant of Ashdod:" yet it was not wholly destroyed. Amos, chap. i. 8, mentions "the inhabitant of Ashdod:" Zephaniah, chap. ii. 4, says, "Ashdod shall be driven out at noon day;" and Zechariah, ix. 6, says, "a bastard shall dwell in Ashdod." From these notices, it appears, that Ashdod was a place of great strength, and consequence. Its New Testament name is Azotus. Philip the Evangelist was found here, after his conversion of the eunuch at old Gaza, distant about thirty miles: but we have no reason to conclude that he was miraculously transported, the whole of this distance; as the text does not mention it: meaning only, that the next appearance of Philip, and exercise of his sacred office, was at Azotus.

The present state of this town is thus described by Dr. WITTMAN, Travels in Syria, &c. p. 285. March 14th, 1801. "Pursuing our route through a delightful country, we came to Ashdod, called by the Greeks, Azotus, and under that name mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, a town of great antiquity, provided with two small entrance gates. In passing through this place, we saw several fragments of columns, capitals, cornices, &c. of marble. Towards the centre, is a handsome mosque, with a minaret. By the Arab inhabitants, Ashdod is called Mezdel. Two miles to the south, on a hill, is a ruin, having in its centre a lofty column still standing entire. The delightful verdure of the surrounding plains, together with a great abundance of fine old olive trees, rendered the scene charmingly picturesque. In the villages, tobacco, fruits, and vegetables, are cultivated abundantly by the inhabitants; and the fertile and extensive plains yield an ample produce of corn. At this time, the wheat was just coming into ear, the harvest taking place so early as towards the latter end of April, or beginning of May." Ashdod may be seen from the "sloping hill, of easy ascent," near Jaffa, or Joppa. p. 254.

This extract confirms the supposition that the cities built by Uzziah, near Ashdod, were towers which commanded a considerable prospect: and very probably, one of these towers was placed on the hill, and spot, where the Dr. observed a lofty column standing. It appears too, that signals from hence might speedily be communicated to Joppa; and, no doubt, to various other surrounding signal-stations. Thus is the confusion of cities around a city, removed by a better acquaintance with the actual geography of this district; for which we are beholden to an observant and intelligent traveller.]

BAAL, or BOL, בַּעַל: he that rules and subdues: master, lord, or husband. [GOVERNOR, RULER.]

BAAL, or BEL, a god of the Phœnicians and Canaanites. Baal and Astaroth are commonly mentioned together; as it is believed, that Astaroth denotes the moon, we conclude that Baal represents the sun. The name Baal is used in a generical sense, for the superior god of the Phœnicians, Chaldeans, Moabites, &c. It is often compounded with the name of some other god; as Baal-Peor, Baal-Zebub, Baal-Gad, Baal-Zephon, Baal-Berith. Baal is the most ancient god of the Canaanites, and, perhaps, of the East. The Hebrews too often imitated the idolatry of the Canaanites, in adoring Baal: they offered human sacrifices to him, they erected altars to him, in groves, on high places, on the terraces of houses. Baal had priests and prophets consecrated to his service. Many infamous and immodest actions were committed in his festivals.

Some learned men have asserted, that the Baal of Phœnicia was the Saturn of Greece and Rome; and indeed there was great conformity between the services and sacrifices offered to Saturn, and what the Scriptures relate of the sacrifices offered to Baal. Others are of opinion, that Baal was the Phœnician (or Tyrian) Hercules, a god of great antiquity in Phœnicia; [perhaps, in fact, this opinion is not inconsistent with the other.] But it is generally concluded, that Baal was the sun; and on this admission, all the characters of this god in Scripture, may be easily explained.

The great luminary was adored over all the East; and is the most ancient deity whose worship is acknowledged among the Heathen. The Greeks paid divine honours to men; they spread their false religion among the Romans, and almost throughout Europe; [but they received their rites from Egypt, as Egypt had received them from the East:] accordingly, therefore, as the Eastern people adored the stars and elements, the Egyptians, though afterwards so lavish of their worship to men, to animals, and to things insensible, yet, in the beginning, they had no other deities than the heavens, the stars, and the elements, the worship of which they transmitted to their connections. Their religion, which appears to be, and really is, monstrous and ridiculous, became so, principally, by their endeavours to blend the theology of the Greeks with their own. At last, however, the Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans, ashamed of such extravagant religion, of their vicious and mortal gods, bethought themselves of reviving the principles of the ancients; and under names of great pomp, and personages of great mystery, they professed to mean nothing more than Nature, the mother of all things: with the various departments of her operations.

But it is impossible to excuse the absurdities of idolatry, with whatever colours it may be decorated, or under whatever pretences it may be concealed. The worship of a star, or of an element, is no more reasonable than the worship of any other creature; and if the later Heathen, instead of making vicious and corrupt men and women objects of their adoration, had uniformly chosen persons venerable for their innocence and virtue, they might, indeed, have been been condemned for worshipping fellow-mortals, but they would have avoided the reproach of having deified sin and lewdness.

Those who held that the stars were themselves pure intelligences, or who believed them to be, at least, animated and directed by angelic residents, were less inexcusable. Supposing this to be true, they saw nothing in Nature more perfect than the sun, the planets, and the stars: they were blameable, because they did not rise from the creature to the Creator, but deprived God of the honour exclusively due to him, by paying that honour to the productions of his power: nevertheless, by worshipping intelligences superior to mankind, they avoided the deification of weakness, and unworthiness.

The Hebrews sometimes called the sun Baal-Shemesh;—Baal the sun. Manasseh adored Baal, planted groves, and worshipped all the host of heaven: Josiah, desirous to repair the evil introduced by Manasseh, put to death “the idolatrous priests that burnt incense unto Baal, to the sun, and to the moon, and to the planets, and to all the host of heaven. He commanded all the vessels that were made for Baal, and for the grove, (Ashreh, or Astaroth) and for all the host of heaven, to be brought forth out of the temple. He took away the horses that the kings of Judah had given to the sun, and burnt the chariots of the sun with fire.” Here the worship of the sun is particularly described; and the sun itself is clearly expressed by the name of Baal, 2 Kings xxiii. 11.

The temples and altars of the sun, or Baal, were generally on eminences: [as were most temples: the temple of the god of Israel was situated on a mountain.] Manasseh placed in the two courts of the temple at Jerusalem, altars to all the host of heaven, and, in particular, to Astarte, or the moon, 2 Kings xxi. 5, 7. Jeremiah threatens those of Judah, who had sacrificed to Baal on the house-top, Jerem. xxxii. 29. Josiah destroyed the altars which Ahaz had erected on the terrace of his palace, 2 Kings xxiii. 12.

Human victims were offered to Baal, as they were to the sun. The Persian Mithra (who is also the sun) was honoured with like sacrifices. Apollo sometimes required such victims. Jeremiah reproaches the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem, with “building the high places of Baal, to burn their sons with fire for burnt-offerings unto Baal.” [The strength of this expression appears to be decisive, for the actual slaying by fire of the unhappy victims to Baal.]

The Scripture calls temples consecrated to Baal i. e. to the sun, chamanim (Levit. xxvii. 30; Isai. xvii. 8; xxvii. 9; and 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4): they were places enclosed with walls, wherein a perpetual fire was maintained: they were frequent in the East, particularly among the Persians; the Greeks called them pyreia, or pyratheia, from the Greek pyr, fire, or pyra, a funeral pile. There was in them, says Strabo, lib. xv. an altar, abundance of ashes, and a fire never suffered to go out. Maundrel, in his journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, observed some remains of these inclosures in Syria. Most of them had no statues; others had some, but these were not uniform in their figure. See the PLATES: PLACE OF FIRE.

Several critics have thought, the god Belus of the Chaldeans and Babylonians was Nimrod, their first king: others, that he was Belus the Assyrian, father of Ninus; and others, a son of Sciramis. Many have supposed Belus to be the same with Jupiter: but we conclude, that Baal was worshipped as the sun among the Phœnicians and Canaanites; and that he was often taken in general for the great god of the Eastern people.

[As much of the Heathen Idolatry alluded to in the Old Testament, is derived from the rites of Baal, and—as it appears by the number of names of places in S. S. into which this title is compounded, that his worship was extremely popular, and—as it is not yet extinct, even among ourselves, we shall pay some farther attention to the subject.

It is remarkable, that we do not find the name Baal so much in popular use east of Babylon, nor do we find it prior to the building of Babylon. But, it was general west of Babylon, and to the very extremity of Western Europe, including the British isles: of which every year affords abundant evidence to this day. It is true, however, that Maha-Bali, the great Baal, is famous on the coast of Malabar; where his capital, Maha-Bali-puram, [or the Seven Pagodas] is well known; though long ago swallowed up by the sea. If this great Baal, is the same as Baal the infant, then it shews the wide extent of his domination. M. Sonnerat informs us, (Voy. vol. i. p. 140.) that, in November the Hindoos light up vast fires, and illuminate their houses by night, in compliance with the institutions of Bali; who, they assert, appointed the feasts of fire; meaning, perhaps, originally, the solstitial fires.

But, whether the Maha-Bali of India be, or be not, the same as Baal the infant, that country affords a history which furnishes a glimmer of light on this deity. The Puranas inform us, says Major Wilford, in the Asiatic Researches, that “Maha-Deva [the great god] was born again [i. e. in his instituted worship] in the character of Bal-eswara, or Iswara the infant;” and this took place on the banks of the Cumud- vati, i. e. the Euphrates. This renovation the learned writer refers to the original foundation of Babylon. Ancient western writers, as Curtius, &c. say, that Babylon was built by Bel, or Baal; and some learned men suppose that Bab-bel, signifies the court, or palace, of Bel. (Simonis, Heb. Lex. in voce BABEL.) Bab, to this day, signifies in Arabic a door, court, or entrance. The Chaldeans say, that their metropolis derived its origin from Bel, who first of all built a great tower, or castle, called by them Bar.

All these authorities attribute the origin of Babylon to Bel; and Bel was undoubtedly worshipped as the peculiar deity of the place. But the real character of Bel the infant is known from other quarters (see the PLATES: MEDALS OF CORINTH.)—He is the Jupiter infans of Classical Mythology. We need not wonder that the second father of the human race, in his re-vivification after his preservation, should be considered as a newly-born child, yet become the great and general object of worship; since he was the first seed of all mankind, and all mankind are his seed. And, perhaps, the name Bel or Baal originally implied as much. The Arabic root بَلَل imports semen masculinum: it is used Luke vii. 38, to denote shedding, weeping; John xiii. 26, it answers to βαψαι, to dip, or sop; and with the Hebrew בָּלַל it imports to anoint, to smear, Psalm xcii. 10. Hence we read in Festus, Billis apud Afros appellatur semen humanum humi profusum. But the worship of the great patriarch was eventually transferred to the Sun, as his symbol, or representative; and this luminary, as is well known, was universally adored. So Servius, on the first book of the Æneid, apud Assyrios BEL dicitur quidam sacrorum ratione et Saturnus et Sol. Philo Biblius, from Sanchoniatho, says, the Phœnicians called the Sun Beel-samen, which, in their language, signifies the Lord of Heaven; and mention is made of an ancient stone, (Bochart, Geog. Sac. 663) inscribed Minnervæ Belisamæ; which imports Lady, or Queen of Heaven; the title given to the moon by the prophet Jeremiah, xlv. 17. We are not then to be surprised at the dedicatory title Apollini Beleno; and Herodian says, lib. viii. that some call the same deity Apollo which others call Belin: this latter was his name in Britain, also, as appears from that ancient memorial of it retained in the name Belin's-gate, at London.

The worship of Bel, Belus, Belenus, or Belinus, was general throughout the British Islands; and certain of its rites and observances are still maintained among us, notwithstanding the spread, and the establishment of Christianity during so many ages. It might have been thought, that the pompous rituals of Popery would have superseded the Druidical superstitions; or, that the Reformation to Protestantism, would have banished them; or, that the prevalence of various sects, would have reduced them to oblivion: the fact is otherwise; of which the reader may be pleased to accept a few instances. Surely the roots of Druidism were struck extremely deep! What charm could render them so prevalent and permanent?

"A town in Perthshire, on the borders of the Highlands, is called Tillie- (or Tullie-) beltane, i. e. the eminence, or rising ground, of the fire of Baal. In the neighbourhood is a Druidical temple of eight upright stones, where it is supposed the fire was kindled. At some distance from this is another temple of the same kind, but smaller, and near it a well still held in great veneration. On Beltane morning, superstitious people go to this well, and drink of it; then they make a procession round it, as I am informed, nine times. After this they in like manner go round the temple. So deep rooted is this heathenish superstition in the minds of many who reckon themselves good protestants, that they will not neglect these rites, even when Beltane falls on Sabbath. Statist. Accounts of Scotland, vol. iii. p. 105.

"On the first day of May, which is called Beltan, or Bal-tein day, all the boys in a town ship or hamlet meet in the moors. They cut a table in the green sod, of a round figure, by casting a trench in the ground, of such circumference as to hold the whole company. They kindle a fire, and dress a repast of eggs and milk in the consistence of a custard. They knead a cake of oatmeal, which is toasted at the embers against a stone. After the custard is eaten up, they divide the cake into so many portions, as similar as possible to one another in size and shape, as there are persons in the company. They daub one of these portions all over with charcoal, until it be perfectly black. They put all the bits of cake into a bonnet. Every one, blindfold, draws out a portion. He who holds the bonnet is entitled to the last bit. Whoever draws the black bit, is the devoted person who is to be sacrificed to Baal, whose favour they mean to implore, in rendering the year productive of the sustenance of man and beast. There is little doubt of these inhuman sacrifices having been once offered in this country, as well as in the East, although they now pass from the act of sacrificing, and only compel the devoted person to leap three times through the flames; with which the ceremonies of this festival are closed." Statist. Accts. vol. xi. p. 621.

Mr. Pennant gives a similar account, with the

the addition of some other circumstances.—“On the first of May,” he says, “the herdsmen of every village hold their Bel-tein, a rural sacrifice. They cut a square trench on the ground, leaving the turf in the middle; on that they make a fire of wood, on which they dress a large caudle of eggs, butter, oatmeal, and milk; and bring, besides the ingredients of the candle, plenty of beer and whiskey; for each of the company must contribute something. The rites begin with spilling some of the caudle on the ground, by way of libation: on that every one takes a cake of oatmeal, upon which are raised nine square knobs, each dedicated to some particular being, the supposed preserver of their flocks and herds, or to some particular animal, the real destroyer of them: each person then turns his face to the fire, breaks off a knob, and flinging it over his shoulders, says,—This I give to thee, preserve thou my horses;—this to thee, preserve thou my sheep; and so on. After that, they use the same ceremony to the noxious animals: this I give to thee, O fox! spare thou my lambs;—this to thee, O hooded crow!—this to thee, O eagle!—

“When the ceremony is over, they dine on the caudle.” Tour in Scotland, 1769. p. 110.

“In Ireland, Bel-tein is celebrated on the 21st June, at the time of the solstice. There, as they make fires on the tops of hills, every member of the family is made to pass through the fire; as they reckon this ceremony necessary to ensure good fortune through the succeeding year. This resembles the rite used by the Romans in the Palilia. Bel-tein is also observed in Lancashire.” Dr. Macpherson’s Critical Dissert. xvii. p. 286.

“This pagan ceremony of lighting these fires in honour of the Asiatic god Belus, gave its name to the entire month of May, which is to this day called mi na Beal-tine, in the Irish language. Doctor Keating, speaking of this fire of Beal, says, that the cattle were drove through it and not sacrificed, and that the chief design of it was to keep off all contagious disorders from them for that year; and he also says, that all the inhabitants of Ireland quenched their fires on that day, and kindled them again out of some part of that fire. He adds, from an ancient Glossary: “The Druids lighted two solemn fires every year, and drove all four-footed beasts through them, in order to preserve them from all contagious distempers during the current year.”

In Wales this annual fire is kindled in autumn, on the first day of November; which being neither at the solstice nor equinox, deserves attention. We believe that it is accounted for by supposing that the lapse of ages has removed it from its ancient station, and that the observance is kept on the same day, nominally, though that be now removed some weeks backward from its true station. However that may be, in North Wales, especially, this fire is attended by many ceremonies: such as running through the fire and smoke, each participant casting a stone into the fire, and at the conclusion of this action, all running off to escape from the black short-tailed sow. The food for supper must consist of parsnips, nuts, and apples: then an apple is suspended by a string, and caught by the mouth alone; or one is flung into a tub of water, and the mouth only is privileged to catch at it. Nor are the purposes of divination absent from the fire on this evening. Each person present throws a nut into it, and those which burn bright betoken prosperity to the owners, through the following year: misfortune is presaged by those that burn black and crackle. On the following morning the stones are searched for in the fire: if any be missing, let their owners make up their minds to encounter mischief,—perhaps calamity. The writer of this article has witnessed the Bel-tein on Midsummer eve in the public streets of towns in the diocese of Durham. The Bel-tein was certainly derived from the East: it is practised at this day in the ceremonies of the Derma Rajah, wherein the devotees walk barefoot over about 40 feet of burning coals. It was, we presume, into a Bel-tein that the three Hebrew youths were cast, bound hand and foot; Dan. iii. 15. The Bel-tein, anciently, at Jerusalem, was held in the valley of Tophet; and the burning of children in honour of Moloch, was the same ceremony under an idol of another name. So general was this custom.

Our Bonfires are, we doubt not, remains of the Bel-tein; and the tricks of our lads in leaping over the rising flame might be proved to have antiquity in their favour, if it were worth while. The bon-fire, we are partly inclined to derive from the Saxon bene, bone, a favour, a boon, an occurrence which gives pleasure: and in this sense we may understand it in Chaucer, “he bade hem all a bone”;—he invited them to an enjoyment;—or, it may be taken in the sense of a boon, a gift; a fire to which contributions are made gratis; by all.

This superstition prevailed throughout the North, as well as throughout the West; says Dr Macpherson,—

“Although the name of Bel-tein is unknown in Sweden, yet on the last day of April, i. e. the evening preceding our Bel-tein, the country people light great fires on the hills, and spend the night in shooting. This with them is the eve of Walburgh’s Mess.”

Leopold von Buch, who travelled through Norway in 1807, noticed this practice at Lødingen, gen, N. lat. 68½. His words are—"It was Hansdagsaften, the eve of St. John's day. The people flocked together on an adjoining hill, to keep up a St. John's fire till midnight, as is done throughout all Germany and Norway. It burnt very well, but it did not render the night a whit more light. The midnight sun shone bright and clear on the fire, and we scarcely could see it. The St. John's fire has not certainly been invented in these regions, for it loses here all the power and nightly splendour which extend over whole territories in Germany. Notwithstanding this circumstance, we surrounded the fire in great good humour, and danced in continual circles the whole night through."

This extract informs us, not only that this custom maintains itself in the extreme North, but also throughout Germany: in short, we see that it involves all Europe. It can, therefore, occasion no surprise that we find it so inveterately established in the countries mentioned in Scripture; where the sun had infinitely more power and influence, and which are much nearer to the seat of the original observances. The world was then plunged in idolatry; we cannot wonder that this branch of it prevailed, since it still exists, notwithstanding the influence of the Gospel. This article affords matter for serious reflection.]

BAAL. There were many cities in Palestine, into whose name the word Baal entered by composition; either, because the god Baal was adored in them; or, because these places were considered as the capital cities,—lords, superiors, of their respective provinces.

BAALAH, בעלה: her idol; from באל baal, idol, and the pronoun ה ah, her's; otherwise, she that is governed or subjected; a spouse; vide BAAL: otherwise, in elevation: from the preposition ב beth, in, and עלה halah, elevation.

BAALAH, otherwise Kirjath-jearim, Josh. xv. 9; or Kirjath-Baal, or plain Baal; (or Baalim of Judah), 1 Chron. xiii. 6, or Sede-jearim, and Campi Silve, Psalm cxxii. 6, are one and the same city of Judah; not far from Gibeah and Gibeon. The ark was stationed at Kirjath-jearim, after the Philistines returned it, 1 Sam. vi. 21. Here it remained in the house of Aminadab, till David transferred it to Jerusalem.

[1. A city in Judah, Josh. xv. 9. 10.

2. A city in Simeon, Josh. xv. 29, contracted to BALA, chap. xix. 3.

3. A mountain, Josh. xv. 11.

If this word signifies possession, or riches, then this name answers to some names among ourselves, as, Rickmansworth, i. e. Rich-man's-worth: Sawbridge-worth, &c.

It is, however, very probable, that this is merely the feminine of Baal, which appears to denote sovereign, or lord; so that this may denote THE lady. Or, the title may be taken as equal to, "THE proprietor," or THE proprietress: always including the idea of superiority, as we say, Land-LORD, Land-LADY.]

BAALATH, בעלת: from the same as Baalah.

I. BAALATH, of Simeon, Josh. xix. 32; 1 Chr. iv. 28: is probably that mentioned in the enumeration of the cities of Judah, Josh. xv. 9; yielded afterwards to Simeon. It was between Azem, or Asemon, and Hazar-Shual; and if so, advanced far toward Arabia Petræa.

II. BAALATH, of Dan, Josh. xix. 44; and 1 Kings, ix. 18. Josephus speaks of Baleth, not far from Gazara. Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 2.

III. BAALATH, a city built by Solomon, 2 Chron. viii. 6.

BAALATH-BEER, of Simeon, Josh. xix. 8.

[The well, or &c. of the (female) Baals, or sovereign ladies.]

[BAAL-BEK. "Beyond the borders of Demeshk, is Baalbek, situated on an eminence. Here are the gates of palaces sculptured in marble; and lofty columns, also of marble. In the whole region of Syria, there is not a more stupendous or considerable edifice." Ebn Haukal. We have a considerable publication on this subject, in large folio. By Mr. Wood.

Perhaps this name imports the Baal of the valley of Bekaa, the name being taken from the place: but I partly suspect, that it is from the Hebrew bek, or bak, which signifies to be emptied out; i. e. as Noah was, from his ark, or, to the same effect, Bekaa, may signify to burst forth.]

BAAL-BERITH, בעלי-ברית: idol of the covenant: otherwise, he that possesses, or subdues, the covenant; from baal, and בירת berith, a covenant.

BAAL-BERITH, i. e. Lord of the covenant, a god of the Shechemites, Judg. viii. 33; ix. 4. After the death of Gideon, the Israelites made Baal-Berith their god. There was at Shechem a temple of Baal-Berith, in whose treasury they accumulated that money which they afterwards gave to Abimelech, son of Gideon. Diodorus Siculus, lib. v. speaks of a goddess of the Cretans, named Britomartis, which is probably the same as Baal-Berith. Britomartis comes from Marath-Berith, mistress of the covenant; and, therefore, seems to be the feminine of Baal-Berith.

The most simple explanation of the name Baal-Berith, is to take it generally, i. e. for the god who presides over alliances and oaths. In this sense, the true God may be termed the God of covenants; and if Scripture had not added the name Baal, to Berith, it might have been so understood. The most barbarous nations, as well as the most superstitious, the most religious, religious, and the most knowing, have always taken God to witness oaths and covenants. The Greeks had their Zeus Horkios, Jupiter the witness and arbitrator of oaths; and the Latins had their Deus Fidius, or Jupiter Pistius, whom they regarded as the god of honesty and integrity; and who presided over treaties and alliances; they even swore sometimes per Jovem lapidem, by Jupiter the stone; because the victim appointed as a ratification of the alliance, was struck with a stone; or, because Jupiter was appealed to, and besought to throw him headlong from some precipice, who should fail in his performance of the contract; in like manner as the stone which the high-priest held in his hands, was by him cast from the top of the capitol. Vide BERITH.

[But, perhaps, this might refer to the god of the city Berytus. We know, that the Israelites borrowed many deities from their neighbours; and the Medals of Berytus shew (vide the PLATES) that the objects of worship were much the same as at Tyre, Sidon, &c. i. e. Astarte, or Good Fortune; Neptune, &c.]

BAAL-GAD, בעל-גד: the idol of fortune, or of the army; from baal, and from gad, fortune, army, felicity, or capture: otherwise, the lord, or master of fortune: [otherwise, subjecting, or possessing luck, or a troop: from the Hebrew and Syriac, the idol of a cleft.

The divinity, Fortune, is very frequently represented on medals, and sometimes with the name annexed; but is usually of the feminine gender. I think, however, that the Deus Lunus is the masculine Fortune; and this agrees with the passage in Isaiah, lxx. 11, where the prophet associates Gad with Mene: the latter is certainly Deus Lunus. Among the Romans, there was a manly Fortune, Fortuna Virilis, whose temple still exists at Rome. There was also Fortuna Barbata, or bearded Fortune, which surely was a male deity: not to say, that the name Fortunatus, Eutychus, &c. was given to males. I therefore think that Baal-gad, imports, "the lord of good Fortune:" which perhaps, might be well enough expressed in the terms of the astrological art, by "the lord of the ascendant." For the figure of Fortune, vide the medals of Tyre, Berytus, &c. and the PLATES: BAAL-GAD.]

BAAL-GAD, a city at the foot of mount Hermon. Baal-Gad derived its name from the deity, Gad, there adored, Josh. xi. 17. Vide GAD.

[BAAL-GUR, or GUR-BAAL, a whelp, or cub; otherwise, habitation, or collection; or fear. A place in Arabia, on the acclivity of Mount Ibleam, 2 Chron. xxvi. 27, where, perhaps, was a temple to Baal.

"Baal, the whelp," probably, of a lioness: i. e. the image of the deity, with this symbol attached to it. Among the heathen, the goddess Cybele, is accompanied by lions: but, as we are not obliged to restrain the present term to the lion species, it may refer to the tiger of Bacchus: and, as we have many statues of that deity, with this, his regular companion, I strongly incline to suppose, that this whelp was neither unknown nor unadopted in Canaan. Vide GUR-BAAL; also the MEDALS of CORINTH, SIDON, &c.]

BAAL-HAMON, בעל-המון: a populous place; from baal, signifying one that possesses or rules, and hamon, people, trouble, multitude, riches. [Baal-ham-ann: the lord-Ham—of generation.]—Vide AMMON No. and the FRAGMENT of Dag-ann, No. CLX. 1; also on "Solomon's Song," No. 441.]

BAAL-HANAN, son of Achbor, succeeded Shaül, in the kingdom of Edom; and was the seventh king, Genes. xxxvi. 38; 1 Chron. i. 49.

BAAL-HAZOR, בעל-הצר: court of the idol, habitation of Baal; from צר chatzer, and Baal, an idol: otherwise, Lord, or master of the court; [or of hay: or possessor of grace, or gifts. "Lord of the circumvallation," or, place surrounded by walls, however constructed, whether the courts of a building, or an enclosure by surrounding tents, or fences. The area so enclosed, is probably, the hazor.

This title, therefore, may refer to sacred enclosures; whether, as originally, only marked by bound hedges, by stones, or, as at length, by walls, and afterwards by buildings: "the lord of the sacred area."]

BAAL-HAZOR, a city of Ephraim, where Absalom kept his flocks, 2 Sam. xiii. 23.

BAAL-HERMON, בעל-הרמון: the possessor or author of destruction; from baal, possessor, and חרם cherem, destruction: also, anathema, devoted or consecrated to God. [Le Clerc thinks hermon means "the high mountain," by way of excellence; and certainly the "lord of the high mountain,"—Meru, makes a very good and expressive title, in reference to eastern mythology. The character given to the prince of Babylon, as having exalted his throne "above the stars of God, yea, so high, as to sit on the mount of the congregation, above the height of the clouds," agrees extremely well with this idea. Nevertheless, to divide this word on the principles of ancient idolatry, we might refer cher-mann to the white, or bright m'ann; or the ann, who above all others, manifests splendor, brightness, or RADIANCE: "the Lord of divine effulgence."]

BAAL-HERMON, is generally placed north of the tribe of Issachar, and the great plain, Judg. iii. 3; 1 Chron. v. 23.

BAALI, בעלי: my idol; from baal, and the affix i, my. [My lord, or ruler, &c.]

BAALIM,

BAALIM, בעלים: idols, masters, false gods, in general. The plural of Baal.

BAALIM of Judah. Vide BAALAH, or KIRJATH-JEARIM.

BAALIS, בעלים, Βασιλῶνα: in joy, or in pride; from the preposition ב beth, in, and על hahas, to please one's self; or from בל q. little king?

BAALIS, king of the Ammonites; he sent Ishmael, son of Nethaniah, to kill Gedaliah, who governed the remnant of the Jews, not carried captive to Babylon. Jerem. xl. 14.

BAAL-MEON, בעל-מנחם, Βαλμὸν: the idol, the master of the house; from baal, and מנחם mahan, a house or dwelling; otherwise, that rules by sin; from Baal, and מנחם havon, sin. [Perhaps, Baal, the sovereign, of aun, the generative power. It deserves notice, however, that Nuh, or Noah, in the Hebrew, is understood to imply a resting place, or dwelling: manuh, or Manoah, is taken in the same sense: q. "in whom is rest,"—possibly the m prefixed in m'aun, is to be taken in like manner for—"him in whom resided the generative power."]

BAAL-MEON, of Reuben, Numb. xxxii. 38; 1 Chron. v. 8. Sometimes called Beth-Baal-Meon: the house, i. e. temple of Baal-Meon. The Moabites took it from the Reubenites, and were masters of it in the time of Ezekiel, Ezek. xxv. 9. Eusebius and St. Jerom place Beel-Meon, or Beel-Maus, nine miles from Esbus, or Esebon, at the foot of mount Baaru, or Abarim.

[BAALOTH, subjects, or possessions, or in ascensions. Josh. x. v. 9, 10.

Riches, property, say some: I rather think propriators; and, the word being feminine, "ladies proprietresses," including the idea of sovereignty, or exaltation. Vide BAALAH, &c.]

BAAL-PEOR, or Beel-Phegor, בעל-פער: master of the opening; from בל baal, master, god, and פער pahar, to open; [the Lord of the opening, cleft, or aperture; the Arabic signifies to gape; and the Syriac, a cave: whence a cleft on the top of a mountain, a fissure, &c.]

Simon thinks, "the lord of Mount Peor," where this deity was worshipped; as the heathen had their Jupiter Olympus, Apollo Clarius, Mercurius Cyllenius, &c. names derived from the places where their temples stood. Maius and Cocceius, Lex. p. 100, think it imports a naked height, or, as we say, an open prospect, so a mountain free from impediments; what stands unsheltered; plainly to be seen; the vertex of a high hill. It was the name of a mountain, standing very favourably for a distant prospect; "a prospect station in an open place." Numb. xxiii. 28.

We may say the same of Beth Peor, Deut. iii.

29, which appears to have been on an eminence; as the valley in which Israel abode was over against it, chap. xiv. 46. It was undoubtedly a temple, we may suppose, with a village, at least around it.

This title has been taken in an obscene sense, and with too much truth; for it is certain that the deities of the heathen were (and are) often of the grossest kind; not that their worshippers thought them scandalous, or connected with any offence against decency, or with that sense of shame and indignation which they excite in us; they considered them as commemorative memorials of distant persons and times, or as employed to bring to recollection truths, in themselves perfectly innoxious: although such means of recording historical facts, of whatever nature, are in our opinion, criminally indecorous, and utterly unfit for public exposure. Of this the compound of the Lingam and Yoni among the Hindoos, affords open and popular proof; but there are other observances in some of their festivals, usually postponed till after all Europeans are departed, which too obscenely justify the most offensive derivation of this name.]

BAAL-PEOR, the god Peor. Our opinion concerning this false god is, that he was the Adonis, or Orus adored by the Egyptians, and other Eastern people. Scripture tells us, (Numb. xxv. 1.) that the Israelites being encamped in the wilderness of Sin, were seduced to worship Baal Peor, to partake of his sacrifices, and to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab; the psalmist, (Psalm cvi. 28) advertg to the same event, says, "they ate the offerings of the dead." Peor is Or, or Orus, if we cut off the article Pe, which is of no signification. Orus is Adonis, or Osiris. The feasts of Adonis were celebrated after the manner of funerals; and the worshippers at that time committed a thousand dissolute actions, particularly after they were told that Adonis, whom they had mourned for as dead, was alive again. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCXII. CCCXVII.

Origen believed Baal-Peor, to be Priapus, or the idol of turpitude, adored principally by women; and, that Moses did not think proper to express more clearly, what kind of turpitude he meant. St. Jerom says, this idol was represented in the same obscene manner as Priapus. His opinion is, that effeminate men, and women, who prostituted themselves in honour of idols, as frequently mentioned in Scripture, were consecrated to Baal-Peor, or Priapus.

Maimonides asserts, that Baal-Peor was adored by uncovering before him what modesty conceals. There is no doubt that Baal-Peor was the god of impurity: we know with what impudence the daughters of Moab engaged the Israelites Israelites to sin (Numb. xxv.); and the prophet Hosea, chap. ix. 10, speaking of this crime, says, "They went unto Baal-Peor, and separated themselves unto that shame." [There is too much support given to the assertion of Maimonides, by the Hindoo festival yet celebrated, called Shaktipuja; in which a naked female exposes to worship what modesty conceals, bestrewed with flowers, in honour of Shakti, the goddess Nature, the mother of all things. The whole solemnity is gross and scandalous. Fra. Paulino, Voy. to East Indies.]

Others have asserted, that Baal-Peor was Saturn, a deity adored in Arabia. The castration of this deity, by his own son, might contribute to introduce the obscenities practised in the worship of Baal-Peor.

Selden (de Diis Syris, Syntagm. I. cap. v.) suggests, that Baal-Peor is Pluto, the god of the dead, founding his conjecture on Psalm cvi. 28, "They joined themselves unto Baal-Peor, and ate the offerings of the dead." The sacrifices here alluded to, says he, are those which were offered to appease the manes of the dead. Apollinarius, in his paraphrase on this psalm, says, the Hebrews polluted themselves in the sacrifices of Baal-Peor, by eating hecatombs offered to the dead. Some affirm, that Saturn ranked his son Muth, whom he had by Rhea, among the gods, and, that he was adored by the Phœnicians, sometimes under the name of Death, (which is the signification of the word Muth) and sometimes by that of Pluto. Sanchon. apud Euseb. Præpar. lib. i. cap. viii.

But these opinions seem less probable than that we have proposed, that this deity was (dead) Adonis, or Osiris. It may be added, that Adonis, as some believe, was the father of Priapus; and that funeral entertainments were made in his honour, which may well be understood by the name of sacrifices: "The priests roar and cry before their gods, as men do at the feast when one is dead," Baruch vi. 32. The psalmist expresses himself in the plural number; "they ate the sacrifices"—for the sacrifices of Baal-Peor were repasts, such as were used at funerals; with this difference, that the latter were often accompanied with real and sincere sorrow; whereas, in those of Adonis, the tears were feigned, and the debauchery afterwards indulged was real. [Compare what has been already said of the repasts, &c. still eaten in Scotland. Vide BAAL.]

BAAL-PERAZIM, בעל-פרצים: master, or god of divisions, or he that possesses and enjoys divisions and dissipations; from baal, and פרץ paratz, to break or divide. ["The lord of the breach," or opening: whether such opening refer to a cleft or fissure in a mountain, or rock; to any natural opening of the person; or to any opening (as the door of the ark) from which the human race may be supposed to have entered the world; of which the tradition is preserved among many nations.

The reason of this appellation is given, 1 Chron. xiv. 11, but in a very confused manner in our translation; possibly it should stand thus: "the Philistines came up to Baal Perasim,—the temple of the lord of the bursting out of waters."—David smote them, and said, God hath burst upon mine enemies by my hand, like the bursting out of waters; on account of which i. e. bursting out of waters, they, the Philistines, had called the place by this name. And they had left their gods there—which David ordered to be burned. This "leaving of their gods," seems to imply a temple, or sacred place, from whence the Philistines were so suddenly expelled, that they had not time to carry off their deities. But the name continued to the place in consequence of David's observation. The transaction passed in the valley of Rephaim, (giants) probably an old sacred station of the inhabitants of Canaan. N. B. The Heri of the Matsya, or Fish Purana. See FRAGMENT, No. XX.]

BAAL-PERAZIM, where David put to flight the Philistines, 2 Sam. v. 20. It could not be very far from Jerusalem, being in the valley of Rephaim.

BAAL-SHALISHA, בעל-שלושה: the third idol, the third husband, or leader; from בעל baal, an idol or husband, and from שלוש shalash, the third: otherwise, that governs or presides over three. [Or chief, or possessor; or possessor of the chiefdom, or principality.]

BAAL-SHALISHA, 2 Kings. iv. 42. St. Jerom and Eusebius place it fifteen miles from Diospolis north.

[Simon thinks shalisha is a triangle: and therefore, that the "land of Shalisha," was of a triangular form; of which Baal-shalisha was the deity. I willingly accede to this interpretation, so far as to refer it to the triquetra, which appears on our medals: "the sovereign of the country intended by the symbol of the legs in a triangle." But, may we not rather understand, "the triple divinity?" because, we have the emphatic ת E in this word, "THE triple." The plate of BAAL-SHALISHA shews in what manner this emblem was very anciently represented in the Hindoo temple at Elephanta, No. 8; and this seems to be one among many oriental emblems brought into Syria, and adopted by others west of Hindostan, as appears in the coin, No. 10. I would observe, by the way, that this coin may hint the origin of the story of Minerva's issuing from the head of Jupiter,

Jupiter, completely armed: i. e. that some image, like that of our medal, comprised three divinities; of which one, containing the bust of the figure, was afterwards separated with all its symbols. It is remarkable, that the idea of combining three figures, occurs in other instances, at whole length: and especially when distributive justice is in question, as in the Grecian Nemesis. Medals of ANTIOCH, No. 8. It occurs also in Egypt; where we have three deities, synthronous, or sitting on the same throne, as if of equal exaltation: this idea, therefore, may be thought the proper one of Baal-shalisha, "THE triple lord," or Sovereign. The conjecture may be confirmed by another instance of the word shalisha, where it is impossible to adopt the idea of a triangle as to form. In Isaiah, xv. 5, we read, strangely unconnected with the context, of Moab's fleeing to — "An heifer of three years old," Heb. Egla Shalishia. Every translator has been embarrassed with this expression. To render it intelligible, we remark, that Egla is the name of a place adjacent to Zoar, and to Horonaim; so Ptolemy enumerates Zoara, Thoana, Necla, very likely another pronunciation of Egla: and Josephus, Ant. lib. xiv. cap. 2. reckons Agall (i. e. Agalla, or Egla) Athone, Zoar, Hozone. The distinctive Shalishia I would refer to the same as Baal-Shalisha, or the triple: thinking it extremely probable, that this image was attended by an heifer having three heads, instead of two, as on our medals; like those of the Dog Cerberus, issuing from one body, on the plate of BAAL-SHALISHA, No. 13. The idea of triplicate divinities occurs more than once on our medals. It will be recollected, that Mount Taurus, (i. e. Meru) which we understand to be commemorated in the bull (or cow) image, was divided into three peaks, or heads; and, probably, this might be the origin of this Egla Shalishia, or three-headed calf: the sex of the image being indifferent to the emblem.]

BAAL-TAMAR, בעל-תמר: master of the palm-tree; from baal, and תמר tamar, a palm.

[The palm tree occurs on many coins as a symbol attending Astarte: a branch of palm is held by the goddess sitting on the rock; and often by Jupiter, who, most probably, answers to the character of the lord of the palm tree. It may be supposed that this symbol was most adopted where the palm was best known; nevertheless, we find it applied where it cannot be restrained to the idea of a production of the country, merely, and therefore, most probably, it was introduced from where this symbol was locally applicable.]

BAAL-TAMAR, where the children of Israel engaged the tribe of Benjamin. Eusebius says, Baal-Tamar was near Gibeah. Judg. xx. 33.

BAALTIS, the same as Astarte, or the moon; next to Baal, the god most honoured by the Phœnicians. Vide ASTARTE, ASHTAROTH.

BAAL-ZEPHON, or Beel-sephon, בעל-צפון: the idol or the possession of the north; from צפון baal, idol, or possession, and צפון tsaphon, the north: otherwise hidden, or secret; from צפן tsaphan. [The hidden idol; or the idol of the watch tower: otherwise, possessor of the north, or the watch tower, or the secret.]

BAAL-ZEPHON. The Hebrews having left Egypt, after three days came to Baal-Zephon, where they passed the sea, Exod. xiv. 2, 9: Numb. xxxiii. 7. Baal-Zephon, therefore, was near Clysma, or Colsoum; for here the ancients tell us the Hebrews passed. It is thought Sephon, or Zephon, was an Egyptian deity, from which the city was named.

[Probably, a temple to Baal at the northern point of the Red Sea: it was also, most likely, an establishment, or town, like the present Suez; in which, or adjacent to which, stood this temple. The learned J. M. Hasius, in his Geog. Descrip. of the kingdom of David and Solomon, understands the temple of Jupiter Cassius. I rather think it was at the head of the Red Sea; not on the coast of the Mediterranean, as Ezion Gaber, at the head of the gulph of Eloth, answered to Beth-Gaber, on the coast of the Mediterranean. Hiller, in his Onomasticon, understands Baal-Zephon in the sense of shut, or closed, and contrasts it, by way of opposition, to Baal-Peor, the open or opening Baal. But, possibly, this appellation is an epithet of aun-zephe, "the aun looking out," i. e. hopefully, expecting, for deliverance and liberation: as Psalm v. 3. "In the morning will I direct my prayer, expectation, hope of deliverance, and will look up, or look out," for the approach of this blessing. Could it allude to Noah looking out for the dove, or the raven, or looking out from the enclosure of the ark?]

Some describe this deity as in shape, a dog; so the Egyptians had their king Anubis, with a dog's head; perhaps, signifying his vigilant eye over this place, and his office by barking to give notice of an enemy's arrival; and to guard the coast of the Red Sea, on that side. It is said, he was placed there, principally, to stop slaves that fled from their masters. The Jerusalem Targum assures us, that all the statues of the Egyptian gods having been destroyed by the exterminating angel, Baal-Zephon alone resisted; whereupon, the Egyptians conceiving great ideas of his power, redoubled their devotion to him. Moses observing that the people flocked thither in crowds, petitioned Pharaoh that he too might make a journey thither with the the Israelites; (vide FRAGMENT, No. XXXVIII.) this Pharaoh permitted; but as they were employed on the shore of the Red Sea, in gathering up the precious stones which the river Phison had carried into the Gihon, and from thence were conveyed into the Red Sea, [an exquisite instance of Rabbinical geography! Vide the MAPS.] Pharaoh surprized them, like people out of their senses; He sacrificed to Baal-Zephon, waiting till the next day to attack Israel, whom he believed his god had delivered into his hands: but, in the mean time, they passed the Red Sea, and escaped. The poet Ezekiel, cited in Eusebius, (Demonst. lib. cx. cap. 29.) believes Baal-Zephon to have been a city; and the text of Moses favours this opinion. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XXXIX.

BAANA, son of Ahitad, governor of Taanach, Megiddo, and Bethshean, 1 Kings iv. 12.

BAANAH, or Boneh, בָּנֵה, in the answer; from the preposition b beth, in, and נָהַן hanah, to answer, or to sing, or to be in affliction.

BAANAH and RECHAB, officers of Ishbosheth, son of Saul, who privately slew that prince while reposing; but were punished for it by David; 2 Sam. iv. 2, & seq.

BAARA, or Boreh, בָּעֵרָה, Baapa: burning, stupidity, beast, pasture, expurgation, in watching. Wife of Shaaaraim, divorced by him, 1 Chron. viii. 8.

BAASEIAH, or Basaiah, or Boshieh, בָּעֵשִׂיָה, Baia: in the work of the Lord; from the preposition b beth, in, and נָהַן hashah, to make, and נָהַן jah, the Lord. Son of Malchiah, a Levite, 1 Chron. vi. 40.

BAASHA, or Bosha, בָּעֵשָׂה, in the work; from the preposition b beth, in, and נָהַן hashah, to make: otherwise, in the moth; from נָהַן hash: otherwise, in the compression; from נָהַן hashash: otherwise, he that seeks and demands; from נָהַן bahah; or, who lays waste; from נָהַן shaah.

BAASHA, son of Abijah, commander of the armies of Nadab, son of Jeroboam, king of Israel. He killed his master treacherously at the siege of Gibbethon, a city of the Philistines; and usurped the kingdom, which he possessed twenty-four years. He exterminated the whole race of Jeroboam, as God had commanded; but by his bad conduct and his idolatry, he incurred God's indignation, 1 Kings xv. 1, & seq. A. M. 3051; ante A. D. 953. Baasha, instead of making good use of admonition, transported with rage against a prophet, the messenger of it, killed him.

BABEL, or Babylon, בָּבֶל: confusion, or mixture; from בָּל balal, to mix, to confound. Gen. x. 10. [See BAAL.]

[It may be taken as certain, that the inhabitants of a city would not easily be induced to adopt, for their metropolis, a title implying confusion. It is most likely that this name imports —ba, “a child;” bel, or baal, “the sovereign,” or lord: in short, that the Jupiter puer, or “infant Jove,” of the western mythologists, was here commemorated. This name, ba-bel, was easily varied into babble, or bubble, at the pleasure of the corrupter; but this derogatory appellation is assuredly a nick-name: and so I understand the Sacred Historian, “the name of the place is called Babel,” i. e. by those, who, after the confusion, alluded to what had taken place there. Aben Ezra divides this name—ba-bel. I do not see how it can regularly be derived from bal-bal; though it might be perverted to that sense by equivocation: neither does the Arabic balal apply regularly to this appellation. There has never been any doubt whether the tower of Babel stood at the city of Babylon: every thing leads us to place it there.]

PAHR V. Edit. IV.

BABEL, or BABYLON. The city and province of Babylon received this name, because, when the tower of Babel was building, God confounded the languages of those who were employed in that undertaking; about A. M. 1775, one hundred and twenty years after the deluge.

It is thought (Joseph. Antiq. lib. i. cap. 5) that Nimrod, son of Cush, was the principal instigator in building this tower of Babel. We do not know how high this tower was actually raised, and all we find in authors concerning it deserves little credit. Many have thought, that the tower of Belus mentioned by Herodotus (lib. i. cap. 381.) and, in his time extant at Babylon, was the tower of Babel; or, at least, a continuation of it, built on the old foundations. This opinion seems the more probable, because this tower was completed, and raised to its full height: being composed, says Herodotus, of eight towers placed one upon another, decreasing gradually in their size from the lower to the upper; over the eighth was the temple of Belus. This author does not tell us the complete height of the whole edifice; or of its respective towers: but only, that the lowest of the eight towers was a furlong,—or a hundred and fifty paces, high and wide, or square; for his text is not very clear: Στάδις καὶ τὸ μῆκος, καὶ τὸ εὖρος. Some writers think this was the height of the whole edifice; as Strabo, lib. xvi. Others, that each of the eight towers was a furlong in height, and the whole fabric was eight furlongs, or a thousand paces high; which seems impossible. Nevertheless, St. Jerom (on Isai. liv.) says, by report, that it was four thousand paces high; others affirm that it was still higher. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCLXV. "Tower of Babel," and the PLATES.

Belus, king of Babylon, by whose directions the building of the tower which Herodotus mentions, is said to have been undertaken, lived long after Moses; whether by Belus be meant the father of Ninus, or Belus son of Semiramis. Belus, the father of Ninus, is placed by Usher about A. M. 2682.

Modern travellers vary in their descriptions of the remains of the tower of Babel. Fabricius says, it might have been about a mile in circumference. Guion says the same. Benjamin, who is much more ancient, informs us, that the foundations were two thousand paces in length. The Sieur de la Bonlaye le Gour, a gentleman of Anjou, who says he made a long stay at Babylon, or Bagdat, declares, that about three leagues from that city, is a tower, called Megara, situated between the Tigris and Euphrates, in an open field. This tower is all solid within, and is more like a mountain than a tower. The compass of it is about five hundred paces; and as the rains and winds have very much ruined it, it cannot be more than about a hundred and thirty-eight feet high. It is built of bricks four inches thick; and between every seven courses of bricks, there is a course of straw, three inches thick, mixed with pitch or bitumen; from the top to the bottom, are about fifty courses. It is highly probable, that the remains of towers, shown in Babylonia, are only ruins of old Babylon, built by Nebuchadnezzar.

["BABEL," says Ebn Haukal, "is a small village, but the most antient spot in all Irak. The whole region is denominated Babel, from this place. The kings of Canaan resided there, and ruins of great edifices still remain. I am of opinion, that in former times, it was a very considerable place. They say that Babel was founded by Zokah Piurasp; and there was Abraham (to whom be peace!) thrown into the fire. There are two heaps, one of which is in a place called Koudi Fereik, the other Koudi Derbar: in this the ashes still remain; and they say that it was the fire of Nimrod into which Abraham was cast; may peace be on him!"

The history of Abraham's being thrown into the fire, may be seen under his article in CALMET: but, as it is evidently impossible that a monarch of the Peishdadian, or first dynasty of the Persian kings, supposed to have reigned ante A. D. 780, should have seen Abraham, I would submit the query, whether this may not have some reference to the story of Shadrach, &c. cast into the fiery furnace, as recorded in Daniel? The circumstances of the miraculous delivery are the same, and the memory of this, so much later, miracle, is more likely to have been preserved by tradition, than the other.

In Pars, says Ibn Haukal, speaking of the other curiosities in that province, "In the vicinity of Aberkouth, are considerable heaps of ashes. The common people say, that here was the fire of Nimrod, (into which he caused Abraham to be thrown.) But this is not true: the fact is, that Nimrod, and the kings of Caanan, dwelt in the land of Babylon." p. 130.

These repeated traditions of deliverance from the power of fire, shew that the memory of a history, of which that was the subject, was strongly and generally impressed on the minds of the inhabitants in neighbouring countries; though they might not accurately report all particulars of it.]

BABEL, TOWER OF.

[It is enough to repel the propositions of those who would take every passage of Scripture literally, to recall to their attention the expression respecting the Tower of Babel, that it was intended to reach up to heaven. If we suppose that the moon, as the nearest celestial body, was taken at its closest approach to the earth, for the shortest distance, it has been demonstrated by ingenious artists, that the base of such a building must have been the whole circumference of the earth, and that it would have required fifty times the quantity of matter contained in the whole globe, however slender it might have been at its approach to the lunar body. This instance has its effect on the expression of "cities walked up to heaven." These and other phrases in which "heaven" occurs, are evidently hyperbolical. The Rabbins dream, that this tower was seventy miles high: let them reduce this to mathematical calculation, and determine the dimensions of its base.

I add other particulars from Dr. Prideaux.

"Till the time of Nebuchadnezzar, the temple of Belus contained no more than the [central] tower only, and the rooms in it served all the occasions of that idolatrous worship. But he enlarged it by vast buildings erected round it, in a square of two furlongs, on every side, and a mile in circumference, which was one thousand eight hundred feet more than the square at the temple of Jerusalem, for that was but three thousand feet round; whereas this was according to this account four thousand eight hundred; and on the outside of all these buildings, was a wall inclosing the whole, which may be supposed to have been of equal extent with the square in which it stood, that is, two miles and an half in compass, in which were several gates leading into the temple, all of solid brass; and the brazen sea, the brazen pillars, and the other

brazen vessels, which were carried to Babylon, from the temple of Jerusalem, seem to have been employed in the making of them; for it is said, that Nebuchadnezzar did put all the sacred vessels, which he carried from Jerusalem, into the house of his god at Babylon, that is, into this house or temple of Bel.

This temple stood till the time of Xerxes, but he, on his return from his Grecian expedition, demolished the whole of it, and laid it all in rubbish, having first plundered it of all its immense riches, among which were several images or statues of massy gold, and one of them is said by Diodorus Siculus to have been forty feet high, which might perchance have been that which Nebuchadnezzar consecrated in the plains of Dura. See FRAGMENT, No. CL.

Other images and sacred utensils were also in that temple, all of solid gold. Those that are particularly mentioned by Diodorus, contain five thousand and thirty talents, which with the thousand talents in the image above-mentioned amount to above one-and-twenty millions of our money; and besides this, we may well suppose the value of as much more in treasure and utensils not mentioned; which was a vast sum. But it was the collection of near two thousand years, for so long that temple had stood: all this Xerxes took away."]

[BABYLON. This name usually occurs in Hebrew, under the form of Bal-bel, "the sovereign Belus infant:" but, with the addition of aun, Ba-bel-on, it imports, "the generative power commemorated as the sovereign infant:" we may find this alluded to not infrequently by the Western mythologists. On several of the medals of Corinth, we see a child reposing on the fish, as the means of its deliverance in the water; and in No. 15, we see that the fish has delivered up the child to the tutelary deity, standing on a rock. This child, I doubt not, is understood to have been preserved by the fish. In No. 12, we have a very remarkable history, of which the medallist found the representation extremely difficult. It seems, however, to allude to the old man who went into the fish in a state of decrepitude, but came out of the fish in a state of infancy; he having therein received a renewal of life. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CKLV. This child, the tutelary deity, as before, takes into her protection, and, (as is seen in medals of Egypt, No. 19.) nurses it, and suckles it, so that this child grows up to maturity. The combination of two periods of time into one representation, has rendered this medal hitherto inexplicable to the most learned antiquaries.

We presume that what we have said may be sufficiently illustrative of the name of this city. Originally part of the kingdom of Nimrod, it experienced the calamities consequent on the confusion of tongues, and contrariety of sentiments, opinions, and interests. It was long afterwards embellished by Nebuchadnezzar; and hither a considerable portion of the Jewish captives were led, by their haughty and politic conqueror. In consequence of this transportation to the chief city of the empire, the name Babylon became symbolical among the Jews for a state of suffering and calamity, and is, accordingly, used in this figurative sense, in the Revelations; not for the city of Babylon in Chaldaea; but for another place and state which might justly be compared to the ancient Babylon. The Jews carry this notion farther still, and give the name of Babylon to any place, whether in Babylonia Proper, or out of it; where any division of their nation had been held in a state of captivity. We shall not here enlarge on the history of this city; it is described by Josephus, Ant. lib. i. cap. 9. Pliny, lib. ii. cap. 26. Strabo, lib. xv. xvi. Herodotus, lib. i. Pompon. Mela, lib. i. Ptol. v. cap. 20, lib. vi. cap. 26. Steph. Geog.]

I. BABYLON. This city, the capital of Chaldaea, was built by Nimrod, adjacent to the tower of Babel. It was the capital of Nimrod's empire; so that its antiquity is unquestionable. Profane authors call its founder a son of Belus, who lived two thousand years before Semiramis. Others ascribe it to Belus the Assyrian, father of Ninus; others to Semiramis; but the opinion most generally followed, is, that Nimrod founded it, Belus enlarged it, and Semiramis added so many and so very considerable works, that she might be called, not improperly, the foundress of it; like as Constantine is called the founder of Constantinople; although that city had long been the city Byzantium: and even Rome itself is thought to have had a more ancient existence, under another name, before Romulus so far improved it as to deserve the appellation of its founder.

Scripture often speaks of Babylon, particularly after the reign of Hezekiah, who, on his recovery, was visited by ambassadors from Berodach-Baladan, king of Babylon, 2 Kings xx. 12. Isaiah, who lived at the time, especially foretels the calamities which the Babylonians should bring on Palestine; the captivity of the Hebrews; their return from Babylon; the fall of that great city; and its capture by the Persians and Medes. The prophets who lived after Isaiah, as Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, and who saw the desolation of Jerusalem and Judah, enlarge still more on the grandeur of Babylon, its cruelty, and the evils with which God would overwhelm it.

The sacred authors describe this metropolis as the greatest and most powerful city in the world. "Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty?" said Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. iv. 30. Berosus and Abydenus [vide Joseph. Antiq. lib. x. cap. 11, & lib. i. contra Appion. & Euseb. Præpar. lib. ix. cap. ult.] ascribe to this prince the building of the walls of Babylon, and those prodigious gardens raised on arches, which some attribute to Semiramis. Historians are not agreed concerning the extent and height of the walls of Babylon. Clitarchus, cited by Diodorus Siculus, says, the circuit of the walls was 368 furlongs; Quintus Curtius says, 60,000 paces; Herodotus says, 380 furlongs; Ctesias, in Diodorus Siculus, says, 360 furlongs (these 360 furlongs make 44,600 paces, i. e. near fifteen leagues;) Strabo says, 385 furlongs: Quintus Curtius and Strabo describe them as 65 feet high, and 32 wide; Pliny and Solinus say, 200 feet high, and 50 broad. Quintus Curtius relates, that these walls were built in a year; that the workmen finished a furlong in a day, i. e. 125 paces. But Berosus and Abydenus inform us, that this wonderful work was completed in fifteen days.

Julius Africanus says, that Evechois (probably the same as Jupiter Belus) began to reign over the Chaldeans A. M. 2242, in the time of the patriarch Isaac, ante A. D. 1762.

The Arabians deprived Chinitzitus, king of Babylon, of his crown, and Mardocentius reigned there in his stead, A. M. 2466; ante A. D. 1338; about the fortieth year of Moses.

Belus the Assyrian began to reign in Babylon, A. M. 2682, ante A. D. 1322, in the time of Shamgar, judge of Israel. Belus was succeeded by Ninus, Semiramis, Ninyas, and others: but none of these princes are noticed in Scripture, at least, not under the title of kings of Babylon. Ninus, according to Herodotus, lib. i. cap. 95, founded the Assyrian empire, which subsisted in Upper Asia 520 years. During this interval, the city and province of Babylon was under a governor appointed by the king of Assyria. Of all the Assyrian monarchs who reigned at Nineveh, the Scripture mentions only Pul, who was probably the father of Sardanapalus, the last of the Assyrian kings, successors of Ninus.

Under the reign of Sardanapalus, A. M. 3257, Arbaces, governor of the Medes, and Belesus, or Baladan, (Isai. xxxix. compared with 2 Kings, xx. 12,) or Nabonassar, governor of Babylon, revolted against Sardanapalus, besieged him in Nineveh, and there obliged him to burn himself, with all that was most dear and valuable to him. After this, these insurgents divided the monarchy: Arbaces reigning in Media, and Belesus at Babylon. Tiglath-pileser reigned at Nineveh, and continued the succession of the Assyrian kings; but the extent of the kingdom was much diminished. He was succeeded by Salmaneser, Sennacherib, and Esar-haddon.

Belesus, or Baladan, was father or grandfather to that Berodach-Baladan, who sent to congratulate Hezekiah after the miracle of the sun's retrogradation, 2 Kings, xx. 12. Esar-haddon, king of Assyria, conquered Babylon; and he and his successors Saosduchinus, and Chynaladanus, otherwise called Saracus, possessed it, till Nabopolassar, governor of Babylon, and Astyages, son of Cyaxares, king of Media, took arms against Chynaladanus, killed him, divided his dominions, and destroyed the Assyrian empire, A. M. 3378, ante A. D. 626. Alex. Polyhistor. apud Syncell. Usher, An. Mund. 3328.

Nabopolassar was the father of Nebuchadnezzar the Great, who destroyed Jerusalem, and was the most magnificent king of Babylon we know of. Evilmerodach succeeded Nebuchadnezzar, and Belshazzar succeeded Evilmerodach [Beros. apud Joseph. lib. i. contra Appion. p. 1045]: Darius the Mede succeeded Belshazzar, and Cyrus succeeded Darius the Mede, otherwise called Astyages. We fix the death of Belshazzar to A. M. 3448, and the first year of Cyrus's reign at Babylon, to A. M. 3457.

The successors of Cyrus are well known, and the following is their order: Cambyeses, the Seven Magi, Darius, son of Hystaspes, Xerxes, Artaxerxes Longimanus, Xerxes II. Secundianus or Sogdianus, Ochus or Darius Nothus, Artaxerxes Mnemon, Ochus, Arses, Darius Codomannus, who was overcome by Alexander the Great, A. M. 3673; ante A. D. 331.

We shall derive our account of Babylon when in its greatest splendor, whether under Semiramis, or Nebuchadnezzar, principally from Herodotus, (lib. i.) who had been on the spot, and is the oldest author who has treated of this matter. The city was square, 120 furlongs every way, i. e. fifteen miles, or five leagues, square; and the whole circuit of it was 480 furlongs, or twenty leagues. The walls were built with large bricks, cemented with bitumen, a thick glutinous fluid, which rises out of the earth in the country hereabouts; it binds stronger than mortar, and becomes harder than the brick itself. These walls were 87 feet thick, and 350 high. Those authors who mention them as only fifty cubits high, refer to their condition, after Darius, son of Hystaspes, had commanded them to be demolished down to that that height, as a punishment for a rebellion of the Babylonians.

The city was encompassed with a vast ditch, which was filled with water; and brick-work was carried up on both sides. The earth which was dug out, was employed in making the bricks for the walls of the city; so that one may judge of the depth and width of the ditch by the extreme height and thickness of the walls. There were a hundred gates to the city, twenty-five on each of the four sides: these gates, with their posts, &c. were of brass. Between every two of these gates were three towers, raised ten feet above the walls, where necessary; for the city being encompassed in several places with marshes which defended the approach to it, there was no need of towers on those parts. [Vide Diodor. Sicul. lib. ii.]

A street answered to each gate, so that there were fifty streets in all, cutting one another at right angles; each fifteen miles in length, and 151 feet wide. Four other streets, having houses only on one side, the ramparts being on the other, made the whole compass of the city: each of these streets was 200 feet wide. As the streets of Babylon crossed one another at right angles, they formed 676 squares, each square four furlongs and a half on every side, making two miles and a quarter in circuit. The houses of these squares were three or four stories high, their fronts were adorned with embellishments, and the inner space was courts and gardens.

The Euphrates divided the city into two parts, running from north to south. A bridge of admirable structure, about a furlong in length, and 60 feet wide, formed the communication over the river; at the two extremities of this bridge were two palaces, the old palace on the east side of the river, the new palace on the west. The temple of Belus, which stood near the old palace, occupied one entire square: the city was situated in a vast plain, whose soil was extremely fat and fruitful. To people this immense city, Nebuchadnezzar transplanted hither an infinite number of captives, from among the many nations subdued by him.

We should say something of those famous hanging gardens which adorned the palace in Babylon; which are ranked among the wonders of the world. They contained four hundred feet square; they were composed of several large terraces; the platform of the highest terrace equalled the walls of Babylon in height, i. e. 350 feet. From one terrace to that above it, was an ascent by stairs ten feet wide. This whole mass was supported by large vaults built one upon another, and strengthened by a wall twenty-two feet thick, covered with stones, rushes, and bitumen, and plates of lead, to prevent leakage.

There was so great a depth of earth, that the largest trees might take root in it. Here was every thing that could please the sight; large trees, flowers, plants, and shrubs. On the highest terrace, was an aqueduct supplied with water from the river, by a pump, probably, [but query, whether pumps were used in these early ages? More probably this was effected by the Persian wheel. Vide the Plate of AGRICULTURE.] from whence the whole garden was watered. It is affirmed, that Nebuchadnezzar undertook this wonderful and famous edifice, out of complaisance to his wife Amytis, daughter of Astyages; who being a native of Media, retained strong inclinations for mountains and forests: which abounded in her native country. Diodor. Sicul. lib. ii. Strabo, lib. xvi. cap. 2. Quint. Curt. lib. v. cap. 1.

Scripture no where notices these celebrated gardens: but speaks of willows planted on the banks of the rivers of Babylon: "We hanged our harps on the willows in the midst thereof," says Psalm cxxxvii. 2. Isaiah, xv. 7, describing in a prophetic style the captivity of the Moabites by Nebuchadnezzar, says, "They shall be carried away to the valley of willows." The same prophet (Isai. xxi. 1.) describing the calamities of Babylon by Cyrus, calls this city the desert of the sea. Jeremiah, to the same purport, says, li. 36, 42, "I will dry up the sea of Babylon, and make her springs dry. The sea is come up upon her: she is covered with the multitude of the waves thereof." Megasthenes (apud Euseb. Præp. lib. ix. cap. 41) assures us, that Babylon was built in a place which had before abounded so greatly with water, that it was called the sea.

The predictions of the prophets against Babylon, received their accomplishment by degrees. Berosus (apud Joseph. lib. i. contra Appion.) relates, that Cyrus having taken this city, demolished its walls; because he was not without apprehensions it would revolt. Darius, son of Hystaspes, says Herodotus, lib. iii. destroyed the gates, &c. Alexander the Great formed a design for rebuilding it; which his sudden death prevented: and Seleucus Nicator having built Seleucia, on the Tigris, this city insensibly deprived Babylon of its inhabitants. Strabo, lib. xvi. assures us, that under Augustus, Babylon was almost forsaken: that it was no longer any thing more than a great desert.

Jerom, on Isaiah xiii. relates, on the testimony of a monk, an Elamite, who dwelt at Jerusalem, that the kings of Persia had made a great park of Babylon, and of its ancient precincts, cincts, and kept abundance of wild creatures in it for hunting.

Great boastings have been made of the antiquity of the astronomical observations taken by the Babylonians. Josephus, contra Appion. lib. i. tells us, that Berosus, the Babylonian historian and astronomer, agreed with Moses concerning the corruption of mankind, and the deluge: and Aristotle, who was curious in examining the truth of what was reported relating to these observations, desired Calisthenes to send him the most certain accounts that he could find of this particular, among the Babylonians. Calisthenes sent him observations of the heavens, which had been made during 1903 years, computing from the origin of the Babylonish monarchy, to the time of Alexander. [This carries up the account as high as the one hundred and fifteenth year after the flood, which was within fifteen years after the tower of Babel was built. For, the confusion of tongues, which followed immediately after the building of that tower, happened in the year wherein Peleg was born, which was a hundred and one years after the flood; and fourteen years after that these observations begin. PRIDEAUX, Connect. Part I. book ii.]

Rauwolf, a German traveller, passed in A. D. 1574, where formerly Babylon stood; he speaks as follows [Voyage, chap. viii.]: "The village of Elugo now lies where heretofore Babylon of Chaldaea was situated. The harbour is a quarter of a league's distance from it; people go ashore in order to proceed by land to the celebrated city of Bagdad, which is a day and a half's journey from thence, eastward, on the Tigris. The soil is so dry and barren, that they cannot till it, and so naked, that I could never have believed that this powerful city, once the most stately and renowned in all the world, and situated in the fruitful country of Shinar, could ever have stood there, if I had not discerned, by the situation, and many antiquities of great beauty, though entirely neglected, which are to be seen round about, that it certainly had been there; as, first, by the old bridge over the Euphrates, whereof some piles and arches of brick are still remaining, so strong that they are a great wonder. The whole front of the village Elugo, is the hill upon which the castle stood, and the ruins of its fortifications are still visible, though demolished and uninhabited. Behind, and some little way beyond, was the tower of Babylon. It is still to be seen, and is half a league in diameter; but so ruinous, so low, and so full of venomous creatures, which lodge in holes made by them in the rubbish, that no one durst approach nearer to it than within half a league, except during two months in the winter, when these animals never stir out of their holes. There is one sort, particularly, which the inhabitants, in the language of the country, which is Persian, call Eglo, the poison whereof is very searching: they are larger than our lizards." Compare Isaiah xiii. 19, 22, with this traveller. See a much later account of the present state of Babylon among the FRAGMENTS.]

II. BABYLON of Egypt. Diodorus Siculus (lib. i.) says, the captives brought by Sesostris from Chaldean Babylon, fortified themselves in this place, and built a city, which they named after that wherein they were born. Ctesias, cited in Diodorus, relates, that the Babylonians, who came with Semiramis into Egypt, founded Babylon, [i. e. priests of that deity] but Josephus (Antiq. lib. xxi. cap. 5.) says, this city was not built till the time of Cambyzes; and that it owed its origin to some Persians, whom this prince permitted to settle there. Some modern critics have supposed, that Peter wrote his First Epistle from this Babylon. [But we have no evidence that he ever was in Egypt; and, unquestionably, probability leads to the contrary conclusion.]

This city was on the borders of Arabia, not far from Heliopolis and Aphrodisiopolis: not very distant from Cairo. It is mentioned by Ptolemy, tab. iii. (AFRICA) cap. 5. where it is called Babylis. It is described by Raphael Volaterr. lib. xii. Comp. Josephus, Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 13.

[III. BABYLON. After the many and long continued controversies among the learned on the subject of the Babylon of St. Peter, it may seem almost presumption to differ from them all; yet we request the forbearance of the considerate, to the mention of a third Babylon, to which hitherto no attention has been paid in this enquiry. We read, 2 Macc. viii. 20, of a battle fought by the Jews in Babylonia against the Galatians; eight thousand Jews, and four thousand Macedonians, against one hundred and twenty thousand, or perhaps more, for "the eight thousand destroyed one hundred and twenty thousand; because of the help they had from heaven." Now, we cannot deny that the Jews in the Chaldean Babylonia, might have mustered eight thousand fighting men; but we may safely deny that ever one hundred and twenty thousand Galatians or Gauls, were present as an army at that Babylon. We are under the necessity, therefore, of seeking another Babylon nearer to Galatia, where the Gauls settled, in order to reduce the fact stated in this passage to credibility.

We find, moreover, in the Rabbins, allusions to a Babylon, much nearer to the land of Israel than than Chaldean Babylôn; for, speaking of some mountainous parts in the north of the land of Israel, Rab. Honna saith, in the Jerusalem Gemara, "When we came hither, we went up to the top of Beth Bal-tin, and discerned the palm trees in Babylon."—As it is physically impossible, that Babylon in Chaldea, or any thing connected with it, could be seen in any part of the land of Israel, by reason of its very great distance: we must seek this Babylon much nearer. It is remarkable, that Ezekiel, xlvii. 16, places Hauran far north in the land of Israel: and the Gemarists say, the lights from Hauran, intended to communicate intelligence, were seen at Beth Bal-tin: allow fifty or sixty miles for this distance: then may the palm trees of Babylon, seen from Beth Bal-tin be estimated about fifty, or say eighty, miles distance from Hauran: or, we may enlarge this distance to a hundred miles, or more, if this Babylon stood on a hill.

The Gemarist queries, "What is Beth Bal-tin? Rab. saith it is Biram."—I take this Biram to be Bir on the Euphrates, N. E. of Aleppo; and, so far from this Bir as it is credible the sight may extend, seems to be the place for Babylonia, and its palm trees. "They (the Rabbins) place Beth Bal-tin," says Light-foot, "not far from the bank, on this side the river, Euphrates:" and they included all within the Euphrates, in the land of Israel. Vide the MAP of Scripture Histories, JOURNEYS.

Within the compass of Rabbinical visibility from Bir, looking N. E. or N. or towards Galatia, we may easily imagine, that a body of Galatians, intent on over-running Asia, might penetrate: and this brings us to the edge of, if not actually into, some of the provinces addressed by St. Peter, who enumerates them in the following order. 1. Pontus, 2. Galatia, 3. Cappadocia, 4. Asia, 5. Bithynia. We are sure, that in these provinces, the Jews might raise an army of eight thousand men; and we have, on another occasion, supposed, the prophet Ezekiel to have been stationed at Erzeroum: undoubtedly, in company with many of his countrymen, much further north than this Babylonia. There is, moreover, a note of time (as I conjecture) employed by St. Peter, in his salutation, which has not hitherto been explained: chap. v. 13. "The co-elected with you in Babylon—saluteth you." Now, when, or where were the Christians in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, &c. elected? We may read the history, Acts ii. init. "The dwellers in Mesopotamia, Cappadocia, Pontus, and Asia," are expressly named; and the countries are evidently those adjacent to this situation, in which we suppose a Babylonia. Nothing, therefore, hinders that residents in this Babylonia, should have accompanied those from the adjoining districts, and should have been converted at the same time, and by the same mean: and, if that mean were Peter's Sermon, then we see the reason of his visit to this Babylonia. It is remarkable too, that this apostle, 2 Epist. i. 10, uses the term election in this very acceptation, placing it after calling, "give diligence to make 1st. your calling, and 2d. your election sure." He seems, also, to use it in the same sense, 1 Epist. i. 1; "Peter, an Apostle of Jesus Christ, to the elect strangers scattered in Pontus, Galatia," &c. These elect strangers, then, were co-elected with the professors of Christianity in Babylonia; and the natural inference is, that they were neighbours by situation, as well as fellow-Christians by grace.

I do not find that this Babylon was a city: in the Maccabees, it clearly is a district of country; in the hints gathered from the Rabbins, this seems also to be the case; and nothing in the language of Peter obliges us to restrain his expressions to a city: though it was usual for a city and a province around it to bear the same name, and therefore it might be either, or both.

Possibly this Babylon was in the neighbourhood of Orfa or Koba: such a conjecture may, at least, be ventured, with some circumstances not unfavourable to it.

I would merely observe further, that Niebuhr says of Bir, p. 334. Fr. edit. vol. ii. "This city is situated on the eastern bank of the Euphrates, and on a high mountain:"—also of Orfa, p. 329, "Its citadel is on one side of the city, on a rock, but exposed to a mountain infinitely higher than itself. There are ruins on this high mountain behind the citadel. As to this mountain, which is called Nimrod, the opinion here is, that it is derived from Nimrod, mentioned in the Bible, who, it is said, had here a palace." This hint about Nimrod, certainly agrees with the notion of a Babylonia hereabouts; as do the heights of these mountains respectively, with the perception of them from each other. Their distance is about forty-two miles. Orfa is the ancient Edessa.]

BABYLONIA, a province of Chaldæa or Assyria, whereof Babylon was the capital. It is now called Irac.

BACCHIDES, Βακχίδης, son of Bacchus, or like to Bacchus.

BACCHIDES, governor of Mesopotamia, and general of the troops belonging to Demetrius Soter, king of Syria, 1 Macc. xii. 8. He was sent by Demetrius, with the high-priest Alcimus, to examine into the depredations alledged against Judas Maccabæus in the country. He appears appears to have been a cruel and perfidious character; of which several instances are related in the passage referred to.

BACCENOR, Βακχηνωρ, drunkard; from Bacchos, and enor, a man of Bacchus. Father of Dositheus, 2 Macc. xii. 35.

BACRITES, בכרי; Vide BECHER.

BACHUR, or Bachurim, בָּחֻרִים, Βαχουριμ; chosen or young men; from בָּחַר bachar: otherwise, in the holes or caverns, or in liberty; from the preposition ב beth, in, and חֹר chur, a cavern, or liberty.

BACHUR, or BAHURIM, or Bachor, or Bachora, or Choraba, or Choramon, for this place had all these names, a village near Jerusalem, in the way to Jordan, where Shimei cursed David, 2 Sam. xvi. 5.

BAGOAS, Holofernes's chamberlain, who introduced Judith into his master's tent. The word Bagoas is used for eunuchs in general, says Pliny, lib. xiii. cap. 4, and often occurs in the histories of the East.

Quem penes est Dominam servandi cura Bagoi.

OID. AMOR, lib. ii.

In Hebrew, eunuchs are called bagata; in Greek, bugaioi; both which seem to originate from the same root.

BAHAL-HANAN, בְּעֵל־חֵן: grace or gift of the idol; from בָּעַל baal, an idol, and חֵן chen, grace, or gift: otherwise, agreeable to the god.

BAHEM, in them, or with them. 1 Macc. xiii.

[BAHURIM, elect persons, or youths; or in openings; or in liberties. 2 Sam. iii. 16. xvi. 5. xvii. 18. Rather primes, whether of things or of persons.]

Possibly, this might be a town built by the young men, the Benjaminites, who escaped the destruction of their tribe; whence it might be called "young men's town." It was in the tribe of Benjamin.

I suspect, however, that this word imports a soldier; youth, being in the prime of life, when engaged in military service; in this sense, Saul was "a choice young man," 1 Sam. ix. 2; i. e. in the prime of life, and activity; and we know he was a military man, of no small courage. The same, 1 Sam. xxiv. 2; "three thousand soldiers," or young men: the same xxvi. 2. Prov. xx. 29.

BAHURIM is thought to have been also named Almon, Josh. xxi. 18. Alemath, 1 Chron. vi. 60: so Kimchi, on 2 Sam. xvi. 5.]

BAJITH, a town of Moab, Isaiah xv. 2.

BAKBAKKER, בִּבְקֶר, who is vain or empty; from בָּקַק bakak, to empty: otherwise, a vain search; from בָּקַר bikher, to search: otherwise, early in the morning; from the same: otherwise, whipping; from בִּקְרוֹת bikroth: otherwise, evacuation of the oven; from בָּקַק bakak, to empty, and בָּקַר baker, an ox.—A Levite, employed in building the temple, 1 Chron. ix. 15.

BAKBUK, בִּבְכּוּק, Βακβουκ: empty bottle.

BALA, or Belo, בֶּלַע, Βαλακ, or Βαλαά: swallowed up, destroyed.

BALA, otherwise Zohar, a city of Pentapolis, Josh. xix. 3. Said to be called Bala, i. e. swallowed up; because, when Lot had quitted it, the earth opened and swallowed it up. Vide Theodoret, qu. 70, in Genes. Procop. Diodor. in Caten. Hieronym. quest. Hebr. Vide ZOAR.

BALAAM, or Belom, בִּלְעָם: old age, or absorption: from בָּלַל balal, and עַם am, a people: otherwise, without the people; from the adverb בִּלְי beli, without, and עַם ham, people: otherwise, their destruction; from בָּלַע balak, swallowed up, and the affix כֵּן am, them, or their's.

BALAAM, a prophet, or diviner, of the city Pethor, on the Euphrates, Numb. xxii. Balak, king of Moab, having seen the multitude of Israel, feared they would attack his country; to avert this dreadful misfortune, he sent for Balaam, as a man famous for prediction, to come and curse that nation. His messengers having declared their errand, Balaam, during the night, consulted God; who forbade his going. Balak afterwards sent others, of superior quality: Balaam still declined, but kept them in his house that night; during which the Lord said to him, If the men come to call thee, rise up and go with them; but yet the word that I shall say unto thee, that shalt thou do. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCIV. Balaam, therefore, rose up in the morning [not staying for the signal appointed to him, of being called by the messengers, as appears] and went with the envoys of Balak. God perceiving this froward evil disposition of his heart, was angry; and an angel stood in the way to stop him. This, Balaam's ass seeing, while the diviner himself was, probably, lost in thought; the ass turned out of the road-way, into the fields. Balaam forced her into the way again, and this occurred a second, and a third time. [vide ASS of BALAAM.] At length, Balaam was made sensible of the divine interposition, and offered to return home, but, receiving permission, he continued his journey to Balak, who complained of his reluctance in coming. Now I am come (said Balaam) I can say nothing: the word that God putteth into my mouth, that must I speak. Balak conducted him to a feast in his capital (Kirjath-Huzoth) and the next morning carried him to the high places of Baal, and showed him the extremity of the Israelite camp. Balaam Balaam said to Balak, Build me here seven altars, and prepare me seven oxen and seven rams; which being done, a bullock and a ram were offered on each altar. Balaam said to Balak, Stand by the burnt-offering, while I retire, and see if the Lord will appear to me; and what he shall command me, that will I tell thee. When Balaam was withdrawn, God gave him his commission, and bid him return: he then uttered an oracular blessing on Israel, and not a curse. This he did a second, and a third time; to the extreme mortification of Balak, who, being enraged against him, said, I called thee to curse mine enemies, and, behold, thou hast altogether blessed them these three times. Therefore, now flee unto thy place. I thought to promote thee to great honour, but now the Lord hath kept thee back from honour. Balaam answered, Spake I not also to thy messengers, saying, If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the commandment of the Lord, to do either good or bad of my own mind. He subsequently foretold what Israel should, in future times, do to the nations round about.

After this, Balaam returned into his own country, (or, at least, quitted Balak for a time) having previously advised Balak to engage Israel in idolatry and whoredom; that they might offend God, and be forsaken by him; Numb. xxiv. 14; Mich. vi. 7; 2 Pet. ii. 5; Jude, ver. 11; Rev. ii. 14. This bad counsel was pursued: the young women of Moab inveigled the Hebrews to the feasts of Baal-Peor; persuaded them to idolatry, and seduced them to impurity. God commanded Moses to avenge this insidious procedure. Moses declared war against the Midianites, of whom he slew many, and killed five of their princes, Numb. xxv. 17, 18. Among those who fell on this occasion was Balaam. Numb. xxxi. 1, 2, 7, 8.

The Rabbins relate many other particulars of Balaam; as that at first he was one of Pharaoh's counsellors: according to others, he was the father of Jannes and Mambres, two eminent magicians; that he squinted, and was lame; that he was the AUTHOR OF THAT PASSAGE IN NUMBERS, WHEREIN HIS HISTORY IS RELATED: and that Moses inserted it, in like manner as he inserted other writings. Vide vitam Mosis à Gualmino editam, & Archiva V. T. Scipionis Sgambati, &c. lib. ii. p. 252. Denique Fabricii Apocrypha, V. T. page 807, & seq.

It has been questioned whether Balaam were a true prophet of the Lord, or a mere diviner, magician, or fortune-teller, hariolus, as he is called, Numb. xxii. 5. Origen says, (Homil. xiii. in Num.) that all his power consisted in magic and cursing; because the devil, by whose influence he acted, can only curse and injure, but cannot bless. Theodoret thinks (quest. xxxix. & xlii. in Num.) that Balaam did not consult the Lord, but that the Lord inspired him, whether he would or not; and put into his mouth sentiments which he had no inclination to pronounce. Cyril of Alexandria (lib. iv. & vi. de adorat. in spiritu) says, he was a wicked wretch, a magician, an idolater, a false prophet, who spoke truth against his will, and contrary to his custom. St. Ambrose (Ep. 1.) compares him to Caiaphas, who prophesied without being aware of the import of what he said.

But Jerom seems to have adopted the opinion of the Hebrews: that Balaam knew the true God, that he erected altars to him, and that he was a true prophet; though corrupted by avarice. Moses says, he consulted the Lord; and Balaam calls the Lord, his God, "I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God," Numb. xxii. 18. St. Austin says, Balaam will be one of those who, at the day of judgment, shall say to God, "Lord, have I not prophesied in thy name?" which intimates, that he believed him to be a true prophet, though a very bad man. Other commentators are of the same opinion; and this seems to be the most probable, on the whole.

[The reason why Balaam calls Jehovah "my God," I conceive might be, because he was of the posterity of Shem, which patriarch maintained the worship of the Lord, not only in his own person, but among his descendants, no doubt, with all his influence: so that while the posterity of Ham fell into idolatry, and the posterity of Japhet were settled at a distance, in Europe, the Shemites maintained the worship of Jehovah, and knew his holiness and jealousy. This appears in the profligate advice which Balaam gives Balak, to seduce the Israelites to transgress against Jehovah, with the holiness of whose nature the perverted prophet seems to have been extremely well acquainted.]

BALADAN, בלדן: the Lord God, from baal and adon: or, ripeness of judgment; from בלל balal, old age, and דין dun, judgment: otherwise, without judgment; from בלי beli, without: otherwise, without command; from אדון adon, that rules or commands. This word is Babylonish.

BALADAN, king of Babylon, in profane authors called Belesus, or Belesus, Nabonassar, or Nanybrus. Vide Usher, Annal. ad. Ann. per Jul. 3966, 3967.

Baladan was at first governor of Babylon; he confederated with Arbaces, governor of Media, and rebelled against Sardanapalus, king of Assyria. These two generals marched against Sardanapalus, with an army of 400,000 men.

The conspirators lost three battles; but the Bactrians deserting to them, they made themselves masters of the king's camp. Sardanapalus retreated to Nineveh, which the conspirators besieged three years; but, in the third year, the Tigris overflowing, beat down twenty furlongs of the walls: whereupon the conspirators entered the city, and Sardanapalus burnt himself, with his valuables, on a funeral pile, in his palace. Arbaces was acknowledged king of Media, and Baladan, king of Babylon. Berodach-Baladan, who sent ambassadors to Hezekiah, (2 Kings, xx. 12) was the son of Baladan.

BALAK, בלַק: who lays waste and destroys: otherwise, who licks, or laps; from ב beth, with, and לַק lakak, to lick.

BALAK, son of Zippor, king of the Moabites: this prince, terrified at the multitude of Israelites encamped on the confines of his country, sent deputies to Balaam the diviner, desiring him to come and curse, or devote [EXECRATE] this people, Numb. xxii. xxiii. xxiv. xxv. Vide BALAAM. Balaam having advised him to engage the Israelites in sin, Balak, politically, as he thought, followed his counsel; which proved equally pernicious (1) to him who gave it, (2) to those who followed it, and (3) to those against whom it was intended. (1) The Israelites who were betrayed by it, were slain by their brethren who continued unperverted; (2) Balaam, the author of it, was involved in the slaughter of the Midianites; and (3) Balak, who had executed it by means of the Midianite women, saw his allies attacked, their country plundered, and himself charged with being the cause of their calamity.

[BALANCE. The Balance, I apprehend, was pretty much of the nature of the Roman steel-yard, where the weight is hung at one end of the beam, and the article to be weighed is hung at the other end. Balances, in the plural, I suppose, generally mean scales,—a pair of scales. See FRAGMENTS, No. CLXXXVI.]

[BALDNESS, is a natural effect of old age, in which period of life the hair of the head, wanting nourishment, falls off, and leaves the head naked.

Baldness was used as a token of mourning; it is threatened to the voluptuous daughters of Israel, instead of well-set hair, Isaiah iii. 4. See Mich. i. 16; and instances of it occur, Isaiah xv. 2; Jer. xlvii. 5. Vide Ezek. vii. 18; Amos viii. 10.]

[BALKH. The city of Balkh, says Ibn Haukal, is situated on a level ground, at the distance of four farsang from the mountains; it has ramparts, with a castle and mosques: and extends about half a farsang: the buildings are of clay. There are six gates—one is called Hindooan gate—another is called the Jews' gate. Through the town runs a stream called Rudi Haas: it turns ten mills. In the direction of every gate there are gardens and orchards.

The hills of this district abound in excellent cattle: and the province produces the ruby, and lapis lazuli: there are mines in the mountains; there is also much musk in this district. Snow falls at Balkh. Garments of silk and linen are brought from Balkh. The men of Balkh are ingenious, and learned in religion and law; and of polite manners. Sir. W. OUSELEY's Trans. p. 223.

As Balkh is affirmed to have been the birth-place of Abraham, it is entitled to form an article in this work; notwithstanding our information respecting it is defective.]

BALSAM-TREE, or BALSAM. The word Balsamon may be derived from Baal-shemen, בַּעַל-שֶׁמֶן, i. e. royal oil; or the most precious of perfumed oils. This word is not in the Hebrew of the Song of Solomon, but we find, the vineyards of Engeddi; which are believed to have been gardens of the balsam-tree. In Ezekiel, xxvii. 17, we find the word pannag; which the Vulgate translates Balsamum; and which is so understood by the Chaldee, and other interpreters. [Mr. Bruce has a plate of the Balsam, or Ballessan, of Abyssinia.]

BALTIS, or BALCHIS, or BALKIS. This name the Eastern people give to that queen of Sheba who visited Solomon, 1 Kings, x. 1. &c. They say, she was queen of Arabia, of the posterity of Jarab, son of Cathan; and reigned in the city of Mareb, capital of the province of Sheba. Her father was Hadlad, son to Scharshabis, twentieth king of Yemen, or Arabia Felix. Others make her the daughter of Sarabil, descended in a right line from Sheba, son of Jakh-Schab, son of Jaarab, son of Cathan, or Joktan, Gen. x. 25. [The Abyssinians relate many particulars of her journey to Solomon; they even say, that the present royal family is descended from the issue of their union; and that the family of Solomon not only long possessed the throne as Jews, but that the customs, &c. of Judaism are still retained by the descendants of those who refused to embrace Christianity.]

[BAMAIL, an eminence, or high place, Ezek. xx. 29.]

[“BAMIAN,” says Ibn Haukal, “is a town half as large as Balkh, situated on a hill. Before this hill runs a river, the stream of which flows into Gerjestan. Bamian has not any gardens or orchards, and it is the only town in this district situated on a hill. The cold part of Khorasan is about Bamian.” Sir W. OUSELEY's Trans. p. 225.

This

This town, affirmed to have been the residence of Shem, is more fully described in EXCURSIONS, No. XI.]

BAMOTH, בָּמוֹת, high places; from בָּמָה damah, an eminence: otherwise, in death; from the preposition ב beth, in, and מוֹת muth, death, [altars? Probably, the heights beside the river Arnon: it was not far from Dibon, Isaiah xv. 2, and here Baal had a temple.]

BAMOTH, Numb. xxi. 19, 20. Eusebius says, Bamoth is a city of Moab, on the river Arnon.

BAMOTH-BAAI, בָּמוֹת-בַּעַל, the high places of Baal; from bamoth and baul, [altars of the idol?]

[Rather, "the heights sacred to Baal;" where, probably, a temple, or shrine of some kind, marked the consecration: "Baal's heights." We have on the medals of DAMASCUS, No. 15, a temple standing on a height, of artificial construction; and, by the position of the altar, it might be thought, that this height, into which there is a door-way, was itself sacred; beside being the ascent to the temple. The back ground to these temples is rocks and mountains; and these may be taken as analogous to the heights of Baal, whatever be thought of the other conjecture; which, however, is not far from the sense above given of altars. See BAAL. Statist. Acc. of Scotland—Tillie-bel-tane.]

BAMOTH-BAAI, a city beyond Jordan, given to Reuben, Josh. xiii. 17. Eusebius says, situated in the plain where the Arnon runs.

BANI, בָּנִי, Bani: my son, my building, my understanding; from בָּנָה banah, to build: or, from בִּין bun, to understand.

I. BANI, the children of Bani returned from Babylon were 642, Ezra, ii. 10.

II. BANI, son of Shamer, a Levite, of the family of Merari, 1 Chron. vi. 46.

III. BANI, a Gadite, one of the heroes in David's army, 2 Sam. xxiii. 36.

BAPTISM, βάπτισμος, from βαπτίζω, to wash, to dip, or immerge.

BAPTISM. The Hebrews had many sorts of baptisms, or purifications: sometimes they washed themselves all over, and plunged their whole body in water: at other times they plunged both body and clothes: sometimes they washed their clothes only. The precise professors among them washed their arms up to their elbows, when returned home from market, or out of the street, fearing they had touched some polluted thing, or person, Mark, vii. 4: Vide FRAGMENT, No. XXXII. They washed their hands, likewise, with great exactness, before and after meals: also, the furniture and utensils of their table and kitchen, as often as they had the least suspicion of their having been polluted, Mark, vii. 2; John, ii. 6.

When they received a proselyte to their religion, they both circumcised and baptized him; affirming that this baptism was a kind of regeneration, whereby he was made a new man: from being a slave, he became free; and his natural relations before this ceremony, were, after it, no longer accounted such.

The whole law and history of the Jews abounds with lustrations and baptisms of different sorts. Moses enjoined the people to wash their garments, and to purify themselves, by way of preparation for the reception of the law, Exod. xix. 10. The priests and Levites, before they exercised their ministry, washed themselves, Exod. xxix. 4; and Levit. viii. 6. All legal pollutions were cleansed by baptism, or by plunging into water. Certain diseases and infirmities, natural to men and to women, were to be purified by bathing. To touch a dead body, to be present at funerals, &c. required purification.

But these purifications were not uniform: generally, people dipped themselves entirely under the water, and this is the most simple notion of the word baptize: but, very commonly, ritual baptism was performed by aspersion, or such a lustration as included no more than the reception of some lustral blood and water scattered lightly on the person; as, when Moses consecrated the priests and altar (Exod. xxix. 21); when the tabernacle was sprinkled with blood, on the day of solemn expiation (Lev. viii. 11); or when the sacrifice was offered by him for the sins of the high-priest and the multitude (Lev. xvi. 14, 15); and he wetted the horns of the altar with the blood of the victim. When a leper was purified after his cure, or when a man was polluted by touching, or by meeting, a dead body, they lightly sprinkled such persons with lustral water. Numb. xix. 13, 18, 20.

When John Baptist began to preach repentance, he practised a baptism in the waters of Jordan. He did not attribute to this service the virtue of forgiving sins, but used it as a preparation for the baptism of Jesus Christ, and for remission (forsaking) of sins; Matth. iii. 2; Mark, i. 4. He did not only exact sorrow for sin, but a change of life, manifested by such practices as were worthy of repentance. The baptism of John was more perfect than that of the Jews, but was less perfect than that of Jesus Christ. "It was," says Chrysostom (Homil. xxiv.) "as it were, a bridge, which from the baptism of the Jews, made a way to that of our Saviour; it was superior to the first, but inferior to the second." That of John promised what that of Jesus performed.

Notwithstanding John Baptist did not enjoin his disciples to continue his baptism after his death, because it was superseded by the manifestation of the Messiah, and the gift of the Holy Ghost; yet many of his followers administered it [and do still] several years after the death of Jesus Christ, some did not know that there was any other baptism. Among this number was Apollos, a learned and zealous man of Alexandria, who came to Ephesus twenty years after the resurrection of our Saviour, Acts, xviii. 25. And St. Paul, coming afterwards to the same city, found many Ephesians, who had received no other baptism than that of John, and knew not that there were any influences of the Holy Ghost communicated by baptism into Christ, Acts, xix. 1. [But, were these persons constant residents in Ephesus, or occasional visitors there for a time on business? James iv. 13, may allude to such migratory traders.]

Our Saviour, when sending his apostles to preach the gospel, said, "Go, teach all nations; BAPTIZING them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; Matth. xxviii. 19. Whosoever believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." Mark, xvi. 16; John, iii. Baptism, therefore, is the first mark whereby the disciples of Jesus Christ are distinguished.

BAPTISM is taken in Scripture for sufferings. "Can ye drink of the cup that I drink of, and be baptized with the baptism which I am baptized with?" Mark, x. 38. And, Luke, xii. 50, "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished?" We find traces of similar phraseology in the Old Testament, (Ps. lxi. 2, 3) where waters often denote tribulations; and where, to be swallowed up by the waters, to pass through great waters, &c. signifies, to be overwhelmed by misfortunes.

II. BAPTISM by Fire. The words of John Baptist, Matth. iii. 11, that he "baptized only with water, but that a person who was to come after him would baptize with the Holy Ghost and fire," have given occasion to enquire what is meant by this baptism by fire. Some of the old Fathers believed, that the faithful, before they entered Paradise, would pass through a certain fire, to purify them from remaining pollutions. This opinion was founded on what is said, Gen. iii. 24, concerning the cherubim placed at the entrance into Paradise, with a flaming sword; and, on the words of St. Paul, 1 Cor. iii. 12, 18, "Every man's work shall be made manifest, because the fire shall try every man's work, of what sort it is." Origen, Homil.

iii. in Ps. xxxvi. & Hom. xxiv. in Lucam. Lactant. lib. vii. cap. 21, Hilar. in Ps. cxviii. n. v. & n. xii. Ambros. in Ps. cxviii. 11, 12, &c.

Other Fathers explain this fire by an abundance of graces; others, by the descent of the Holy Ghost on the apostles, in the form of fiery tongues. Others have said, that the word fire is an addition, and that we should read "I baptize you with water, but he that cometh after me, will baptize you with the Holy Ghost." It is certain, the word fire is not in several MSS. of Matthew; but we read it in Luke, iii. 17, and in the Oriental versions of Matthew.

Some old heretics, such as the Seleucians and Hermians, understood this passage literally, and maintained, that material fire was necessary in the administration of baptism; but we are not told, either how, or to what part of the body, they applied it; or, whether they obliged the baptized to pass over, or through the flames. Aug. Hæres. lix. & Philast. de Hæres. cap. 55, 56, 57. Valentinus re-baptized those who had received baptism out of his sect, and drew them through the fire, says Tertullian, Carmin. contra Marcion. lib. i.

Bis docuit lingui traducto corpore flammâ.

Iraclion, cited by Clemens Alexandrinus, says, that some applied a red-hot iron to the ears of the baptized, as if to impress some mark on them.

[It deserves notice, that in both the Evangelists this prediction is expressed in the same manner, that is to say, there is no article, or any sign of disjunction, between the terms Holy Ghost and fire. According, therefore, to the power of the Greek language, these two terms form but one act, or thing: or, in other words, this one baptism was to be conferred at the same time, not separately, though under two species; the first, that of the Holy Ghost, the second, that of fire; and to this agrees the history, Acts ii. "there was the sound as of a rushing mighty wind," this was the first: and "the cloven tongues like as of fire, which sat on each of them," this was the second;—strictly the baptism by fire.

Immediately after the appearance of the cloven tongues, it is said "they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues:"—the same we read also in the history of Cornelius, Acts x. 45, "on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost; for they heard them speak with tongues." And Peter, in narrating the history, Acts xi. says, "the Holy Ghost fell on them, as [he fell] on us at the beginning"—and they were "baptized with the Holy Ghost." Yet, as we read nothing nothing of wind in this history, it should seem that the symbolical fire, only, appeared; and that these Gentiles were baptized by fire falling from heaven; and afterwards by water, as directed by Peter.]

III. BAPTISM in the name of Jesus Christ. Many difficulties have been raised on the words of St. Luke, Acts, x. 48: "Be baptized IN THE NAME OF JESUS CHRIST, for the remission of sins." And again, (chap. viii. 16) "They were baptized IN THE NAME OF THE LORD JESUS." It has been questioned, whether baptism ever was administered in the name of Jesus, only, without express mention of the Father and the Spirit? and whether such baptism could be valid or lawful?

Many Fathers, and some councils, believed, that the apostles, occasionally, had baptized in the name of Jesus only; and Ambrose asserts, that though one person only of the Trinity were expressed, the baptism is perfect. "For," adds he, "whosoever names one person of the Trinity, means the whole." Ambros. de Spirit. lib. i. cap. 3, n. 41, 42.

But, as this opinion is founded only on a dubious fact, and an obscure text, it is not impossible that these Fathers and councils might be mistaken; first, as to the fact, and explanation of the text; and, secondly, in the consequences they drew from it. Now it may be shown, 1. That the text in the Acts of the Apostles, is not clear for this opinion; 2. That it is very dubious, whether the apostles ever baptized in the name of Jesus only.

By baptizing in the name of Jesus, may be signified (1) either to baptize with invocation of the name of Jesus alone, without mention of the Father and the Spirit; or (2) to baptize in his name, by his authority, with his baptism, and into his religion, (making express mention of the three persons of the Trinity) as he has clearly and plainly commanded in Matthew. Since, therefore, we have a positive and explicit text for this service,—what obliges us to quit it, and to follow another, capable of different senses? Who will believe that the apostles, forsaking the form of baptism prescribed to them by Jesus Christ, had instituted another form, quite new, and without necessity?

[In fact, the opinion that baptism ought to be administered in the name of the whole Trinity, and with express invocation of the three persons, has a clear text of Scripture in its favour, where the rite is instituted, as it were, and expressly treated of; and this against an incidental mention of it in an historical relation, among other things; and capable of several senses. I should not have thought this subject worthy of so long an article, because I conceive the force of testimony to be clearly for the customary mode, if I had not been informed that baptism had been lately administered in England, in a public congregation, by the pastor of it, in the name of the Lord Jesus only: an instance, which I hope will have no imitation.]

IV. BAPTISM for the Dead. St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 29, proving the resurrection of the dead, says, "If the dead rise not at all, what shall they do who are baptized for the dead?" The question is, what is meant by baptism for the dead?

No one pretends, that the apostle approves the practice, or authorizes the opinion. It is sufficient, that there were people who thus thought and acted at the time. Observe, also, he does not say, the Corinthians caused themselves to be baptized for the dead; but—what shall they do, who are baptized for the dead? How will they support this practice, upon what will they justify it, if the dead rise not again, and if souls departed do not exist after death?

We might easily show, that some at this time, who called themselves Christians, were baptized for the dead,—for the advantage of the dead. When this epistle to the Corinthians was written, twenty-three years after the resurrection of our Saviour, several heretics (as the Simonians, Gnostics, and Nicolaitans) denied the real resurrection of the dead, and acknowledged only a metaphorical resurrection received in baptism. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCXII.

The Marcionites, who appeared some time afterwards, embraced the same principles; they denied the resurrection of the dead, and, what is more particular, they received baptism for the dead. This we learn from Tertullian, contra Marcion, lib. v. cap. 10, where he tells the Marcionites, that they ought not to use St. Paul's authority in favour of their practice of receiving baptism for the dead; and that if the apostle notices this custom, it is only to prove the resurrection of the dead against themselves. In another place, (de Resurrect. Carnis, cap. 48.) he confesses that in St. Paul's time, some were baptized a second time for the dead,—on behalf of the dead; hoping it would be of service to others, as to their resurrection.

St. Chrysostom (1 Cor. Homil. xl.) says, that among the Marcionites, when any of their catechumens die, they lay a living person under the bed of the deceased; then, advancing toward the dead body, they ask, whether he be willing to receive baptism? The person under the bed answers for him, that he desires earnestly to be baptized; and, accordingly, he is so, instead of the dead person; thus making a mummery of this sacred administration. Also, Epiphanius (Hæres. 42 § 28) asserts, that the Marcionites.

Marcionites received baptism not only once, but frequently, as often as they thought proper; that they procured themselves to be baptized in the name of those among them who died without baptism; as substituted representatives of such persons; and that St. Paul had these heretics in view.

This opinion has been followed by most learned and eminent commentators.

ADDITION.

[Bochart has collected no less than fifteen senses in which this passage has been taken by the learned; such is its obscurity; but, it is only obscure to us, by reason of our ignorance of ancient customs. It was clear to the Apostle; and equally clear to those to whom he wrote. He refers to a rite well known, openly and avowedly practised; not by a few, nor by a petty sect of Christians, but by a whole people: in short, it was familiar to the Corinthians, and needed no explanation. It is somewhat singular, that the import of the Jewish practice in cases of pollution by a dead body, should have been so imperfectly applied in explanation of this subject. The first office performed to a dead body was washing: and this was common to the Heathen,

Tergimini corpus bona fœmina lavit et unxit;

and to the Jews, as appears from the Talmud; and to the early Christians, Acts ix. 37.

Accordingly, the person who laid out, and washed, a dead body, and consequently participated in the pollution occasioned by death, participated also in the customary interment of the dead. Death was, as it were, imputed to him; and he continued in a state of seclusion from society till the third day: on the third day, he washed himself thoroughly in water, and was baptized by the sprinkling of the ashes of the red heifer: this baptism restored him to his place among the living, and was, to him, a release from his sepulchral state; in other words, a resurrection. This sprinkling is expressly enumerated among the Jewish baptisms by the Apostle, Heb. ix. 10, 13, see also, in Gr. Ecclus. xxxiv. 25. Suppose then, a person to be polluted by a dead body on Friday afternoon, he would be symbolically dead the remainder of that day, the whole of Saturday, and until he was baptized by the ashes on the Sunday morning: such being the Hebrew manner of reckoning three days. It is evident, that he sympathized with the death of the party who occasioned his pollution, by symbolizing with his interment, and with his washing; and if the Jews understood the symbol, and attached to the subsequent baptism the idea of an illustration of the national hope of a resurrection, (Acts xxiii. 6.) then the Apostle's argument is extremely cogent on that people: "What shall they—the Jews—do, who are baptized for the dead; [literally, instead of the dead, as substitutes for the dead, νεκρῶν, plural.] If there is not, if there cannot be, any such thing as a resurrection of the dead, why do they undergo a ceremony the very purport and intention of which is prefiguration of a resurrection? Why are they baptized as substitutes for—as representatives of—the dead?" From this argument the Sadducees among the Jews must be accepted; and also the Heathen: the Apostle's words, therefore, are not general, but,—what shall they do? it is an argumentum ad hominem. The reader will also observe the force of the article before the term dead, τῶν νεκρῶν, not any dead, nor the dead in general, but, those dead well known to the parties;—as the custom was well known to the Corinthians. That the Jews really did attach the idea of regeneration to baptism in the case of converts, as observed by CALMET, in the early part of this article, is well known from Maimonides, and other Rabbins; and the resemblance between regeneration, importing a renewal of life, and resurrection, importing also a renewal of life, is so close, that they might almost be considered as two words, expressing the same thing; and, probably, they were so used among the Jews.]

BARABBAS, Βαραββᾶς: son of the father, or of the master; from the Chaldee בר bar, a son, and the Hebrew אב ab, a father, or master: otherwise, son of confusion and shame, Matt. xxvii. 17.

BARABBAS, a remarkable thief, guilty also of sedition and murder; yet preferred before Jesus Christ, by the Jews, when Pilate asked them, at the feast of the passover, which of the two they would have released, Jesus or Barabbas? John, xviii. 40. Origen says (in Matth. tract. xxxv.) that in many copies, Barabbas was called Jesus likewise. The Armenian has the same reading: "Whom will ye that I deliver unto you; Jesus Barabbas, or Jesus who is called Christ?"

[N. B. This gives an additional spirit to the history; and well deserves notice.]

BARACHIEL, ברכאל: who blesses God, who bends the knee before God; from ברכ barach, to bless, to bend the knee, and from אל el, God. Father of Elihu, the Buzite, Job, xxxii. 2.

BARACHIAS, ברכיה: who blesses the Lord, who bends the knee before the Lord; from barach, and יה yah, the Lord.

I. BARACHIAS, father of Zachariah, mentioned Matt. xxiii. 35. "From the blood of righteous Abel, unto the blood of Zacharias, son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple temple and the altar." Opinions differ concerning this Zacharias, son of Barachias: some take him to be Zechariah, son of Jehoiada, killed by order of Joash, between the temple and the altar, 2 Chr. xxiv. 21, thinking that Jehoiada had two names, Barachias and Jehoiada; and in the gospel of the Nazarenes, cited by St. Jerom, instead of Zacharias, son of Barachias, was put—Zacharias, son of Jehoiada. Hieron. Beda. Mald. alii, in Matt. xxiii.

Others are of opinion, that this Barachias was father of Zechariah, the last of the twelve minor prophets, Zach. i. 1. But we have no proof that this Barachias was killed in the temple. Strab. in Matth. xxiii. Sanct. ad Zach. i. 1. Natal. Alex. in Matth. xxiii.

Several of the ancients thought Zacharias the father of John Baptist, to be this son of Barachias, and in some apocryphal books it was said, that Zachary was killed in the temple; because he contrived to secure his son from the fury of Herod, when he ordered the massacre of the children at Bethlehem. But nothing can be more uncertain than this story. Origen. Chrysost. Theophil. Euthym. in Matt. xxiii. Basil. de human. Christ. Gener. Tertull. Sorpiac. Epiphan. alii.

Several moderns, as Grotius, Hammond, Lud. de Dieu, M. de Tillemont, conjecture, that this Barachias is Baruch, father of Zechariah, mentioned by Josephus, in his books concerning the Jewish war. Zechariah was killed between the porch and the altar, by the zealots, a little before the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans. We may choose which of these opinions we please; there is something plausible in each, and each too has its difficulties. Vide ZACHARIAH.

II. BARACHIAS, son of Zerubbabel, 1 Chron. iii. 20.

III. BARACHIAS, father of Asaph, a Levite, 1 Chron. vi. 39.

IV. BARACHIAS, son of Asa, a Levite, 1 Chr. ix. 16.

[BARAD, Large, or in descending, or in governing. Gen. xvi. 14.

The Arabic root imports cold, or chilliness; as some suppose: others think, separated, singular, unique in respect of excellency. It appears, however, to be used for hail, Exod. ix. 18, &c. and for hailing, Isaiah, xxx. 19, which agrees with the former sense of the term.]

BARAK, בַּרַק: thunder: otherwise, in rain; from the preposition ב beth, in, and רַק rik, void, vain.

BARAK, son of Abinoam, chosen by God to deliver the Hebrews from that bondage under which they were held by Jabin, king of the Canaanites, Judg. iv. 4, 5, &c. He refused at first to obey the Lord's orders, signified to him by Deborah, the prophetess, and answered, if you will go with me, I will go; if not, I will not go. I will surely go, said Deborah, but the honour of the victory will not be your's; for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a woman. Meaning either Jael, who killed Sisera; or herself, who had the greater share in the success of this expedition. Deborah, however, accompanied Barak towards Kedesh of Naphtali; and having assembled 10,000 men, they advanced to mount Tabor.

Sisera being informed of this movement, marched with 900 chariots of war, and encamped near the river Kishon. Barak rapidly descended from mount Tabor, and the Lord having spread terror through Sisera's army, Barak easily obtained a complete victory. Sisera was killed by Jael. Barak and Deborah composed a hymn of thanksgiving; and the land had peace forty years, from A.M. 2719 to 2759, ante A.D. 1245.

Some have supposed, as Ambrose, lib. de Viduit. cap. 8, that Barak was son of Deborah: others, that he was her father; others, that he was her husband; and that Barak and Lapidoth are the same person. (Rab. David. & Hugo S. Victore, alii plures.) It seems certain by the text, that Deborah was married at Lapidoth, or to Lapidoth, and that Barak had no relation to her. [N. B. Some have taken Lapidoth, in the sense of—splendour, “a woman of dignity,” a woman, whose mode of living was in great splendour; others, as a town, a woman who lived at Lapidoth.] Vide LAPIDOTH.

BARASA, בִּרְסָא: in poverty; from the preposition ב beth, in, and רַשׁ rash, poverty; or, in the course; from רָצָה ratza, to run; or, in good pleasure: from רָצָה ratzah: otherwise, son of formation, or in evil; from רָשָׁע rashah, [or son of modelling in clay, 1 Macc. v.]

BARBARIANS. The word לוֹעַז loez (rendered barbarian, LXX. βάρβαρος) in the Hebrew sense of it, signifies a stranger, one who knows neither the holy language, nor the law. According to the notions of the Greeks, all nations who were not Greeks, or not governed by laws like the Greeks, were Barbarians. The Persians, Egyptians, Hebrews, Arabians, Gauls, Germans, and even the Romans were, in their phraseology, barbarians, however learned or polite they might be in themselves and in their manners. St. Paul comprehends all mankind under the names of Greeks and Barbarians, Rom. i. 14, “I am debtor both to the Greeks and to the Barbarians; to the wise and to the unwise.” St. Luke calls the inhabitants of the island of Malta, barbarians, Acts xxviii. 2, 4. St. Paul, to the Colossians, uses the terms barbarian barian and Scythian, almost in the same signification. In 1 Cor. xiv. 11, he says, that if he who speaks a foreign language in an assembly, be not understood by those to whom he discourses, with respect to them he is a barbarian; and, reciprocally, if he understand not those who speak to him, they are to him barbarians. Barburian, therefore, is used for every stranger, or foreigner, who does not speak our native language, and includes no implication whatever of savage nature or manners in those respecting whom it is used.

[N. B. It is most probably derived from herbir, a shepherd, whence Barbary, the country of wandering shepherds, Bedouins, Sceni, Scythæ: q. wanderers in tents; therefore barbarians.]

BAR-CHOCEBA, or Chochebas, or Chockibus, a famous impostor. It is said, he assumed the name of Bar-Chocheba, i. e. Son of the Star, from those words of Balaam, which he applied to himself, as the Messiah: "There shall come a STAR (cocab) out of Jacob, and a sceptre out of Israel." Others think, he derived his name from the town of Cochaba, beyond Jordan, in the neighbourhood of Ashtaroth-Carnaïm. Bar-Chocheba engaged the Jews to revolt under the reign of Adrian. The famous Jew, Akiba, supported him, and maintained that he was the Messiah. Spartian, in Adriano, cap. xiv. says, what induced the Jews to rebel at this time, was an order, forbidding them to practise circumcision. It is said, that Bar-Chocheba, to impose on the Jews, put kindled straw into his mouth, and made a show of vomiting flame. Hieronym. Apolog. & advers. Rufin. He fortified many places, and massacred an infinite number of men; raging with unbounded fury principally against the Christians. Justin Martyr. Apolog. ad Anton. pium.

Adrian sent Julius Severus against him, who, at length, shut him up in Bether. The siege was long and very obstinate: at last, the town was taken, and quickly afterwards the war was finished. Bar-Chocheba perished in it (the Jews say, he fell into the hands of the Romans, who tore off his skin with iron pincers, and that he died thus miserably.) The multitude of Jews put to death, or sold during this war, and in consequence of it, was almost innumerable. Numbers were sold at the fair of the turpentine-tree, [near Hebron:] those remaining unsold, were exposed to sale at Gaza; such as were unsold at Gaza, were carried into Egypt; where they perished by shipwreck, or famine, or slaughter. After this, Adrian published an edict, forbidding the Jews, on pain of death, to visit Jerusalem; and guards were placed at the gates, to prevent their entering. The rebellion of Bar-

Chocheba, happened A. D. 178, 179, in the 17th and 18th years of Adrian. Hieronym. in Jerem. xxxi. & in Zach. xi. Vide & Chronic. Alex. p. 596.—Hieronym. in Isai. vi. Euseb. lib. iv. cap. 6. Hist. Eccles.

The Jewish authors relate, that Akiba's scholars, who had defended the city Bether, were tied together with their books, and thrown into the fire. We are told farther, that the massacre was so great, that more Jews perished in this war, than came out of Egypt; that the skulls of three hundred children were found on one stone only; that the streams of blood were so large, that they carried stones of four pounds weight to the sea, four miles distant; that the inhabitants of these places did not dung their lands for seven years afterwards, they being sufficiently manured with dead bodies. In the fast celebrated the 18th of Ab, (July and August) the Jews call Adrian a second Nebuchadnezzar, and pray God to remember this cruel prince, who destroyed 480 synagogues. This is part of what the Jews tell us relating to Bar-Chocheba: [we must take these Rabbinical accounts; cum grano salis.] Vide BETHER, ADRIAN, Jews.

BARHUMITE, or Baharumite, ברחמי: who chooses the waters; from בחר bachar, to choose, and מים majim, waters: otherwise, choice of elevation; from bachar, and רום rum, to raise. 1 Chron. xi. 33. comp. 2 Sam. xxiii. 31.

BARIA, ברִיָּה, Bepia: a bar, or lever: otherwise, fugitive; from ברה barah: otherwise, in the smell; from the preposition ב beth, in, and ריח riah, to scent. [q. Son of Juh?]

BAR-JESUS, or BARJEU, Βαρῖης: son of Jesus; from בר bar, a son, in the Chaldee.

BAR-JESUS, or, according to some copies, Barjeu, was a Jewish magician, in the isle of Crete, Acts xiii. 6. St. Luke calls him Elymas (which in Arabic is the sorcerer.) He was with the pro-consul, Sergius Paulus, who, sending for Paul and Barnabas, desired to hear the word of God. Bar-Jesus endeavouring to hinder the pro-consul from embracing Christianity, Paul, filled with the Holy Ghost, said, "Thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the ways of the Lord? Behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thee, and thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun, for a season;" which took place immediately. The pro-consul, who saw this miracle, was converted. Origen and Chrysostom think, that Elymas, or Bar-Jesus, was converted likewise; and that St. Paul speedily restored his sight. Origen. in Exod. edit. Huet. page 22, 23. Chrysost. in Acta, homil. xxviii. Isidor. Grot. alii.

BAR-JONA, Βαρῖονᾶ: son of John; from בר bar, a son, and Jona, or John: otherwise, son of

of the pigeon; from יונה jonah, a pigeon, or dove. This word is partly Hebrew, and partly Syriac.

BAR-JONA. By this name, our Saviour sometimes calls Peter, Matt. xvi. 17: some think, Bar-Jona is put for Bar-Johanna, son of John. Hieronym. in loc.

BARIS, the name of a palace begun by John Hircanus, on the mountain of the temple; which afterwards was used for the residence of the Asmonæan princes. Herod the Great completed it, and made a citadel of it, which he called Antonia, in honour of his friend Mark Antony. Vide ANTONIA. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 6, & de Bello, lib. vi. cap. 15.

The LXX. use the word baris, to denote a palace, a great house inclosed on all sides, in the form of a tower. It is derived from the Chaldee, berah, which we often meet with in this sense, in the Hebrew books written after the captivity (Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther.) St. Jerom says, it is a term peculiar to Palestine, in this signification. The plural is bareis, which is something ambiguous, because it may come from barus, which signifies heavy. Hence some of the Latins, in Psalm xlv. 10, where we read domibus eburneis, "from palaces of ivory," read gravibus eburneis, which has no sense, but has produced another fault; for others, attempting to correct the error, read gradibus eburneis, from steps of ivory, which has no relation to the passage. In Psalm xlvii. 14, where we read distribuite domos ejus, others, deceived by the same ambiguity of the term bareis, have read graves ejus; and others, desiring to outdo the rest, and spin the matter finer, have read, distribuite gradus ejus.

[If any reason were wanting to shew the importance of correct acquaintance with the original, and with things mentioned in it, by those who undertake translation, this instance, this genealogical descent of error, might stand for that reason; and in this view it deserves the reader's attention.]

BARKOS, בָּרוֹקִים: son of separation; from בָּר bar, a son, according to the Chaldee, and קֹס kos, to cut, to cut off. Ezra ii. 53. Neh. vii. 55.

BARLEY. In Palestine, barley was sown in autumn, and reaped in spring, i. e. at the pass-over. The Rabbins sometimes call barley the food of beasts, because they fed their cattle with it, 1 Kings iv. 28. In Homer, we find barley always given to horses. Herodotus tells us, that the Egyptians ate neither wheat nor barley, using a particular sort of corn instead of them.

Nevertheless, the Hebrews frequently used barley bread: as, 2 Sam. xvii. 28. David's friends brought him in his flight, wheat, barley, &c. Solomon sent wheat, barley, wine, and oil, to the servants whom king Hiram had furnished him, for the works at Libanus, 2 Chron. ii. 15. In the gospel, Jesus Christ and his apostles had for their provision five barley loaves, John. vi. 9. Elijah received a present of twenty barley-loaves, and corn in the husk, as first-fruits, 2 Kings iv. 42.

Moses remarks, that when the hail fell in Egypt, the flax and the barley were bruised and destroyed, because the flax was full grown, and the barley forming its green ears; but the wheat, &c. were not damaged, because they were only in the blade. This was some days before the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt; or before the passover. In Egypt, barley harvest does not begin till toward the end of April. Pliny, lib. xviii. cap. 18. Leo Afric. Cassian. collat. xv. cap. 4, &c.

BARNABAS, בְּרִינָבָא, Βαρναβας: son of the prophet; from בָּר bar, a son, and נָבִי nabi, a prophet; otherwise, son of consolation; from the Syriac יָבֵה jabah.

BARNABAS, a disciple of Jesus Christ, and companion of St. Paul in his labours; he was a Levite, native of the isle of Cyprus. He had also, the name of Joseph, or Joses; and some Greek copies, instead of Barnabas, call him Barsabas, who drew lots with Matthias, to fill the place of Judas, Acts i. 23. It is believed that he sold all his temporal fortune, and laid the price of it at the apostles' feet. He was brought up with Paul at the feet of Gamaliel. When that apostle came to Jerusalem, three years after his conversion, Barnabas introduced him to the other apostles, Acts ix. 26, 27; about A. D. 37.

Five years afterwards, the church of Jerusalem being informed of the progress of the gospel at Antioch, sent Barnabas thither, who beheld with great joy, the wonders of the grace of God, Acts ix. 22, 24. He exhorted the faithful to perseverance. Sometime afterwards he went to Tarsus, to seek Paul, and bring him to Antioch, where they dwelt together two years, and converted great numbers; and here the disciples were first called Christians. They left Antioch, A. D. 44, to convey alms from this church to that of Jerusalem. At their return, they brought John Mark, Barnabas's cousin. [nephew?]

While they were at Antioch, the Holy Ghost ordered that they should be separated for those labours, to which he had appointed them. After praying and fasting, and imposition of hands, they departed into Cyprus: at Salamis they converted Sergius Paulus, the pro-consul.

They preached at Perga in Pamphylia, without much success, by reason of the obstinacy and malice of the Jews. They came to Iconium, where they made many converts: but the Jews stirred up a sedition, and obliged them to retire to Derbe and Lystra, in Lycaonia. Here St. Paul curing one Æneas, who had been lame from his birth, the people of Lystra regarded them as gods, (calling Barnabas, Jupiter, and Paul, Mercury) and would have sacrificed to them, which the two apostles, with great difficulty, hindered: nevertheless, soon afterwards, they were persecuted in this very city.

Having revisited the cities through which they had passed, and where they had preached the gospel, they returned to Antioch, in Syria.

A. D. 51, Barnabas was sent, with Paul, from Antioch to Jerusalem, on occasion of disputes concerning the observation of legal rites, to which the Jews wanted to subject the Gentiles. Paul and Barnabas were present in the council at Jerusalem, and returned immediately to Antioch; Peter, arriving there soon afterwards, was seduced to countenance, in some degree, by his conduct, the observation of the Mosaic distinctions. Barnabas, too, [who being by descent a Levite, might retain some former notions] used the like dissimulation; but Paul reproved Peter and Barnabas with great freedom.

Paul afterwards determining to visit the churches, in the isle of Cyprus, and in Asia Minor, Barnabas desired that John Mark might accompany them: but Paul objected, because Mark had left them on the first journey. Hereupon the two apostles separated: Paul went toward Asia, and Barnabas, with Mark, to Cyprus. This is all we know, certainly, concerning Barnabas. We cannot rely on the Acts which go under the name of Mark; nor on his life, written by a monk of Alexandria. It is said, Barnabas was stoned to death at Salamis, by the Jews of Cyprus,—that his body was discovered in this island in the reign of the emperor Zeno;—that his body was found in his grave; and, on his breast the gospel of St. Matthew, written in Greek with his own hand. About A. D. 488. The Greeks and Latins observe his festival, June 11.

We have an Epistle under the name of Barnabas, which is cited by several ancients, and by some has been thought canonical. It is certainly very inconvenient to own it, as being truly a work of Barnabas, without admitting it as canonical: nevertheless, we know that it never has been received as inspired: and we may well question, whether it be genuine. We acknowledge that it is ancient, and of the apostolic times. The design of it is to prove,—that the law is abolished by the gospel,—that the legal ceremonies are useless, and,—that the incarnation and death of Christ were necessary.

[It abounds in figurative explications of various passages of Scripture, in allegory, and allusion. It may, perhaps, be esteemed a specimen of the manner of Judaizing teachers of Christianity; and if such kind of comments were in request at that time among the Jews, (as we have reason to believe,) it fully justifies the allegories used by Paul, as a means of gaining the attention of those to whom he wrote, and of showing them his learning in that mode which they most esteemed. If this be fact, that apostle has been very sparing in a kind of writing, of which, no doubt, he was fully master, having been educated at the feet of Gamaliel.]

Under the name of Barnabas, a spurious gospel is mentioned by Pope Gelasius, in his decree against apocryphal books. We know no copy of it; but the Turks have a counterfeit gospel, under the name of Barnabas, wherein are related abundance of things injurious to Jesus Christ, and honourable to Mahomet. It was composed in Arabic, as M. de la Crose thinks, under the emperor Frederic II. A. D. 1211, to 1245, and was translated into Italian about the middle of the fifteenth century.

In this gospel, Barnabas, who says he was particularly commissioned to write it, calls himself an apostle; says he lived in great familiarity with Jesus Christ and the blessed Virgin; conceives himself better instructed than Paul in the merit of circumcision, and the use of meats allowed, or prohibited; says, that the infernal torments of the Mahometans will not be eternal; calls Jesus Christ plainly no more than a prophet; relates that he was not crucified, but that he being transported to the third heaven, Judas was transformed precisely into his likeness, and received the reward of his villainy, by suffering in his stead; that the Virgin Mary herself, and the apostles, believed Jesus to have been nailed upon the cross, so accurately did Judas resemble him; but, that Jesus obtained permission to come and comfort his mother, and his apostles; that God, as a punishment for the liberty men had taken, in attributing to him the name of God, has suffered him, and will suffer him, to the end of the world, to be the error of mankind; who continue persuaded, that it was Jesus who died on the cross. [Professor WHITE has given extracts from this gospel, at the end of his "Sermons at the Bampton Lectures." This history was believed by some, who called themselves Christians. Two reflections naturally arise on this statement; (1) the universal and extreme hatred of Judas's villainy, which even became a popular form of cursing in neighbouring countries; (2) the general attribution of the name of God to Christ, so much blamed by Mahomet.]

BARSABAS,

BARSABAS, בִּרְשָׁבַע, Βάρσαβας: son of return, or of conversion; from בִּר bar, a son, and שׁוּב shub, return, conversion: otherwise, son of rest; from שׁוּבָה shubah, or, שָׁבָה shaba, son of shabath, rest: otherwise, son of swearing; from שְׁבַע shabah. [Son of Plenty?]

I. BARSABAS. Joseph Barsabas, surnamed The Just, was an early disciple of Jesus Christ, and, probably, among the seventy, Acts, i. 21, 22, &c. After the ascension of our Saviour, while the apostles kept together, expecting the descent of the Holy Ghost, Peter proposed to fill up the place of Judas, the traitor, by one of those disciples who had been constant eye-witnesses of our Saviour's actions. Two persons were selected, Barsabas, surnamed Justus, and Matthias; the lot determined for Matthias. Papias (apud Euseb. lib. iii. cap. 39) informs us, that Barsabas having drank poison, the ill effects of it were miraculously prevented. We know nothing of his life. The martyrologists fix his festival, July 20, and tell us, that after he had suffered much for the gospel, he died in Judæa. Vide Euseb. lib. i. cap. 12, ex Clem. Alex. Beda in Acta. Epiphan. de Christo. cap. 4.

II. BARSABAS. Judas, one of the principal disciples, mentioned Acts, xv. 22, & seq. was surnamed Barsabas; he, and others, were sent from Jerusalem, with Paul and Barnabas, to Antioch, carrying a letter with the council's decree. Judas, (i. e. Barsabas) and Silas, staid here some time, instructing and confirming the brethren; after which, they returned to Jerusalem.

BARTHOLOMEW, Βαρθολομαῖος: a son that suspends the waters; from בִּר bar, a son, and תָּלַח thalah, to suspend, and מַיִם maim, waters: or rather, perhaps, son of Ptolemy.

BARTHOLOMEW, was of Galilee (Acts, i. 13; ii. 7): but where born, we cannot tell. The gospel says little of him, nor have we any certain history of him. It is generally believed, that he preached the gospel in the Indies; [Euseb. lib. v. cap. 10.] and that he carried the gospel of Matthew, in Hebrew, where Pantenus found a copy of it a hundred years after. Euseb. lib. v. cap. 11. Hieronym. de Viris illustrib. cap. 36. We are told, likewise, that he preached in Arabia Felix, and Persia, which he might do, in passing through those countries to India.

We know not, with certainty, the time, place, or manner of his death. The modern Greeks and Latins agree, in saying that he died in the city of Albana, which, perhaps, is Albana, in Albania, on the Caspian Sea, and on the confines of Armenia. This country has sometimes been included under the name of the Indies. It is believed, that Bartholomew was stayed alive by Astygæ, brother to Polemon, king of Armenia, out of hatred to the Christian religion, which the apostle had prevailed on Polemon to embrace: but this is very uncertain.

Many are of opinion, that Nathanaël and Bartholomew are the same person; they support this opinion by these reasons:—(1) No notice is taken of Bartholomew's calling, unless his and Nathanaël's be the same. (2) The evangelists who speak of Bartholomew, say nothing of Nathanaël; and John, who speaks of Nathanaël, says nothing of Bartholomew. (3) Bartholomew is not a proper name; it signifies—son of Ptolemy, besides which he might be named Nathanaël, i. e. Nathaniel, son of Ptolemy. (4) John seems to rank Nathanaël among the apostles, when he says, that Peter, Thomas, the two sons of Zebedee, Nathanaël, and two other disciples, being gone a fishing, Jesus showed himself to them. Rupert. in Joan. xxi. Jansen. Cornel. à Lapide. Hamm. in Joan. Tostat. in Matth. x.

[The Syrian writers affirm without hesitation, that Nathanaël is the same as Bartholomew: they call him "Nathanael-bar-Tholemy," and "Nathanael-ebn-Tholemy;" they say he accompanied his brother-apostle, Thomas, into the East: that they preached at Nisibis, Mosul, (or Nineveh) Hazath, and in Persia: that Thomas went on to India; but, I do not perceive, that they generally affirm the same of Bartholomew. Yet Amrus, a Syriac author, quoted by Asemann, writes, that "Nathanael-ebn-Tolemy, the disciple of Thomas, (rather, fellow-disciple with Thomas) and Lebbeus, of the twelve, with Addeus, (or Thaddeus) Marus, and Agheus, who had been of the seventy, taught Nisibis, al-Gezirat, (i. e. Mesopotamia) Mosul, Babylonia, and Chaldea; also Arabia, the East Country, Nebaioth, Huzzath, and Persia. Also, going into the greater Armenia, he converted the inhabitants to Christianity, and there built a church. Lastly, he removed to India, as far as China." This last particular may be true of Thomas; but is very questionable as to his associate Bartholomew. All other writers place the scene of this Apostle's labours in the regions around Persia and Armenia. The Syrian canons place the fifth seat of ecclesiastical honour at Babylon, in consideration of "Thomas, the apostle of the Hindoos and Chinese; and of Bartholomew, who is also the Nathanael of the Syrians." So that it may be taken, generally, that Bartholomew was the apostle of Mesopotamia and Persia.]

A spurious gospel of Bartholomew is mentioned by Pope Gelasius. Bernard, and Abbot Rupert, were of opinion, that he was the bridegroom at the marriage of Cana.

BAR-TIMÆUS, Βαρτιμαῖος: son of Timæus; Κ κ 2 from

from בַּר bar, a son, and תָּמַם thamam, finished, perfect.

BAR-TIMÆUS, a blind man of Jericho, who sat by the side of the public road, haggling, when our Saviour passed that way to Jerusalem. Mark, x. 46, 52, says, that Jesus COMING OUT OF Jericho, with his disciples, and a great crowd, Bar-Timæus, when he heard it was Jesus of Nazareth, began to cry out, Jesus, son of David, have mercy on me! and Jesus restored him to sight. But, Matthew, xx. 30, relating the same story, says, that two blind men, sitting by the way-side, understanding that Jesus was passing, began to cry out, &c. and both received sight. Mark notes Bar-Timæus only because he was more known, [and not improbably (as his name is preserved) was born in a superior rank of life, and to better hopes; therefore was no common beggar: if, besides, his blindness had been the cause of reducing him to poverty, no doubt his neighbours would mention his name, and take great interest in his cure. Probably, Timæus, his father, was of note in that place; as such was generally the case, when the father's name was taken by the son; and, perhaps, some of the neighbours who had known Bar-Timæus, in better hopes, who had often pitied, but could not relieve him, were the persons to encourage the blind man: Be of good comfort! Rise: he calleth thee. This does not contradict the supposition, that on this occasion, he, principally, expressed his warmth and zeal: that he spake to Jesus Christ, and distinguished himself by his alacrity, faith, and obedience. However, this two in Matthew may be nothing more than a literal adhesion to the Syriac dual form of expression; there being in this Evangelist other instances of the same idiom; as the two thieves, Matth. xxvii. 44. who reviled Jesus; whereas Luke mentions only one; and says, the other rebuked his companion.] N. B. The cure of another blind man, mentioned Luke, xviii. 35, 43, is different from this: that happened, when Jesus was ENTERING INTO Jericho; this, the next day, as he was COMING OUT.

BARUCH, בָּרוּךְ: who is blessed, who bends the knee; from בָּרַךְ barach.

BARUCH, son of Neriah, and grandson to Maseiah, was of illustrious birth, of the tribe of Judah. Baruch was the faithful disciple of Jeremiah the prophet, Jerem. li. 61. He served him as his secretary, nor quitted him till his death. In the reign of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, Jeremiah being in prison, (Jerem. xxxvi.) received orders from the Lord to write all his prophecies to that time. He sent for Baruch, and repeated them by heart to him. Some time afterwards, he sent him to read them to the people, then assembled in the temple: A. M. 3898; ante A. D. 605. This alarming the king's officers, they reported it to the king, who, having heard part of the book read, threw the rest into the fire.

God afterwards commanded Jeremiah again to commit his prophecies to writing. Baruch wrote them, as he repeated them; and the prophet added several to the former. Baruch's constant adherence to Jeremiah, drew on him persecution. One day, he being greatly disheartened, and complaining bitterly, God encouraged him by the mouth of Jeremiah, (Jer. xlv. 2, 3) after which he continued more tranquil. In the fourth year of Zedekiah, Baruch went to Babylon, with his brother, Seraiah, and carried a letter from Jeremiah, wherein the prophet foretold the misfortunes which should befall Babylon; and promised the captives a return to liberty. Baruch read Jeremiah's letter to king Jehoiachin, and other captives; after which he threw it into the Euphrates, as the prophet had commanded.

The captives, having heard Jeremiah's letter, were strongly affected, and gave Baruch money, wherewith to offer sacrifices to the Lord at Jerusalem. They wrote, likewise, a letter to their brethren of Jerusalem, perhaps by Baruch's hand. (vide Baruch, Apoc.) Being returned to Jerusalem, Baruch continued his attendance on Jeremiah; and when Jerusalem was besieged by Nebuchadnezzar, Jeremiah being imprisoned, Baruch was confined also: after the surrender of the city, Nabuzaradan showed him favour, set him at liberty, and permitted him to go where he pleased, with Jeremiah. Joseph. Antiq. lib. x. cap. 11.

The remains of the people left under Gedaliah, resolved to go into Egypt; but Jeremiah opposing this, they laid the blame on Baruch, and pretended that he engaged the prophet to this opposition. Jeremiah and Baruch being obliged to accompany the people into Egypt, Jeremiah died there, and Baruch retired to Babylon; where the Rabbins say he died, in the twelfth year of the captivity.

BARUCH, book of, in the Apocrypha, is not extant in Hebrew, but in Greek only: the Jews, among whom it is a standing rule to receive no books into the canon, but what are written in their language, exclude Baruch. Jerom speaks of this book in a manner which shews that he did not esteem it canonical. He says [Pref. in Exposit. Jerem.] he did not think proper to comment on Baruch, (which, in the LXX is joined with Jeremiah,) because it was not read among the Hebrews, and contains an epistle, which falsely bears the name of Jeremiah. Elsewhere, he says, he did not translate it, as he

he had done Jeremiah, because it was not in Hebrew, and the Jews did not admit it into the canon. We do not find Baruch in the ancient catalogues of the scriptures, cited by the Fathers and councils. Protestants, and even some catholic writers, exclude it from the canonical books. The council of Trent admitted it; with others of the apocryphal writings.

BARUTH. Vide BERYTUS.

BARZILLAI, or Berzellai, בִּרְזַלִּי: made of iron; from ברזל barzel: otherwise, according to the Hebrew and Syriac, son of contempt; from בר bar, a son, and זל zul, to despise.

I. BARZILLAI, a native of Rogelim, in Gilead: an old friend to David, who assisted him, when expelled from Jerusalem, by Absalom (2 Sam. xvii. 27, 28;) and came to meet him at Mahanaim, beyond Jordan, bringing refreshments with him. After the defeat of Absalom, when David returned to Jerusalem, Barzellai attended him to the Jordan; and David invited him to court; but Barzellai objected his age and infirmities, and sent Chunham, his son, in his stead: A. M. 2981; ante A. D. 1022.

II. BARZILLAI, a native of Melolath, in Simeon; father of Adriel, who married Michal, formerly wife of David, 2 Sam. xxi. 8.

III. BARZILLAI, a priest, married a daughter of Barzellai the Gileadite. Nchem. vii. 63.

BASCA, a town where Jonathan Maccabæus was killed. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 1. The first book of Maccabæus calls it Bascama.

BASCAMA, בַּשְׁכָּמָה: infamy, or confusion of anger, or of heat; from בִּישָׁה boshah, infamy, and חֶמָה chemah, anger: or, in the fire of anger.

BASCAMA, the same, probably, as Bezek, or Boskath, in Judah, 1 Macc. xiii. 23, was not far from Bethshan, where they who went into Gilead passed the Jordan, Judg. i. 4, 5, 6.

[BASCATH, a mass, or swelling, otherwise, in straits, or in effusion. Josh. xv. 39. 2 Kings, xxii. 1. called also BESECATH, or BOSCATH.

Some think, from the Arabic, "a raised way." Parkhurst prefers the idea of moistened, soft, or tender.]

BASHAN, בָּשָׁן: in the tooth, or in the ivory; from ב beth, in, and שן shen, a tooth, or ivory: otherwise, in the change, or the sleep; from שָׁה shanah, [or, in slumbering, or confusion, or ignominy. Num. xxi. 33. xxxii. 33. Isaiah, ii. 13. Deut. iii. 1. Psalm xxii. 13.

Probably, a corruption of Bethshan, or Beit-shan; whose present name is pronounced Bisan, or Baisan; which referred most likely to an image with the head of an elephant. Vide Plates, BETHSHEN. Simon thinks it imports a level, and soft soil, from the Arabic. This agrees with the character of the country as fit for pasturing cattle; and is applicable to an extensive province.]

BASHAN, the land of Bashan, otherwise the Batanæa, in the Peræa, i. e. beyond Jordan, north of the tribes of Gad and Reuben, and in the half tribe of Manasseh; is bounded east by the mountains of Gilead, the land of Ammon and East Edom; north by mount Hermon, south by the brook Jabok, west by the Jordan. Og, king of the Amorites, possessed Bashan when Moses conquered it. Bashan was esteemed one of the most fruitful countries in the world; its rich pastures, oaks, and fine cattle, are exceedingly commended. Reland. Palæst. lib. i.

BASHMATH, בִּשְׁמַת: perfumed; from בִּשָּׁם bushim: otherwise, confusion of death; from בִּישָׁה bushah, shame, or confusion, and מוֹת moth, death: otherwise, in desolation; from the preposition ב beth, in, and שָׁמָם shamam, to make desolate. Daughter of Helon the Hittite, wife of Esau. Gen. xxvii. 34.

BASIOTHIA, בִּזְיוֹתָא: his contempt, or his destruction; from בָּזָה bazah, and the pronoun ה hah, his: otherwise, in the olive yards of the Lord; from זַיִת zaith, and יָה jah, the Lord.

BASIOTHIA, or Bizjathjah, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 21. The LXX, instead of this name, read, "their towns and their farms."

BASMATH, daughter of Solomon, married Ahimaaz of Naphtali, 1 Kings, iv. 15.

BASON, or LAVER, of the Tabernacle, vide TEMPLE, and PLATES.

BAT, an unclean creature, having the body of a mouse, and wings not made of feathers, but of a leathery skin, expansible for the purpose of flying. It produces its young alive, and suckles them like four-footed animals; and does not, like birds, lay eggs. The Hebrew term, hatalaph, which is commonly interpreted bat, signifies a swallow, according to the Rabbins. There are bats in the East much larger than ours; they are salted and eaten.

The bat never becomes tame. It feeds on flies, insects, and fat things, such as candles, oil, and grease. It appears only by night, nor then, unless the weather be fine, and the season warm. Some of the bats of Africa and Ethiopia, have long tails like those of mice, which extend beyond their wings. Some have four ears, others only two: they build no nests, but bring forth their young in a hole or cleft, or cave, in tops or coverings of houses; some are black, some white, sallow, and ash-coloured. The old one suckles its young, as they are fastened to its teats; and when she is obliged to leave them, in order to go out and seek food, she takes them from her teats, and hangs them up against the wall, where they adhere by clinging. There

There are bats in China, some say, as large as pullets, and as delicate eating: those of Brazil, Madagascar, and the Maldives, are very large, and suck the blood of men, while they sleep in the night, fastening upon some uncovered part, which they at the same time refresh by the fluttering of their wings.

BATANÆA, vide BASHAN.

BATH, or Bathus, בַּת, חֹמֶץ: a daughter, or a house.

BATH, or Epha, a Hebrew measure, containing seven gallons, four pints, liquid measure; or three pecks, three pints, dry measure. Some have imagined that there was a sacred bath, different from the common, containing a bath and a half of the other; which they endeavour to prove, by what is said 1 Kings, vii. 26, of Solomon's molten sea, that it contained 2000 baths; compared with 2 Chron. iv. 5, which says that it held 3000 baths: but this difference is easily reconciled, by saying, that the brazen sea itself contained 2000 baths; but the rim, or lip of this vessel, contained one thousand more. [Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCLIV.] The LXX render this word sometimes βαῖθ; sometimes μετρητής, 2 Chron. iv. 5; sometimes κεράμος, Is. v. 10. The ancient Latin version translates it lagenæ. It was the tenth part of the homer, in liquid things, as the ephah was in dry measure. Ezek. xlv. 11: "the ephah and the bath shall be of one measure, that the bath may contain the tenth part of an homer; and the ephah the tenth part of an homer." Arbuth. Tables, &c. p. 99.

BATH-KOL, בַּת-כּוֹל: daughter of the voice: by this name the Jewish writers distinguish what they called a revelation from God, after verbal prophecy had ceased in Israel; i. e. after the prophets Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. The generality of their traditions and customs are founded on this Bath-Kol. They pretend, that God revealed them to their elders, not by prophecy, but by secret inspiration, or by tradition; which they call the daughter of the voice.

The Bath-Kol, as Dr. Prideaux shows, was a fantastical way of divination, invented by the Jews, like the Sortes Virgilianæ among the Heathen. For, as with them, the words first dipt at in opening the works of that poet, was the oracle whereby they prognosticated those future events which they desired to be informed of; so with the Jews when they appealed to Bath-Kol, the next words which they should hear drop from any one's mouth were taken as the desired oracle. See Prid. Connect. &c. Part II. book v.

BATH-SHEBA, בַּת-שֶׁבַע: daughter of swearing, of satiety: or the seventh daughter; from בַּת beth, a daughter, and שֶׁבַע shabah, an oath, seven, fullness, &c.

BATH-SHEBA, daughter of Eliam, or Ammiel, and wife to Uriah the Hittite, whose residence was at Jerusalem, not far from David's palace. That prince, one day, after sleeping at noon, (as customary in warm countries) went up to the terrace roof of his palace, from whence, in the garden of her own house, he saw Bathsheba bathing: as she was a beautiful woman, David sent to enquire who she was; had her brought to him, and committed adultery with her. Some time after, she informed David she was pregnant; David sent for Uriah, her husband, supposing he would naturally accompany his wife, when at home; but, Uriah spending his nights with the king's guards, counteracted the king's design. David then sent orders by this brave fellow himself, for his exposure to danger, whereby he was killed before the city Rabbah, then besieged by Joab. 2 Sam. xi. [Comp. FRAGMENT, No. CXXIV.]

Bathsheba after her husband's death, mourned as usual; which ceremony being over, David brought her to his house, and married her: soon after this, she was delivered of a son. The Lord sent the prophet Nathan to David, to convince him of his sin, by the parable of the ewe lamb, taken by a rich man from a poor man; and to threaten his punishment by the death of this child. David earnestly interceded for his son; but, on the seventh day, the child died.

After this, David comforted Bathsheba, and she became the mother of Solomon, A. M. 2971; ante A. D. 1033: whom God afterwards appointed, should succeed David in the throne; should build a temple to him; should be blessed with wisdom, riches, and understanding. Towards the end of David's life, Adonijah, his eldest son, having formed a party, presumed that the crown should descend to him rather than to Solomon: Bathsheba, therefore, visited David in his chamber, and related the behaviour of Adonijah. Nathan, the prophet, confirming her account, David gave immediate orders for the inauguration of Solomon. After the settlement of Solomon, Adonijah prevailed on Bathsheba to desire Solomon to give him Abishag, the Shunamite, who had been the last wife of David. Solomon treated his mother with all respect, but saw a deeper policy in this request than she did; and punished it by the death of Adonijah. This is the last mention made of Bathsheba. 1 Kings, xi. 12. [For her title of King's Mother, vide FRAGMENTS, No. XVI.]

1 Chron. iii. 5, and 2 Sam. v. 14, notice other sons of Bathsheba by David, viz. Shammuah, Shobab, and Nathan, beside Solomon. Some interpreters are of opinion, that these were sons of of Uriah, the Hittite; but the generality maintain, that they were sons of David. The text in Samuel is clear for this; and Luke gives the genealogy of Nathan, son of David, as one of the Messiah's ancestors. The passage in Proverbs, iv. 3, where Solomon says, he was the beloved son of his father, and the only son of his mother, proves no more than the very tender affection of David and Bathsheba for him. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCCXXXIII. "Genealogies."

The thirty-first chapter of the Proverbs has been considered as Bathsheba's instruction to her son, Solomon, which this prince placed in the collection of his proverbs, or maxims of morality; but, besides, that king Lemuel, like Agur, may be another person, whose writings are appended to Solomon's, because on subjects greatly similar, this chapter might really be written by Solomon, if, designing to do honour to his mother, he reduced the instructions which he received from her viva voce, into this form, and published them as if she had been their author.

BATH-SHUA, בַּת-שׁוּעַ: daughter of a cry; from בַּת bath, a daughter, and שׁוּעַ shava, a cry.

[BATHUEL, daughter of God, or measure of God, or desert of God. 1 Chron. iv. 30.

Rather, "separated to God;" as a measure separates what it encloses from the adjacent heap of corn, or, &c. Vide BETHUEL.]

BATH-ZACHARIAS, Βαθζαχαρία: the house of memory, or of remembrance; from זָכַר zachar: or habitation of the male; from sacar.

BATH-ZACHARIAS, a place near Bethsura, 1 Macc. vi. 32, 33. Epiphanius, in his "Lives of the Prophets," says, the prophet Habbakuk, was born in the territories of Bath-zacharias. Luke i. 39, 40, tells us, that the Virgin Mary visited Elizabeth, and entered the house of Zacharias, which may be understood of Bath-zacharias (the house of Zacharias) in the mountains of Judah, and neighbourhood of Hebron; but it is more natural to say, that Luke means to inform us, that the Virgin entered into the dwelling-house of the priest Zacharias.

Bath-zacharias is celebrated for a battle fought between Antiochus Eupator, and Judas Maccabæus. 1 Macc. vi. 30.

BAVAL, בָּוַל, Βαβαί: in mourning, in misery, in sorrow; from the preposition ב beth, in, and the interjection הוי hoi, alas! or misfortune. [From the Arabic, mercy of God.]

BAVAL, son of Henadad, after the captivity, contributed to rebuild Jerusalem. Neh. iii. 18.

[BAZIOTHIA, his contempt, or aversion, or his prey: otherwise, in the olive of the Lord. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 28.

Perhaps, "the spoils or preys of the Lord;" it might be a town, &c. consecrated to God, as his property, or portion; of which the revenues were to be expended in promoting some part of divine worship.]

[BAZRAH. In the territories of Hormuz: the people are industrious and honest. "They give one tenth of their dates to the king, like the people of Basrah; and whatever dates are shaken from the trees by the wind, they do not touch, but leave them for those who have not any, or for travellers: and it happened one year, that half the dates were thus blown off the trees, yet the owners did not take one of them." Ibn Haukal. Sir W. OUSELEY'S Trans. p. 143. The reader will compare these customs with some established by Moses. Exod. xxiii. Deut. xxiii. 24.]

BAZLUTH, בצלות, Βασιλῶθ: in the shade; from צַל tsel, shadow: or, in the roast: from צָלָה tzalah, roasted: or, in prayer, according to the Syriac. Head of a family, Ezra, ii. 52.

BDELLIUM, a gum from a tree, common in Arabia, and the East. Pliny (lib. xii. cap. 9.) says, the best bdellium comes from Bactria; that the tree which produces it is black, as large as an olive-tree, its leaves like those of an oak, its fruit like that of the caper-tree. Bdellium should be transparent, yellow as wax, bitter to the taste, and oily; it smells like the unguis odoratus, when burnt. There is bdellium, likewise, in the Indies, in Media, and in Babylon. In Hebrew, it is called Bdotak. Moses says (Gen. ii. 11) it is yielded by the country through which the river Pison runs; and that the manna of the Israelites was of the colour of bdellium, i. e. inclining to yellow. Numb. xi. 7.

BEALIAH, בעליה, lord of the idol; from Baal, and יה jah, the Lord; otherwise, the Lord God is my master, my sovereign, my husband. One of the thirty brave officers of David. 1 Chron. xii. 5.

BEALOTH, בעלות, Βαλῶθ: which are governed, or which govern; from בעל baal: otherwise, in elevation; from the preposition ב beth, in, and על alah, elevation: otherwise, the mistresses or sovereigns, the goddesses Baal.

[BEAM, vide EVE, ad fin.]

[BEAM, part of a weaver's loom; that, I believe, on which the part of the stuff that is woven is rolled, Judges xv. 1 Sam. xvii. 7.]

BEAN, בֶּעַן: in affliction; from ב in, and עני eni, or בען baian.

BEAN. It is said, 1 Macc. v. 4, 6, that the children of Bean were a shame, and an offence to the people of Israel, laying ambushes for them. Some think Bean is the name of a city, beyond Jordan, Numb. xxxii. 3: others, that Bean is put for Batanæa; others, that it is the name of a man.

BEAR,

BEAR, ursus; ἄρκτος, arctos; in Hebrew, דוב, dob, the growler. Bears were common in Palestine: David says 1 Sam. xvii. 34, 36, he had often fought with bears, and lions. Elisha having prophetically cursed some lads of Bethel, for insulting him, two she-bears issued from a neighbouring forest, and wounded forty-two of them, 2 Kings, xi. 23, 24. The sacred writers, to express the sensations of a man transported by passion, say, "He is chafed in his mind, as a bear bereaved," 2 Sam. xvii. 8.

The bear's claws are very hooked, and useful to him in ascending to the tops of trees: he feeds on fruits, honey, and flesh. There are white bears in the north; in Poland, Muscovy, Lithuania, and the great forests of Germany: [but, probably, this kind of bear was unknown in Palestine.]

Bears lie hid all the winter, and sleep. The male continues in this condition forty days, and the female four months: in all this time, they eat nothing. The flesh of bears was much esteemed by the ancients; even at this day, the ham of a bear, salted and smoked, is served up at the best of tables. This animal, rough and stupid as he seems to be, yet is capable of discipline; he leaps, dances, and plays a thousand tricks, at command.

The prophet Isaiah, xi. 7, describing the happiness of the Messiah's reign, says, the ox and the bear shall feed together; by the bear, say some, signifying the Gentiles, by the ox, the Jews, united in one church. Daniel, (vii. 5) in his description of the four great monarchies, represents that of the Persians under the figure of a bear, having three rows of teeth: by this, principally, intending Cyrus.

BEARD. The Hebrews wore their beards, but had, doubtless, in common with other Asiatic nations, several fashions in this, as in all other parts of dress. Moses forbids them (Levit. xix. 27) "to cut off entirely the angle, or extremity of their beard," i. e. to avoid the manner of the Egyptians, who left only a little tuft of beard at the extremity of their chins. The Jews, in some places, at this day suffer a little fillet of hair to grow from below the ears to the chin; where, as well as upon their lower lips, their beards are pretty long. When they mourned, they entirely shaved the hair of their heads and beards, and neglected to trim their beards, to regulate them into neat order, or to remove what grew on their upper lips and cheeks, Jer. xli. 5; xlviii. 37. In times of grief and affliction, they plucked away the hair of their heads and beards, a mode of expression common to other nations under great calamities. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XCIII.

The king of the Ammonites, designing to insult David in the person of his ambassadors, cut away half of their beards, and half of their clothes; i. e. he cut off all their beard on one side of their faces; 2 Sam. x. 4, 5; 1 Chron. xix. 5. To avoid ridicule, David did not wish them to appear at court till their beards were grown again.

When a leper was cured of his leprosy, he washed himself in a bath, and shaved off all the hair of his body; after which, he returned into the camp, or city; seven days afterwards, he washed himself, and his clothes again, shaved off all his hair, and offered the sacrifices appointed for his purification. Lev. xiv. 9.

The Levites, at their consecration, were purified by bathing, and washing their bodies and clothes; after which, they shaved off all the hair of their bodies, and then offered the sacrifices appointed for their consecration. Numb. viii. 7. Vide TO SHAVE.

BEAST, an animal destitute of reason; usually a quadruped, and usually living on land. God created the beasts of the earth, and man, on the sixth day; he brought the fowls, and the animals to Adam, to receive their names, thereby beginning his exercise of that dominion which God had given him over the creatures. The Lord blessed man, the fowls, fishes, and beasts; commanded them to multiply, and gave them the fruits, and herbs of the earth for food. It was not till after the deluge, that God granted flesh as food to mankind; and, even then, he forbade the eating of blood, threatening to punish the violent shedding of it, and to chastise even beasts, which should shed human blood.

By the law of Moses, (Exod. xxi. 28, 29) every beast which should kill a man, or was abominably polluted, (Lev. xx. 15, 16) was punished with death. Cities guilty of apostacy, were devoted, not only their inhabitants, but their cattle. When Noah quitted the ark, with his children, and the animals, God says he made a covenant with him, his family, his descendants, and with the creatures, never to send such a deluge again over the earth, Gen. ix. 9. God, enjoining rest on the sabbath, declares, that cattle, as well as slaves, should enjoy the benefit of this repose, Isa. xx. 10. God smote in Egypt, the first-born of men and beasts; and as a memorial of his having spared the Hebrews, he commands the first-born of men, and of beasts, to be consecrated to him.

The Egyptians, among whom the Hebrews dwelt long, adored beasts; so did the Israelites, who worshipped the golden calf in the wilderness; and those who, after Jeroboam's schism, continued to adore the like figures.

The doctrine of Transignation, was common throughout the East, and even among the Hebrews;

brews; remains hereof are visible among the Jews of our Saviour's time, and perhaps in the apostles, before they had received the Holy Ghost; this opinion supposes manifestly, that beasts are reasonable; because, it supposes, that the same souls which animated the wisest and most understanding men, pass successively into the bodies of beasts.

Omnia mutantur; nihil interit: errat & illinc
Hac venit, hinc, illuc, & quolibet occupat artus,
Spiritus, æque feris humana in corpora transit,
Inque feras noster, nec tempore deperit allo.

OVID. METAM. lib. xv.

These opinions are observable, with some variety, in Philo (de Somniis) and in the Rabbins.

Father Pardies, a Jesuit, wrote concerning the knowledge of beasts; to show, that they are not destitute of thought, or understanding. Willis likewise wrote on the souls of beasts.

Solomon, in Ecclesiastes, whether he proposes his own thoughts, or those of the philosophers and free-thinkers of his time, expresses himself in a manner which might be understood to insinuate that beasts possess understanding, and reasonable souls. "I have said in my heart, concerning the sons of men, that they might see that they themselves are beasts; for, as one dieth, so dieth the other, yea, they have all one breath; so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast.—Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?" Eccl. iii. 18, 19, 21.

But we should widely mistake the import of such passages, should we infer from them, that beasts are equal to man, in reason, or in a capacity of religion, of knowing God, of attaining celestial felicity, and of acting on spiritual principles. The knowledge, reasoning, desires, designs of beasts, are limited to the discernment of what may contribute to their immediate and instant enjoyment, their temporal happiness, and the multiplication of their species. They may, indeed, determine between hot and cold, between enjoyment and danger, but not between moral good and evil, between just and unjust, lawful and unlawful; we may suppose them, if any one will insist on it, immortal and eternal; but this privilege is common to them with bodies, and matter, the essence whereof is indefectible, and cannot perish. Matter may be changed in its figure, or situation; it may rest, or may be put in motion; but it cannot be annihilated, unless God ceases to preserve it: and, in this sense, the angels themselves, and the souls of men, have no greater privilege than matter.

But what becomes of the animating principle of beasts, when separated from matter? We reply, that we have no principles whereby we can discover it; neither revelation, nor experience, nor reasoning, furnishes light in this particular. We know that God created all things for his glory; but, can beasts be capable of an active knowledge and love of their Creator? If not, he must be glorified by them some other way: as, doubtless, he is glorified passively by simple matter; but surely not in any other sense, than as showing forth his glory, his wisdom, power, &c.

A great objection is borrowed from Austin, against the souls of beasts; "under a just God, no one can be unhappy that does not deserve it." Now, if beasts have sense and reason, they are unhappy; they, therefore, have deserved to be so: and this desert must arise from sin. Now, supposing they have sinned, are they not then capable of virtue? of the love and knowledge of God? Let it be granted, they are miserable; since men kill, and eat them, subject them to the hardest labours, beat them, use them shamefully ill, and persecute them, without reason: if beasts were capable of sense and reason, would God have given sinful man such entire dominion over them?

It may be replied, that God being sovereign over his creature, may dispose of it as he pleases, without giving an account of his conduct. God created beasts; to man he has given dominion over them; he has permitted man to eat, and consequently, to kill them: man uses this power; of what then can beasts, if we suppose them reasonable, complain?—of dying? Man dies: wherein differs death by slaughter, from death by disease? Will they tell God, that they are innocent, nevertheless he subjects them to wicked, brutal, foolish men? but consider—are not mankind, the best of mankind, also subject to calamities, to diseases, &c. &c.

[On the subject of beasts, we should recur to the distinctions of life:—body, soul, spirit. Body we grant them; soul, i. e. animal life, we also grant them: this they enjoy up to fixed degrees, each possessing that kind, degree, power, duration, &c. appropriate to its species; transmitting that to its posterity, but without improvement as without variation. Herein is the animal life, or soul, distinct from reason, which is infinitely various, capable of unlimited improvements, and of strong desires after still farther acquisitions. Instinct, then, is a confined, contented, satisfied quality; reason, is directly the contrary: and this strongly characterises the active nature of spirit, which is a higher principle of life, bestowed on man for higher purposes of existence.

We should also remember, that, however beasts may appear to be subjected to human cruelty, yet, in fact, not one in ten millions of animals in general, is so; witness those myriads of wild creatures around our dwellings; and those where man has no residence; witness birds, who fly from his power, those who swim, those who dwell on rocks, &c. &c.; witness the reptile tribes, the fishes, and above all, insects, in their innumerable species! and, microscopic insects! Surely not one living being in a hundred millions, ever comes under the power of man! These ideas are distinct from the consideration, that beasts, having no foreknowledge, are not unhappy; they have no anxious apprehensions:—these never enter into their catalogue of miseries, whereas, these are the chief among human woes: anticipations of evil, are the severest of human sufferings; and this strongly characterises the nature of reason, and manifests its capacity for extending its views into futurity: a futurity not limited by the narrow confines of time and sense.]

BEAUTY. The Hebrew נָוֶה naveh, which signifies beauty, is likewise taken for a dwell-ing. The Lord hath loved the beauty of Jacob, his temple, his selected place of abode in Jacob, Ps. xlvii. 4. In Psalm l. 2, Sion his beauty, may be expounded in the same manner. In Psalm lxiii. 12, Heb. the habitation of the house, they who continued at home, divided the spoil with those who went to war. The temple of the Lord, and his tabernacle, the places of his abode among men, are called his habitation. God delivered the beauty of the Israelites, the ark of the Lord, into the hands of the Philistines. [The idea of excellence suits all these places.]

BEBAI, בְּבַי: the ball of the eye; from בָּבָה babah, hollow, void. His children returned from Babylon, 623 in number, Ezra, ii. 11.

BECAH, or Bekah, half a shekel. A bekah, in Dr. Arbuthnot's Table of Reductions, is 13d. 11-16ths. In Dr. Prideaux's computation, 1. 6. The half shekel was called bekah, from the verb baka, which signifies, divided into two parts. Every Israelite paid one bekah yearly, for the support, repairs, &c. of the temple, Exod. xxx. 13. See Math. xvii. 23, and DIDRACHMA.

BECHER, בֶּכֶר: first-born, and first-fruits: otherwise, in the ram; from the preposition ב beth, in, and בֶּר car, a ram.

I. BECHER, son of Ephraim, chief of a family, Numb. xxiv. 35.

II. BECHER, son of Benjamin, father of Zemira, &c. Gen. xvi. 21; and 1 Chron. vii. 6, 8.

BECHORATH, בְּכוֹרִית: primogeniture, first-fruits. Son of Aphia, great-grandfather of Kish, father of Saul, 1 Sam. ix. 1.

BEDAD, בֶּדַד, בָּדַד: alone, solitary; from בֶּד bad: otherwise, in friendship, or in the bosom, or the nipple; from the preposition ב beth, in, and דָּד dad, a nipple, or דָּד dod, friend, or friendship.

BEDAD, father of Hadad the Edomite. Gen. xxxvi. 35. 1 Chron. i. 46. The LXX. call him Barad.

BEDAN, בֶּדָן only, or lever; from בֶּד bad: otherwise, in the judgment, or according to judgment; from the preposition ב beth, in, and דָּן dun, judgment.

BEDAN. 1 Sam. xii. 11, says, the Lord sent several deliverers of Israel—Jerubbaal, BEDAN, Jephthah, Samuel. Jerubbaal, we know, is Gideon; but we nowhere find Bedan among the judges of Israel. The LXX. instead of Bedan, read Barak; others, think Bedan is Jair, of Manasseh, who judged Israel twenty-three years, Judg. x. 3. There was a Bedan, great-grandson to Machir, and Jair was descended from a daughter of Machir. The Chaldee, the Rabbins, and after them the generality of commentators, conclude that Bedan was Samson, of Dan; but I prefer the opinion, which supposes Bedan and Jair to be the same person. The names of Samson and Barak were added in many Latin copies before the corrections of them, by the Roman censors, were published. The edition of Sixtus V. reads, "Jerobaal, & Baldan, & Samson, & Barak, & Jephthe."

BEDEIAH, בְּדִיָּה: the only Lord; from בֶּד bad, only, and יָה jah, the Lord: otherwise, the lever of the Lord, from the same; one who, after the return from Babylon, separated from his foreign wife, Ezra x. 35.

BEELIADA, בְּעִלְיָדָא: manifest idol, or master of science; from baal, an idol, master, and יָדָא jadah, to manifest, to know. A son of David, 1 Chron. xiv. 7.

BEEL-TEEM, בְּעִלְטֵעַם: an idol, or he that possesses; the taste, reason, the discourse; from טַעַם takam, the taste, and בָּעַל baal, master.

BEEL-TEEM, or Rehum Beel-teem. Rehum was his name, Beel-teem was his title of dignity; which some believe to have been counsellor, or secretary, or chief treasurer. He was the chief officer of the king of Persia, who commanded in Samaria and Palestine. He wrote to Artaxerxes, (otherwise Smerdis, or Oropastes) the successor of Cambyses, to oppose the re-building of the temple of Jerusalem, Ezra, iv. 9, & seq. [Chief Taster to the king?]

BEEL-ZEBUB, בְּעִלְזְבוּב, Βελζεβυβ: god of the fly; from baal, and זְבוּב zebub, a fly.

BEEL-ZEBUB. The form and quality of this ridiculous god are disputed.

Beel-zebub, or, as he is called in the Greek and Latin, Beel-zebub, or Beel-zebub, had a famous temple and oracle at Ekron. Ahaziah, king of Israel, having fallen from the terrace of his house, and received dangerous bruises, sent to consult Beel-zebub, whether he should recover. 2 Kings, i. 2, 3, &c. In the New Testament, Beel-zebub is called prince of the devils, Matth. xii. 24; Mark, iii. 22; Luke, xi. 15.

Some are of opinion, that the name of Achor, the god invoked at Cyrene against flies, comes from Accaron, the city where Beel-zebub was worshipped: others, that the true name which the Philistines gave their deity, was Beel-zebach, god of sacrifice; or Beel-zebaath, god of hosts, or Beel-zebul, god of the habitation, or of heaven; and that the Jews, who delighted in disfiguring the names of false gods, by punning upon them, and who were scrupulous of calling them by their proper appellations, gave him, in derision, that of god fly, or god of ordure. The name of Beel-zebuth, is not very different from that of Beel-zebaath, god of hosts.

Some commentators suppose, that the true name of this deity was Belsamin, the god of heaven; others conceive, that this deity was called the god of flies, because he defended people from flies; as the Eleans adored Jupiter, the expeller of flies; so did the Romans too [not as the Eleans, and others by the name of Jupiter, but of Hercules Apomyius; though we no where read, that killing flies was one of the labours of Hercules.] Lastly, others believe that the fly or beetle accompanied his image, and gave name to it: q. d. Baal with the fly. The Egyptians (who lived near the Philistines) paid divine honours to the beetle. There are beetles in the Isiac Table, an ancient Egyptian performance. [There is lately added to the mass of curiosities in the British Museum, an Egyptian beetle of immense size, entirely covered with hieroglyphics and inscriptions, valued at £2,000.] Wisdom, chap. xii. 8, having said, that God sent flies and wasps to drive the Canaanites and Ammonites by degrees out of Canaan, adds, that God made those very things, to which they paid divine honours, the instruments of their punishment; which indicates, that they adored flies and wasps. There are medals, seals, and burnt-clay images, on which flies and beetles are represented; [Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LVI. See also BELZEBUB, on the PLATES] and the Ekronites, or others, might dread the same plague as the Egyptians suffered, Exod. viii. 24, & seq. [But it really does appear, that Ekron and its neighbourhood is pestered with a kind of fire-fly, or cincinnatiæ, whose stings occasion "a most violent burning tumour," at some seasons of the year. Vinisauf. Hist. A. S. vol. ii. p. 396. Harmer.] Why the Jews, in Christ's time, should call Beel-zebub the prince of the devils, we do not very well know.

The worship of this false god must have been practised in our Saviour's time, since the Jews accused him of driving out devils, in the name of Belzebul, prince of the devils; i. e. of Satan, Lucifer, or the chief of the rebel angels. This appears by our Lord's answer: "If Satan cast out Satan, he is divided against himself; how then can his kingdom stand?" Matth. xii. 24.

It is questioned, which is the true reading of Matth. xii. 24: whether Belzebul, as the Vulgate; or Belzebul, as the Greek, and the Oriental translations from the Greek; or Belzebuth, as the French pronounce it? The Hebrew always reads Belzebul. The LXX translate, Baal the fly; consequently, they read Belzebul.

BEER, or Beera, באר, a well. There is a town of this name, four leagues from Jerusalem, in the way to Shechem, or Naplouse; says Maundrell, Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem. It is probable, that Jotham, son of Gideon, retired to this place, to avoid falling into the hands of his brother Abimelech, Judg. ix. 21.

[There is also a Beer on the Euphrates, usually written Bir in the Maps.]

BEER-ELIM, Isaiah, xv. 8, i. e. the well of the princes, is probably the same with that mentioned, Numb. xxi. 17, under the name of the prince's well—Beersarim.

BEERAH, בארה, Bapà: the well; from באר beer: otherwise, who explains or illustrates; from the same: otherwise, in the light; from the preposition ב beth, in, and אור aur, light.

BEERAH, head of the tribe of Reuben; carried captive by Tiglath-pileser, 1 Chron. v. 6.

[BEER-RAMATH, the well, or declaration, of heights: or of darting; otherwise, high in light. Josh. xix. 8. The well on the heights. Vide RAMA. Eng. Tr. differs.]

BEERI, בארי, Beûp: my well; otherwise, in the lion; from the preposition ב beth, in, and אריה ariah, a lion.

I. BEERI, father of the prophet Hosea, Hos. i.

II. BEERI, father of Judith, wife of Esau, Gen. xxvi. 34.

BEEROTH, בארות, the wells, or illuminations; from באר beer, a well; otherwise, in the lights; from the preposition ב beth, in, and אור aur, light.

I. BEEROTH, a city of the Gibeonites, afterwards belonging to Benjamin, Josh. ix. 17; xviii. 25; 2 Sam. iv. 2; Ezra ii. 25. Eusebius says, Beeroth was seven miles from Jerusalem, toward Nicopolis. Jerom, instead of Nicopolis, reads Neapolis, or Naplouse. Reland prefers Eusebius's reading, Palæst. lib. iii.

II. BEEROTH, of the children of Jaakan. Deut. x. 6; Eusebius, Onomast. in voce Beeroth, says, this station of the Israelites was placed ten miles from the city of Petra. Numb. xxxiii. 31, 32, reads only Bene-Jaakan, instead of Beeroth—

Beeri-Jaakan, Deut. x. 6. [Where water is scarce, wells would naturally induce settlements, and give name to them; so Puteoli, the wells, Acts xxviii. 13. The property of wells would also be claimed by the residents around them; hence Beeroth-beni-Jaakan, the wells of the sons of Jaakan, Deut. x. 6.]

BEER-SHEBA, בֵּער־שֶׁבַע: the well or fountain of an oath; from בֵּער beer, a well, and שֶׁבַע shabah, an oath; otherwise, the seventh well, or well of satiety; from the same root.

BEER-SHEBA, here Abraham made an alliance with Abimelech, king of Gerar, and gave him seven ewe-lambs, in token of that covenant to which they had sworn, Gen. xx. 31. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LXIII. Beer-sheba was given by Joshua to Judah; afterwards it was transferred to Simeon, Josh. xv. 28. It was twenty miles from Hebron, south: here was a Roman garrison in Eusebius's and Jerom's time. The limits of the Holy Land are often expressed in Scripture, by the terms—"From Dan to Beer-sheba," 2 Sam. xvii. 11, &c. Dan being the northern, Beer-sheba the southern, extremity of the land.

BEEES, insects producing honey. Vide HONEY. Bees were unclean by the law. Levit. xi. 23.

BEESSERTAH, בְּעֶשְׂתֵּרָה: in his flock; from the preposition ב beth, in, and עֶשְׂתֵּרָה ash-tar, and the pronoun ה a, his, [or in his riches, or in the worm of the law, or of exploration. Josh. xxi. 27; comp. 1 Chron. vi. 71. Very probably this is a contraction of Beth Ashtaroth; "the temple of the Goddess Astarte," or of Beth Ashreh, the goddess of the Groves.]

BEGABAR, a city beyond Jordan, the prophet Nahum's country. Epiphan. de Vita & Morte Prophetarum. Probably the same as Bethabara.

BEGGING. Moses, exhorting the Israelites to alms-giving, says, Deut. xv. 4, 7, "To the end that there be no poor among you; for the Lord shall greatly bless thee:" and, a little lower, "If there be among you a poor man, thou shalt not harden thine heart, nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother." The text of this place does not speak of begging; but we know there were at all times poor persons, and beggars, among the Jews, as well as other nations. God, himself, says, Deut. v. 11, "The poor shall never cease out of the land." And we see in the gospels, beggars in Jerusalem, and other places, Mark, x. 46; Luke, xviii. 35, &c. The true sense of the passage in Moses is, that God will so plentifully bless the lands of the Hebrews in the sixth year, that though there be no harvest in the sabbatical year, yet none among them would be destitute if they observed his precepts; or, it was his design to recommend charity and alms-giving most effectually: q. d. "Be so charitable and liberal, that there may be no indigent person in Israel." The Jews, at this day, observe great order to prevent as much as possible there being any poor among them. [I have been told to the contrary, in England. But, since the first edition of this work was printed, the Jews have established a considerable Hospital for their poor, at Mile-End, near London. They have, also, obtained an Act of Parliament, authorizing them to enforce the payment of rates laid on their own people, for the support of their own poor: and it is hoped that the English Jews may not be behind their brethren in other countries, in their attention to the wants of the impoverished members of their community.] In the more considerable towns where they are settled, they have several confraternities, one whereof has the care of collecting alms for the poor; another for the redemption of captives; a third, for endowing young maidens. The Talmudists have a maxim, that they were never to send away a poor man without giving him something, if it were but a grain of corn. They give alms, and make collections public and private; and it is rare to see street-beggars of their nation, even in places where they are numerous.

BEGUAI, בִּגְוַי, Bayai: vide BIGUAI. He and his sons returned from Babylon with Zertubabel, Ezra, ii. 2, 14.

BEHEMOTH, בְּהֵמָה: from בֵּהֵם behem, animal: here in the plural. [q. THE ANIMAL?]

[Some have observed, that the Egyptian words preserved in Scripture, are all either in the plural form, or the feminine termination: they, therefore, suppose this to be an Egyptian word.]

BEHEMOTH. In Job (chap. xl. 40) is described an animal, called Behemoth, whose particular properties are narrated at large. Bochart has taken great pains to prove, that this is the hippopotamus, or river-horse: Sanctius thinks it was an ox: the Fathers suppose it was the devil: but, says CALMET, we agree with the generality of interpreters, that it is the elephant. Behemoth, in Hebrew, signifies beasts in general, particularly of the larger kind. The Rabbins tell us, that Behemoth is the largest four-footed creature that God created; that, in the beginning, he made two, male and female; the female he killed and salted, to reserve it as an entertainment for the elect, whenever the Messiah shall come: the male is still living, but when his time comes, God will kill it, and give it to the Israelites, who shall then rise from the dead. They are so fully convinced of these extravagancies, that they often swear by the share they are to have of Behemoth. Vide FRAGMENTS,

MENTS, No. LXV. and the PLATES, MEDALS of EGYPT. Vide ELEPHANT.

BEIZA, or Beizath, בֵּיזָה. This word, in Hebrew, signifies an egg; also, a measure used among the Jews: they say, an egg contains the sixth part of a log—three cubic inches 2-3rds. The Beiza was likewise a gold coin among the Persians; it weighed forty drachmas, and from this the word besam was formed; a besam is worth two dinars, and a dinar worth twenty or twenty-five drachmas. The Persians say Philip of Macedon owed Darius, king of Persia, a thousand beizaths, or golden eggs, for tribute-money; and that Alexander the Great, succeeding Philip, refused to pay them, saying, the bird which laid these eggs, was flown into the other world. Vide ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

BEL, בֵּל, בִּלָּה: ancient; from בָּלָה balah, to grow old, to perish: otherwise, nothing; from בֵּל beli, not, whence בִּלְמָה belimah, nothing.

BEL, or BELUS, the first king of Babylon, who, after death, received divine honours in that city, and throughout Chaldaea. We do not know whether Nimrod, or Belus the father of Ninus, or some other king, were the first worshipped under this name; or whether it were the Sun, Saturn, or Jupiter. (Vide BABEL.) Jeremiah, l. 2, speaking of the destruction of Babylon, by the Medes and Persians, says, "Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, Mero-dach is broken in pieces." In another place, "I will punish Bel, in Babylon, and I will bring forth out of his mouth that which he hath swallowed, and the nations shall not flow together any more unto him; yea, the wall of Babylon shall fall." This was executed under Cyrus, Darius son of Hystaspes, and the princes who succeeded them. Vide BABEL.

The Babylonians worshipped Bel as a god; they attributed to him the gift of healing diseases; they believed he ate and drank like a living person. Baruch (vi. 40, Apoc.) says, that a dumb person was presented to him, that he might restore the use of speech, as though he were able to understand. And Daniel (Apoc.) relates his detection of the cheat of Bel's priests, who came every night through private doors, to eat what was offered to their deity. Vide BABEL, TOWER OF BABEL.

BELA, בֵּלָה: which swallows up and destroys.

I. BELA, Bala, or Zohar. Gen. xiv. 28.

II. BELA, son of Beor, king of Dinhabah, in the east of Edom, Genes. xxxvi. 32.

III. BELA, son of Benjamin, chief of a family, Numb. xxvi. 38.

IV. BELA, son of Azaz. 1 Chron. v. 8.

BELEUS, or Belus, a little river of Judæa, which falls into the Mediterranean, about two furlongs from Ptolemais. Pliny says, lib. xxxvi. cap. 26, it rises from a lake, and does not run above four miles. Its waters are not good to drink; its bottom is marshy; but the water of the sea, flowing into its channel, washes the sand; and of this they make glass. The bank, from whence the sand is taken for this use, is not above five hundred paces in extent, and though for so many ages much has continually been carried away, yet it remains inexhaustible. Josephus, and Tacitus, lib. v. speak of it, as well as Pliny; but the authors who treat of the holy wars, take no other notice of the sands of Belus than of something then out of use, and known only by the writings of the ancients. It is said the making of glass originated from this river.

BELGA, בִּלְגָה: refreshment, or renewing; from בָּלַג balag: otherwise, old age of the body; from בָּלָה balah, to grow old, and גָּוָה gavah, the body. Chief of the fifteenth band of priests, established by David, 1 Chron. xxiv. 14.

BELGAI, בִּלְגֵי: old age of the valley; from בָּלָה balah, to grow old, and גַּי gai, a valley. Of the sacerdotal family: one who signed the covenant with the Lord, after the return from Babylon, Nehem. x. 8.

BELIAL, בִּלְעִי, Παράνομος, or Βελλιάς: wicked, of no account; from בֵּל bel, or בֵּלִי beli, not, or without, and יָלַח jahal, to do well; that is, who does no good. Vulgate, without a yoke, a libertine.

BELIAL is plainly Hebrew, absque jugo—implying a wicked worthless man; one resolved to endure no subjection; a rebel; a disobedient fellow; [an uncontrollable.] The inhabitants of Gibeah, who abused the Levite's wife, have the name of Belial—unrestrainables—given them, Judg. xix. 22. Hophni and Phineas, the high priest Eli's sons, are likewise called sons of Belial—of uncontrollableness—because of their crimes, and their unbecoming conduct in the temple of the Lord.

In later writings, Belial denotes the devil. Paul says, 2 Cor. vi. 15, "What concord hath Christ with Belial?" Whence we infer, that in his time the Jews, under the name of Belial, understood the devil, [as the patron, and epitome of licentiousness] by this term in the Old Testament.

BELL. Moses ordered, that the lower part of the blue robe, which the high-priest wore in religious ceremonies, should be adorned with pomegranates and bells, intermixed [alternately] at equal distances. The pomegranates were of wool, blue, purple and crimson; the bells were of gold. Exod. xxviii. 33, 34, Moses adds, "And it shall be upon Aaron to minister; and his sound shall be heard when he goeth in unto the holy place before the Lord, and when he cometh cometh out; that he die not." Some of the Hebrews believe that these little bells were round; others, that they were such as were commonly in use.

The kings of Persia are said to have had the hem of their robes adorned like that of the Jewish high-priest, with pomegranates and golden bells. The Arabian ladies, who are about the king's person, who serve and divert him, have little gold bells fastened to their legs, their neck and elbows, which, when they dance, make a very agreeable harmony. The Arabian princesses wear on their legs large hollow gold rings, containing small flints, that sound like little bells when they walk; or they are large circles, with little rings hung all round, which produce the same effect. These rings are open in one place, in the form of a crescent, through which they pass the small of the leg; besides these, they have abundance of flat bobs fixed to their hair, which is plaited, and hangs long behind; these, when they walk, give notice that the mistress of the house is passing, that so the servants in the family may behave themselves respectfully, and strangers may retire, to avoid seeing the person who advances. Traité des Caravannes, par M. Buzeron, p. 83. M. D'Arvieux. Coutumes des Arabes, cap. 17.

It was, therefore, in all probability, with some such design of giving notice that the high-priest was passing, that he also wore little bells at the hem of his robe; it was a kind of public notice that he was about to enter the sanctuary. In the king of Persia's court, no one might enter the apartments without giving warning; not by knocking or speaking, but by the sound of something, Judith, xiv. 8, 9. Thus, the high-priest, out of respect, did not knock by way of notice, when he entered the sanctuary; but, by the sound of the little bells at the bottom of his robe, he, in a manner, desired permission to enter, "that the sound of the bells might be heard, and that he be not punished with death."

As to the number of the bells worn by the high-priest, authors are not agreed. If they were small, there might be many used in embellishing the bottom of the high-priest's robe.

BELLS are frequently mentioned in Scripture; they were sometimes used in the temple. The figure of them is not known. In 1 Chron. xv. 19, the Hebrew terms them מִצְלֹחִים הַחֹשֶׁת לְהַשְׁמִיעַ mizleoth, or mizlothaim: they were of copper, their sound was sharp, and was audible at a great distance. The prophet Zechariah speaks of bells of the horses, i. e. probably hung to the bridles (or foreheads), [or belts round the neck] of war-horses, that thereby they might be accustomed to noise, Zech. xiv. 20. A horse which had not been trained, nor used to wear bells, was by the Greeks called—one that had never heard the noise of bells. The mules employed in the funeral pomp of Alexander the Great, had, at each jaw, a gold bell. Vide Scholiast. Aristoph. in Ravis, & Etymologic. ἐν κυνοδίῳ; & Hen. Steph. in Thes. in κωδωνσφαλεροπόλο.

BELLY: this word is often used as synonymous with gluttony; "The Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies," Tit. i. 12; and, "There are many whose God is their belly," Philip. iii. 19. And, Rom. xvi. 18, "They serve not the Lord Jesus, but their own bellies."

Belly is used, likewise, for the heart, the bottom of the soul. "The words of a tale-bearer go down into the innermost parts of the belly," and wound the very bottom of the soul, Prov. xviii. 8. And, Prov. xx. 27, "The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord, searching all the inward parts of the belly;" the spirit of man is like the light of God, which penetrates the very bottom of the soul. And, Prov. xxii. 18, "Preserve the lessons of wisdom; if thou keep it within thy belly," in thy heart, "it will not break out upon thy lips." Vulgate.

The belly of hell, the grave, or imminent danger of death. The author of Ecclesiasticus says, that he was delivered from the deep belly of hell: and Jonah, that he cried to the Lord out of the belly of hell,—from the bottom of the sea, from the great fish's belly. Vide HADES.

BELMA, בֵּלְמָא : nothing, nullity ; כָּל bel, or from בִּלְמָה belimah : otherwise, extreme old age ; בָּלָה balah. The same as Baal-meon, the master of the habitation.

BELMA, or Belmon, near the valley of Esdraelon. Judith, vii. 3.

[BELMAIM, the waters of Bel, or Belus. Judith vii. 3.]

BELMEN. Judith, iv. 4. Gr. the same, probably, as Beel-main; perhaps, Abel-main, of Naphtali, 2 Chron. xvi. 4; Abel-mehtra, as the Syriac reads, Judith, iv. 4, and vii. 3. So that Belmen, Belma, Belmaim, and Abel-mehola, may be the same place.

BELSHAZZAR, בלשצצר, Βαλζάσαρ: master of the treasure, or who lays up treasure in secret; from בעל baal, master, and אצר otzer, treasure.

BELSHAZZAR, son of Evil-merodach, and grandson to Nebuchadnezzar. This prince made an entertainment for a thousand of his courtiers, at which every one drank according to his age. Diodor. Sicul. Bibl. lib. xviii. Belshazzar ascended the throne of Chaldæa, A. M. 3444. He made this great entertainment in 3449; so that we allow him to have reigned but four years, Dan. v. 1, 2, &c. The king, deluded by wine, commanded the gold and silver vessels to to be produced before him, which Nebuchadnezzar, his grandfather, had brought from the temple of Jerusalem, that he might drink out of them, with his wives, his concubines, and his court: presently there was an appearance, as it were, of a man's fingers writing on the wall over-against the candlestick. Belshazzar observing this, was greatly astonished, and commanded all the diviners and sages of Babylon to be fetched, to explain this writing. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCV.

He promised great honours, but the Magi could comprehend nothing of this writing, which increased the disorder and uneasiness of the king and his court. The queen-mother, wife to the late Nebuchadnezzar the Great, [vide Origen & Theodoret. apud Hieronym. in Dan. v. also FRAGMENTS, No. XVI.] coming in, told Belshazzar of Daniel and his prophetic spirit. The king sent for him; Daniel performed what he required, was clothed with scarlet, received a gold chain, and was proclaimed the third person in the kingdom. That very night Belshazzar was killed, and Darius the Mede took his kingdom.

We are perplexed to reconcile profane history with this account in the sacred writings. It is generally believed that Evil-merodach was succeeded by Neriglissor; Neriglissor by Laborsaoardoch; and that Belshazzar is the same with Nabonidas, or Labyrites.

All the marks whereby Nabonidas is described in history, agree with Belshazzar. Herodotus, lib. i. says, that Nabonidas (or Labyrites) was the last king of Babylon; that he was not of Neriglissor's or of Laborsaoardoch's family; but was the son of the great queen Nitocris. Belshazzar, in like manner, is in Daniel the last king of the Chaldeans, son to a king of Babylon, (who can be no other than Evil-merodach) and to whom the queen dowager, by her influence over him, should seem to have been mother. Daniel, v. 2, calls Belshazzar the son of Nebuchadnezzar; but in the style of the Hebrews, grandsons or descendants are often named sons. Jeremiah, xxvii. 6, 7, says expressly, "the nations shall be subject to Nebuchadnezzar, to his son, and to his grandson, till the time come for vengeance on himself, and his country."

But whatever variations may be observed in historians, the result of their accounts is constant and uniform—that the prophecies against Babylon were, for the most part, literally fulfilled, at the death of Belshazzar. This city was then besieged by an army of Medes, Elamites, and Armenians, according to the predictions of Isaiah, chap. xiii. 17; xxi. 2; and Jeremiah, chap. l. 11, 27, 28, 29, 30, that the fords of the river should be seized; that confusion and disturbance should prevail throughout the city; that the bravest of the inhabitants should be disheartened; that the river Euphrates should be made dry, Jerem. l. 38; li. 36; that the city should be taken in a time of rejoicing; that its princes, sages, and captains, should be overwhelmed with drunkenness, and should pass from a natural to a mortal sleep, Jerem. li. 39, 57; that the city which was formerly so beautiful, so powerful, and so flourishing, should become a dwelling for bitterns and unclean birds, Isaiah, xiv. 23. [These particulars not only deserve the reader's notice in themselves, but also in the circumstance of their being delivered in progression: not all together; nor all by the same prophet; but at different times: the succeeding adding what a former had omitted, yet all agreeing in the same general issue and description.]

BELTESHAZZAR, or Balshazzar, בלשעצר; who lays up treasures in secret; from בלס balat, secretly, and אצר atsar, to lay up; otherwise, he that is in the polisher of the treasure; from ב in, לטש latash, the polisher, and אצר atsar, the treasure: or, he that secretly endures pain and pressure. The name given to Daniel, at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. i. 7.

BEN, בן: son; otherwise, who builds; from בנה banah: otherwise, intelligent; from בון bun.

BEN-ABINADAD, בן-אבירד: son of Abinadab; from בן ben, a son, and Abinadab; my father is a prince, or my father is liberal. Governor of the country of Dor; he married Taphath, daughter of Solomon, 1 Kings, iv. 11.

BENAIAH, בנייה, Βαυα: son of the Lord; from בן ben, a son, and יה jah, the Lord: otherwise, the understanding of the Lord; from בון bun, to understand, and יה jah, the Lord.

I. BENAIAH, son of Jehoiada, captain of David's guard. He took the two lions of Moab, i. e. the two cities of Ar, or Ariel; or the city Ar, divided into two parts by the river Arnon. He also killed a lion in a pit, in time of snow. He killed a giant five cubits high, who was armed with sword and spear, though he himself had a staff only in his hand. He adhered to Solomon against Adonijah; was sent by Solomon to kill Joab; and was made generalissimo in his place, 1 Kings, i. 36; ii. 29.

II. BENAIAH, or Benanias, son of Paath-Moab. After the return from Babylon, he separated from his foreign wife, Ezra, x. 30;—as did also

III. BENAIAH, son of Banai, and

IV. BENAIAH, son of Parosh.

[BEN-AMMI, son of my people, a son of Lot by his daughter, Gen. xix. 38. He was the father of the Ammonites.]

BEN-DEKAR,

BEN-DEKAR, בן-דקר, viç dakáp: son of him that pierces and divides; from בן ben, a son, and דקר dacar, to pierce, to divide: governor of several cities under Solomon, 1 Kings, iv. 9.

BENE-BERAK, a city of Dan. Josh. xix. 45. The Vulgate makes two cities of it, Bane and Barak.

I. BENEDICTION, or Blessing. The Hebrews, under this phrase, often understand—presente made by one friend to another; in all probability, because such are generally attended with blessings and compliments, both from those who give, and those who receive, Genes. xxxiii. 11; Jos. xv. 19; 1 Sam. xxv. 27; xxx. 26; 2 Kings, v. 15, &c.

II. BENEDICTIONS. Solemn blessings pronounced, or prayed for, by the priests, and by them given, i. e. wished to the people, in certain ceremonies. Moses says to Aaron, "Thus shall ye bless the children of Israel, saying unto them, the Lord bless thee and keep thee; the Lord make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up his countenance unto thee, and give thee peace." Numb. vi. 23, &c. He pronounced these words standing, with a loud voice, and his hands elevated and extended. The prophets also, and other inspired men, frequently blessed the servants and people of the Lord. The Psalms are full of benedictions of this nature. The patriarchs, when dying, blessed their children and families. God ordains, that on the arrival of Israel in the promised land, the whole multitude should be convened between the mountains Ebal and Gerizim, and that blessings should be published on mount Gerizim, for those who should observe the laws of God, and curses on mount Ebal against the violators of those laws. This was performed by Joshua, after he had conquered part of the land of Canaan, Jos. viii. 30, 31. Vide EBAL.

III. BENEDICTION signifies likewise—abundance. "He that soweth sparingly, shall reap sparingly; and he who soweth with benediction, shall reap with benediction"—abundance. 2 Cor. ix. 6. And again, "I exhorted the brethren that they would go before unto you, and make up before-hand your blessing, that it may be, as it really is, a blessing, and not of covetousness." And Jacob, Gen. xlix. 25, wishes his son Joseph "the blessings of heaven above," or rain and dew in abundance; "blessing of the deep that lieth beneath," or water from the springs; "blessings of the breasts and of the womb," fruitful women and cattle. "Thou fillest all things living with benediction," with abundance of thy benefits, Ps. cxiv. 16. [The idea is LIBERALITY.]

IV. BENEDICTION, Valley of Blessing; in the tribe of Judah, near the Dead Sea, and Engeddi, called the Valley of Berachah, or Blessing, after the miraculous victory of Jehoshaphat over the confederated army of Ammon, Moab, and Edom. 2 Chron. xx. 23, &c.

[BENE, or BENE-BERAK, sons; or buildings, or understandings. Josh. xix. 45. This name is by some taken as two names; by others as only one name. It was a city in the tribe of Dan; probably where the "sons of Berak" were established. Some suppose Berak means a flash of lightning.]

BENE-JAAKAN, בן-יעקן, Μαακάν: son of Jaakan, from בן ben, a son, and Jaakan. [Sons of trouble, or of labour; otherwise, builders of trouble, or of labour: or understandings in labour, or trouble. Numb. xxxiii. 31. the sons of Jaakan; and in Deut. x. 6. Beeroth-bene-Jaakan, the wells of the sons of Jaakan.]

Jaakan may signify, one who is adorned with a collar, or bracelet; by his fond parents, perhaps, says Simon.]

BEN-GABER, בן-גבר, son of man, or of the strong and powerful; from גבר gabar, or גבור gibbor, stout.

BEN-GABER, son of Gaber, of Manasseh; he possessed the cities of Jair, and the region of Argob, beyond the Jordan, 1 Kings, iv. 13.

BEN-HADAD, בן-חדד, son of Hadad.

I. BEN-HADAD, son of Tabrimon, king of Syria; came to assist Asa, king of Judah, against Baasha, king of Israel; he obliged Baasha to return and succour his own country, and to abandon Ramah, which he had undertaken to fortify, 1 Kings, xv. 18. This Ben-hadad is probably Hadad, the Edomite, who rebelled against Solomon, at the end of that prince's reign, 1 Kings, xi. 25.

II. BEN-HADAD, king of Syria, son of the above Ben-hadad; made war against Ahab, king of Israel, A. M. 3103, thirty-seven years after the war of Ben-hadad I. against Baasha. Vide AHAH. Ben-hadad was defeated, and lost all his baggage. His generals told him that the God of the Hebrews was god of the mountains only, and that he must attack Israel in the plain; where the God of Israel had no power. Ben-hadad pursued this advice the year following; but the Israelites killed 100,000 of Ben-hadad's people. Ben-hadad concealed himself, to avoid falling into the hands of Ahab. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXV.

Then Ben-hadad's servants advised to beg their lives of king Ahab; they went to him, therefore, and said, "Thy servant Ben-hadad—Ahab said, "he is my brother, bring him to me." Ben-hadad being come to Ahab, this king king received him into his chariot, accepted his conditions of peace, and let him go. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XLII.

About twelve years afterwards, A. M. 3115, the same Ben-hadad declared war against Jehoram, son of Ahab; but the prophet Elisha discovered Ben-hadad's plans to Jehoram, and thereby disappointed them, 2 Kings vi. 8, & seq. Ben-hadad suspected treachery in his officers; but learning, after a while, that his projects were revealed by Elisha, he resolved to seize the prophet, and understanding he was at Dothan, he sent thither a detachment of his best troops; the prophet struck them with obscurity of vision, and led them into Samaria, before they perceived it. Some years afterwards Ben-hadad again besieged Samaria, and the famine became extreme in the place: but, in the night-time, a panic fear struck the Syrian host; they imagined that Jehoram had procured an army of Hittites and Egyptians; and thought only of saving themselves by flight.

The next year, Elisha being gone towards Damascus, Ben-hadad, then fallen sick, sent Hazael with presents to the man of God, to learn from him whether there were hopes of his recovery? He answered, Go, tell him thou mayest certainly recover; however, the Lord hath showed me that he shall surely die. Hazael returning to Damascus, told Ben-hadad that his health would be restored; the next day he took a thick cloth, which he dipped in water, and spread it over the king's face, who speedily died. Hazael succeeded him. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. VII.

III. BEN-HADAD, son of Hazael, mentioned above. Jehoash, king of Israel, recovered from Ben-hadad all that Hazael had taken from Jehoahaz, king of Israel, his predecessor, 2 Kings, xiii. 3, 24, 25. Jehoash beat him three times, and compelled him to surrender all the country beyond Jordan, i. e. the lands belonging to Gad, Reuben, and Manasseh, which Hazael had taken.

Josephus calls those princes Hadad, who, in Scripture, are named Ben-hadad, i. e. son of Hadad; adding that the Syrians of Damascus paid divine honours to the last Hadad, and Hazael, in consideration of the benefits of their government, and particularly because they adorned the city of Damascus with magnificent temples.

BEN-HAIL, בן־חַיִל viòs ðunarw̄n: son of strength, or of riches, or of fortifications: otherwise, of grief and pain; from חַיִל chail, power, treasure, &c. Jehoshaphat sent him to the cities of his dominions to instruct the people, 2 Chron. xvii. 7.

BEN-HENNON, בן־הֶנּוֹן: son of Hennon; from בן ben, a son, and הֶנּוֹן hon, riches: otherwise, the son of him that deceives and makes sorrowful; from הֶנּוֹן hom, to afflict [2 Chron. xxviii. 3, xxxiii. 6. This may be derived from the Arabic to deplete, to draw out the voice in grief: "son of INTENSE LAMENTATION." Vide HINNOM, Valley of.]

BEN-HENNON, or BEN-HINNON, or Geh-hinnon, or Geh-bene-hinnon, i. e. the valley of the children of Hinnon, south-east of Jerusalem. Some say, it was the sink to Jerusalem, and an emblem of hell; which is called Gehenna, vide GEHENNA. This valley was likewise called Tophet, vide TOPHET. Vide also the MAP OF JERUSALEM.

BEN-HESED, בן־חֶסֶד: son of pity, or of insult; from חֶסֶד chesed. Governor of Sochoh, and Hopher, under Solomon, 1 Kings, iv. 10.

BEN-HUR, בן־חֹר, Benw̄p: son of the cavern, or the hole, or whiteness; from חֹר chur: otherwise, of liberty; from חָרַר charar, according to the Chaldee and Syriac, to make free: governor of Ephraim, under Solomon, 1 Kings, iv. 8.

BEN-JAMIN, בן־יָמִין: son of the right hand; from יָמִין jamin, the right hand, and בן ben, a son.

BEN-JAMIN, the youngest son of Jacob and Rachel. Jacob journeying from Mesopotamia, southward, with Rachel in company, she was surprised with the pains of child-bearing, about a quarter of a league from Bethlehem, (Gen. xxxv. 16, 17, &c.) and died, after the delivery of a son, whom, with her last breath, she named Ben-oni, i. e. the son of my sorrow: but Jacob called him Benjamin, i. e. the son of my right-hand. He is often called in Scripture Jemini only, i. e. my right hand: בן־יָמִין Ben-oni, בן־יָמִין Ben-jamin.

During the famine which afflicted Canaan, Jacob sending his sons into Egypt to buy corn, kept Benjamin at home. Joseph, who well knew his brethren, though they did not discover him, not seeing Benjamin among them, enquired very artfully whether he were living? and gave them corn, only on condition they would bring Benjamin to Egypt; he also detained Simeon till their return. Jacob, after great reluctance, at last permitted Benjamin to undertake the journey.

Joseph now seeing Benjamin among his brethren, carried them to his house, made them eat with him, but not at his own table; and, in the distribution which he made of the meat he sent them, Benjamin's portion was five times larger than that of any other. After this, Joseph commanded his steward to fill their sacks with corn; and in the sack belonging to the youngest, to put the silver cup which he used, and the money which Benjamin had brought to pay for his corn. When Joseph's brethren were gone out of the city, he sent his steward after them, who reproached them with their robbery. He searched all their sacks; and in that of Benjamin the cup was found. They returned to Joseph, who after much solicitude on their part, and tears on his part, discovered himself to them, fell on Benjamin's neck, kissed him, and all his brethren; and invited them into Egypt, with their father. He gave to each of them two suits of raiment; but to Benjamin five suits, with three hundred pieces of silver.

After this, Scripture says nothing of Benjamin. Jacob says of this tribe, "Benjamin shall raven as a wolf; in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil," Gen. xlix. 27. Moses, in his last song, says of Benjamin, "The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by him; and the Lord shall cover him all the day long, and he shall dwell between his shoulders," Deut. xxxiii. 12. These words, "Benjamin is a ravaging wolf," are allusively applied to St. Paul, who was of the tribe of Benjamin; but much more properly to the valour of this tribe. Vide Judges, xx.

BENINU, בנינו: our sons, our architects, or masons; our intelligent. [A Levite, Neh. x. 13.]

BENO, בנו: his son; from בן ben, a son, and the pronoun ו o, his: otherwise, his edifice; from בניה beniah: otherwise, his understanding; from בון bun.

BEN-ONI, בן-און, υἱος ὀδυνῆς us: son of my pain; from בן ben, a son, and און on, grief, pain, and ו i, my, or mine. See BENJAMIN.

BEN-ZOHEH, בן-זוח, υἱος ζαχθ: son of separation; from זוח zachach, to separate: otherwise, son of this fear, or of this bruising; from the pronoun זו zu, this or that, and זח chath, or זחח chathath, fear, &c. Son of Ishi, 1 Chron. iv. 20.

BEON, בען, Βαου: in affliction; from the preposition ב beth, in, and און honi, or honi, affliction or misery: otherwise, in the answer, or in the song; from אנה hanah, to sing, to answer: otherwise BEAN, Numb. xxxii. 3. [From the Syriac, deprecation. Some suppose this to be a contraction from Beth-aun, "the temple of dwelling," (i. e. of Baal.) I rather think the ideas are distinct; and that possibly it may refer to the root oneh, and import "the deity of clouds:" or the ruler over clouds: the sovereign in, or among clouds, the meteors of heaven; which we know was one character of Jupiter; "cloud-compelling Jove." Vide PLATES, MEDALS of PERSIA, No. 4.]

BEOR, burning; from בערה beherah: otherwise, foolish, mad, beast; from בער bahar, or בער bahir, stupid, beast: father of Bela, king of Dinhabah, in Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 32.

BERA, or Bara, ברע, Βαλχα: in evil; from the preposition ב in, and רע rah, bad, evil: or, in the companion; from רעה roke: otherwise, in crying; from רוע ruah. ["The Well:" or explanation, or declaration; otherwise, in his light. A town in Judah, Judges ix. 21.]

I. BERA, king of Sodom, in the time of Abraham; was tributary to Chedorlaomer, king of Elam. Bera, and four other kings of neighbouring cities, supported probably by the people around them, rebelled against the Elamites. Chedorlaomer, in company with three other kings, came and attacked Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zohar, plundered them, and carried off the spoil to Hobah, a little beyond the springs of Jordan. [See the PLATES: Map of CANAAN to Genesis.] Abraham pursued, overtook, and dispersed them; recovered the booty, and restored to Bera, and to the other kings of the Pentapolis, what had been taken from them, Gen. xiv. This is the first war expressly mentioned in Scripture: it happened A. M. 2092; ante A. D. 1912.

II. BERA, or rather Beera. Eusebius places a city of this name eight miles from Eleuthropolis, north. Vide BEER.

BERACHAH, ברכה: benediction and genuflection; from ברך barac. 1 Chron. xii. 3.

BERAIAH, בראיה: the creature of the Lord; from ברה barah, and יה jah, the Lord: or fattening; from ברא bari, fut, big: otherwise, in vision; from the preposition ב beth, in, and ראה raah, to see. 1 Chron. viii. 21.

BEREA, Βερέα: his well; from באר ber, a well, and the pronoun ה ah, his or her's.

[BEREA, his well, or his son, or his declaration. 1 Mach. ix. 4. Is this the same town as BERA?]

BEREA, Βερέα: heavy; from βαρος, weight.

BEREA, or Beroe, a city of Macedonia, near Mount Cithaues; where St. Paul preached the gospel with success. See the honourable character of the people, Acts, xviii. 10. See the PLATES, MEDALS of BEREÆ.

BERED, or Barad, ברד hail: otherwise, in the descent; from the preposition ב beth, in, and ירד jarad, to descend: otherwise, in the ruling; from רוד rud, to rule, and ב in.

BĒRED, a city in Judah, near Kadesh. The Chaldees call it Agara; the Syriac, Gedar; the Arabic, Jader; the same, perhaps, as Arad, or Arada, (Numb. xxxiv. 4.) in the south of Judah.

BERENICE, Βερνίκη: one that brings victory; Gr. φερω, I bring, and νικος, victory. If we derive it from the Hebrew, it may signify a well of perfume.

1. BERENICE, daughter of Agrippa the Great, king of the Jews, and sister to Agrippa the younger, also king of the Jews. She was first betrothed to Mark, son of Alexander Lysimachus, alabarch of Alexandria; afterwards she married Herod, king of Chalcis, her own uncle, by the father's side. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 5. After the death of Herod, she proposed to Polemon, king of Pontus and part of Cilicia, that if he would be circumcised she would marry him: Polemon accepted this offer, and the match was consummated. But Berenice did not continue long with him. She returned to her brother Agrippa, with whom she lived in such a manner as made all the world talk of her. Juvenal notices this incestuous commerce between the brother and the sister:

Deinde Adamas notissimus, & Berenices
In digito factus pretiosior: hunc dedit olim
Barbarus; incestæ dedit hunc Agrippa sorori.

SATIR. VI. v. 156.

Berenice was present with her brother Agrippa, and heard the discourse of Paul before Festus, at Cæsarea of Palestine. Titus, son of Vespasian, had a friendship for Berenice, and Vespasian himself made her large presents. Tacit. Hist. lib. ii. cap. 81. Some have said that Titus would have married her, had she not been a foreigner, and a queen, which connection the Roman laws forbade.

BERESCHITH, בְּרֵאשִׁית, iv ἀρχῇ: in the beginning; from the preposition בְּ beth, in, and רֵאשִׁית reshith, beginning.

BERESCHITH, in principio. This name the Hebrews give to the book of Genesis, because it begins with the word bereschith, in the beginning. Vide CABALA.

BERI, בִּרְיָ: from the Chaldee בִּרְ bar, a son, and the pronoun י i, my; otherwise, my wheat; from the Hebrew בִּרְ bar, and the same pronoun; or lastly, my well, from beer, a well. Son of Zophah, of Asher. 1 Chron. vii. 36.

BERIA, בְּרִיעָה: in the company, in evil, in clamour; from the Hebrew בְּרִיעָה ruah, and ב, in. Son of Asher, and father of Heber and Malchiel. Gen. xlvii. 17. Head of a family. Numb. xxvi. 44.

BERITH, or Baratres, a city of Phœnicia, on the Mediterranean, between Biblos and Sidon, 400 furlongs north from Sidon.

It is questioned whether Scripture speaks of this place? Some are of opinion, that the god Berith (vide BAAL-BERITH) was worshipped here, and that from him this city received its appellation; others derive it from Beroe, daughter of Venus and Adonis, the deity most honoured in this country; others, from beroth, wells, or springs; some, from berith a covenant, q. d. the god of covenants or contracts. There are several cities of this name in Palestine. David carried off a great quantity of brass from the towns of Bera and Berothai, in Syria, 2 Sam. viii. 8. Vide the PLATES, Medals of BERYTUS.

BERODACH-BALADAN, בִּרְדָּאךְ, Βαρδὰχ: who creates contrition; from בָּרָא bara, to create, and דָּאָ daca: otherwise, the son of death, or of thy vapour; from בֵּר bar, a son, and אֵד ed, vapour, and the pronoun י ec, thine: otherwise, the wheat, or the purity of thy cloud; or of thy vapour. 2 Kings, xx. 12.

[BAAL-ADON? the sovereign Lord.]

BERODACH-BALADAN, son of Baladan, king of Babylon. He sent ambassadors to Hezekiah, king of Judah, with letters and presents, on receiving information that he had been sick, and was recovered in a miraculous manner. Hezekiah, extremely pleased with the arrival of these ambassadors, showed them the riches and beauties of his palace. Afterwards, God sent Isaiah to tell Hezekiah that every thing in his palace, with the sight whereof he had entertained these foreigners, would be carried to Babylon. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. II. also for the following article, see the same FRAGMENT.

BEROSUS, the Babylonish historian, was, by nation, a Chaldean; and by office a priest of Belus. Tatian (contra Gentes) says, he lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and dedicated his work to king Antiochus, the third after Alexander, i. e. Antiochus Theos, or perhaps, Antiochus Soter; for the many years between Alexander and Antiochus Theos (some reckoning 64 from the death of Alexander to the first year of Antiochus Theos) might induce us to prefer this sense. Berosus having learned Greek, went first to the isle of Cos, says Vitruvius, lib. ix. cap. 7, where he taught astronomy and astrology; and afterwards to Athens, where he acquired so much reputation by his astrological predictions, that in the Gymnasium, where the youth performed their exercises, a statue, with a golden tongue, was erected to him, as Pliny says, lib. vii. cap. 37. Josephus and Eusebius have preserved some excellent fragments of Berosus's history, which greatly elucidate many places in the Old Testament; and without which it would be difficult to produce an exact series of the kings of Babylon. Joseph. de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 2, & de vita sua, lib. ii. cap. 25.

BEROTH, בְּרוֹת, λεκτών, ἐκ λεκτών: the wells; from בִּרְ bar: otherwise, the purities; from בִּרְ bar, pure, [or covenant, or cypress.]

BEROTH, (2 Sam. viii. 8,) a city conquered by David: probably Beroe of Syria, or Berytus in Phœnicia; [see BERTH] or,

BEROTHAI, or Berothai (בְּרוֹתַי, the well of of the Lord,) between Hethalon and Emesa, Ezek. xlvi. 16. See BEEROTH.

BERSABA, a town in Galilee. South of Upper Galilee, and north of Lower Galilee.

[BERSHEBA, well, or spring of swearing; or, well of saturation, or the seventh well, Gen. xxi. 14, 3; xxvi. 33. Josh. xix. 2.

Ptolemy writes Bersanam. From Josh. xix. 2, it should appear that there were two places named Sheba, one of which was distinguished by Beer, or the well, prefixed. But this may be read, "Beersheba otherwise Sheba." The LXX. read Samaa, which approaches the Bersanam of Ptolemy. Bersheba was on the borders of Judea and Egypt. Amos v. 5; Neh. xi. 27, 30.]

BERYL, the eighth stone in the high-priest's pectoral, Exod. xxviii. 10. The Vulgate, and LXX. call it Beryl; the Hebrew, Jasphe. We have already observed, that the proper significations of the Hebrew names of precious stones are unknown to us.

BESETHA, one of the mountains on which Jerusalem was built. It lay north of the temple. See the PLATES, MAP of JERUSALEM.

BESIRA, i. e. the well of Sirah, 2 Sam. iii. 26. Josephus places Besira twenty furlongs from Hebron.

BESODEIAH, בְּסוּדִיָּה: in the secret, or counsel of the Lord; from the preposition ב beth, in, and סוד sod, secret, or advice, and יה jah, the Lord: father of Meshullam, Neh. iii. 6.

BESOR, בִּשְׁוֹר: evangelization, or incarnation; from בִּשְׁוֹר bisher: otherwise, in the ox, or the wall; from the preposition ב in, and שוֹר shur, an ox, &c. [1 Sam. xxx. 9, 10, 21. Simon thinks, rather from the Arabic, cold, or the cold waters. Perhaps it denotes the spread-ing waters: "the wide-spread brook."]

BESOR, or Bosor, a brook which falls into the Mediterranean, between Gaza and Rhinocorura; or between Rhinocorura and Egypt, according to Jerom. This is the brook of the wilderness, Amos. vi. 14, which many have taken, unadvisedly, for the river of Egypt, mentioned in Scripture, which is the eastern branch of the Nile, Josh. xv. 4, 47; 2 Chron. vii. 8.

BETAH, בֵּטָח, БѢТАХ: confidence; from בֵּטָח batach: otherwise, in the hardening or rubbing; from the preposition ב beth, in, and טח tuach, to harden, or rub. [Fidelity: confidence, i. e. of the inhabitants.]

BETAH, or Beten, a city of Syria-Zobah: taken by David from Hadadezer, 2 Sam. viii. 6; possibly the Beten which Joshua, xix. 25, mentions as belonging to Asher; or Bathne, in Syria, between Beroœa and Hierapolis.

BETEN, בֶּטֶן: belly, or terebinthus.

[Josh. xix. 25. A town in the tribe of Asher, whose territories being mountainous, some suppose this city was situated in a hollow, or belly, between the hills: others, perhaps more probably, think it might take its name from some famous tree, of the terebinthine kind, which grew in the neighbourhood. The Arabic signifies low, depressed; and is much like the Greek cælo: whence Cælo-Syria, Syria in the hollow, or the belly; i. e. of Mount Lebanon: or between Libanus and Anti-Libanus. Vide BETONIM.]

N. B. In many of the following words, BETH may signify either house, or temple.

BETHABARA, בֵּית־אֶבְרָא: the house of passage; from בֵּית beth, a house, and אֶבְרָא habar, passage: otherwise, in anger; from עֲבָרָה haberah: otherwise, in the wheat, [or fruits] according to the Syriac.

BETHABARA, beyond Jordan, where John Baptist baptized, John. i. 28. The Latin, instead of Bethabara, reads Bethania; but the true reading is Bethabara, as Origen, Chrysostom, and Epiphanius observe: thought to be where Israel passed the Jordan under Joshua; the common ford of this river. [Probably the same as Beth-barah, Judges vii. 24. It was, no doubt, a regular passage over the river Jordan; and, as such, was resorted to by the Midianites when discomfited by Gideon. Whether it were also the passage adopted by the Israelites under Joshua is uncertain.]

BETH ACHARA, בֵּית־אֶחָרָה: house of the vineyard; from בֵּית beth, a house, and אֶחָרָה cherem, a vineyard: otherwise, house of their knowledge; from אֶחָרָה nicar, and אֶמ am, their's.

BETH-ACHARA, or Beth-haccerim (Jerem. vi. 1) a city situated on an eminence, between Jerusalem and Tekoa. Malchiah, son of Rechab, was prince of Bethhaccerim, Nehem. iii. 14. [In the tribe of Benjamin. "The temple surrounded by a vineyard:" and therefore most probably dedicated to Bacchus god of vines.]

[BETH AGLA, house of festivity, or of their revolutions.

1. A city in Judah, Josh. xv. 6. Eng. Tr. BETH-HOGLA.

2. A city in Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 19, 21.

The Syriac and Arabic, says Simon, signify a partridge: whence he would render "the place of a partridge," i. e. a place abounding in partridges. Hiller rather supposes the residence of a person of the name of Agla, or Chogla, "Partridge's house." May it denote the temple of the deity attended by a partridge? Why not, as well as by a peacock, as Juno was?

BETH-ANATH, בֵּית־אֲנָת: house of a song, or of the answer, or of affliction; from בֵּית beth, beth, a house, and חַנָּה hanah, a song, an answer, or from חָנִי honi, affliction. A city of Naphtali "The temple in the vale," or of the echo. Vide the following article.

[BETH-ANITH, Josh. xix. 38; Judges i. 33. Possibly "the temple in the echoes," or parts (of mountains, probably,) where a repetition of sound was remarkable, so that this was a natural phenomenon. But it may also mean that the temple had an echo in itself; like the whispering gallery, for instance, in St. Paul's cathedral. If it refer to songs sung in public processions, then it marks part of the worship there performed: and these might be reverberated by the construction of the temple, or by the form of the hills around it.]

[BETH-ANOTH, the same as BETH-ANITH, Josh. xv. 59. It may further be said, on these names, that anoth, or onith, imports low, or in a vale; and such is a probable place for an echo to be formed in. Vide ANATHOTH, which is said to import "the tows," or, "low towns;" and it is described as being situated in a valley. Roberts's Itin. p. 70 Monconys, p. 301.]

BETHANY, Βηθανία: house of song, or of affliction; from חַנָּה hanah, or חָנִי honi: otherwise, house of obedience; from חָנָּה hanu; otherwise, house of the grace of the Lord, from חָנָּה, and יְיָ jah, the Lord.

BETHANY, John, xi. 18, was fifteen furlongs, or about two miles from Jerusalem, at the ascent of the Mount of Olives, east of Jerusalem, on the way to Jericho. Here Martha and Mary dwelt, with their brother Lazarus, whom Jesus raised from the dead: here, likewise, Mary poured perfume on our Saviour's head. [This village was famous for its figs; which are mentioned among the Rabbins as subject to tithing. Some think the name is Beth-Athene, and that Athene signifies the dates of palm-trees, not yet ripe. "The house of unripe dates." Could it be derived from the same idea as the goddess Athene, i. e. Minerva?—Beth, the temple, of Athene.]

BETHANIM, a village four miles from Hebron, and two miles from Abraham's turpentine tree.

BETH-ARABAH, בֵּית־הָעֲרָבָה: the house of the flat country, or of mildness, or of caution, or of the night, or of the willow; from עֲרָב harab. A city of Judah (Josh. xv. 6); afterwards given to Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 22.

[BETH-ARAM, the house of rising; or of pregnancy; or of their mountain. A city in Gad, Josh. xiii. 27. Vide BETH-HARAN.

Probably the house of a man named Haram; but if this were a temple, then it imported the temple at the shambles, or butchery, where meat is cut into joints: or else, that the deity himself had been cut into parts, or jointed: of which we have a story in the history of Osiris, who was disjointed, and all his members, except one, were gathered and united by Isis. May this refer to a sovereign, all whose provinces except one were lost, but regained to the kingdom of his successor?]

[BETH-ARBEL. Hosea x. 14, is Arbel, a city of Gallilee, say some. Jos. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 18.]

BETH-AVEN, בֵּית־אָבֶן, Βαταβεν: the house of vanity, of iniquity, of trouble, of strength; from אָבֶן aven or on.

BETH-AVEN, the same as Bethel. After Jeroboam, son of Nebat, had set up his golden calves at Bethel, the Hebrews, who adhered to the house of David, in derision called this city Beth-aven [בֵּית־אָבֶן, Bethaven, בֵּית־אֵל, Bethel] i. e. the house of nothing, or the house of iniquity, instead of Bethel, "the house of God," as Jacob had formerly named it. Vide BETHEL. Hosea iv. 15; x. 5; x. 8; xii. 12. Amos v. 5. 1 Sam. xiv. 23.

[It is usually supposed that this name is by a kind of paranoimasia changed from Beth-el, the house of God, to Beth-aven, the house of vanity. It may, however, be queried, whether this Aven or Aun is not the Ann or On of Egypt, and the Aum or Om of the Hindoos: so that the antiquity of the name is little, if at all, short of that of Bethel. The probability is that what Jacob and his family would refer to Jehováh, the Canaanites, &c. would refer to their supreme deity Ann, so that they intended no degradation or dishonour in the application of this term. If it could be proved that, at an early period, this word Ann was taken in the sense of labourer, machinator, the maker of all things, the Demivrgus of later times, then there would be some probability that el, or al, meaning—power, the powerful in action, Beth-el was not far from synonymous with Beth-aun,—"the power of universal activity in generation."]

BETH-AZMAVETH, בֵּית־עֲמָוֶת, 'Αζαμωθ: strong, house of death; from עָמָו hazaz, force, and מָוֶת maveth, death. [House of the strength of death. Nehem. vii. 28. From the Arabic, the temple of the near approach of death: Simon understands this azmoth, when the name of a person, as importing that his mother was near dying when in labour of him: but possibly it imports that the worshippers brought their dying friends to this temple to expire in its precincts. We know that such a custom obtained in various places, as in India, the dying are brought to the banks of the holy river Ganges to expire. Can it import that the deity here worshipped had himself been in imminent danger of death?]

BETH-HARAN,

BET

BETH-HARAN, בֵּית־הָרָם, Βηθαραμ: the house of women with child; from רָחַם harah: otherwise, the house of their mountain; from הָר har, a mountain, and the pronoun כָּם am, their's: otherwise, the house of elevation; from רָמַם ramam.

BETH-ARAN, בֵּית־אֶרֶן, Βαρθάρων: is also the house of him who sings; from רָנָן ranan to sing.

BETH-ARAN, or Beth-haram, or Beth-aramphtha, afterwards called Livias, was beyond the Jordan, toward the Dead Sea, Numb. xxxii. 36. Jos. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 3.

BETH BAAL-MEON, Josh. xiii. 17; BAAL-MEON, Numb. xxxii. 37. Maun, Pale-m'aun, &c.

BETH-BARAH, בֵּית־בָּרָה: the house of his son; from בָּר bar, a son, and the pronoun אָה ah, his or her's: otherwise, a chosen or pure house, or house of corn; from בָּרַר barar, or בָּר bar. A place beyond the Jordan, Judg. vii. 24. Probably BETHABARA. [More probably a contraction of Bethabara; the house of passage, John i. 28. Simon thinks this is from the Chaldee Bera, a desert or uncultivated place; and the probability is, that adjacent to the Jordan, if near the Dead Sea, such a place should be found, and adapted for a ferry-house.]

BETH-BASI, Βαθβασα: the house of confusion, of shame, of hashfulness; from בֹּשׁ bosh, to blush, to be ashamed. A city of Judah, which the two Maccabees, Simon and Jonathan fortified, 1 Macc. ix. 62, 64.

BETH-BIREI, בֵּית־בִּרְאִי: the house of my creator; from בָּרָא bara, to create, and the pronoun י, my: otherwise, the house of my health, or of my choice; from the same word. [1 Chron. iv. 31. Simon thinks Berai signifies chosen; and beth-berai "the house of Berai." Perhaps it is derived from BERET to cause to eat, to feed; in which case it would import a temple to the deity who feeds us, or communicates food: the god of the plough, Zeus Arotrius;—Ceres, the goddess of corn, &c. &c. among the Heathen. The word being feminine, and the plural making Beruth, I would query, whether the name of the city Berytus, at present pronounced Bairout, may derive from it; if so, we know this goddess at once; and she may be seen on many medals of cities on the coast. See the PLATES of ARADUS, BERYTUS, TYRE, &c.]

BETH-CAR, בֵּית־כָּר: the house of the lamb; from כָּר car, a lamb: otherwise, the house of knowledge, from כָּר nichar [or of digging.] A city of Dan; 1 Sam. vii. 11.

BETH-DAGON, בֵּית־דָּגָן: the house of corn; [or of fruits] from דָּגָן dagon: otherwise, habitation of the fish; from דָּג dag: or rather, the temple of the god Dagon. 1 Macc. x. 83.

BET

I. BETH-DAGON, a city of Asher, Josh. xix. 27, temple of Dagon. Comp. 1 Sam. v. 2, 5.

II. BETH-DAGON, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 41; so called, probably, because here was a temple of Dagon, before the Israelites took it. ["The temple of the Aun coming out of the fish." For the explanation of this emblem, vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CLX. and the PLATES of DAGON. The emblem appears on our medals of Corinth, though under some variation, yet to the same effect; a child delivered by a fish, after having been borne in safety through the boisterous ocean. See the PLATES.]

BETH-DIBLATHAIM, vide DIBLATHA: the house of Diblatha.

BETHEKED, or Beth-akad, (2 Kings. x. 12, 14) which some construe in a general sense—a shearing-house, or, the house of shepherds binding sheep. But the LXX. and others, take it for a place between Jezreel and Samaria; the same, perhaps, as Bethker.

BETHEL, בֵּית־אֵל: the house of God; from בֵּית beth, a house, and אֵל el, God. 1 Chron. viii. 28.

BETHEL, a city west of Hai, on the confines of the tribes of Ephraim and Benjamin, Gen. xii. 8; xxviii. 10: here Jacob slept, and had a dream of great import and consolation to him. Vide JACOB. Eusebius says, Bethel was twelve miles from Jerusalem, in the way to Sichem.

The Rabbins tell us, that the stone on which Jacob rested his head at Bethel, was put into the sanctuary of that temple, which was built after the return from the Babylonish captivity; that the ark of the covenant was placed on this stone; and that long after the ruin of the temple, the Jews had a custom of lamenting their calamities upon it. The Mahometans believe their temple of Mecca to be founded on this very stone; and have a great veneration for it.

It has been thought, that Jacob's pouring oil on the stone at Bethel, gave occasion to a superstition among the ancients of erecting Betuli, which were stones anointed and consecrated to the memory of great men, after their death. Sanchoniathon attributes the invention of these betuli to Saturn. Damascius, cited in Photius's Bibliotheca, says these betuli were consecrated to the heathen gods; to Saturn, to the Sun, and other deities. Hesychius says, that the ancients called betulus the stone which Saturn swallowed, thinking to devour his son Jupiter. Asclepiades, cited by Damascius, relates many surprising things of the betuli, dedicated to Venus of Aphek.

[BETHEL, in Benjamin, was not very far from Jerusalem: the breadth of the tribe of Benjamin only intervening. Bethel was also called called Beth-aven, properly, I suppose, Beth-aun, where Aun is the same deity as is otherwise called On: and probably is the Eli-oun of San-choniatho, in which appellation both names El and Aun appear to be united, vide BETH-AVEN. In Judges, iv. 5, it is said of Deborah, that she lived between Ramah and Bethel in mount Ephraim: the Targum says, she had gardens in Ramatha; olive trees yielding oil in the valley; and a house of watering in Bethel. A mountain, 1 Sam. xiii. 2.]

BETH-EMEK, בית-עמק: house of the vale, or of the depth; from עמק hamak, hollow, deep, [or profound.] A city of Asher, Josh. xix. 27. [Rather, "the temple in the valley," or dale. We may conjecture that such an edifice might stand low down on the declivity of a hill, or bank, rather than in the very bottom of a valley: but this unquestionably must have been regulated by local circumstances.]

BETHER, בֶּתֶר, ὁρη κοιλωμάτων: division; from בָּתַר bathar, to divide: otherwise, in the turtle, or in the trial, or perquisition; from the preposition ב beth, in, and תָּרַר thor, or thur, turtle; according to several readings. [CRAGGY mounts, or in examination, or contemplation: in Syriac, posterior, the mountains of clefts, or fissures. Vide BETH-PEOR.]

BETHER. The mountains of Bether are mentioned in the Song of Solomon, viii. 14. The Vulgate reads mountains of perfume. Several Latin copies read Bethel, Cant. ii. 17: but the Hebrew in both places reads Bether. Some take this place to be Bethoron, called Bether in Eusebius, Bithara in Josephus, and Bethra in an old itinerary. Bether was taken by the emperor Adrian, in Barchochebas's rebellion. Vide BARCHOCHEBAS. Others will have it to be Betharis, between Cæsarea and Diospolis, noticed in the ancient itinerary just mentioned; or lastly, to be Bether, mentioned by the LXX. Jos. xv. 60, among the cities of Judah. I take it to be Upper Bethoron, or Bethora, between Diospolis and Cæsarea. Eusebius speaks of Betharim, near Diospolis, and when he mentions Bether, taken by Adrian, he says, it was in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. Hist. lib. iv. cap. 6. See BETHORON.

BETHESDA, Βηθεσδα: house of effusion; from עָשָׂה eshed: or house of mercy; from בֵּית beth, a house, and חָסֶה chesed, pity or mercy. [Rather "the spring house;" the house where the spring issued: which spring, in the instance of the pool of Bethesda, might be intermitting and medicinal.]

BETHESDA, in the Vulgate Bethzaida, otherwise called Piscina probatica, because the sheep were washed in it which were designed for the sacrifices, called in Greek pro-

bata. Bethesda, as many interpreters expound it, signifies—the house of mercy, probably because the sick who lay under the porticos that surrounded it, here found shelter. Others explain it, בית אשר, domus effusionis, the sink-house or drain; supposing the waters which came from the temple, and where the victims were washed, flowed hither.

Eusebius and Jerom say, that in their time were two fishponds, or a kind of double reservoir, shown at Jerusalem: ONE of which was filled every year with rain water; THE OTHER with water of a deep red colour, as if some of the blood of such victims as formerly were washed there still tinged it. The gospel informs us, that there were five porches about this pool, and many sick persons constantly waiting, in order to descend into the water when it was stirred; for an angel came down at some times, and stirred the water; the first who then plunged into it was cured, he his disease what it might. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LXVI.

[BETH-EZEL, the house of a neighbour, Mic. i. 11.]

BETH-GADER, בית-גדר, Βηθ-Γαδερ: the house of the wall, or of the heap; from גָּדַר gader. A man of Caleb's family. 1 Chron. ii. 51.

[It might, however, be an emblem of a fruit having partitions, locula; as the orange, pomegrate, &c. accompanying an image of the divinity; as, for instance, Proserpina, who was detained by Pluto; having eaten of a pomegranate, in his infernal dominions.]

BETH-GAMUL, בית-גמול, Βηθ-Γαμουλ: the house of recompence, or of the weaned, or the house of the camel; from גָּמַל gamul, a camel, or to wean. A city of Moabites, in Reuben, Jerem. xlviii. 23.

[Or the house of a person named Gamul: we have such a name, 1 Chron. xxiv. 17. It might be an image of a camel, attending the deity in the temple. Among the Hindoos the planet Venus rides on a camel. The camel occurs on the medals of some of the Arabian provinces.]

[BETH-HACCEREM, the house of the vineyard, or temple of the vine.

The Middoth, cap. 3, hal. 4, says, the stones of the altar, and of the ascent to the altar, were brought from the valley of Beth-Cerem, being dug out from thence beneath the barren land. From thence they brought whole stones, on which no tool of iron had come.]

BETH-HANAN, בית-חנן, Βηθ-Χαναν: house of grace, or of mercy, and of gift; from חָנַן chanan. [1 Kings iv. 9. Or the house of a person named Hanan: whose name implies as much as Deodatus, &c. a favour given (i. e. by God.)

BETH-JESHIMOTH, בית-יהשמוט, Βηθ-Ιησιμουτ: the house of desolation, or of desolate places; from בֵּית a house, and יָשָׁם jasham, to make desolate; desolate: otherwise the house of placing or position; from שָׁם shum, to put or place: otherwise the house of denomination; from שֵׁם shem, a name.

[No doubt but this name might denote "the temple in the desert" or wilderness: yet, as the root imports to place, put, or enclose, it might refer to a Deity, "the temple of the inclosers," (feminine) or inclosures: as meat is inclosed in a cover, or dish, when brought to table, Gen. xxiv. 33; as Joseph was enclosed in his coffin, Gen. l. 26; as a man may be said to enclose any thing in the hollow of his hand, Judg. xii. 3. Possibly this may refer to Adonis enclosed in his coffin, and lamented accordingly; or perhaps it may denote Diana, the goddess of hunting, (not omitting her brother Apollo) who enclosed game in her nets; but comp. Ezek. xiii. 18, for another idea of enclosing, i. e. of persons for licentious purposes. See also FRAGMENTS, No. XII. with the PLATES.]

BETH-JESHIMOTH. A city of Reuben, Josh. xii. 3; xiii. 20, afterwards possessed by the Moabites. Ezekiel foretold the destruction of this and other cities of Moab, Ezek. xxv. 9.

BETH LEBATH, בֵּית לֵבָי: the house of lionesses; from לָבִי labi, a lioness, Josh. xix. 6.

[BETH-LEBAOTH, house of leopards, or house of hearts, letters, or signs; otherwise, house of arrivals. A city in Simeon, Josh. xix. 6, called Lebaoth, chap. xv. 32.]

"The temple of the deity whose attendant was a leopard;" or heart-spotted pard: i. e. Bacchus, whom we often find so attended, though his proper companion should be the Indian tyger. Compare BETH NIMRA. Some think this leopard was a lion or lioness, Heb. labia. Vide GUR BAAL. See the PLATES; MEDALS of JERUSALEM, No. 5, and SIDON, No. 10.]

BETH-LEHEM, בֵּית לֶחֶם: the house of bread; from לֶחֶם lechem: otherwise, the house of war; from מִלְחָמָה milchamah, war. [The former from its fertility, perhaps, including viands of other kinds, as well as bread.]

I. BETH-LEHEM, or Beth-lechem, a city in Judah, Josh. xvii. 7; generally called Bethlehem of Judah, to distinguish it from another Bethlehem in Zebulun. [The city of David. Judges xix. 1; 1 Sam. xvi. 4; Micah. v. 2; Matth. ii. 1; Luke ii. 4; John vii. 42. It was fortified by Rehoboam, 2 Chron. xi. 6; Ezra ii. 21.] It is called likewise Ephrath, (Bethlehem Ephrata) and its inhabitants Ephrateans, Gen. xlviii. 7; Mic. v. 2. [Ephrath is thought to signify plentiful, fertile, abundant; and Ephrath, high fertility: i. e. of the lands, &c.]

The fertility of the fields around Bethlehem is mentioned by several travellers; as Cotovicus, lib. ii. cap. 8. Rauwolf, P. III., cap. 22.

De la Valle, P. I. Epist. 13. Doubdan, cap. 16. Le Bruyn, cap. 51. De Breves, p. 171. Grobenius, cap. 27. Breuning, Itin. iii. cap. 18. Comp. Bissele Topothes. Palest. p. 49. Adrichomius, Theat. Ter. Sanct. p. iii. 41.

The following is Volney's description of it, Trav. vol. ii. p. 332.

"The second place deserving notice, is Bait-el-lahm, or Bethlehem, so celebrated in the history of Christianity. This village, situated two leagues south-east of Jerusalem, is seated on an eminence, in a country full of hills and vallies, and might be rendered very agreeable. The soil is the best in all these districts; fruits, vines, olives, and sesamum succeed here extremely well; but, as is the case every where else, cultivation is wanting.

"They make a white wine, which justifies the former celebrity of the wines of Judea, but it has the bad property of being very heady."

Ebn Haukal says, "At a distance of six miles from Jerusalem is a village called Beit al-lehem. Here Jesus (on whom be peace!) was born of his mother; and it is said that the date or palm tree, of whose fruit Mary ate, and which is celebrated by mention in the Koran (chap. xix. chapter of Mary) has been placed in the dome, or vault here, and held in high veneration and respect."

This city was not considerable for its extent or its riches, but was glorious on account of the Messiah's birth, which was appointed to be in it. Micah extolling this pre-eminence of Bethlehem, says, "Thou Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall He come forth unto me, who is to be ruler in Israel;" or who is the Messiah, as the Chaldee paraphrast has translated it. Vide Jonathanis Targum, Bibl. Polyg. Lond. The prophet had no design certainly of describing David, who had been born at Bethlehem many ages before he wrote; but referred to Christ, who was born in this city many ages afterwards.

Several difficulties are started relating to this prophecy of Micah, which foretels the birth of the Messiah at Bethlehem. First, Matthew (ii 6) reads, "And thou, Bethlehem of Judah, art NOT THE LEAST of the cities of Judah;" whereas the text of Micah runs, "And thou Bethlehem, though THOU BE LITTLE among the thousands of Judah." Secondly, Micah says, "Out of Judah shall He come forth unto me, who is to be the ruler in Israel, whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting." It is objected that here is a contrariety between Matthew and Micah, one of whom says, that Bethlehem is SMALL among the cities of Judah; the other says, that it is NOT THE LEAST of the cities.

cities of Judah:—but may not a city though little, yet not be the least?

It is also answered, that Matthew might read the text of Micah interrogatively—"And thou Bethlehem—art thou too small to be ranked among the cities of Judah?" If so, he gives the true sense of the prophet, "Thou art not the least." Some critics maintain that the Hebrew word Zehir, generally translated small, signifies likewise the contrary; and they cite Jer. xlviii. 4; xlix. 20; Zech. xiii. 7, where Zehir, as the Jews agree, signifies heads, principals of the people. Jerom and others are of opinion, that Matthew recorded the passage in Micah historically, not as it was written in that prophet but as it had been produced by the priests to Herod; so that they should be accused of false readings, if such it was.

[May not a city be small in extent—yet not the lowest, the meanest, the least; but on the contrary, of great dignity and consequence by reason of other circumstances, such for instance as its being a royal seat, or of great antiquity, or illustrious for learning, as a university, &c. or for other privileges? May this be the sense of the passage? "Bethlehem though of narrow extent as a city, yet is of great dignity as the appointed birth-place of the Messiah:" i. e. small, but honorable.]

As to the second difficulty, the Jews generally acknowledge that the Messiah should come out of Bethlehem; but they maintain that this prophecy of Micah has no regard either to Jesus or to the Messiah. He whom Micah speaks of, say they, shall be "ruler in Israel:" verse 3, "The remnant of his brethren shall be converted, and re-united with the children of Israel." Jesus as man never reigned over Israel, and if he be God, he can have no brethren over whom to reign:—the answer is, that Christ as God certainly had no brethren; but as the son of Mary, and as born of the Jewish nation, Jesus had brethren. The prophet in this place carefully distinguishes his temporal birth at Bethlehem from "his goings forth," which, says he, have been from of old, from everlasting.

Bethlehem is situated on the declivity of a hill, six miles from Jerusalem.

The cave wherein it is said our Saviour was born, was not strictly in the city, but rather without Bethlehem. Jerom says it was to the south. The inn whither the Virgin Mary and Joseph repaired, was probably a caravanserai, where guests were received gratis; but where nothing was found them but shelter: vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXIII. As the crowd was great, Joseph and Mary were obliged to repose in a cave, which usually served as a stable. It is certain the ancients mention the birth of Jesus Christ as having happened in a cave. Jerom informs us, that Adrian, to erase the memory of the place where Jesus Christ was born, planted over the cave a grove of tall trees, in honour of Adonis; so that when the festivals of that infamous deity were celebrated, the holy grotto echoed with the lamentations made in commemoration of the lover of Venus. [The present state of Bethlehem may be best learned from Chateaubriand, and Dr. Clarke, among modern travellers. The original church built by the Empress Helena, over the cavern of the manger, still exists, but blended with the necessary repairs and restorations from the devastations of inimical hordes of Mahometans, &c. during the Croisades, and especially at the close of the thirteenth century.

In the church are the remains of Mosaics, also of paintings on wood, certainly very ancient. [Also of various decrees of synods and councils of early ages.] Two spiral staircases, each composed of fifteen steps, open on the sides of the outer church, and conduct to the subterraneous church, which is situated immediately beneath the choir of the church above. This crypt is irregular in its form; it is hewn out of the rock, is lined and floored with marble, and is illuminated by thirty-two lamps. At the further end is said to be the birth-place of the Redeemer. It is marked by beams of silver radiating from a spot of white marble, incrustured with jasper. Around it are inscribed the words:

IN DE VIRGINE MARIA
JESVS CHRISTVS NATVS EST.

It is said, the manger was hewn out of the rock; a block of marble is shewn in the place. This crypt is also adorned with pictures; but not of much antiquity. Near it are said to be the Chapel of the Innocents, and their Sepulchre: also the sepulchres of St. Jerom, of Eusebius, and of the female saints, Paula and Eustochia. The tomb of Rachel, near Bethlehem, is no antiquity. Chateaubriand did not observe in the soil around Bethlehem the fertility usually ascribed to it.

Dr. Clarke found Bethlehem a larger place than he expected. He descended into the valley of Bethlehem, where he found a well of "pure and delicious water," which he thinks, is that so ardently longed for by David, 2 Sam. xxiii. 15. It is possible, however, that some succeeding traveller may find a well more accurately answering to that described by David, as being "by the gate" of the town: (D'Arvieux says, "After having seen the famous cistern of Bethlehem, and having drank of its water, which we found excellent, we arrived at Bethlehem,"—from Jerusalem :) but Josephus seems to countenance the idea of Dr. Clarke, by placing the scene of the story in a valley. Dr. Clarke allows the authenticity of the cave of the Nativity, though he doubted of many things shewn in Jerusalem. The convent is not in the town, but adjacent. It has the air of a fortress; and might even stand a siege against the Turks. It manufactures crucifixes and beads for the devout; and marks religious emblems on the persons of pilgrims, by means of gunpowder. Both the town of Bethlehem, and the convent, are built on the ridge of a hill, which overlooks the valley reaching to the Dead Sea, (of which it commands a distinct prospect) so that any phenomenon elevated over Bethlehem, would be seen from afar in the East country, beyond the Dead Sea.]

11. BETH-LEHEM, of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 15; Judg. xii. 10. This city is scarcely known, but by its bearing the same name as that which gave birth to king David, and to Jesus Christ, the King of kings.

BETH-MAAKA, בֵּית-מַעֲכָה, a house pressed; from mahach. Vide ABEL-MAACHA. [The house of compression, or of contrition, or the settled house. 2 Sam. xx. 14; 1 Kings, xv. 20; 2 Kings, xv. 29.]

The root Maucha seems to imply the pains of labour, or child birth: so that probably this temple was dedicated to Diana Lucina, or the goddess presiding over parturition. Vide MAACHAH.]

BETH-MAON, בֵּית-מַעֲוֶן, οἶκος Μάων: the house of habitation: otherwise, the house of sin; from avon, iniquity. [The house of small dwellings; or of transgression. More probably "the temple of Maon." Vide BAAL MAON, with the allusions to Pale' Maon, passim. BETH-MEON was not far from Tiberias: for the men of Tiberias went to Beth-Meon to be hired; and the men of Beth-Meon came to Tiberias for the same purpose: and each was hired according to the custom of these places respectively. Jerus. Bava Mezia, fol. 11. 2. [A city of the Moabites, in the tribe of Reuben, Jerem. xlvi. 23.]

BETH-MARCABOTH, בֵּית-מַרְכָּבוֹת, Βηθμαρκαβωθ: house of chariots; from racab: otherwise, habitation of bitterness extinct; from marar marar, bitterness, and cabah, to extinguish; [or of commutation. A city of Simeon. Josh. xix. 5; 1 Chron. iv. 31. Compare Solomon's cities for chariots, 1 Kings, iv. 26; 2 Chron. i. 14; ix. 25.]

As this appears to have been a temple, most probably it imports "the temple of the deity in a chariot drawn by four horses:" not a recab, drawn by two; but a marecab, or chariot, drawn by a full set. Vide the PLATES: Eastern CHARIOTS, on 1 Sam. vi. This plainly points at the solar Deity, Apollo, or the Deity of splendor. In the medals this representation is frequent. The moon has, properly, only two horses to her car. See the Medals of CORINTH, No. 25. SARDIS, No. 11.]

BETH-MAUS, in Galilee, between Sephoris and Tiberias, five furlongs from the latter. Joseph. de Vita. This place is called Beth-meon in the Talmud, says Lightfoot.

BETH-MILLO, בֵּית-מִלּוֹא, plenitude, or repletion. A place near Shechem. 2 Kings xii. 20.

BETH NIMRAH, בֵּית-נִמְרָה, Βηθναρρά: the house of the leopard, [or tiger:]; from נִמְרָה namar: otherwise, of rebellion; from מַרָּה marah: otherwise, of bitterness; from מַרָּר marar [or of commutation.]

BETH-NIMRAH, a city of Gad, Numb. xxxii. 36; Josh. xiii. 27. I should take it to be Nimrim, Jer. xlviii. 34, or Bethnabris, five miles north from Livias. The difficulty lies in extending the tribe of Gad so far as Nimrim south, or Bethnabris north.

[This appears by Isaiah xv. 6; Jer. xlviii. 34, to have been a place abounding in waters, whence some would derive it from the Arabic, "to find water;" but it might be a temple of Bacchus, accompanied by his proper emblem the Indian tiger. Some render nimra rather panther than tiger: i. e. a beast spotted, not striped. Compare BETH-LEBAOTH.]

BETH-OANNABA, or Beth-hannubah. Eusebius says it is a town four miles east from Diospolis; but Jerom says it is placed, by many, eight miles from Diospolis. Beth-oannaba seems to preserve some remains of the word Nob, where the tabernacle continued, some time, in the reign of Saul, 1 Sam. xxi. 1. Jerom, in Paula's epitaph, says Nob was not far from Diospolis, [God's-town.]

BETH-OGLA, בֵּית-חֲגֻלָּה, οἶκος χαγῆλος, the house of the feast, of the dance; from the word chagug, a feast; or from galal, and the pronoun ah, his, or her's.

BETH-OGLA. There are two places of this name; one placed by Eusebius, eight miles from Gaza; the other placed by Jerom, two miles from Jordan. Beth-ogla is reckoned to the tribe of Judah, Joshua, xv. 6. This, probably, is the place mentioned by Eusebius. But Joshua, xviii. 21, reckons another Beth-ogla as belonging to Benjamin: which is that Jerom speaks of.

BETH-OM, or rather Bethora, or Bethoran: otherwise Julias, the birth-place of the prophet Joel. Epiphan. de Vita & Morte Prophetarum, arum, Chronic. Paschale. Vide Reland. in Bethom, or,— BETH-OME, which having rebelled against Alexander Jannæus, was taken, and its inhabitants sent captives to Jerusalem. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 22.

BETH-ONEA, or Beth-anea, fifteen miles from Cæsarea, east; here, say Eusebius and Jerom, are very beneficial hot baths.

BETH-ORON, or Bethora, בית-חרון: the house of wrath; otherwise, the house of the hole, or of the cave, or of liberty; from חור chor, or chur: or the habitation of whiteness, from the same, according to the Chaldee. [Division, or in his examination, or daughters of songs: in Syriac, posterior. 2 Sam. ii. 29. BITHRON, Eng. Trans. Vide BITHRON.]

BETH-ORON. The same, probably, as Bethora, Bethra, Bether, and Bithar. Scripture mentions two cities of this name, Upper Bethoron and Lower Bethoron. The tribe of Ephraim having received Bethoron as part of their allotment, gave it to the Levites, Josh. xxi. 22. It was, according to Eusebius, four leagues from Jerusalem, toward Sicheim or Naplouse, north of Jerusalem. He adds, that Upper Bethoron was built by Solomon, and the Lower resigned to the Levites. Josephus places Bethoron about a hundred furlongs from Jerusalem (de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 11, compared with Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 4.) Jerom says, that Paula passed through both the Bethorons in her way from Naplouse to Jerusalem.

[I BETH-ORON Superior, or Upper: supposed to have been in the tribe of Ephraim.

II. BETH-ORON Inferior, or Lower: supposed to have been in the confines of Benjamin. Perhaps these places were noted for some white cavern in a rock, or more than one; as these towns appear to have been situated on or near hills: in the sides of which might be openings, anciently used for superstitious purposes.

Beth-oron in Josephus, de Bell. lib. ii. cap. 20, is called Baithoro: and was about a hundred furlongs, twelve miles and half, from Jerusalem.

The Rabbins believe that the army of Sennacherib perished in the going down of Beth-horon. Bab Berac. fol. 54. l. It was so narrow a way, that the Talmudists say, "if two camels attempt to go up it together, they both fall." Cestius the Roman general retreated by this route from Jerusalem; the Jews who followed him did not press his army while he was in the open ground, but, getting before the Romans, while they were in the narrow part of the descent, (of Beth-horon) they spread themselves at the opening of this strait, and overwhelmed the Romans with their darts. Joseph. de Bell. lib. ii. cap. 40.

Compare Josh. x. 10. The slaughter made by an unusual, unexpected, and tremendous shower of stones, while the fugitives were closely pressed together in this narrow gullet, must have been truly dreadful; and its happening at this point of time, and in such a confined passage, appears to be intentionally noticed by the Sacred Historian.

Dr. Clarke mentions a Bethoor, which he supposes to be the ancient Bethoron, "in the high way from Jaffa to Jerusalem." It is placed not far from Ramah, by Jerom: it stood on the confines of Ephraim and Benjamin. It is probable, that the modern village of Bethoor, is the Bethoron Superior of the ancients.]

BETH-PALET, בית-פלס: house of deliverance, or expulsion, or lying in.

BETH-PALET, or Beth-peleth, a city in the most southern part of Judah, Josh. xv. 27; Nehem. xi. 26. Afterwards yielded to Simeon.

BETH-PAZZEZ, בית-פצע: the house of division, or of fraction; from פצע patzah. A city of Issachar, Joshua, xix. 21.

[BETH-PAZZEZ, the temple of the dispersed; or, as we might say, "of the emigrants;" probably of strangers, who, wandering from their native lands, had agreed here to settle, and had built a temple thus called, after them. There is, nevertheless, a possibility that the deity of this temple himself had been a wanderer, and even scattered, or dispersed, i. e. his members. We have a story of Osiris lost by Isis, who sought him after his death; and found in various places all his members but one. As this was commemorated by a great festival in Egypt, it is possible the same notion and custom might have obtained among the Canaanites.]

BETH-PEOR, בית-פער: the house of opening; from פער pahar, to open; or the temple of Peor. A city of Moab, given to Reuben, Deut. iv. 46.

[BETH-PEOR, house of the cleft, or aperture. Deut. iii. 29; iv. 4; xxxiv. 6; Josh. xiii. 20. Vide BAAL-PFOR.

"The temple of Peor." Peor denotes an opening, chasm, crevice, chink, or fissure. It might be so named from a breach of this description in a mountain or hill near it: or possibly from such a gap in the ground as Lucian informs us there was in a temple at Hierapolis in Syria, of which city he was a native:—a fissure, into which a great quantity of water was annually poured; in commemoration, no doubt, of the Deluge. We should recollect, also, that in the temple of Apollo at Delphi, there was a fissure, or cleft, below the surface of the temple, up which cleft rose the vapour that communicated the insflatus of the deity to the priestesses who sat over it. Either of these temples might have been called Beth-Peor: but the general opinion connects this temple with Baal-Peor, considered as an immodest divinity, presiding over a very different subject; yet not foreign from the reproach cast on the Delphic Apollo, of affecting priestesses, not priests, though himself was masculine; and of taking with their persons liberties not to be named. Those who have considered the worship of the Lingam and Yoni of India, will easily comprehend this allusion. See BAAL PEOR.]

BETH-PHAGE, בֵּית-פֶּזֶק, Βηθφαγῆ: house of the mouth, or drain of the valleys; from פֶּה peh, an opening, and גֶּעַח geeah, a valley: otherwise, house of early figs; from פָּגַג pagag: or lastly, house of meeting; from phaga, to meet.

BETH-PHAGE, a little village at the foot of the mount of Olives, between Bethany and Jerusalem, Luke xix. 19. Jesus, being come from Bethany to Bethphage, commanded his disciples to procure an ass for his use, in his triumphant entrance into Jerusalem, John, xii. 14. The distance between Bethphage and Jerusalem is about fifteen furlongs. Vide Light-foot's Chorog. Marco præmissi, cap. 4.

[The Talmudists tell us, that Bethphage was within the walls of Jerusalem; but at the very utmost circuit of them: and it is really probable that there was a street or district so called, because it led immediately, and indeed adjoined, to the Bethphage which produced figs, and was out of the city. It is probable too, that the figs of this district were brought into Jerusalem, and sold on this spot. But the district itself was, no doubt, at the descent of the mount of Olives next to Jerusalem; and seems rather to have been so named from a house of figs; a house where figs were sold, or in the garden of which they were cultivated; and this might extend a good way up the mountain. We are uncertain whether or not there was a village, or number of other houses, beside those of the gardeners who attended to the cultivation of this fruit; as also of olive trees, and of palm trees: most probably also, of various other esculents for the use of the inhabitants of Jerusalem.]

[BETH-PHALET, or BETH-PHELET, house of liberation, or of expulsion: or, from the Hebrew and Syriac house of vomiting. Nehemiah, xi. 26; Josh. xv. 27.

This may refer to, 1. the temple of the delivery of women in labour; Diana Lucina. Vide BETH MAACAH. But 2. as the term phleth signifies to be delivered from evil, or refugees; and the privilege of asylum was common among the heathen temples, it probably has reference to some such protection; "the temple of the deity who delivers from danger," or from evil. Perhaps, "the temple of the deity who was himself delivered from destruction:" i. e. Noah.]

BETH-RAPHA, בֵּית-רַפָּא, the house of health, or of physic: otherwise, of loosing; from רָפָא raphah. Son of Eshton, of Judah, 1 Chron. iv. 12.

BETHSAIDA, Βηθσαιδα, the house of fruits, [or of grain,] or of food; of hunters, or of snares; from בֵּית beth, a house, and צַדָּה tsadah, or צַד tsud, &c. Vide BETHESPA. [Matth. xi. 21; xii. 21. 1 John, i. 44. Rather, "the temple of Saida," or Sidé; whence Sidé in Pamphylia; and Sidon in Syria.]

[BETH-SETA, house of deviation, or house of spreading, or house of the thorn. Judg. vii. 22. This is properly Beth Shittah: and is of the same import as Beth Shittim; "the temple at the Shittim trees." Vide ABEL-SHITTIM.]

BETH-SHALISHA, probably the same as Baal-shalisha. Beth shalisha, in Eusebius, is fifteen miles from Diopolis, north, in the canton of Thamna. See BAAL-SHALISHA.

BETH-SHAN, or BETH-SHEN, בֵּית-שֵׁן, house or temple of the tooth, or of ivory; from בֵּית beth, a house, and שֵׁן shen, a tooth: otherwise, house of change; from שָׁנָה shanah: or the dwelling of sleep; from שָׁן jashan: otherwise, Beth-shean, Judg. i. 27; 1 Sam. xxxi. 10; 2 Sam. xxi. 12; as the Hebrew has it, the house of tumult; from שָׁנָן shanan, which signifies calm and peaceable, but which denotes the contrary, by the figure which the Greeks call metalepsis.

[BETH-SHEAN, or BETH-SHAN, the house of quiet. A town of the tribe of Manasseh, but situated in Asher. Josh. xvii. 11, 16; Judg. 1, 27; 1 Kings iv. 12.

Whether this is not a different town from Beth-shan, though usually reckoned the same?]

BETH-SHEN, more generally known by the name of Scythopolis. In 2 Macc. xii. 29, it is reckoned to be 600 furlongs from Jerusalem, or 75 miles. Josephus (de Vita sua, p. 1025) says it was 120 furlongs from Tiberias; so that it cannot be so near the lake of Tiberias as some geographers have supposed. It was on this side Jordan, west, at the extremity of the great plain. Abulfeda says a small river falls into the Jordan at Scythopolis. The name of Scythopolis, or the city of the Scythians, came, according to George Syncellus, (p. 214) from the Scythians, who invaded Palestine in the reign of Josiah, son of Amos, king of Judah. Stephens the geographer, and Pliny, Nat. Hist. lib. v. cap. 18, call it likewise Nysa. The Hebrew names it Bethshan. The LXX. Judg. i. 27, read "Bethshan, otherwise Scythopolis." In the Maccabees and Josephus, it is often named Scythopolis. After the battle of Gilboa, the the Philistines having taken the bodies of Saul and Jonathan, hung them on the walls of Beth-shan; but the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead, on the other side Jordan, came in the night, carried off the bodies, and interred them honourably under a grove of oaks, near their city, 1 Sam. xxxi. 10, &c. See the MAPS.

[The nurse of Bacchus was buried here; afterwards it was called by the Greeks Scythopolis. It was distant a little way from the Jordan; seated in the entrance to a great valley; was a part of the land of Israel in the early settlement of the Hebrews, but not after the return from Babylon. Hence it retained a Greek appellation. The fruits of Bethshan were the sweetest of all in the land of Israel: fine linen garments were made here. Hieros. Kiddush. fol. 62, 3. It was, before the Babylonish captivity, included within the land of Israel; but after that period it was reckoned without the land; and none of its productions were tithed. Hieros. Demai. fol. 22. Possibly the posterity of the Scythians retained their property in it, and its demesnes.]

Bethshan was in the lot of Manasseh, Judg. i. 27. It was the limit of Galilee, south. It is, says Borchard, half a league distant from Jordan. Probably a district around it was also called Scythopolis, and this district might extend on both sides the Jordan.

The city of Scythopolis is sometimes expressed on its medals by a single name Nysa, which was its original appellation: and sometimes Nysa Scythopolis:—its subsequent name, together with its former. Jerom says there were two towns named Bethshan.]

BETH-SHEMESH, בית-שמש, house [or temple] of the sun, Jerem. xliii. 13: otherwise, according to the Hebrew and Syriac, house of service, or of ministry; from שמש shemesh.

I. BETH-SHEMESH, a city belonging to the priests in the tribe of Judah, Josh. xv. 10; afterwards given to the Levites, Josh. xix. 16; 1 Sam. vi. 12. In Eusebius it is placed ten miles from Eleutheropolis, east, in the way to Nicopolis or Emaüs. Reland thinks we should not distinguish Hir-shemesh in Dan, from Beth-shemesh in Judah; but the passages he produces, (Joshua xiv. 41, compared with 1 Kings iv. 7, where Hir-shemesh is placed as parallel to Beth-shemesh) convince us that they are not the same city. Hir-shemesh signifies the City of the Sun, and Beth-shemesh signifies the House of the Sun. As the tribes of Dan and Judah were adjacent, the same city is reckoned sometimes to one tribe, sometimes to the other. The Philistines returning the ark of the Lord into the land of Israel, it came to Beth-shemesh; some of the people looking with too much curiosity into it, the Lord smote seventy principal men of the city, and 50,000 of the common people. Vide ABEL THE GREAT.

[As this history has usually been misunderstood, i. e. as if 50,000 people perished on this occasion, it may be proper to examine the expressions of the historian more particularly. His words are—the Lord smote—as if with his hand—among the people, seventy men, and 50,000 men; and the people lamented because the Lord HAD RESTRAINED—confined—the people with a great restraint. Here was, then, no fatal destruction—no mortality—of the people: for then how could THEY have lamented? But, probably, some disorder was endemial among them, and many of them were LAID UP by it, were confined to sick chambers, &c. for a time. I think this narration is illustrated by the manner in which the small-pox sometimes goes through some of our towns; it restrains, confines, the inhabitants with a great restraint; nevertheless, they recover, and in due time may appear abroad again. This mode of explaining the passage removes all difficulty as to the number of persons visited, since the disease might spread far beyond Beth-shemesh, or its territories, which single town can hardly be supposed to have contained so great a number of people as the history mentions: nor does the history say that the country at large was alarmed, or that it sympathized with this town, &c. or that any but the people of Beth-shemesh themselves lamented, as must have been the case, had so many persons been destroyed.]

II. BETH-SHEMESH, a city of Issachar, Joshua xix. 22.

III. Some notice a third Beth-shemesh in the tribe of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 38; Judg. i. 33.

[IV. A city in Egypt, Jer. xliii. 13. This is no doubt the Heliopolis of the Greeks: called On, Gen. xli. 45; xlv. 40, and Onion by Ptolemy; which appellation is probably less from Onias the priest, than—Auni-Aun, “the generator of generators,” i. e. the great Generator. It retained this name in the days of Ezekiel, chap. xxx. 17. In this temple there was an annual festival, in honour of the Sun, Herod. lib. ii. cap. 59.]

As the Sun was that object whose daily rising reminded western mankind of their original country and connections, it is no wonder that it was perverted, in process of time, into a commemorative object of worship; and as this worship was universal, we may expect to meet with many edifices appropriated to this purpose. The Sun is alluded to under the name of Cheres, and there is no doubt but that many emblems annexed to various images, &c. and considered as sacred, were derived from properties of the Sun; or were references to the power and influence of that luminary.]

BETH-SHITTAH,

BETH-SHITTAH, בֵּית שִׁטָּה, the house of turning; from שָׁטָה shatah, otherwise, of the thorn. To this place Gideon pursued Midian, Judges, vii. 22.

[BETH-SIMOTH, house of desolation, or house of repositories, or of nominations: called also BETH-JESIMOTH. Josh. xii. 3; xiii. 20. Numb. xxxiii. 49; Ezek. xxv. 9.]

BETH-SURAI, vide BETH-ZUR.

BETH-TAPPUA, בֵּית תַּפּוּחַ, house of the apple, or of the apple tree; from תַּפּוּחַ thap-huach: otherwise, habitations of swellings; from נָפַח naphach, to puff up, or swell. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 53. Eusebius says it is the last city of Palestine, in the way to Egypt, fourteen miles from Raphia.

[As the art of cyder-making does not appear in Scripture, this temple can hardly be supposed to derive its name from a heap of apples, as Simon thinks: rather from a deity who held an apple in his (or her) hand; as others held the pomegranate, Vide RIMMON. That apples were very valuable, and highly esteemed, appears from Cant. ii. 3, 5, but the word there used, taphua, is now usually rendered citron. Vide NAT. HIST. ART. APPLE.]

BETHUEL, or Bathuel, בְּתוּאֵל, filiation of God: from בַּת bath, a daughter, and אֵל el, God.

BETHUEL, son of Nahor and Milcah, was Abraham's nephew, and father to Laban, and to Rebecca, Isaac's wife. Bethuel does not appear in the affair of Rebecca's marriage, but Laban only, Gen. xxiv. 50. Vide LABAN.

BETHUL, בֵּתוּלָה, virgin, [or young woman, MARRIAGEABLE-GIRL.] [Rather "a separated place," a consecration: but more probably still Beth-el; the temple of the deity, or al. Written BETHUEL, 1 Chron. iv. 30.]

BETHUL, or Bethuel, a city of Simeon, Josh. xix. 4; the same, probably, as Bethelia, which Sozomen speaks of in his history, as a town belonging to the inhabitants of Gaza, well peopled, and having several temples remarkable for their structure and antiqity; particularly a Pantheon, (or temple dedicated to all the gods) situated on an eminence made of earth, brought thither for the purpose, which commanded the whole city. I conjecture, continues Sozomen, that this place was named Bethelia, which signifies the House of God, by reason of this temple. Jeron, in his life of Hilarion, speaks of Bethelia, and says that from thence to Pelusium was five short days' journey. We find a bishop of Bethelia among the bishops of Palestine. Vide Reland, lib. i. cap. 35.

BETHULIA, בֵּתוּלָה, virgin of the Lord; from בֵּתוּלָה bethul, a virgin, and יְהוָה jah, the Lord. [Or house of the Lord's delivery. Vide BETHUL above.]

BETHULIA, a city celebrated for its siege by Holofernes, at which he was killed by Judith, Judith vi. 7. Probably the Bethel or Bethuel whereof we have been speaking.

But it may be objected, how can this be reconciled with Judith, iv 3; vii. 3, which says that Bethulia was near Dothaim and Esdraelon, cities in the great plain and country round about, very remote from Bethulia. I answer, that in this place the author of the book of Judith describes the march of Holofernes's army, and the camp which he left when he broke up to go and undertake the siege of Bethulia; not the camp of which he took possession, when he set down before this place. Vide JUDITH.

[BETH-ZACHARA, house of memory, or of recordings. 1 Mach. vi. 33.]

Some have imagined that this town whose name imports "the house of Zachariah," is intended by this term, Luke i. 40, which they suppose was the town of Zachariah the priest: but the probability is very strong that Hebron was the town where Zachariah dwelt; and that the passage in Luke is properly rendered as signifying the house of his abode or residence.]

BETHZAIDA, a city beyond Jordan, on the sea of Tiberias, almost in the place where the Jordan enters that sea. Philip the Tetrarch enlarged and adorned Bethzaida, and called it Julias. Josephus notices, particularly, that Bethzaida was in the Gaulonitis, and on the other side Jordan; (Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 3, & de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 13) but some have thought that Bethzaida was west, and not east of the sea of Tiberias.

Bethzaida is not known by the name of Julias in the New Testament. The apostles Peter, Andrew, and Philip were of this city, Mark, viii. 22. Our Saviour visited here frequently; he cured a blind man, and wrought many miracles here; but the inhabitants were not benefited by his instructions, nor by his miracles, which induced him to say, "Woe unto thee, Chorazin, woe unto thee Bethzaida! for if the mighty works which have been done in you, had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they had a great while ago repented, sitting in sackcloth and ashes!" Luke, x. 13.

BETH-ZECHA, בֵּית זֶכָה, house of chains, or fitters; from זָכָה zakak, to bind, to tie in chains: otherwise, according to the Syriac and Hebrew, the house on the farther side. The same, probably, as Bezek, or Buzek, Bassach.

BETH-ZUR, בֵּית זֹר, house of the rock; from זֹר tsur: otherwise, habitation of strength, or of the fortress; from מְצוּר metzor: otherwise, house of the band; from צָרָר tzarar, to bind.

bind. [Or of honour, or of reward, or of chains. Called BETH-SURA. 1 Macc. iv. 61.]

The "temple on the rock;" or, the temple of the rock: which latter import is justified, by observing how very frequently the rock, mountain, or original refuge of mankind is commemorated on the medals of cities and sovereigns: and, indeed, the idea that mankind proceeded from a rock, occurs in Scripture, Isa. li. 1. "Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn—to Abraham your father:" they are said to be begotten by a rock, Deut. xxxii. 18. Moreover, Deity is compared to a rock: Jehovah himself is so, Psalm xviii. 2, 31; Deut. xxxi. 5, and xxxii. 31, "their rock (Deity) is not like our rock (Deity)." The figure of an image holding a rock in his hand, is common in the symbol of the Deus Lunus, and many others. See the PLATES, BETH-SHEN, Nos. 4. 6. also CAUCASUS, Nos. 1 to 9, &c.]

BETH-ZUR, or Bethsura, a fortress of great consequence, principally in the time of the Maccabees. Rehoboam king of Judah, fortified it, 2 Chron. xi. 7. Lysias, regent of Syria, under young Antiochus, son of Antiochus Epiphanes, besieged Bethzur with an army of 60,000 foot and 5,000 horse. Judas Maccabeus coming to succour the place, Lysias was obliged to raise the siege, 1 Macc. iv. 28; vi. 7. Judas put his army to flight, and afterwards, making the best use of the arms and booty found in the enemy's camp, the Jews became stronger, and more formidable than they had heretofore been.

Bethzur belonged to Judah, Josh. xv. 58. It lay opposite to South Edom, and defended the passages into Judea from thence. We read 2 Macc. xi. 5, that Bethzur was five furlongs from Jerusalem; but this is a visible mistake. Eusebius places it twenty miles, or seven leagues from Jerusalem, toward Hebron. At the foot of mount Bethzur is a fountain, shown as that wherein queen Candace's eunuch was baptized. Euseb. & Hieron, in locis, voce Bethzur. Ita alij plerique.

BETONIM, בֵּטְנִים, Betavim, nut-trees, or turpentine-trees: otherwise, bellics; from בֵּטֵן beten. A city of Gad, towards the north of this tribe, bordering on Manasseh, Josh. xiii. 26. [Vide BETEN, of which this is the plural, and being plural, rather inclines to the sense of trees; since a single town seldom occupies several hollows or cavities; but many trees might mark the situation of a single town: and if these were pistachia trees, then their productions were valuable, and formed one of the esteemed fruits of the land of Canaan, which were sent as presents. Vide Gen. xlviii. 11.]

BETROTHING, vide MARRIAGES.

[BEULAH, married, Isaiah lxix. 4.]

BEZAI, בִּזְאִי, Bzoi, he that despises; from בִּזָּה bus. Simon thinks, healing from God, from the Chaldee and Syriac. Ezra ii. 49; Neh. vii. 52.

BEZAI, בִּצְיָ, Bazai, eggs; from בִּצְיָ betz, an egg: otherwise, muddy; from בִּצְיָ batz, mud. Simon thinks, in the haste of the Lord. Ezra ii. 17; Neh. vii. 23. x. 19.

BEZALEEL, בְּצַלְאֵל, in the shadow of God; from the preposition בֵּ beth, in, and צַלַּל tsalal, shadow, and אֵל el, God.

[BEZALEEL was a famous artificer, son of Uri, Exod. xxxi. 2; xxxv. 30. of whom it is said, that he was filled with the Spirit of God, —to devise excellent works in gold, silver, and all other workmanship. A very remarkable testimony to the antiquity of the Arts, to the esteem in which they were held, to the source whence they were understood to spring, and to the wisdom (by inspiration) of this artist.]

II. BEZALEEL, of the sons of Pahath-Moab. Ezra x. 30.]

BEZEK, בֶּזֶק, lightning: otherwise, in chains or fitters; from the preposition בֵּ beth, in, and זָקַק zakak, to chain. [Some think this word imports dispersion; i. e. a town built by those who had been dispersed; and the Chaldee and Syriac roots have this signification. But perhaps it may import a flash, in the sense of illumination by fire; or lightning: which leads us to Jupiter, as the deity of that atmospherical meteor.]

BEZEK, or Beseca, or Bezeka, or Bezaka, or Bezeath, vide ADONIBFEK. Saul, before he marched against Jabesh-Gilead, reviewed his army at Bezek, 1 Sam. xi. 8. Eusebius says, there are two cities of this name near one another, seven miles from Sichem, in the way to Scythopolis. We are of opinion that Bezek, or Bezekat, was indeed situated somewhere near the passage of the river Jordan, which was at Scythopolis, or thereabouts.

BEZER, בִּצְרָ, Bazap, 1 Macc. v. 26, fortification, or vintage; from בִּצְרָ batzar: otherwise, to cut, to take away, to defend, to hinder; from the same: otherwise, in anguish, or distress; from the preposition בֵּ beth, in, and צָרָר tzazar.

BEZER, or Bozra, or Bostra, a city beyond Jordan, given by Moses to Reuben: this town was designed by Joshua to be a city of refuge; it was given to the Levites of Gershon's family. When Scripture mentions Bezer, it adds, in the wilderness, because it lay in Arabia Deserta, and the eastern part of Edom, encompassed with deserts.

Eusebius places Bozra twenty-four miles from Adraa, or Edrai. This city is sometimes said to belong to Reuben, sometimes to Moab, and sometimes again to Edom; because, as it was a frontier town to these three provinces, it was occasionally in the hands of one party, and then was taken by another. The bishops of Bostra subscribed the decrees of several councils. It is sometimes in the land of Gilead, sometimes in the Trachonitis, at others again in the Auranitis, but most frequently in Arabia, or Idumæa. [Called by heathen writers Bostra; or Bossora, 1 Macc. v. 26. From hence is deduced the Punic Byrsa, or strong hold of the Carthaginians. "The well-fortified city:" the strong city. I presume this is the city intended Psalm lx. 8, and cviii. 10, under the appellation "strong city." Though these passages are counterparts to each other, yet in Ps. lx. 9, it is written Metjur; in Ps. cviii. 10, it is Betjur, or Bosor: and this forms the proper geographical parallelism by opposition with the Edom of the same verse: Bostra lying N. E. of Jerusalem, Edom S. W. Vide Jer. xlviii. 24. See the PLATES, MEDALS of Bostra.]

[It is probable there were other cities of this name; the sound of the name resembles greatly that of Bassorah, or Bazra, a city in the East, situated on the Euphrates, toward the mouth of that river. Though this city may not be so ancient as to be the subject of the threatenings of Isaiah and Jeremiah, yet it may be a successor (or repetition) to one of the same name: and such an one might be reckoned in Arabia.]

BEZETH, a city on this side Jordan, which Bacchides surprized, and threw all the inhabitants into a great pit. Probably the Bezecath of 1 Macc. vii. 19.

BEZETHA, or Betzeta, a division or district of Jerusalem, situated on a mountain, encompassed with good walls; being, as it were, a new city added to the old. Betzetha was north of Jerusalem and the temple. Vide BEZETHA, and the MAPS of JERUSALEM.

BIBLE, from the Greek Βιβλος, biblos, a book. We give this name to our collection of sacred writings, and call it THE BIBLE, or THE BOOK, by way of eminence and distinction. The Hebrews call it mikra, מִקְרָא, lesson, lecture, or scripture. They acknowledge only twenty-two books as canonical, which they place in the following order:

Order of the Books of the BIBLE, according to the Hebrews.

THE LAW.

- 1 Genesis, in Hebrew, Bereschith: in the beginning.
- 2 Exodus, in Hebrew, Veelle Schemoth: these are the names.
- 3 Leviticus, in Hebrew, Vailkra: and he called.
- 4 Numbers, in Hebrew, Bammidbar: in the desert.
- 5 Deuteronomy, in Hebrew, Elle buddabarim: these are the words.

THE FIRST PROPHETS.

THE REVELATIONS OF ST. JOHN.

The books of the Old Testament were written for the most part in Hebrew. Some parts of Ezra and Daniel are written in Chaldee.

The books of the New Testament were all written in Greek, except, perhaps, Matthew, whose Gospel was, probably, first written in Hebrew, i. e. Syriac, the language then spoken in Judea. It has been disputed whether Mark wrote in Greek or Latin, and whether the Epistle to the Hebrews were not originally written in Hebrew; but we think, that these books were composed in Greek. See their articles.

Books cited in the Old Testament, and supposed to be lost, are (1) the "Book of the Righteous, or Jasher," Josh. x. 13; and 1 Sam. xvii. 18; (2) the "Book of the Wars of the Lord," Numb. xxi. 14; (3) the Annals of the Kings of Judah and Israel." The authors of these annals, were the prophets who lived at the time. We have likewise only a part of Solomon's 3000 Proverbs, and his 1005 Songs, (1 Kings iv. 32, 33) and none of his writings on Natural History, &c. It is questioned, whether we have the Lamentations which Jeremiah composed on the death of Josiah, king of Judah; because the taking of Jerusalem, and the destruction of that city by Nebuchadnezzar, seem to be the subjects of those which we have of this prophet.

Book of the Wars of the Lord. This is cited by Moses, Numb. xxi. 14, "What he did in the Red Sea, and in the brooks of Arnon," &c. The Book of the Wars of the Lord, related some particulars which happened when the Hebrews passed those brooks.

Enquiry has been made, what this Book was; some think it was a work of greater antiquity than Moses, containing a recital of wars, to which the Israelites were parties in Egypt; or out of Egypt; before their Exodus under Moses. Indeed, it is most natural to quote a book, which is more ancient than the author who is writing, particularly in support of any extraordinary and miraculous fact. The Hebrew of this passage is perplexed: "As it is written in the Book of the Wars of the PART VI. Edit. IV.

Lord; at Vaheb, in Suphah; and in the brooks of Arnon," &c. We do not know who, or what, this Vaheb is. M. Boivin senior, thought it meant some prince, who had the government of the country, and was defeated by the Israelites before they came out of Egypt: others think, Vaheb was a king of Moab, overcome by Sihon, king of the Amorites.

Grotius, instead of Vaheb, reads Moab, and translates it, "Sihon beat Moab at Suphah." I should rather read Zared, instead of Vaheb, after this manner: "As it is written in the book of the wars of the Lord, the Hebrews came from Zared, and encamped at Suphah, and about the stream of the brook of Arnon," &c. Zared we know, Numb. xxi. 12, 13; from whence they came to Suphah, which is mentioned Deut. i. 1; and, perhaps, Numb. xxii. 36. From hence they came to the brook of Arnon, which flows down to Ar, the capital city of the Moabites. This is cited very seasonably in this place, to confirm what is said in preceding verses. Zared may easily be made from vaheb, in the Hebrew; את ובה בצופה eth vaheb besuphah . . . את ובה בצופה eth zared besuphah.

Others are of opinion, that the "Book of the Wars of the Lord," is the book of Numbers itself, wherein this passage is cited; or that of Joshua, or the Judges; they translate, "It is said in the recital of the wars of the Lord," &c. Others, that this narration of the wars of the Lord is contained in the hundred and thirty-fifth, and the hundred and thirty-sixth Psalms: others, that the "Book of the Wars of the Lord," and the "Book of Jasher," referred to Josh. x. 13, are the same. Cornelius a Lapide conjectures, that this citation is added to the text of Moses, and that the "Book of the Wars of the Lord," related the wars of the Israelites, under Moses, Joshua, the Judges, &c. and, therefore, was later than Moses. Lastly, it may be said, that Moses either wrote himself, or procured to be written, a book, wherein he related all the wars of the Lord. This book was continued under the Judges and the Kings, and was called Annals; and from these annals were composed those sacred books, which contain the histories of the Old Testament: this "Book of the Wars of the Lord," is not now in being; yet we have no reason to doubt of its authenticity.

"The book of Jasher, or the Upright." This is cited, Joshua x. 13; and 2 Sam. i. 18. The same difficulties are proposed concerning this, as concerning the former. "Is not this written in the book of Jasher? So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day." There is great diversity versity of opinions concerning this book; some think it to be the same with that of the Wars of the Lord; others, that it is the Book of Genesis, which contains the lives of the patriarchs, and other good men; others, the "Books of Moses."

But the opinion which seems most probable, is, that there were from the beginning persons among the Hebrews, who were employed in writing the annals of their nation, and recording the memorable events in it. These annals were lodged in the tabernacle, or temple, where, on occasion, recourse was had to them. Therefore, the "Book of the Wars of the Lord," the "Book of Days, or Chronicles," and the "Book of Jasher, or the Righteous," are, properly speaking, the same, but differently denominated, according to the difference of times. Before there were kings over the Hebrews, these records might be entitled, the "Book of the Wars of the Lord," or the "Book of Jasher, or Right." After the reign of Saul, they might be called the "Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel, or, of Judah." Grotius is of opinion, that this book was a triumphant song, made purposely to celebrate the success of Joshua, and the prodigy attending it. M. Dupin declares for this opinion, as most probable, because (1) the words cited by Joshua, are poetical expressions not very proper for historical memoirs: (2) because a book under the same title, is referred to in Samuel, where David's song is repeated on the death of Saul and Jonathan. 2 Sam. i. 18. Dissert. Prelimin. sur la Bible, lib. i. cap. 3.

[But, may not these opinions coincide, if we suppose this book contained a collection of pieces of poetry, made on occasion of remarkable events?—In this view, the appeal to the Book of Jasher for a copy of David's Ode, called "The Bow," is very pertinent. Might it not contain the Songs of Moses, of Deborah, &c. May Jasher "the Upright," signify THE STANDARD—authentic book? Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXVI. Dr. Geddes, "New Transl." will not allow that Josh. x. 13, is a quotation. I think it clearly a quotation.

It is perfectly well known to all readers of English history, that not only are our most ancient chronicles in verse, but also that many national events are recorded in historical songs, which, though unquestionably genuine and authentic, yet are no where else to be met with. The Saxon Chronicle, with several others, prove this; but the most popular instances are the "border songs," or events narrated in rhyme, of the wars and contests between the English and the Scots on the "debateable lands," before the union of the two crowns.]

It is disputed, whether the citation from the book of Jasher were inserted by Joshua himself, or by those who digested his memoirs, and arranged his book in its present form. It is credible, that this passage might be inserted afterwards; we may easily observe, that the book of Joshua has received some additions.

"The Book of Chronicles, or Days," in Hebrew, דְּבֵרֵי יָמִים, Deberi Jamim. This book contained the annals and journals written by public recorders, in the kingdoms of Israel and Judah; these memoirs, or journals, are not now in being, but are cited very frequently in the books of Kings and Chronicles, which are abstracts chiefly from such old memoirs, and records, as in all probability, were subsisting after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity. The authors were generally prophets.

COMPRISING SOME ACCOUNT OF THE Original Manuscripts

OF THE ANCIENT AND MODERN VERSIONS

AND PARTICULARS OF THE

ENGLISH TRANSLATIONS, OF THE BIBLE.

As it is of the utmost importance to every professor of that Religion which is founded on the Bible, that the Bible itself should not only be well understood by him, but that its authority, as a work communicated by inspiration from Heaven, should be well ascertained, and moreover, that the authenticity of such copies of it as are now procurable, and the correctness of those translations from such copies as are usually read and appealed to by us, should be established, we have thought it might be proper to offer an enquiry of some length into these latter particulars, not less for the use of the Biblical student, than for the satisfaction of general readers.

Of the AUTHORITY of the Bible, as received by inspiration from God, we shall at present say nothing, presuming it is fully admitted by the reader; and being aware that the necessary proofs requisite to do this subject tolerable justice, would extend these summary hints to an inconvenient length.

As to the AUTHENTICITY of such copies of the Bible as are now procurable, we refer the reader, in the first place, to the articles BIBLE, MASSORA, POINTS, VERSIONS, &c.

OF THE ORIGINAL WRITERS OF THE BIBLE.

It is very credible that the patriarch Abraham, to go no higher into antiquity, possessed and brought away what information the books or records of his original country, Kedem, could communicate. For my own part, I do not know that I should say any thing improbable, if I considered Noah himself as practising the art of writing; but as great doubts have been entertained, whether this art be more ancient than the intercourse of Moses with the Divinity on Mount Horeb, I am unwilling to be thought too sanguine, or too over-weening, on this subject.

The remarks suggested in FRAGMENT, No. CCLXVI. "On the Nature of Seals," are determinate for the nature of the seal of Judah, Gen. xxxviii. that it contained his name, or appropriate mark engraved on it. We assume this as fact. But I think we discern traces of a still more early employment of this noble art, in the days of Abraham. We read, Gen. xxiv. 17, a passage which has all the air of an abridgement of a title-deed, or conveyance of an estate; which indeed is its import. "And the 1. field of Ephron, 2. which was in Macpelah, 3. which was before Mamre, 4. the field, 5. and the cave which was therein, 6. and all the trees in the field, 7. that were in all the borders thereof round about, 8. were made sure to Abraham, 9. for a possession, 10. in the presence of the children of Heth, 11. before all that went in at the gate of his city." An attorney of our own days would desire no more than the introduction of a few modern phrases, to make a deed of many skins from this passage; and the whole history of this purchase and payment strikes me as being not only according to the local usages of the country, in the present day, but also to be so minutely described, that I scarcely think it would have been so amply, and even punctiliously, inserted into an epitomised history of the times, had not the original laid before the writer; who, finding himself able to communicate this ancient document to his readers, [his posterity] embraced with pleasure the opportunity of abridging it.

If this be admitted as an instance of the art of writing, and of that art being practised in the days of Abraham, we may justly consider whether that patriarch could be the first possessor of it? I think not: and if, as the Rabbins say, Abraham himself learned of Shem, and they say, decidedly, that "Isaac went to Shem's school," then we may hesitate before we deny the possibility, at least, that Shem had preserved histories of former events, which histories he communicated to Abraham, from whom they descended to Isaac, to Jacob, to Levi, to Moses. I am not singular in supposing a difference of style between the early parts of the book of Genesis and the original writings of Moses; but this by the bye.

No injury is done to the just arguments on behalf of the inspiration of Scripture, if we suppose that Shem wrote the early history of the world; that Abraham wrote family memoirs of what related to himself; that Jacob continued what concerned himself, &c. and that, at length, Moses compiled, arranged, and edited, a copy of the holy works extant in his time. A procedure, perfectly analogous to this, was conducted by Ezra in a later age; on whose edition of Holy Scripture our faith now rests, as it rests, in like manner, on the prior edition of Moses, if he were the editor of some parts; or on his authority, if he were the writer of the whole.

Accepting Moses as the writer of the Pentateuch, [not without the concurrence of Aaron, see FRAGMENT, No. I.] we may nevertheless consider Joshua as adding some small matters to it, such as the history of the death of Moses, &c. and Ezra, also, in his edition, as adding some other small matters to it, such as various minor observations, changes of names which had happened during the lapse of many ages, particular directions where such or such objects were situated, &c. for the benefit of his readers; and let me say, too, for the benefit of remote posterity, even down to the present day.

When we come to the days of Moses, we have clear evidence of written documents being composed, purposely, to deliver down to posterity the history of events. Moses not only was willing to write, but he is specifically directed to write, by way of record; and to take special care for the preservation of those records, by placing them in the most sacred National repository; and under the immediate care of those persons who by birth, education and office, were most intimately concerned in their preservation.

We find this custom of composing PUBLIC RECORDS was continued in after ages in Israel; under the Judges, under the Kings; and when the schism took place between Israel and Judah, EACH of those kingdoms preserved copies of the writings esteemed sacred, whether historical or devotional. We have, indeed, reason to be thankful, that beside the Pentateuch preserved by the Jewish copy, the Samaritans have preserved their copy of the Pentateuch also; which if it be, as many learned men have supposed, written in the truly ancient Hebrew character, is so much the more valuable, as it has had less risque and less occasion of error, than a copy transcribed into another alphabet, to meet another dialect.

But this is not the only use which I think should be made of this circumstance: we ought to recollect the natural effects of party in matters of Religion, especially when heightened by political rancour; we may be satisfied that the Samaritans would suffer no alterations to be made in their copies by any authority from the Jewish governors; and the Jews, we well know, would have hardly received even a palpable truth from "that foolish people which dwelt in Samaria."

Wherefore, when we find the copies preserved by these two opposing and inimical people GENERALLY correspondent, and differing only in some few minor matters, we ought to admire the providence of God, which has thus "made even the wrath of man to praise him," by transmitting more than one copy of this leading portion of Holy Writ, in a manner more certain, and much less liable to doubt, or collusion, or equivocation, than if a single copy had come through the hands of one set of friends only, or had been preserved only by those whose unsupported testimony might have been suspected of undue partiality, or of improper bias.

We find the kings of Judah attentive to the arrangement of their sacred code in after ages; David, no doubt, authenticated the books of the prophet Samuel; and we read that Hezekiah employed several persons to collect and arrange the Proverbs of Solomon; and even to add to them others which that prince had left behind him. It is usually understood that the Psalms, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, were added under Hezekiah; also the book of Job, perhaps; others think Isaiah. Vide CABBALA.

The prophecies of Jeremiah were public; many of them were read to all the people, and before the king, so that many copies might be in circulation; the same may be said of most of the minor prophets; and, in short, of all that were near to the days of Nehemiah and Ezra.

It is very natural to suppose that those chiefs of the Jewish people, after their return from captivity, would do their utmost to collect, preserve, and maintain the dignity and integrity of the writings of their Sacred Code; and indeed, excepting the prophet Malachi, we may confidently consider Ezra as not only collecting, but collating the copies of former writings, and composing additions to the historical narrations; not in the books themselves, [except here and there a few words] withheld perhaps by their prior sanctity, but in that separate history which we call the Chronicles.

Here we ought to pause; because here our faith rests on Ezra's edition: and I doubt not that this "scribe, well instructed in the law," had not only divine guidance, but good reasons too for what he did, and for his manner of doing it.

I suspect that we have so many instances of Ezra's modesty, as we have marginal readings in our Hebrew Bibles, which in all amount to 840. These occur in various places of the works extant before Ezra; but there are none in the prophet Malachi, who has been supposed to be Ezra himself; if so, the reason for this exemption from various readings is evident.

From the time of Ezra the Hebrew canon was esteemed as concluded; but between the times of Ezra and Christ the books of the Jews became objects of enquiry among neighbouring nations; and translations of them, during this interval, being undertaken by those whose language we also study, these translations become very important to us: who by their means have additional sanction to the articles of our enquiry, and additional means of answering the purposes to which our enquiry is directed.

TRANSLATIONS OF THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES.

The first Translation in order of time, and indeed in point of importance to us, is that Greek version usually called the SEVENTY, or the SEPTUAGINT; we have little to add to the account given of it in the Dictionary.

The CHALDEE Translations come next in order: they are not so much translations as paraphrases: vide TARGUM, JONATHAN, VER-SION, &c.

The SYRIAC Translation has been, by some, referred to the time of Solomon; by others to the time of Abgarus, king of Edessa; this is certainly more probable; but is not universally admitted. It unquestionably is ancient. Dr. Prideaux thinks it was made within the first century of A. D. and that it is the best of all translations.

LATIN Translations do not date before the introduction of Christianity into Rome. Vide VULGATE.

We are now to add to our consideration, beside the Hebrew copies of the Old Testament, the several books which compose the New Testament; these were studied, copied and translated, together with the Hebrew Scriptures, by Christians; while the Jews continued to study and copy only those which contained the principles of their ancient system.

JEWISH LABOURS ON HEBREW COPIES.

The attention of the Jews was by no means confined to writing copies of the Holy Word; they made almost incredible exertions to preserve the genuineness and integrity of the text.

This produced what has been termed the Masora, the most stupendous monument, in the whole history of literature, of minute and persevering labour. The persons employed in it, and and who afterwards received from it the name of Masorites, were Jewish literati, who flourished after the commencement of the Christian æra. With a reverential, not to say superstitious attention, of which history does not furnish an instance to be urged in comparison with it, they counted all the verses, words, and letters of all the twenty-four books of the Old Testament, and of each of those twenty-four books, and of every section of each book, and of all its subdivisions. "The matter of the Massora," says Mr. Lewis, in his Origines Hebrææ, vol. iv. p. 156, "consists in critical remarks on the verses, words, letters, and vowel points of the Hebrew text. The Massorets were the first who distinguished the books and sections of books into verses, and marked the number of the verses, and of the words and letters in each verse; the verses where they thought there was something forgot; the words which they believed to be changed; the letters which they thought superfluous; the repetitions of the same verses; the different readings; the words which are redundant or defective; the number of times that the same word is found in the beginning, middle, or end of a verse; the different significations of the same word; the agreement or conjunction of one word with another; the number of words that are printed above; which letters are pronounced, and which are turned upside down; and such as hang perpendicular; they took the number of each: it was they, in short, who invented the vowel points, the accents, and made divers critical remarks on the punctuation, and abundance of other things of equal importance.

"A great part of the labour of these Jewish doctors consisted in counting the letters of the Hebrew text; and the letter Nun in the word Gehon, is, in the Talmud, observed to be in the very middle of the Pentateuch. Father Simon gives an account of a manuscript copy, which he saw, where that part of the Massora that belonged to the letters, was to this purpose. There are twelve parscioths, or great sections, in Genesis; there are forty-three lesser sections, called sedarim, or orders: there are one thousand five hundred and thirty-four verses, twenty thousand seven hundred and thirteen words, seventy-eight thousand one hundred letters; and the midst of the book consists in these words, Ve al harbeka tihieh, in chap. xxvii. ver. 40. There are five points (these are points made on the top of some letters, mentioned by St. Jerom). Exodus has eleven parscioths, thirty-three sedarim, one thousand two hundred and nine verses, sixty-three thousand four hundred and sixty-seven letters; and these words, Elohim, lo tekallel, in chap. xxii. ver. 27. are in the very middle of this book. There are in Leviticus ten parscioths, twenty-five sedarim, eight hundred and fifty-nine verses, eleven thousand nine hundred and two words, forty-four thousand nine hundred and eighty-nine letters; and these words, Vehannogia bibesar, in chap. xv. ver. 7. are the middle words. There are in Numbers ten parscioths, thirty-three sedarim, one thousand two hundred and eighty-eight verses, sixteen thousand seven hundred and seven words, sixty-two thousand five hundred and twenty-nine letters; and these words, Ve hain-is asher ebehar, in chap. xvii. ver. 20. are the middle words. There are in Deuteronomy ten parscioths, thirty-one sedarim, nine hundred and fifty-five verses, sixteen thousand three hundred and ninety-four words, fifty-four thousand eight hundred and ninety-two letters; and the middle words of this book are, Ve ascitu alpi hadavar, in chap. xvii. ver. 10."

Such is the celebrated Masora of the Jews. Originally it did not accompany the text. Afterwards the greatest part of it was written in the margin. To bring it into the margin, it was necessary to abridge the work itself. This abridgment was called the Masora Parva. Being found too short, a more copious abridgment of it was inserted. This, in contradistinction from the other Masora, was called the Masora Magna. The omitted parts were added at the end of the text, and this was called the Masora Finalis.

In the Jewish manuscripts and printed editions, a word is often found with a small circle annexed to it, or with an asterisk over it, and a word written in the margin of the same line. The former is called the Ketibh, the latter the Keri. In these, much mystery has been discovered by the Masorites. The prevailing opinion is, that they are partly various readings, collected from the time of Esdras, and partly critical observations, or, as they have been called, insinuations, of the Masorites, to substitute proper or regular for improper and irregular words; and sometimes decent for indecent expressions, in the text.

As to the VOWEL POINTS, which CALMET has considered as masoretical, the reader may see sufficient information under that article in the Dictionary.

OF THE PRESENT STATE OF THE HEBREW MANUSCRIPTS.

No extensive collation of the Hebrew manuscripts of the sacred text was made till the present [last] century. This was owing, in a great measure, to a notion which had prevailed of the integrity of the sacred text, in consequence quence of its supposed preservation from error, by the wonder-working Masora. In the annals of literature, there is not, perhaps a more striking instance of the little safety there is, in trusting, without examination, to received opinions, than the general acquiescence of the learned in this opinion. The Rabbins boldly asserted, and the Christians implicitly believed, that the Hebrew text was free from error, and that, in all the manuscripts of it, not an instance of a various reading of importance could be produced. The first, who combated this notion in the form of regular attack, was Ludovicus Capellus. From the differences he observed between the Hebrew text and the version of the Seventy, and between the Hebrew Pentateuch and the Samaritan Pentateuch; from the manifest and palpable corruptions he thought he saw in the text itself; and from the many reasons which made him suppose the vowel points and the Masora were both a modern and an useless invention, he was led to question the general integrity of the text; and even his enemies allowed, that, in his attack upon it, he discovered extreme learning and ingenuity. Still, however, he admitted the uniformity of the manuscripts. When this was urged against him by Buxtorf, he had little to reply. At length (what should have been done, before any thing had been said or written on the subject), the manuscripts themselves were examined, and innumerable various readings were discovered in them. From this time Biblical criticism on the sacred text took a new turn. Manuscripts were collated, were examined with attention, their various readings were discussed with freedom, and their respective merits ascertained by the rules of criticism. The celebrated collation of Dr. Kennicott was begun in the year 1760. He undertook to collate all the manuscripts of the sacred text in England, and in Ireland; and, while he should be employed in this (which he supposed might be about ten years), to collate, as far as the expence would admit, all the Hebrew manuscripts of importance, in foreign countries. The first volume was printed in 1776; the second in 1780. Dr. Kennicott himself collated two hundred and fifty manuscripts. Under his direction, and at his expence, Mr. Brunus collated about three hundred and fifty: so that the whole number of manuscripts collated, on this occasion, was nearly six hundred. It appears, that, in his opinion, fifty-one of the manuscripts collated for his edition were from 600 to 800, and that one hundred and seventy-four were from 480 to 580, years old. Four quarto volumes of various readings have since been published by De Rossi of Parma, from more than four hundred manuscripts; some of which are said to be of the seventh or eighth century, as well as from a considerable number of rare and unnoticed editions, under the title of Variae Lectiones Veteris Testamenti, ex immensa manuscriptorum editorumque codicum congerie, haustæ et examinata.—Parma, 1786. The consequence of these extensive collations has been, to raise a general opinion among the learned, 1st, that all manuscript copies of the Hebrew Scriptures now extant may, in some sort, be called Masoretic copies, because none of them have intirely escaped the rude hands of the Masorites: 2dly, that the most valuable manuscripts, generally speaking, are those which are oldest, written at first without points or accents, containing the greatest number of real vowels, or matres lectionis, exhibiting marks of an accurate transcriber, and conforming most to the ancient versions, and, with regard to the Pentateuch, conforming most to the Samaritan exemplar, and the Greek uninterpolated version: 3dly, that the Masoretic copies often disagree (and that, the further back they go, the greater is their disagreement) from the the present printed copy: fourthly, that the synagogue rolls disagree the least from the printed copies, so that they are of little value in ascertaining the text. From this combination of reasons they conclude, that the surest sources of emendation, are a collation of manuscripts and parallel places; a comparison of the text with the ancient versions, and of these with one another; grammatical analogy; and, where all these fail, even conjectural criticism. [Nevertheless, the ancient opinions have some advocates. These do not go so far as to assert, that a collation of Hebrew manuscripts is perfectly useless; but they think it may be prized higher than it deserves; that, when manuscripts of an earlier date than the Masora are sought for, it should not be forgot, that the Masorites had those manuscripts, when they settled the text; and what hopes can there be, they ask, that at the close of the eighteenth century, after the Hebrew has long ceased to be a spoken language, a Christian, so much of whose time is employed in other pursuits, and distracted by other cares, can make a better use of those manuscripts than was actually made of them, by the Masoretic literati, whose whole time, whose every thought, from their earliest years to their latest age, was devoted to that one object; who lived among the people, and almost in the country, where the events recorded by them, happened,—who saw with their own eyes the manners they describe, and daily and hourly spoke and heard a language kindred to that in which they are written? But, if there must be a collation of manuscripts, then, say they, no manuscript written by any other than a Jew, or wanting any one of the Jewish marks of authenticity, should be taken into account: and, trying the question of the integrity of the text by these, which they call, the only authentic manuscripts, no question, they assert, will remain of the perfect integrity, and perfect freedom from corruption, of the present text. Where it can be shewn, that the text of the Masora is corrupt, the genuineness of the Bible reading may be doubted: but where there is no reason to impeach the Masora, the text as they assert, is fixed beyond controversy. Such is the state of the Manuscripts of the Hebrew Scriptures.]

OF THE PRINTED HEBREW BIBLES.

Those printed editions which appear to deserve particular attention, are, that of Soncino, in 1488, from its being the first printed edition of the whole Bible; the edition at Brescia, in 1494, from its being the edition used by Luther, in his translation; a third was printed in 1517, without the name of any place. These three editions are called the Soncinates, being printed by Jews, of a family which came originally from Germany, and established themselves at Soncino, a town in Lombardy, between Cremona and Brescia. They were the first Hebrew printers. Bomberg's edition was printed five times, and is distinguished by the beauty of the type; but, not being divided into chapters and verses, is unfit for general use. The first of his editions was printed in 1518, the last in 1545: they were all printed at Venice, and are all in 4to. Robert Stephens's 16mo edition is most elegantly printed. It is in seven volumes, and was printed at Paris, 1544—1546. He had before printed a 4to edition at Paris, in four volumes, 1539—1544. The celebrated edition of Athias, a Jew printer at Amsterdam, was published in that city, first in 1661, and afterwards in 1667: it is remarkable for being the first edition in Hebrew, in which the verses are numbered. It was beautifully reprinted by Eeverardus Vander Hooght, in two volumes 8vo. 1705. This edition has the general reputation of great accuracy. Some have called its accuracy in question; but the elegance of the type, the beauty of the paper, and the fine glossy blackness of the ink, cannot be denied. His text was adopted by Dr. Kennicott, in his edition. The Plantinian editions have considerable merit for their neatness and accuracy. The edition of Nunes Torres, with the notes of Raschè, was begun in 1700, was printed in 1705, and was the favourite edition of the Jews. Most of the former editions were surpassed by that of Michaelis in 1720. A critical edition was published by Raphael Chajim Basila, a Jew at Mantua, in four parts, 1742—1744.

The most celebrated edition of the Hebrew, with a Latin translation, was that of Sebastian Munster. The first volume of the first edition was printed in 1534, the second volume in 1535; the second edition was printed in 1546. It was the first Latin translation by any of the separatists from the see of Rome. Santos Pagninus was the first of the Catholics who made an entirely new Latin version. It was published at Lyons, in 1528, and has often been republished. That it is an accurate and faithful translation, all acknowledge,—that the Latinity is barbarous, cannot be denied; but, as it was the author's plan, to frame a verbal translation, in the strictest and most literal sense of that word, its supposed barbarism was unavoidable, and cannot, therefore, be imputed to it, as a fault. The celebrated edition of the Rev. Charles Francis Houbigant, of the Oratory, was published in four volumes folio, with a Latin version and prolegomena, at Paris, in 1753. The prolegomena and the Latin version have been printed separately. The merit of this edition is celebrated by all, who are not advocates for the Masora: by them it is spoken of in the harshest terms. Several manuscripts were occasionally consulted by the author: but it is evident, that he did not collate any one manuscript throughout. Prior to Houbigant's edition, was that of Reineccius, at Leipsic, in 1725, reprinted there in 1739. A new edition of it was printed in 1793, under the inspection of Dr. Doederlein, and Professor Meisner. It contains the most important of the various readings collected by Dr. Kennicott and De Rossi; printed under the text. For the purpose of common use, it is an excellent edition, and supplies the want of the splendid but expensive editions and collations, of Houbigant, Kennicott, and De Rossi.

Those who extend their biblical researches into Rabbinism, are recommended by the learned in this branch of biblical literature, to the Biblia Rabbinica of Rabbi Moses, published at Amsterdam, in four volumes folio, in 1724—1727, which entirely superseded the Biblia Rabbinica of Bomberg and Buxtorf. The purchasers of it should see, that the copy offered to them contains the treatise of the Rabbi Abdias Sporno, de Scopo Legis, which, in the copies designed for sale to Christians, is generally omitted.

The reader will perceive, that the Hebrew language, though lost as a spoken language among the Jews, yet has been cultivated among them by their men of learning: while the Christians, under all the disadvantages of receiving the principles of this language from Jewish instructors, have laboured with great assiduity, assiduity, in acquiring a competent acquaintance with it; and even a deep knowledge of its powers. They have also been the first to collate MSS. and to apply general learning to Sacred Literature: both these principles are honourable to their skill and industry; but, both may be carried too far, if they should be substituted for accurate understanding of the Holy Language itself, and correct attention to its peculiarities, properties, and idioms.

But while I recommend strongly the closest attention to the Hebrew language itself, I admit frankly, that very great light has been obtained from its sister dialects, of which the Chaldee is one, and the Arabic is another, which cannot be too highly prized. The Jews despise this Arabic dialect; but the disadvantage of despising it is to themselves.

The reader may now form a tolerable idea of the state of the Hebrew Scriptures, the Old Testament: we are next to direct our attention to the Scriptures of the New Testament, which are written in Greek.

OF THE PRESENT STATE OF THE GREEK MANUSCRIPTS.

The Greek manuscripts, according to Wetstein's account, are written either on parchment (or vellum) or on paper. The parchment or vellum is either purple-coloured, or of its natural colour; and either thin or thick. The paper is either silken, or of the common sort; and its superficies is either glazed, or of the ordinary roughness. The letters are either capital (generally called uncial), or small. The capital letters are either unadorned and simple, and the strokes of them very thin and straight; or they are of a thicker kind, uneven and angular. Some of them are supported on something like a base, others are ornamented, or rather burthened, with a top. Letters of the first description are of the kind generally found on the ancient monuments of Greece; those of the last resemble the paintings of half barbarous times. Manuscripts, therefore, written in the first kind of letter, are generally supposed to be of the sixth century, at the latest; those written in the second kind of letter are generally supposed to be of the tenth century. The manuscripts written in the small letters are of a still later age. But the Greek manuscripts, copied by the Latins, after the reign of Charlemagne, are in another kind of alphabet; the α , the ϵ , and the γ , in them, are inflected, in the form of the letters of the Latin alphabet. Even in the earliest manuscripts some words are abbreviated. At the beginning of a new book, the four or five first lines are often written in vermillion. There are very few manuscripts containing the entire New Testament. The greater part contain the gospels only; very few have the Apocalypse.

The curious and extensive collations, which have been made of manuscripts within this century, have shewn, that certain manuscripts have an affinity to each other; and that their text is distinguished from others by characteristic marks. This has enabled the writers on this subject to arrange them under certain general classes. They have observed, that, as different countries had different versions, according to their respective languages, their manuscripts naturally resembled their respective versions, as the versions, generally speaking, were made from the manuscripts in common use. Pursuing this idea, they have supposed four principal exemplars: 1st the Western exemplar, or that used in the countries where the Latin language was spoken;—with this, the Latin versions coincide: 2d the Alexandrine exemplar;—with this, the quotations of Origen coincide: 3d, the Edessene exemplar, from which the Syriac version was made; and 4th, the BYZANTINE or CONSTANTINOPOLITAN exemplar: the greatest number of manuscripts written by the monks on mount Athos, the Moscow manuscripts, the Slavonian or Russian versions, and the quotations of St. Chrysostom and Theophylact, bishop of Bulgaria, are referrible to this edition. The readings of this exemplar are remarkably different from those of the other exemplars; between which, a striking coincidence appears. A reading supported by all three of them is supposed to be of the very highest authority; yet the true reading is sometimes found only in the fourth.

From the coincidence observed between many Greek manuscripts and the Vulgate, or some other Latin translation, a suspicion arose in the minds of several writers of eminence, that the Greek text had been assimilated throughout to the Latin. This seems to have been first suggested by Erasmus; but it does not appear that he supposed the alterations were made before the fifteenth century: so that the charge of Latinizing the manuscripts did not, in his notion of it, extend to the original writers of the manuscript, or as they are called, the writers a primâ manu, but affected only the subsequent interpolators, or, as they are called, the writers a secundâ manu. Father Simon and Mill adopted and extended this accusation; and it was urged by Wetstein with his usual vehemence and ability; so that it came to be generally received. Bengel expressed some doubts of it; and Semler formally called it in question. He was followed by Griesbach and Woide; and finally brought over Michaelis, who, in the first edition of his Introduction to the New Testament, had taken part with the accusers; but, in the fourth edition of the same work, with a candour of which there are too few examples, he declared himself persuaded, that the charge was unfounded; and totally abandoned his first opinion.

Besides the manuscripts which contain whole books of the New Testament, other manuscripts have been consulted; among these are the Lectionaria, or collections of detached parts of the New Testament, appointed to be read in the service of the church. These are distinguished into the Evangelistarium, or lessons from the Gospels; and the Apostolos, or lessons from the Acts and Epistles. The quotations from the New Testament, in the works of the ancients, have also been consulted.

PRINCIPAL GREEK MANUSCRIPTS NOW EXTANT.

These are the Codex ALEXANDRINUS, in the British Museum, the Codex CANTABRIGIENSIS, or Codex BEZÆ, and the Codex VATICANUS. The Codex ALEXANDRINUS consists of four volumes; the first three of which contain the Old Testament; the fourth, the New Testament, together with the first epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, and a fragment of the second. The Codex CANTABRIGIENSIS, or the Codex BEZÆ, is a Greek and Latin manuscript of the four Gospels and the Acts of the apostles. The Codex VATICANUS contained, originally, the whole Greek Bible. The respective ages of these venerable manuscripts have been a subject of great controversy, and have employed the ingenuity and learning of several biblical writers of great renown. After a profound investigation of the subject, Dr. Woide fixes the age of the Codex ALEXANDRINUS between the middle and the end of the fourth century; after a similar investigation, Dr. Kipling fixes the age of the Codex CANTABRIGIENSIS, or the Codex BEZÆ, at the second century; but Bishop Marsh, in his notes to Michaelis, vol. ii. p. 708—715, seems to prove demonstratively, that it was not written earlier than the fifth century. Montfaucon and Blanchini refer the Codex VATICANUS to the fifth century. In 1786, a fac-simile edition of the New Testament in the Codex ALEXANDRINUS was published in London, by Dr. Woide. In 1793, a fac-simile edition of the Codex CANTABRIGIENSIS, or the Codex BEZÆ, was published at Cambridge, at the expense of the University, by Dr. Kipling. These editions exhibit their respective prototypes, page for page, line for line, word for word, contraction for contraction, rasure for rasure, to a degree of similarity hardly credible. The types were cast for the purpose, in alphabets of various forms, that they might be varied with those of the manuscript, and represent it more exactly; and the ink was composed to suit the colour of the faded pigment. Nothing equal to them had appeared in the world of letters.

[The Alexandrian Manuscript is an article of such great curiosity, and the labour and expense bestowed on it are so truly honourable to our country, that some further account of it may be looked for here by the intelligent reader.

This celebrated Manuscript was transmitted to England by Sir Thomas Roe, ambassador from king Charles I. to the Ottoman Porte, in 1628. Cyril Lucar, Patriarch of Alexandria, in Egypt, being removed from that city to Constantinople, brought with him a valuable collection of ancient books; and, possibly, not without apprehension of what might befall himself, and with him his collection, among a people so little swayed by deference to Christian learning as the Turks; or by whatever other motive influenced, the patriarch sent the most valuable article in his possession, which had been revered as a treasure by the Greek church for several hundred years, as a present to his Majesty of England. It was placed in the Royal Library at St. James's, whence it was subsequently removed to our National collection in the British Museum; of which it forms one of the glories.

The writer of this manuscript is said to have been Thecla, an Egyptian lady, who lived early in the fourth century;—but here ends our knowledge of her. There have been many ladies of this name; some of them of Roman descent, who retired into the East for devotion, perhaps for solitude; and whose piety was in the highest esteem among their contemporaries. These ladies understood the Greek language; nor could they better employ the leisure they had obtained, than by reading the Holy Scriptures in that tongue, and by copying, or causing to be copied for their use, so much of it as they could procure;—for often it was not without diligence and good fortune they could procure the whole. The lady Thecla, then, to whom our Manuscript owes its existence, was a person of eminence, probably of consequence, since her copy is complete, as to its contents; though now bearing marks of accidents, to which it has been exposed.

Its value is further enhanced, by observing, that, whatever opinions in subsequent ages agitated the Christian world, they have had no influence on this copy; it neither omits, nor inserts, nor dismembers a word to accommodate a passage to such sentiments. It was not many removes distant from the originals, of which it is a transcript: the language was still the spoken language; and whatever ambiguities occurred, (as some will always occur in all writings) they were then easily explained, and properly understood by the copyist; so that one principal cause of literary and verbal errors did not exist.

This Manuscript had not been long in England, before its value, as an important document in behalf of Christianity, became known. Mr. Patrick Young, the learned keeper of the king's library at that time, soon discovered the epistles of Clement, the only copy known of the second; and was commanded by the king to publish them, which he did in 1633, with a Latin translation. Dr. Grabe was commanded by queen Anne to publish the Manuscript.—He accordingly communicated to the world, in 1707—1710, the Old Testament part of it; being the Septuagint translation. We have noticed Dr. Woide's New Testament in 1786. Some years afterwards, Mr. Baber, of the British Museum, published the Book of Psalms, with equal accuracy; and in the year 1814, Mr. Baber proposed to publish a fac-simile copy of the remaining parts, so that the whole will be before the world. The number of copies to be printed is two hundred and fifty; and the expense will be nearly eight thousand pounds, which has been voted by the British Parliament. For further, Vide SEPTUAGINT.

PUNCTUATION OF THE BIBLE.

The numerous inaccuracies in the writings of the fathers, and their uncertainty how particular passages were to be read and understood, clearly prove that there was no regular and accustomed mode of punctuation in use in the fourth century. It seems to have been a gradual improvement, commenced by Jerom, and continued and improved by subsequent critics. At the invention of printing, the editors placed the points arbitrarily, probably, as Michaëlis thinks, without bestowing the necessary attention; and Stephens in particular, it is well known, varied his points in every edition. It is still much to be wished that in this respect the Scriptures were carefully revised.

DIVISION OF THE BIBLE INTO VERSES.

Whatever the antiquity of the Hebrew vowel points may be, the division of verses in the Old Testament is antecedent to the discovery of printing, or to any manuscripts that are known to exist; but in the Greek manuscripts of the New Testament there is no distinction of verses, and the time when they were first used by printers is perhaps not very accurately ascertained. Robert Stephens is thought to have been the author, or inventor, of verses in the

New Testament, which (says his son in the preface to his Concordance) he performed during a journey on horseback [inter equitandum] from Paris to Lyons. CALMET says, "the first division of the New Testament was made by Robert Stephens in 1551, and of the whole Bible in 1555." Michaëlis says, "verses were first used in the New Testament by Robert Stephens in 1551, and in the Old Testament by Cardinal Hugo de Sancto Caro, in the thirteenth century." But a Latin Bible, translated by Sanctus Pagninus, and printed at Lyons in the year 1527, or 1528, before Robert Stephens had printed any Bible on his own account, at least, is divided, the verses being numbered in the margin, and distinguished in the text by paragraphical marks, both in the Old and New Testament, and in the Apocrypha. The New Testament is indeed made into fewer divisions. St. Matthew's Gospel, in this edition, is divided into 576 verses, (the first chapter containing forty-nine; each of the present genealogical verses making three) while the present division amounts to 1071. The Gospel of St. Mark is 257, now 678. In the Old Testament the difference is small; in Genesis only twenty-two verses. CALMET notes this Bible, but not the division of verses. In the title page the date is 1528, but the imprint at the end is, "Veteris ac Nova Instrumenti nova translatio per Reverendum sacre Theolo. docto. Sanctum Pagninum Lucen. nuper edita, explicit. Impressa est autem Lugduni per Antonium du Ry. calcographum diligentissimum, impensis Francisci Turchi, et Dominici Berticinium Lucensium, et Iacobi de Giuntis bibliopola civis Florentini. Anno Domini 1527, Die vero xxix Januarii." Is there not then reason to conclude, that Robert Stephens had seen this Bible, saw the utility of verses, imitated it, and improved thereon? The great advantage of such a division is allowed by all who know the use of a Concordance.

EDITIONS OF THE GREEK NEW TESTAMENT.

The first in point of time, was that of Erasmus, with a new Latin translation. He published five editions of it, in 1516, 1519, 1522, 1527, and 1535. The edition of 1519 is most esteemed. In fact, the edition by Erasmus, with a slight intermixture of the text in the Complutensian Polyglott, are the principal editions from which almost all the subsequent copies have been taken.

The next edition of the New Testament in Greek, is that inserted in the Complutensian Polyglott. It is much to be wished that the editors had described, or at least specified, the manuscripts of which they made use. They speak highly of them; but this was, when the number of known manuscripts was small, and manuscript criticism in its infancy; so that, without impeaching either their candour or their judgment, their assertions, in this respect, must be understood with much limitation. It has been charged on them, that they sometimes altered the Greek text, without the authority of a single manuscript, to make it conform to the Latin. Against this charge they have been defended by Gœze and Michaëlis, and, to a certain extent, by Griesbach.

The editions of Robert Stephens are next to be considered. For exquisite beauty and delicacy of type, elegance and proper disposition of contractions, smoothness and softness of paper, liquid clearness of ink, and evenness of lines and letters, they have never been surpassed, and in the opinion of many, never equalled. There were four editions of them published by himself, in 1546, 1549, 1550, and 1551. His son published a fifth edition in 1569. The third of these is in folio, and has the readings of sixteen manuscripts in the margin. The two first are in 16mo. and of those, the first is the most correct.

The first edition of Beza was printed in 1565; he principally follows the third edition of Robert Stephens. He printed other editions in 1582, 1589, 1598. They do not contain, every where, the same text. In his choice of readings he is accused of being influenced by his Calvinistic sentiments.

The celebrated edition of the Elzevirs was first printed at Leyden, in 1624. It was printed from the third edition of Robert Stephens: where it varies from that edition, it follows, generally, the edition of Beza. By this edition, the text, which had fluctuated in the preceding editions, acquired a consistency. It was generally followed in all the subsequent editions. It has deservedly, therefore, obtained the appellation of Editio recepta. The editors of it are unknown.

EDITIONS WITH VARIOUS READINGS.

The celebrated edition of the Rev. John Mill was published at Oxford in 1707, after an assiduous labour of thirty years. He survived the publication of it only fourteen days. He inserted in this edition all the collections of various readings, which had been made before his time; he collated several original editions; procured extracts from Greek manuscripts, which had never been collated; and, in many instances, added readings from the ancient versions, and from the quotations of them in the works of the ancient fathers. The whole of the various readings collected by him, are said, without any improbability, to amount to thirty thousand. He has enriched his work with most learned prolegomena, and a clear and accurate description of his manuscripts. He took the third edition of Stephens for his text.

The edition of John Albert Bengel, abbot of Allspirspack, in the duchy of Wurtemberg, was published in 1734. He prefixed to it his "Introductio in Crisin Novi Testamenti;" and subjoined to it his "Apparatus Criticus et Epilogus." He altered the text, where he thought it might be improved; but, excepting the Apocalypse, he studiously avoided inserting in the text any reading which was not in some printed edition. Under the text he placed some select readings, reserving the whole collection of various readings, and his own sentiments upon them, for his Apparatus Criticus. He expressed his opinion of these marginal readings by the Greek letters, α , β , γ , δ , and ϵ .— α denotes that he held the reading to be genuine; β , that he thought its genuineness was not absolutely certain, but that the reading appeared to him preferable to that in the text; γ , that the reading in the margin was of equal value with the reading in the text; δ , that the marginal reading seemed of less value; and ϵ , that he thought it spurious.

But all former editions of the Greek Testament were surpassed by that of John James Wetstein; it was published in two volumes folio, in 1751, at Amsterdam. He adopted for his text the editio recepta of the Elzevirs. His collection of various readings far surpasses that of Mill or Bengel. His notes are particularly valuable, for the copious extracts he has made from Rabbinical writers. These greatly serve to explain the idiom and turn of expression used by the Apostolic writers and Evangelists.

The first edition of Dr. John James Griesbach's New Testament was published in 1775—1777, in two volumes octavo, at Halle, in Germany. In the year 1796, the first volume was reprinted, under the patronage and at the expense of his Grace the Duke of Grafton. It has extracts from two hundred manuscripts, in addition to those quoted in the former edition. He collated all the Latin versions published by Sabatier and Blanchini. His object is to give a select and choice collection of the various readings, produced by Mill, Bengel, and Wetstein, and of his own extracts; omitting all such as are trifling in themselves, supported by little authority, or evidently only errata.

[Griesbach's edition has been reprinted in this country, in a smaller form, for the use of schools: also in America. It is the text book used by the students in the German universities; and is gradually acquiring that authority, which, in all probability, will render it the general book of scholars, tutors, and the literati in general.

There are many other respectable editions of the Greek Testament; but those we have mentioned are confessedly the principal. The study of Greek learning is at this time pursued with great ardour in the British empire; and our travellers take opportunities of obtaining copies of MSS. from abroad, which greatly increase our literary riches at home. We repay the obligation, by printing, or by contributing assistance in printing, the sacred books for all the world.]

POLYGLOTT EDITIONS OF THE BIBLE.

That is, Bibles published in several languages, or at least, in three, of which the texts are ranged in different columns. Some Polyglotts contain all the books of the Bible, others contain but a part of them.—The following are the principal editions of these Bibles.—

1517.]—The first POLYGLOTT is that of Complutum or Alcalá. It is divided into six parts, and comprised in four volumes folio. It has the Hebrew, Latin, and Greek, in three distinct columns; the Chaldee paraphrase, with a Latin interpretation, is at the bottom of the page, and the margin is filled with the Hebrew and Chaldee radicals: the fourth volume contains the Greek Testament, with no other translation than the Latin. It was begun in 1502, was printed off in 1517, and was published in 1522. The expense of the work, which it is said amounted to fifty thousand ducats, was wholly paid by Cardinal XIMENES, of Spain. It is certain that the Cardinal spared no expense in collecting manuscripts; but whether he had any that were truly valuable, has been much doubted. In 1784, when Professor Birch was engaged in his edition of the Bible, Professor Moldenhawer went to Alcalá, for the purpose of discovering the manuscripts used in the Ximenian Polyglott. After much inquiry, he discovered, that, about thirty-five years before, they had been sold to a rocket-maker, of the name of Torio; and the receipt given to him for his purchase was produced!

1518.]—The Bible of Justinian, bishop of Nebio, of the order of St. Dominic, in five languages—Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, Latin, and Arabic, followed next. Only the Psalter was printed.

1546.]—John Potken, provost of the collegiate church of St. George at Cologne, caused the psalter to be printed in four languages—Hebrew, Greek, Chaldee, or rather Ethiopic, and Latin.

1546.]—The Jews of Constantinople printed the Pentateuch in Hebrew, Chaldee, Persian, and Arabic, with the commentaries of Solomon Jarchi.

1547.]—The same Jews caused to be printed, also, the Pentateuch, in four languages—Hebrew, Chaldee, vulgar Greek, and Spanish.

1565.]—John Draconitis, of Carlostad, in Franconia, published an edition of the psalter, the Proverbs, and the Prophets Micah and Joel, in five languages—Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, Latin, and German. The death of the author prevented the completion of his work.

1572.]—The Polyglott of Antwerp was printed in that city in 1569—1572, in eight volumes folio, under the direction of Arias Montanus. It contains, besides the whole of the Complutensian edition, a Chaldee paraphrase of part of the Old Testament, which Cardinal Ximenes, having particular reasons for not publishing, had deposited in the Theological library at Complutum. The New Testament has the Syriac version, and the Latin translation of Sanctus Pagninus, as reformed by Montanus.

1586.]—There appeared at Heidelberg, an edition of the books of the Old Testament, in Hebrew and Greek, with two Latin versions, one by Jerom, and the other by Sanctus Pagninus, ranged in four columns, at the bottom of which were notes ascribed to Vatablus. Hence it obtained the designation of the Polyglott Bible of Vatablus. This book is rare, but held in little estimation.

1596.]—David Wolder, a Lutheran minister at Hamburg, printed by James Lucius, a Bible in three languages—Greek, Latin, and German.

1599.]—Elias Hutter, a German, printed several Polyglotts. The first of these is in six languages, printed at Nuremberg.—There was only printed the Pentateuch, the books of Joshua, Judges, and Ruth; in Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, Latin, and the German of Luther: the sixth language varied according to the nation for which the copies were designed. Some had the Slavonian version, of the edition of Witttemberg; others the French, of Geneva; others the Italian, also of Geneva; others the Saxon version, from the German of Luther. This work is very rare.

Hutter also published the Psalter, and the New Testament, in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German. But his chief work is the New Testament, in twelve languages—Syriac, Greek, Hebrew, Italian, Spanish, French, Latin, German, Bohemian, English, Danish, and Polish. This work was printed at Nuremberg, in two volumes, folio; and in four volumes, 4to.

1645.]—The Bible of M. le Jay, in seven languages, was printed at Paris by Anthony Vitre. It contains the Hebrew, Samaritan, Chaldee, Greek, Syriac, Latin, and Arabic. He followed the Greek version printed at Antwerp, also the Chaldee, and Latin. The Hebrew text is extremely inaccurate; but it is, nevertheless, the most beautiful Polyglott extant.

1657.]—Less beautiful, but more accurate, and comprehending more than any of the three preceding Polyglotts, is the Polyglott of London, edited by Dr. Brian Walton, printed in 1653—1657, in six volumes, to which the Lexicon Heptaglotton of Castell, in two volumes folio, is usually added. This edition of the Scriptures contains learned prolegomena, several new printed versions, and a very large collection of various readings. Twelve copies were printed on large paper: one, of great beauty, is in the library of St. Paul's cathedral; another was in that of the Count de Lauraguais; another is in the library of St. John's College, Cambridge. It was published by subscription, and is said to be the first book so printed in England.

1821.]—Most of the Polyglotts we have noticed are of great rarity, and bear a high price, and hence are to be found only, or chiefly, in public libraries, and in those of the curious. It gives us much pleasure, therefore, to be able to add to this list, another work of the same class, which has been recently published by Mr. Bagster, of London, at a price which places it within the reach of all who desire to possess themselves of a most important aid in the interpretation of Scripture. It is published in folio, exhibiting at one view, the Old Testament in Hebrew—Greek—English—Latin—Spanish—Italian—French—and German. The Hebrew text is from Vander Hooght, with the Keri, and the Sam. Pentateuch, from Kennicott's edition—the Greek from Bos, with the readings of Grabe—the Vulgate from the edition of Clement VIII.—the Spanish from Padre Scio,—the Italian from Diodati—the French from Osterwald—the German from Luther. The New Testament embraces the same languages, excepting the Hebrew, the place of which is occupied by the Portuguese: the Greek is the text of Mill, with Griesbach's readings. It also contains the Peshito Syriac translation, with the epistles and Apocalypse from the Philoxenian version. Each language is also published in a separate form in small 8vo.

The two last mentioned editions of the Scriptures have made a noble addition to the materials for studying the Bible. The learned are daily augmenting this assistance, by collations of ancient versions, with their various readings.—These may be esteemed as so many Polyglotts.

Every person, who justly values the sacred writings, must wish them edited in the most perfect manner. It would reflect disgrace on the learned of the Christian world, that any Pagan author should be published in a more perfect manner than the word of God. An Englishman must view with pleasure the useful and magnificent exertions of his countrymen in this respect. Bishop Walton's Polyglott ranks first in that noble and costly class of publications; foreign countries can shew nothing equal to Dr. Kennicott's edition of the Bible, or similar either to Dr. Woide's edition of the Codex Alexandrinus, or Dr. Kipling's edition of the Codex Bezae: and, in the whole republic of letters, nothing is now so impatiently expected as the completion of Dr. Holmes's edition of the Septuagint.

Where the word of God is concerned, the greatest moderation should be used: and care should be taken, that the assertions made, are expressed accurately, and in such terms as prevent improper conclusions from being drawn from them. Where the number of the various readings is mentioned before persons to whom the subject new, or in any works likely to have a general circulation, it should be added, that their importance is rather of a literary than a religious kind; and that, whether considered collectively or individually, they do not affect the genuineness of the text, or the substance of its history or doctrine. The improvements, which proposed alterations are thought to make, should not be exaggerated; it should be remarked, that alterations of that description are confessedly few; and that none of them affect the gospel as a history, as a rule of faith, or as a body of morality. Conjectural emendations should be restrained, and almost always be resisted.

ENGLISH TRANSLATIONS OF THE BIBLE.

We here proceed to a subject more particularly interesting to us as Britons, and which has already engaged the attention of the learned, by whose labours we shall profit.

It would be very difficult to ascertain every English translator, or when the Scriptures were first translated into the language of this country:—that the Saxons read the Bible in their own language, is an opinion well authenticated; some parts, at least, having been translated by Adhelm, bishop of Sherborne, Eadfrid (or Ecbert) bishop of Lindisferne, the venerable Bede, and king Alfred. Ælfric, abbot of Malmesbury, translated the Pentateuch, Judges, and Job:—which were printed at Oxford in the year 1699. (Le Long. Calmet. Lewis's History of the English Translations, p. 6.) And the four gospels were printed from an ancient Saxon MS. now in the Bodleian Library, (Lewis, p. 4.) in 1571, under the care of the martyrologist John Fox, assisted and encouraged by Matthew Parker, archbishop of Canterbury. The title is, "The Gospels of the Fower Evangelists, translated in the olde Saxons tyme out of Latin, into the vulgare toung of the Saxons, and now published for testimonie of the same. At London by John Daye, dwelling ouer Aldersgate—1571. Cum privilegio Regiæ Majestatis per decennium."

It should appear that the Saxons had more than one translation, of parts, at least, of the Bible among them; though no version particularly sanctioned by public authority. They had also glosses and comments. A small specimen not only proves this fact; but is curious, also, on account of the roots belonging to words still used in our language. The translation given below is interlinear; the corresponding words being placed under their originals.

The following is from the Saxon "Gospell thorough Mathew;" the various readings in italics are the Rushworth Gloss, the words marked F. are from Fox's edition of the Saxon gospels, 1571.

& se the (& suachun) swa hwa swa thee And he that (and whoso), [so] who so thee genedes, (nede) & gethreitass, mille staedena, needs go, (need) and urgeth does (mille strides) thusend steppan, geong mith him othra a thousand steps, gang with him other tuege.

Besides these early versions, several parts of the Scriptures had been from time to time translated by different persons; proofs of which, if not the very translations themselves, exist in different libraries of this kingdom. In particular, in 1349, the Psalms were translated by Richard Rolle, a hermit of Hampole in Yorkshire: and in the Harleian, and the king's libraries, are specimens of other and different versions. Soon afterwards Wiclif translated the New Testament. Lewis, p. 12, &c

JOHN WICLIF was born about the beginning of the fourteenth century, at Wiclif in Yorkshire. Being bred to learning, he was sent to Queen's College, Oxford, and admitted a commoner; but soon after removed to Merton College, where he was a probationer, but not a fellow. Biograph. Britan. vol. vii. In 1356, he is said to have written a tract "Of the Last Age;" in which he exposed the many corrupt ways used to obtain ecclesiastical benefices. He gained considerable reputation by defending the interests of the University against the encroachment of the begging Friars. He was chosen warden of Baliol-Hall, and presented to the rectory of Fylingham in Lincolnshire, which he afterwards exchanged for that of Lotgarshall. December 14, 1365, he was nominated warden of Canterbury College, incorporated into Christ Church in Oxford, by archbishop Islip, the founder; but at the death of the archbishop, he, with three secular fellows, were, in 1367, ejected from thence; and on appeal, the sentence was confirmed by the Pope's bull in 1370. After his ejection, he read lectures in divinity in that University with such applause, that almost every thing he said was received as an oracle. In 1374, Edward III. nominated him, with the Bishop of Bangor and others, as his ambassador, to treat with the Pope's nuncios concerning the provisions of ecclesiastical benefices in England, claimed by the Pope, and long complained of by our parliaments as very injurious to the rights of the English church. As a reward for his faithfulness in executing this commission, which was held at Bruges (Biograph. Britan.), the king gave him the prebend of Aust, in the collegiate church of Westbury, in the county of Gloucester, and then in the diocese of Worcester [Gloucester was elevated into a bishopric by Henry VIII.], with the rectory of Lutterworth in Leicestershire. But having shewn himself a defender of the king's supremacy, and freely exposed the artifices and encroachments of the Papal power, nineteen articles of accusation were extracted from his lectures and sermons, and transmitted to the Pope (Gregory XI.) who, May 21, 1377, dispatched to Simon Sudbury, archbishop of Canterbury, and William Courtney, bishop of London, three bulls; by the first of which, these prelates were directed to cause John Wiclif to be apprehended, imprisoned, and put in irons: this gave the Doctor a great deal of trouble, and would, in all probability, have ended in his death, had he not been protected by the Duke of Lancaster, uncle to Richard II. who was then king. It seems that about this time he set about translating the whole Bible into English from the Latin; probably not being sufficiently skilled in Hebrew and Greek to translate from the original tongues.

In 1383, he was seized with a palsy, which, however, did not prevent his attending the duties of his function till December 28, 1384, when he was again attacked, and died the 31st of the same month. There are several copies of this translation of the New Testament in different libraries, both public and private, though with some degree of variation. Lewis, p. 29. In the year 1731, the New Testament was printed in folio, under the care of the Rev. John Lewis, minister of Margate, and chaplain to Lord Malton, with a glossary. This version has also been reprinted (1810) in quarto, by Rev. Mr. Baber. By way of affording a specimen of the language, and of comparison with the ancient Saxon Version already given, the reader will not be displeased with a transcript of the same passage. Matt. v. 41.

"But I seye to you that ye aghenstonde not an yvel man, but if ony smyte thee in the right cheke, schewe to him also the oother. And to him that stryve with thee in doom, and take away thi coote, leewe thou also to him thi mantel. And whoever constreynith thee a thousynd pacis; go thou with him other tweyne: give thou to him that axith of the; and turne thou not away fro him that wole borowe of thee. Ghe han herd that it was seid thou schalt love thi neighbore, and hate thin enemy. But I seye to you, love ye your enemyes, do ye wel to hem that haten you, and prie ye for hem that pursuen and sclaudren ye."

In the year 1526, WILLIAM TYNDAL printed the first edition of his New Testament.

William Tyndal, or Tyndale, or Tyndall, otherwise Hutchins, was born somewhere in Wales; and being bred to learning, was placed in Magdalen-Hall, in Oxford, where now remains an original picture of him. Here he took his degrees, and read lectures privately in divinity to several of the students of that hall, and fellows of the adjoining college. His manners and conversation, says Fox, in his "Acts and Monuments," were such, that all who knew him reputed and esteemed him to be a man of most virtuous disposition, and life unspotted. Wood says, he was expelled for his Lutheran tenets; and whether he took any degree in that University does not appear. Hist. Univ. Oxon. From Oxford he removed to Cambridge, whence, after some stay, he went to Little Sodbury in Gloucestershire, where he was entertained in the family of Sir John Welch, as tutor to his children. But being suspected of heresy by the neighbouring clergy, with whom he had sometimes disputes about religion, and being by them threatened and persecuted in the ecclesiastical courts, he, with the consent of Sir John, left the family, and went to London, where he for sometime preached in the church of St. Dunstan's in the West. Here he obtained the recommendation of Sir Henry Guildford, master of the horse, to Dr. Cuthbert Tonstal, bishop of London, to whom he presented an oration of Isocrates, translated by himself out of the Greek, with an epistle to the bishop, which he wrote by the advice of Sir Henry. But the bishop's answer was, that his house was full; that he had more than he could provide for; and advised him to seek out in London, where he could not fail of employment. Not being able to obtain any, he was supported by Mr. Humphrey Monmouth, a draper and alderman of London, a favourer of Luther's opinions; with whom he abode half a year, behaving in the most sober and temperate manner; studying night and day, and bending his thoughts towards the translation of the New Testament into English. But being sensible of the hazard he would run by printing it in England, he resolved to go into Germany, as affording greater security and more liberty. And this he was better enabled to do by the assistance of his friend Mr. Monmouth, who gave him an annuity of ten pounds a year, then a sufficient maintenance for a single man, and as much as Tyndal desired. At his first leaving England, he went as far as Saxony, where he conferred with Luther, and other eminent reformers. From thence he returned, and settled at Antwerp, where was at that time a considerable factory of English merchants, many of whom were zealous professors of Luther's doctrine. Here he immediately set himself about his favourite work, the English translation of the new Testament, in which he had the assistance of John Fry (or Friih), and a friar named William Roye, who wrote for him, and assisted him in comparing the texts together; in the year 1526, it was printed in octavo, without a name, with an epistle at the end, wherein he desired them that were learned to amend if aught were found amiss. This edition is very scarce: for soon after its first appearance, the bishop of London, being at Antwerp, desired Augustus Packington, an English merchant, to buy up all the copies that remained unsold; and on the bishop's return, they, with many other books, were burned, says Fox, at Paul's Cross. This, Dr. Jortin, in his life of Erasmus, thinks was done by the bishop to serve Tyndal; however that might be, the sale of these copies put a good sum of money into Tyndal's pocket, and enabled him to prepare another edition for the press more correct than the former, which however, was not printed till 1534; he being probably hindered by his avocations as clerk to the English merchants, in which capacity he was received on his first going to Antwerp. Fuller's Eccles. Hist. Lewis. Biog. Brit.

From the first edition five thousand copies were re-printed by the Dutch printers in 1527, 1528, and in 1530; but all these editions are represented to be exceedingly incorrect. In 1534, the Dutch printed a fifth edition, corrected by George Joye, who not only corrected the typographical errors, but ventured to alter, and amend as he thought, the translation; and soon after, the second edition by Tyndal himself appeared, in which he complains of Joye's forestalling him, and altering his translation.

GEORGE JOYE, who corrected the Dutch edition of Tyndal's New Testament in 1534 (for which he was paid, according to his own account, three stivers, or 4½d. per sheet, receiving only fourteen shillings Flemish for the whole. Lewis.), was an English refugee, born in Bedfordshire, and educated in Peter-house, Cambridge, where he took his degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1512, and that of Master of Arts in 1527, in which year also he was admitted fellow; but being accused of heresy, he fled to Strasburg. He published a translation of Isaiah in 1531; the Psalter, and Jeremiah, with the Song of Moses, in 1534. In the reign of king Edward VI. he returned to England, and died in his native country in the year 1553.

Besides purchasing the copies of Tyndal at Antwerp, other means were tried: orders and monitions were issued by the archbishop of Canterbury, and the bishop of London, to bring in all the New Testaments translated into the vulgar tongue, that they might be burned; and to prohibit the reading of them. His brother, John Tyndal, was prosecuted, and sentenced to do penance: his patron, alderman Monmouth, was imprisoned, and almost ruined. In 1523, Henry VIII. ordered all the books containing several errors, &c. with the translation of the Scriptures corrupted by William Tyndal, as well in the Old Testament as in the New, to be utterly expelled, rejected, and put away out of the hands of his people, and not to go abroad among his subjects: a proclamation was issued to the same purpose.

Tyndal's translation of the Pentateuch was printed at Marlborough, in Hesse, the year before; and that of Jonah this year. Some are of opinion these were all he translated, and Fox mentions no more; but Hall and Balg, his contemporaries, say, that he likewise translated the books from Joshua to Nehemiah; which, unless Matthew's be so far a new translation, is most probable. Fuller presumes, that he translated the Old Testament from the Latin, as his friends allowed that he had no skill in Hebrew: but in this Fuller might be mistaken. He finished his translation of the Pentateuch in the year 1526; but, going by sea to Hamburg, he suffered shipwreck, with the loss of all his books, papers, &c. so that he was obliged to begin the whole again. Fox. Lewis. Tyndal himself, in a letter to John Frith, written January, 1583, says, "I call God to recorde against the day we shall appear before our Lord Jesus, to give a reckoning of our doings, that I never altered one syllable of God's word against my conscience; nor would do this day, if all that is in earth, whether it be honour, pleasure, or riches, might be given me. Moreover, I take God to witness to my conscience, that I desire of God to myself in this world, no more than that without which I cannot keep his laws." It appears, however, that the king, in pursuance of his own settled judgment, thinking a great deal of good might come from people's reading the New Testament with reverence, and following of it, commanded the bishops to call to them the most learned of the two Universities, and to cause a new translation to be made, that the people should not be ignorant of God's law: but nothing being done, the people still read and studied Tyndal's; therefore, according to the policy of the times, it was determined to get rid of so dangerous a heretic; and the king and council employed one Henry Philips, who insinuated himself into the acquaintance of Mr. Tyndal, and Mr. Thomas Pointz, an English merchant, at whose house he lodged: and at a favourable opportunity he got the procurator-general of the emperor's court to seize on Tyndal, by whom he was brought to Vilvorden, or Fillorde, about 18 miles from Antwerp; and after being imprisoned a year and a half, notwithstanding letters in his favour from secretary Cromwell, and others, to the Court at Brussels, he was tried, and none of his reasons in his defence being admitted, he was condemned, by virtue of the emperor's decree, made in the assembly at Augsburg, in the year 1536. Being brought to the place of execution, he was first strangled, calling out in his last moments, "Lord, open the king of England's eyes!"—and then he was burned. Thus died William Tyndal, with this testimony to his character given him by the emperor's procurator or attorney-general, though his adversary, that he was "Homo doctus, pius, et bonus"; which Fox translates, "a learned, good, and godly man:" and others who conversed with him in the castle, reported of him, that "if he were not a good Christen man, they could not tell whom to trust. His friend, Mr. Pointz, was also for some time kept in prison; but he afterwards made his escape. Fox. Biog. Britan. Fuller's Ch. Hist. and Eng. Worth.

The first English Bible, or complete translation of the Scriptures printed, was that by MYLES COVERDALE, the first edition of which bears date 1535, dedicated to king Henry VIII.

This edition is printed in folio, and the title, ornamented with an emblematical border, cut on wood, is—“BIBLIA, the Bible; that is, the Holy Scripture of the Olde and New Testament, faithfully and newly translated out of Douche and Latyn into Englishe. M.D.XXXV.

“St. Paul, 2 Thess. iii. Praie for us, that the word of God maie have free passage and be glorified, &c.

“St. Paul, Coloss. iii. Let the word of Christ dwell in you plenteously in all wisdom, &c.

“Josue i. Let not the boke of this lawe departe out of thy mouth, but exercise thyselfe therein day and night.”

A copy is in the British Museum.

In Bishop Coverdale's Bible we meet with the following judicious remark, which shews the very respectable knowledge and temper of that great man. “Now whereas the most famous interpreters of all geve sondrye judgements on the texte (so far as it is done by the spiryte of knowledge in the Holye Gooste), methynke no man shoulde be offended thereat, for they referre theyr doyniges in mekenes to the spiryte of trueth in the congregation of God: and sure I am, that there commethe more knowledge and understandinge of the Scripture by their sondrye translacions, than by all the gloses of our sophisticall doctours. For that one interpreteth somthyng obscurely in one place, the same translateth another (or els he himselfe) more manifestly by a more playne vocabole of the same meaning in another place.”

More than common care seems to have been taken by Myles Coverdale in the language of his translation: we have very few instances of barbarism, and none which are not authorized by the purest writers of the times in which he wrote. To him, and to other translators of the Scriptures, especially of the present Bible by the authority of king James, our language owes perhaps more than to all the authors who have since written: and even though some of the expressions may appear uncouth, their fewness renders them inoffensive; they are never vulgar; they preserve their ancient simplicity pure and undefiled; and, in their circumstance and connection, perhaps but seldom could be exchanged for the better: nor will this opinion be condemned, when it is considered, that that elegant writer and learned prelate, bishop Lowth, has constantly used the words where he has not differed from the translation; and whenever amendments have been intended in the language of the Scriptures, if we have gained any thing in elegance, we have almost assuredly lost in dignity.

MYLES COVERDALE was born in Yorkshire, in the reign of Richard III. or the beginning of Henry VII. about the year 1484, and being educated in the Romish religion, became an Augustine monk. But afterwards embracing the Reformation, he entered into holy orders. He seems little noticed during the reign of Henry VIII.; but soon after the accession of Edward VI. he was one of the first, on the revival of the church of England, who, together with Dr. Robert Barnes, taught the purity of the gospel, and dedicated himself to the service of religion. In the year 1551 he was, on the decease of Dr. John Harman, consecrated bishop of Exeter; being promoted for his singular knowledge in divinity, and his unblemished character: “Propter singularem sacrarum litterarum doctrinam, morseque probatissimos.”

Wood's Hist. Univers. Oxon. Under the change of religion in queen Mary's reign, our bishop was, like all others, ejected from his see, and thrown into prison; but M. Machæbæus, superintendant in Denmark, and related to Coverdale's wife, obtained of Christian, king of Denmark, who also had some knowledge of him, having seen him at his court in Henry VIII.'s time, to intercede with queen Mary in his behalf; which he did with such perseverance, that after some considerable time, and not without difficulty, he was released, and permitted to go into banishment. Two letters written by Christian to queen Mary on this occasion, are preserved by Fox, in his Acts and Monuments.

Coverdale took up his residence principally at Geneva, where he engaged with some protestant refugees in a new version of the Scriptures, from the Hebrew and Greek languages, with notes; called, from the place, The Geneva Bible; and after the death of queen Mary, when affairs in religion took a different turn, he came back to England; but not immediately, probably, because the translation was not then finished; and (says the author of his life in the Biographia Brit.) refused to be restored to his bishopric; but this is hardly reconcileable with the state of his poverty, and his complaints, related by Mr. Strype, who says:

“Old Myles Coverdale, D. D. formerly bishop of Exon, and an exile, famous for translating the Bible into English in the reign of king Henry the Eighth, and other good services to Religion, had been hitherto without any place of preferment, living privately, in and about London, and often preaching in the churches there. For this very reverend man, that had so well deserved of Religion, our bishop had a great concern; and it troubled him much to see such an one, as it were, cast by, without that notice taken of him that was due; and once cried out about it, ‘I cannot excuse us bishops;’ but somewhat, he said, he had to speak for himself, that he had offered him divers things, which nevertheless he thought not meet to accept of. This man, notwithstanding his great years, had gotten the plague this year, and recovered, as though God had some more work for him to do in the church before his death. Grindal acquaints the secretary herewith: telling him, that surely it was not well, that father Coverdale, as he styled him, Qui ante nos omnes fuit in Christo; i. e. who was in Christ before us all; should now be in his age without stay of living. And therefore, Landaff being void, he recommended him to the secretary for that see, if any competency of living might be made of it, after it had been so spoiled and stripped by the last incumbent: putting him in mind here, that it would be well, if any means might be found, that things wickedly alienated from that see might be restored. But, I suppose, Coverdale cared not now to enter upon the charge of a bishopric, considering his own age, his want of strength, and the activity required to execute such an office. But in fine, in the month of February, our bishop collated Coverdale to the parish of S. Magnus, at the bridge' foot; and withal, sued to the secretary to obtain the favour of the queen to release him his first-fruits, which came to sixty pounds and upwards. And the venerable man pleaded himself for this favour to be shewn him, for various reasons;—and he enjoyed his request.

“The contents of his letter to the archbishop, which will set forth his present condition, were—‘That it would please him to join with the bishop of London in suit for him to the queen, that, in favourable consideration how destitute he had been of a competent living in the realm, ever since his bishopric was violently taken away from him; I being, said he, compelled to resign, and how I never had pension, annuity, or stipend of it, these ten years and upwards; how unable also I am to pay the first-fruits, or long to enjoy the said benefice, going upon my grave, as they say, and not like to live another year; her majesty, at the contemplation of such reverend, honourable, and worthy suitors, will most graciously grant me her warrant and discharge for the first-fruits of the said benefice. And as I am bold most humbly to crave your Grace's help herein, so am I fully persuaded, God willing, to shew myself again as thankful, and in my vocation, during my short time, as fruitful, and as quiet as I can.’

‘MYL. COV. quond. EXON.’

‘29th Jan. New Year.’”

It is to be observed, that many of the first reformers had a great objection to the ecclesiastical habits, and to almost every kind of ceremony; holding them remnants of popery. The refugees, who settled at Geneva, were particularly tenacious in this respect. The expression, “as quiet as I can,” seems to imply that such objections had been made by Coverdale, and some arguments used to prevail on him to conform; to which not consenting, his other merits might not be sufficient to his re-establishment in the church.

“He wrote also in the beginning of February to Cecyl, the secretary, to the same import, to be a means for him to the queen, to grant him the first-fruits of the said S. Magnus, which the bishop of London had gently granted him the pastoral office and benefice of. That heretofore (he praised God for it) his honour had ever been his special help and succour in all his rightful suits. And that, if now (that poor old Myles might be provided for) it would please him to obtain this for him, he should think this enough to be as good as a feast. And so, beseeching him to take this boldness in good part, he committed him and all his to the gracious protection of the Almighty.

‘MYL. COV. quond. EXON.’

‘From London, 6th. Feb.’”

Coverdale wrote a month or six weeks after to the archbishop again, signifying that the Lord Robert Dudley sent him a message, that the queen had granted him his first-fruits. He lived little more than two years after, and died, aged 81, living, as he promised the archbishop, quiet, though not coming up to the uniformity required, which had occasioned so much unquietness in others; and perhaps relinquishing his parish before his death: for he was buried not at S. Magnus, but S. Bartholomew.

At the convocation (1536, probably), the clergy agreed on a petition to the king, that he would be graciously pleased to grant unto the laity the reading of the Bible in the English tongue; and that a new translation might be made for that purpose; and soon after were issued injunctions to the clergy by the authority of the king's highness, the seventh article of which commands,

“That every person or proprietary of any parish church within this realm, at this great feast of St. Peter ad vincula [Aug. 1.], next coming, provide a boke of the whole Bible, both in Latin and also in English, and lay the same in the quire for every man that will look thereon: and shall discourage no man from the reading any part of the Bible, either in Latin or English; but rather comfort, exhort, and admonish every man to read the same, as the very word of God, and the spiritual food of man's soul; whereby they may better know their duties to God, to the sovereign lord the king, and their neighbour: ever gently and chan-tably exhorting them, that using a sober and modest behaviour in the reading and inquisition of the true sense of the same. they do in no wise stify or eagerly contend or strive one with another about the same, but refer the declaration of those places that be in controversy to the judgment of them that be learned."

The first edition of Matthew's Bible, generally known, was printed in the year 1532. The title is, in an emblematical frontispiece cut in wood, "The Byble, which is all the Holy Scripture; in which are contained, the Olde and Newe Testament, truly and purely translated into Englysh by Thomas Matthew.

"Esaye 1. Hearcken to, ye heavens, and thou earth, geave eare, for the Lorde speaketh. M.D.XXXVII.

"Set forth with the King's most gracyous licence."

At the end.

"¶ The Ende of the Newe Testament of the whole Byble.

"¶ To the honoure and prayse of God was this Byble prynted and fynessed in the yere of our Lorde God, a. M.D.XXXVII."

The name of Thomas Matthew is said to have been fictitious, and used by the real editor, John Rogers, from motives of prudence or fear; for although no clamour was raised against Myles Coverdale for his translation, the name of Tyndal was exceedingly odious to the clergy; and much trouble might reasonably have been expected from an acknowledged republication of his translation.

"None will deny (says Fuller) but that many faults needing amendment are found in the [Tyndal's] translation, which is no wonder to those who consider; first, such an undertaking was not the task of a man, but men. Secondly, no great design is invented and perfected at once. Thirdly, Tyndal, being an exile, wanted many necessary accommodations. Fourthly, his skill in Hebrew was not considerable; yea, generally, learning in languages was then but in the infancie thereof. Fifthly, our English tongue was not improved to that expressiveness whereat, at this day, it is arrived. However, what he undertook, was to be admired as glorious; what he performed, to be commended as profitable; wherein he failed, is to be excused as pardonable, and to be scored on the account rather of that age, than of the author himself. Yea, Tyndal's pains were useful, had his translation done no other good than to help towards the making of a better; our last translators having in expresse charge from king James to consult the translation of Tyndal."

Matthew's Bible is composed partly from Tyndal's and partly from Coverdale's translations, with some alterations; taking Tyndal's New Testament, and such parts of the Old as were translated by him, except that the prophecy of Jonah is of Coverdale's translation; neither is Tyndal's prologue prefixed to Jonah, or any other prologue inserted, except to the Romans, in that which is supposed to be the first edition. Sundry alterations are made from Coverdale, and some have been of opinion, that it was a new work undertaken by Coverdale, Tyndal, and Rogers, and that the latter translated the Apocrypha; but Mr. Lewis thinks that Coverdale had none to assist him in his translation, and that he was not concerned in that called Matthew's, but only John Rogers, who made a few alterations, but not a new translation.

John Rogers was a native of Lancashire, and educated at Cambridge, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, in 1525. From thence he was the same year chosen junior canon in Cardinal Wolsey's College (now Christ-church) in Oxford; but on the publication of the Six Articles, he fled to Germany, and was appointed chaplain to the merchants at Antwerp, in whose service he resided some years. Here falling into company, and conversing with Tyndal and Coverdale (says Fox), he joined with them in that painful and most profitable labour of translating the Bible into the English tongue [which is entitled, The translation of Thomas Matthew], married, and renounced popery. He was afterwards chosen pastor of a congregation of Protestants at Wittenburg, in Saxony, having attained a knowledge of the language. In the reign of Edward VI. he came back to England, and was preferred to the vicarage of St. Sepulchre's in London. Bishop Ridley likewise gave him a prebend in the church of St. Paul's, and the Dean and Chapter appointed him reader of the divinity lesson there. Thus he continued till the reign of queen Mary, when preaching a sermon at St. Paul's, warning the people to guard against popery, he was called before the council, and soon after tried and condemned as a heretic. He was the first martyr who suffered in that reign, being burned in Smithfield, Feb. 4, 1555.

Archbishop CRANMER's Bible was printed in the year 1539, though perhaps first proposed in convocation six years before, but had at that time proved abortive and was now published with a prologue by the archbishop. In this Bible, the translations of Coverdale and Matthew seem to be revised and corrected. The Psalms are those now used in the Liturgy.

In the year 1538, Grafton and Whitchurch had obtained permission of Henry VIII. to print the Bible at Paris; but when the work was nearly finished, by an order of the Inquisition, dated the 17th of December the same year, the printers were inhibited under canonical pains to proceed; and the whole impression of two thousand five hundred copies was seized and confiscated; but, by the encouragement of the lord Cromwell, some Englishmen returned to Paris, recovered the presses, types, &c. and brought them to London, where the work was resumed, and a Bible was finished in 1539; the title of which is,

“¶ The Byble in Englishe, that is to saye, the content of all the Holy Scripture, both of the Old and New Testament, truly translated after the veryte of the Hebrew and Greke textes, by the dylygent studie of dyverse excellent learned men, expert in the forsayde tonges.

“¶ Prynted by Richard Grafton and Edwarde Whitchurch. Cum privilegio ad imprimendum solum. 1539.”

This was called Cranmer's Bible, on account of the preface, or prologue which was written by the archbishop.

THOMAS CRANMER was born at Arslacton in Nottinghamshire, 1489. He was educated at Cambridge, admitted a fellow of Jesus College, and made one of the examiners of those who took degrees in divinity. By marrying he lost his fellowship; but his wife dying within a year, he was reinstated. The occasion of preference was his opinion concerning the king's divorce, “That it might be decided from the Scriptures, by learned men in England, as well as at Rome:” in consequence of which, Mr. Cranmer was sent for to court, and made king's chaplain; and writing in favour of the divorce, he was promoted to the archdeaconry of Taunton. In 1530, being sent to Italy, Germany, and France, to discuss the king's marriage, the pope constituted him his plenipotentiary throughout England, Ireland, and Wales. In 1532, he married again; and on the death of archbishop Warham, was promoted to the see of Canterbury, and consecrated, 1533. In 1545-6, he procured a repeal of the Six Articles, the establishment of the communion in both kinds, a public liturgy, &c. On king Edward's death he appeared in the party of lady Jane Gray, for which he was summoned before queen Mary's council, and committed to the Tower. In the ensuing parliament he was attainted, and found guilty of high treason. His treason being pardoned, he was next tried at Oxford as a heretic, and was burned, March 21, 1555-6, in the 67th year of his age.

There are several editions of Cranmer's Bible; in particular, one in 1541, under the care of Tonsal, bishop of Durham, and Heath, bishop of Rochester; and another, printed at Roan, at the charge of Richard Carmarden, 1556.

In November 1539, the king appointed lord Cromwell to take special care and charge, that no manner of person or persons within this his realm should enterprise, attempt, or set in hand to print any Bible in the English tongue of any manner of volume, during the space of five years next ensuing the date thereof, but only such as shall be deputed, assigned, and admitted by the said lord Cromwell; and it is not improbable but this might have been done in favour of Taverner's Bible, which appeared at this time: Bale calls it, Sacrorum recognitio, seu potius versio nova; but Mr. Lewis says, that it is neither a bare revisal, nor a correct edition of the English Bible: nor yet strictly a new version, but between both; it is what may be called, a correction of Matthew's Bible, wherever the editor thought it needful. He takes in a great part of Matthew's marginal notes, but omits several, and inserts others of his own.

RICHARD TAVERNER was born at Brisley in Norfolk, in 1505, and first entered at Bene't-college, Cambridge: after a year and a half spent in academical studies, he was chosen one of the junior canons of Christ-church (then Cardinal-college) in Oxford, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, in 1529. From thence he went to Staire-Inn, otherwise called Strond-Inn (destroyed by building Somerset-House), to study the law, and from thence to the Inner Temple; where, it is said, his custom was to quote the law in Greek, when he read any thing thereof. In 1534, he went to Court, being taken into the service of Sir Thomas Cromwell; and in 1537, was appointed one of the signet in ordinary, in which situation he made this recognition of the Bible, which was authorized to be read in churches. After lord Cromwell's death, in 1540, he was committed prisoner to the Tower for publishing the Bible; but was soon acquitted, and restored to the king's favour, and to his place at Court, in which he continued till the accession of queen Mary; from which time till her death, he retired to his seat called Norbiton-Hall, in Surry. He was afterwards a great favourite of queen Elizabeth, and received from her the honour of knighthood. He died at Woodeaton in Oxfordshire, July 1575.

The title of Taverner's Bible is,

“The Most Sacred Bible, which is the Holy Scripture, conteynyng the Old and New Testament, translated into English, and newly recognised with great diligence after most faythful exemplars, by Richard Taverner.

"Harken thou heaven, and thou earth gyve eare: for the Lorde speaketh. Esaie i.

"Prynted at London in Fleteestrete, at the sygne of the sonne, by John Byddell, for Thomas Barthlet

"Cum privilegio ad imprimendum solum.
M.D.XXXIX."

In the convocation held February 6, 1542, the archbishop, in the king's name, required the bishops and clergy to revise the translation of the Scriptures; and for that purpose different parts of the New Testament were put into the hands of several bishops for perusal: the Archbishop took the gospel of St. Matthew; Mark was given to LONGLAND, bishop of Lincoln; Luke, to GARDINER, bishop of Winchester; John, to GOODRICH, bishop of Ely; Acts, to HEATH, bishop of Rochester; Romans, to SAMSON, bishop of Chichester; I. and II. Corinthians, to CAPON, bishop of Sarum; Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians, to BARLOW, bishop of St. David's; I. and II. Thessalonians, to BELL, bishop of Worcester; Timothy, Titus, and Philemon, to PARFEW, bishop of St. Asaph; I. and II. Peter, to HOLGATE, bishop of Laudaff; Hebrews, to SKIP, bishop of Hereford; James, the three epistles of John, and Jude, to THYRLBY, bishop of Westminster; and the Revelations, to WAKEMAN, bishop of Gloucester; and CHAMBERS, bishop of Peterborough.

Many objections were raised on various pretences, and bishop Gardiner read a list of ninety-nine Latin words, which he said would not admit of being translated into English. By this the archbishop found that this motion of translation would come to nothing. And a determination of the king's to wrest the work from the bishops, and place it in the hands of the Universities, seems to have had a similar fate: for the next year an act was passed which condemned Tyndal's translation as crafty, false, and untrue; and enacted, that all books of the Old and New Testament of his translation should by authority of this act be abolished, extinguished, and forbidden to be kept and used in this realm, or elsewhere in his majesty's dominions. But it was provided, "That the Bibles and New Testaments in English, not being of Tyndal's translation, should stand in force, and not be comprised in this abolition or act. Nevertheless, if there should be found in any such Bibles or New Testaments any annotations or preambles, that then the owners of them should cut or blot the same in such wise as they cannot be perceived or read, on pain of losing or forfeiting for every Bible, &c. 40s. Provided, that this article should not extend to the blotting, &c.

any quotations or summaries of chapters in any Bibles." It was likewise enacted, "That no manner of person or persons after the first day of October, then next ensuing, should take upon him or them to read, &c. openly to other in any church or open assembly, within any of the king's dominions, the Bible or any part of the Scripture in English, unless he was so appointed thereunto by the king, or by any ordinarie, &c. on pain of suffering a month's imprisonment. Provided, that the chancellor of England, captains of the warres, the king's justices, the recorders of any city, borough, or town, the Speaker of the Parliament, &c. which heretofore have been accustomed to declare or teach any good, vertuous, or godly exhortations in any assemblies, may use any part of the Bible or holie Scriptures as they have been wont; and that every nobleman and gentleman, being a householder, may read, or cause to be read by any of his familie, servants in his house, orchardes, or garden, and to his own familie, any text of the Bible or New Testament: and also every merchant-man, being a householder, and any other persons other than women, prentises, &c. might read to themselves privately the Bible, &c. But no woman, (except noblewomen and gentlewomen, who might read to themselves alone, and not to others, any texts of the Bible, &c.) nor artificers, prentises, journeymen, serving-men, of the degrees of yomen or under, husbandmen, nor labourers, were to read the Bible or New Testament in Englishe to himself, or any other, privately or openly, upon paine of one month's imprisonment." Lewis, p. 149.

Grafton was called to account for printing Matthew's Bible, 1537, and examined as to the great Bible, what notes he intended to set to it: to which he replied, "that he added none to the Bible he printed, when he perceived the king and the clergy not willing to have any." Yet he was confined a prisoner in the Fleet six weeks, and then released, on being bound in a bond of 300*l.* neither to imprint or sell any more English Bibles, till the king and clergy should agree on a translation.

Another act was passed, July 8, 1546, by which the having and reading Tyndal's and Coverdale's translations were prohibited, as well as the use of any other than what was allowed by act of Parliament. Thus matters continued so long as king Henry lived; but on the accession of his son Edward VI. they took another turn: the Reformation was encouraged, and the acts which prohibited the translation of the Scriptures, were repealed. Injunctions were issued, and sent into every part of the kingdom, among other things enjoining, that within three months a Bible of the larger volume in English, and within twelve months, Erasmus's Paraphrase on the Gospels, be provided, and conveniently placed in the churches for the people to read in.

The reign of queen Mary was too unfavourable for any translation of the Scriptures to be printed in England; and except the Geneva Testament before mentioned, we meet with nothing but a quarto primer, Latin and English, according to the use of Sarum, with the 'pistles and gospels in English, printed by John Kingstons and Henry Sutton, 1557.

That which was done in the Geneva Bible was as follows:—

"(1.) Because some translations read after one sort and some after another, they noted in the margin the diversities of speech and reading, especially according to the Hebrew. (2.) Where the Hebrew speech seemed hardly to agree with ours, they noted in the margin, using that which was more intelligible. (3.) Though many of the Hebrew names were altered from the old text, and restored to the true writing, and first original, yet in the usual names, little was changed, for fear of troubling the simple readers. (4.) When as the necessity of the sentence required any thing to be added, whether verb, or other word, they put it in the text with another kind of letter, that it might easily be discerned from the common letter of the text. (5.) As touching the division of the verses, they followed the Hebrew examples, adding the number of each verse. (6.) The principal matters were noted; and the arguments, both for each book, and for each chapter. (7.) They set over the head of every page some notable word, or sentence, for the help of memory. (8.) They set brief annotations upon all the hard places, as well for the understanding of obscure words, as for declaration of the text. And for this purpose they diligently read the best commentaries; and had much conference with godly and learned brethren. (9.) They set forth with figures certain places in the books of Moses, of the Kings, and Ezekiel; which seemed so dark, that by no other description they could be made easy to the reader. (10.) They added certain maps of cosmography, of divers places and countries, partly described, and partly by occasion touched, both in the Old and New Testaments. (11.) They adjoined two profitable tables: the one of interpretations of Hebrew names, and the other containing all the chief and principal matters of the whole Bible."

"But in 1565, the Bible was preparing for a second impression. As this Bible had been set forth before by a joint company of men (the name of one whereof, and I think the chief undertaker, was John Bodleigh), so about the beginning of March they had finished a careful review and correction of this translation, in order to the reprinting it. Bodleigh had applied himself to the queen's secretary, Ceeyl, for the renewing of his privilege, with longer term of years than was at first granted them, for the new printing of this Bible, that had been by him and his associates before published. But the secretary suspended giving his furtherance, until he had heard the advice of the archbishop, and bishop of London. Whereupon Bodleigh repaired unto them, and signified the charge he and the rest had been at, by the last impression, and by the late review, desiring their letter to the secretary. The secretary, I suppose, might make some scruple of encouraging this new impression; because the bishops had intended themselves speedily to publish a fair and accurate English translation. But both the archbishop and bishop willingly gave their letters to the secretary in Bodleigh's behalf: writing to him, that they thought so well of the first impression, and the review of those who had since travailed therein, that they wished it would please him to be a means, that twelve years longer term might be by special privilege granted him in consideration of the charges by him and his associates in the first impression, and the review since then sustained. And that though one other special Bible for the churches were meant by them to be set forth, as convenient time and leisure hereafter might permit; yet should it nothing hinder, but rather do much good, to have diversity of translations and readings. And, that if the license hereafter to be made went simply forth, without proviso of their oversight, as they thought it might so pass well enough; yet they told the secretary, they would take such order with the party, in writing [under his hand], that no impression should pass but by their direction, consent, and advice. This was writ from Lambeth, signed by the archbishop, and bishop of London, March 9." Strype.

In the first parliament of queen Elizabeth, held January 1558, an act passed for restoring to the crown the ancient jurisdiction over the state ecclesiastical and spiritual; and another for the uniformity of common prayer, and service in the church, &c. The queen also appointed a royal visitation, and gave her injunctions, as well to the clergy as laity, by which it was ordered, as in the reign of Edward VI. that they should, at the charge of the parish, within three months, provide one book of the whole Bible of the largest volume in English: and within twelve months the Paraphrase of Erasmus. The following year the Liturgy was reviewed, and altered in some passages; and being presented to Parliament, was by that authority received and established. And soon after, a design was formed to make a new translation of the Scriptures, under the direction of archbishop Parker; which, however, was not printed before the year 1568, when it first appeared in folio. This is called THE BISHOPS' BIBLE.

"The work was divided into several parcels, and assigned to men of learning and character, picked out for the purpose. Most of the divisions are marked with great initial letters, signifying either the titles or names of the persons employed. WILLIAM ALLY, bishop of Exeter, had the Pentateuch for his proportion; of which, at the end, stand the capital letters W. E. Joshua, Judges, Ruth, and the two books of Samuel, were given to RICHARD DAVIES, preferred to the see of St. David's when YOUNG was translated to York: it is marked R. M. The four books of Kings and Chronicles, were assigned to EDWIN SANDYS, then bishop of Worcester. The books of Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and Job, were done by one whose name is marked A. P. C. which probably might stand for ANDREW PERSON, one of the archbishop's chaplains, and prebendary of Canterbury. The book of Psalms is signed with T. B.; whether this was THOMAS BENTHAM, bishop of Coventry, or THOMAS BEACON, prebendary of Canterbury, is somewhat uncertain, but most probably the latter. The Proverbs were translated by one who subscribes A. P. C. the C. stands at some distance, probably to distinguish the person from the former A. P. C. Ecclesiastes, and Solomon's Song, are marked with A. P. E. for ANDREAS PERNE Eliensis. Isaiah, Jeremy, and Lamentations, were done by ROBERT HORN, bishop of Winchester, as may be conjectured from the letters R. W. Ezekiel, and Daniel, were translated by T. C. L. which is supposed to stand for BENTHAM, bishop of Litchfield. Hosea, Joel, and so forward through all the minor prophets, is signed E. L. and was done by EDMUND GRINDAL, bishop of London. The Apocrypha, it is said, was translated by PARKHURST, bishop of Norwich; the capitals subjoined are T. N. Bishop Burnet relates, that BARLOW, bishop of Chichester, began with Esdras, and translated to the book of Wisdom. The four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, and the epistle to the Romans, were given to Cox, bishop of Ely; the capitals are R. E. for Ricardus Eliensis. The first epistle to the Corinthians is subscribed G. G. which probably may stand for GABRIEL GOODMAN, then dean of Westminster. The remainder of the New Testament has no capitals subjoined. Archbishop PARKER had the main direction of this affair, reviewed the performance, and, it may be, gave the finishing hand to it. He employed several critics in the Hebrew and Greek languages to review the old translation, and compare it with the original. One LAWRANCE, an eminent Grecian, was engaged to examine the version of the New Testament. He seems to have been well qualified for this undertaking, managed with great exactness, and made several animadversions upon the performances of Beza and Erasmus in this way." Coll. Eccl. Hist.

"The bishop of Worcester, who was well skilled in the Oriental languages, when he had finished his part, sent it to the archbishop, with his letter, dated Worcester, February 6, 1565.

"My duty remembered: According to your Grace's letter of instruction, I have perused the book you sent me, and with good diligence: having also, in conference with some other, considered of the same, in such sort, I trust, as your Grace will not mislike of. I have sent up with it my clerk, whose hand I used in writing forth corrections and marginal notes. When it shall please your Grace to set over the book to be viewed by some one of your chaplains, my said clerk shall attend a day or two, to make it plain unto him how my notes are to be placed. In mine opinion, your Grace shall do well to make the whole Bible to be diligently surveyed by some well learned, before it be put to print; and also to have skilful and diligent correctors at the printing of it: that it may be done in such perfection, that the adversaries can have no occasion to quarrel with it. Which thing will require a time; sed sat cito, si sat bene. The setters forth of this our common translation followed Munster too much, who, doubtless, was a very negligent man in his doings, and often swerved very much from the Hebrew. Thus, trusting that your Grace will take in good part my trifles, wherein wanted no good will, I commend the same to the grace of Almighty God. From my house at Worcester. Your Grace's in Christ at commandment,

'EDW. WIGORN.'

"And in another letter the same pious bishop puts the archbishop in mind of this great work to proceed earnestly forward in it:—

"Your Grace (saith he) should much benefit the Church in hastening forward the Bible, which you have in hand: those that we have, be not only false printed, but also give great offence to many by reason of the depravity in reading.'

"To Guest, bishop of Rochester, the archbishop sent the book of Psalms to revise; and he sent it back again with his notes and advertisements, as the bishop of Worcester had done. In his letter to the archbishop, he said, 'He had not altered the translation, but where it gave occasion of an error.' As at the first Psalm, at the beginning, I turn the preterperfect tense into the present tense, because the sense is too harsh in the preterperfect tense. Where in the New Testament one piece of a psalm is reported, I translate it in the Psalms according to the translation thereof in the New Testament, for the avoiding of the offence that may rise to the people upon divers translations. Where two great letters be joined together, or where one great letter is twice put, it signifies that both the sentences of the words be expounded together.'

"To Parkhurst, bishop of Norwich, the archbishop sent another part of the Bible, to make his notes and advertisements upon, who wrote back to the archbishop, 'that he would travail therein with such diligence and expedition as he might.'

"Davies, bishop of St. David's, had another portion; and he wrote to the archbishop, 'That he was in hand with that part of the Bible he sent him.' And again, not long after, the year 1566, he wrote the archbishop, 'That he would finish it with as much speed as he could; and that he bestowed for his performance of the same all such time as he could spare.'

"This bishop was now very busy in translating the Bible into Welch, together with William Salisbury, bishop of Man, who was very learned in the British antiquities. This business in correcting the former translation of the Bible went forward the next year, 1566.

"Cox, bishop of Ely, who seems to have had another part of the holy Scripture committed to him, in a letter dated May 3, 1566, hath these words concerning this noble work: 'I trust your Grace is well forward with the Bible by this time. I perceive the greatest burthen will lie upon your neck, touching care and travail. I would wish that such usual words as we English people be acquainted with, might still remain in their form and sound, so far as the Hebrew will well bear; inhorn terms to be avoided. The translation of the verbs in the Psalms to be used uniformly in one tense, &c. And if ye translate bonitas, or miser cordia, to use it likewise in all places of the Psalms, &c. God send this good travail a blessed success.'

"We shall hear more of the archbishop Parker's care and pains in this translation, under the years 1568, 1569, and 1572, when it seems first to have been printed in the largest folio, according to Dr. Fulke, in his defence of the English Translation against Gregory Martin, where he speaks of the Bible revised by divers bishops to be first printed in the large volume, and authorised for the churches." Strype's Life of Archbishop Parker, p. 208.

There is a peculiarity observable in the Psalms of this translation, for which there seems no apparent reason; viz. the word מְלֹכִים is translated LORD, and יְיָ is translated GOD; contrary to general, if not (otherwise) universal custom. It is not unlikely, that this circumstance prevented the Bishops' Psalms being read in the church service, in which the Psalms of archbishop Cranmer's Bible were used, and are continued to this day. Cranmer's psalms are often printed in the Bishops' Bible, and sometimes in the Geneva, either by themselves, or with the proper psalms of those translations in opposite columns.

MATTHEW PARKER was born at Norwich, in 1504, and was sent by his mother (his father dying when he was but twelve years of age) to the University of Cambridge. He was first a Bible clerk in Corpus Christi College, and afterwards a fellow. His first preferment was the deanery of Stoke, which he obtained by the favour of queen Ann Boleyn, to whom he was chaplain. At her death, Henry VIII. appointed him chaplain to himself, in which capacity he also served his son Edward VI. By the former he was promoted to a prebend of Ely, and the mastership of Corpus Christi, by the election of the fellows, at the command of the king. Edward VI. gave him the deanery of Lincoln, with the prebend of Coldingham; which preferments he enjoyed till the reign of queen Mary, in which, for being married, he was deprived, and lived in poverty during her reign. On the accession of queen Elizabeth, the see of Canterbury being vacant by the death of Cardinal Pole, he was thought the properest man for that high place and preferment, and was consecrated December 17, 1559. He held this station fifteen years and five months, dying May 17, 1575, in the seventy-second year of his age.

A translation of the New Testament by Lawrence Tonson, who was under-secretary to Sir Francis Walsingham, was printed in 1576. This was afterwards reprinted frequently in the Geneva Bible, instead of the former translation.

These labours of the Protestants had their effect on the Catholics; who, as they would not use the versions of those whom they considered as heretics, yet were ashamed of having no version of Scripture for the use of their party, and therefore set themselves to translate, so far as they lawfully might.

In 1582, was printed the New Testament, translated by the English college at Rheimes; twenty-seven years after, in 1609, appeared the first volume, and in 1610, the second volume of the Old Testament and Apocrypha, printed at Doway, and thence called the Doway Bible.

Both these have been reprinted several times; but an edition in five volumes 12mo. 1750, is much improved in point of language, especially from the Doway, which is in many instances very obscure. The translators were William Allen, Henry Holland, George Martin, and Richard Bristol. The notes were by Dr. Worthington. Le Long says, the New Testament was principally translated by William Raynold, or Reynolds.

DR. WILLIAM ALLEN was born in Lancashire, and educated at Oriel College, Oxford. In the reign of queen Mary, he was principal of St. Mary-Hall, and canon of York; but on the accession of queen Elizabeth, he went to Louvain, was made canon of Cambrai and Rheimes, and in 1587, was promoted by Pope Pius V. to be cardinal priest of St. Martin's, and archbishop of Mechlin. He died at Rome in 1594, and was buried in the English school.

GREGORY MARTIN was born at Macfield, near Winchelsea in Sussex, and educated at St. John's College, Oxford, as one of the original scholars placed there by the founder, Sir Thomas White, in 1557, where he took the degree of Master of Arts in 1564. Quitting Oxford, he was taken into the family of the Duke of Norfolk as tutor to his son. Being a papist, he went to Doway; where, applying himself to the study of divinity, he was made licentiate in that faculty in 1575, and not long after, going to Rheimes, he was chosen divinity-professor to that University. He died in 1592.

HENRY HOLLAND was a Worcestershire man, and fellow of St. John's in Oxford; from whence he went to Doway, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, and the order of priesthood. He was living in 1611.

RICHARD BRISTOL, or BRISTOW, was born at Worcester, commenced Master of Arts at Oxford in 1563, was afterwards fellow of Exeter College, and in 1569 he left the college and the kingdom. Going to Louvain, he abjured the Protestant religion, and became acquainted with Dr. Allen; who made him the first moderator, or prefect, of the divinity studies at Doway. and afterwards committed to his care his new seminary at Rheimes, where he lived two years; and then coming to England for his health, died in 1582.

THOMAS WORTHINGTON, a native of Lancashire, and well-descended, after taking the degree of Bachelor of Arts at Oxford, about 1570, went to the college of Doway, and some years after was translated thence to Rheimes. A little before the intended Spanish invasion, he came over to England, was taken up for a spy, and committed prisoner to the Tower, yet escaped with his life. Returning to Doway, he reviewed and published the English translation of the Old Testament above-mentioned, which had been made at Rheimes some years before. He commenced D.D. at Triers, and was made president of the English college at Rheimes. He was living in 1611.

THE PRESENT ENGLISH AUTHORIZED VERSION.

At a Convocation in 1608, soon after the accession of James I. complaints were made that many and great faults existed in the translation authorised to be read; and Fuller says, one of the best things produced by the Hampton-Court conference was, a resolution in his Majesty for a new translation of the Bible. To this purpose the king wrote to the archbishops and bishops—

"Right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. Whereas we have appointed certain learned men, to the number of four and fifty, for the translation of the Bible, and that in this number divers of them have either no ecclesiastical preferment at all, or else so very small, that the same is far unmeet for men of their defence. And yet we of ourself, in any convenient time, cannot well remedy it. Therefore we do hereby require you, That presently you write in our name, as well to the archbishop of York, as to the rest of the bishops of the province of Canterbury, signifying unto them, that we do well and straightly charge every one of them, as also the other bishops of the province of York, as they tender our good favour towards them, that (all excuses set apart) when any prebend or parsonage, being rated in our book of taxations, the prebend to twenty pounds at least, and the parsonage to the like sum and upwards, shall next upon any occasion happen to be void, and to be either of their patronage or gift, or the like parsonage so void to be of the patronage and gift of any person whatsoever, they do make stay thereof, and admit none into it, until certifying us of the avoidance of it, and of the name of the patron (if it be not of their own gift), that we may commend for the same some such of the learned men as we shall think fit to be preferred to it; not doubting of the bishops' readiness to satisfy us herein, or that any of the laity, when we shall in time move them to so good and religious an act, will be unwilling to give us the like due contentment and satisfaction; we ourself having taken the same order for such prebends and benefices as shall be void in our gift. What we write to you of other, you must apply to yourselves, as also not forget to move the said archbishop, and all the bishops, with their deans and chapters of both provinces, as touching the other point to be imparted by you unto them. Furthermore, we require you to move all our bishops to inform themselves of all such learned men within their several dioceses, as having especial skill in the Hebrew and Greek tongues, have taken pains in their private studies of the Scriptures, for the clearing of any obscurities, either in the Hebrew or in the Greek, or touching any difficulties, or mistakings in the former English translations, which we have now commanded to be thoroughly viewed and amended; and thereupon to write unto them, earnestly charging them, and signifying our pleasure therein, that they send such their observations, either to Mr. Livelie, Hebrew reader at Cambridge; or to Dr. Harding, Hebrew reader at Oxford; or to Dr. Andrews, dean of Westminster; "to be imparted to the rest of their several companies; that so our said intended translation may have the help and furtherance of all our principal learned men within this our kingdom.—Given under our signet, at our palace of Westminster, the two and twentieth day of July, in the second year of our reign of England, France, and Ireland; and of Scotland, the thirty-seventh."

This letter being written about three years before, it is probable seven of the persons nominated for this performance died in the interval, or that so many might have been employed in revising the translation; for Fuller's list of the translators amounts to forty-seven; which number ranged under six divisions, entered on the work this spring. The names of the persons, the places where they met, together with the portions of Scripture assigned to each company, are as follows:—

"Ten at WESTMINSTER: The Pentateuch; the history, from Joshua to the first book of the Chronicles, exclusively. [Dr. ANDREWS, fellow and master of Pembroke-Hall, in Cambridge, then dean of Westminster, afterwards bishop of Winchester. Dr. OVERALL, fellow of Trinity-college, master of Katherine-hall in Cambridge, then dean of St. Paul's, and afterwards bishop of Norwich. Dr. SARAVIA, prebendary of Canterbury. Dr. CLARKE, fellow of Christ's-college in Cambridge, vicar of Mynstre and Monckton in Thanet, and one of the six preachers in Canterbury. Dr. LAIFIELD, fellow of Trinity in Cambridge, and parson of St. Clement Danes: being skilled in architecture, his judgment was much relied on for the description of the tabernacle and temple. Dr. LEIGH, archdeacon of Middlesex, parson of All-Hallows, Barking. Master BURGLEY. Mr. KING. Mr. TOMPSON, Mr. BEDWELL of Cambridge, and vicar of Tottenham, near London.

"Eight at CAMBRIDGE: From the first of the Chronicles, with the rest of the history, and the Hagiographa, viz. Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Canticles, Ecclesiastes.] Mr. LIVELY, Mr. RICHARDSON, fellow of Emanuel, after D. D.

master first of Peter-house, then of Trinity-college. Mr. CHADDERTON, after D. D. fellow first of Christ-college, then master of Emanuel. Mr. DILLINGHAM, fellow of Christ-college, beneficed at — in Bedfordshire, where he died. Mr. ANDREWS, afterwards D.D. brother to the bishop of Winchester, and master of Jesus-college. Mr. HARRISON, the Rev. vice-master of Trinity-college. Mr. SPALDING, fellow of St. John's, in Cambridge, and Hebrew professor therein. Mr. BING, fellow of Peter-house in Cambridge, and Hebrew professor therein.

"Seven at OXFORD: The four greater Prophets, with the Lamentations, and the twelve lesser Prophets.] Dr. HARDING, president of Magdalen-college. Dr. REYNOLDS, president of Corpus Christi college. Dr. HOLLAND, rector of Exeter-college, Regius professor. Dr. KILBY, rector of Lincoln-college, and Regius professor. Mr. SMITH, afterwards D. D. and bishop of Gloucester; he composed the learned and religious preface to the translation. Mr. BRETT, beneficed at Quainton in Buckinghamshire. Mr. FAIRCLOWE.

"CAMBRIDGE: The Prayer of Manasseh, and the rest of the Apocrypha.] Dr. DUPORE, prebendary of Ely, and master of Jesus-college. Dr. BRAINTHWAIT, fellow first of Emanuel, then master of Gonvil, and Caius-college. Dr. RADCLYFFE, one of the senior fellows of Trinity-college. Mr. WARD, of Emanuel, afterwards D.D. master of Sidney-college, and Margaret professor. Mr. DOWNES, fellow of St. John's college, and Greek professor. Mr. BOYSE, fellow of St. John's college, prebendary of Ely, parson of Boxworth, in Cambridgeshire. Mr. WARD, of King's college, afterwards D. D. prebendary of Chichester, rector of Bishop's Waltham, in Hampshire.

"OXFORD: The four Gospels, Acts of the Apostles, and Apocalypse.] Dr. RAVIS, dean of Christ-church, afterwards bishop of London. Dr. ABBOT, master of University-college, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury. Dr. EEDS, [instead of whom Lewis has JAMES MONTAGUE, bishop of Bath and Wells.] Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. SAVILL. Dr. PERYN. Dr. RAVENS. Mr. HARMER.

WESTMINSTER: The Epistles of St. Paul, and the other Canonical Epistles.] Dr. BARLOWE, of Trinity-hall in Cambridge, dean of Chester, afterwards bishop of Lincoln. Dr. HUTCHINSON. Dr. SPENCER. Mr. FENTON. Mr. RABBIT. Mr. SANDERSON. Mr. DAKINS."

"And that they might proceed to the best advantage in their method and management, the king suggested the instructions following:—

"(1.) The Bible read in the church, commonly called the Bishops' Bible, was to receive as few alterations as might be: and to pass through-out, unless the original called plainly for an amendment. (2.) The names of the prophets and the inspired writers, with the other names in the text, to be kept as near as may be, as they stand recommended at present by customary use. (3.) The old ecclesiastical words to be retained. For instance, the word church not to be translated congregation, &c. (4.) When any word has several significations, that which has been commonly used by the most celebrated fathers should be preferred; provided it be agreeable to the context, and the analogy of faith. (5.) As to the chapters, they were to continue in their present division, and not be altered without apparent necessity. (6.) The margin not to be charged with any notes, excepting for the explanation of the Hebrew or Greek words, which cannot be turned without some circumlocution; and, therefore, not so proper to be inserted in the text. (7.) The margin to be furnished with such citations as serve for a reference of one place of Scripture to another. (8.) Every member of each division to take the chapters assigned for the whole company; and after having gone through the version or corrections, all the division was to meet, examine their respective performances, and come to a resolution which parts of them should stand. (9.) When any division had finished a book in this manner, they were to transmit it to the rest to be further considered. (10.) If any of the respective divisions shall doubt or dissent upon the review of the book transmitted, they were to mark the places, and send back the reasons of their disagreement: if they happen to differ about their amendments, the dispute was to be referred to a general committee, consisting of the best distinguished persons drawn out of each division. However, this decision was not to be made till they had gone through the work. (11.) When any place is remarkably obscure, letters were to be directed by authority to the most learned persons in the Universities, or country, for their judgment upon the text. (12.) The directors in each company were to be the deans of Westminster and Chester, and the king's professors in Hebrew and Greek in each University. (13.) The translations of Tyndal, Matthew, Coverdale, Whitchurch, and Geneva, to be used when they come closer to the original than the Bishops' Bible. (Lastly,) Three or four of the most eminent divines in each of the Universities, though not of the number of the translators, were to be assigned by the vice-chancellor, to consult with other heads of houses for reviewing the whole translation."

"A copy of these instructions being sent, as has been said, to Mr Lively at Cambridge, and.

it is to be supposed, other copies of them to Dr. Harding, the king's reader of Hebrew at Oxford, and Dr. Andrews, dean of Westminster: it seems as if (some other doubts arising concerning them) application was made by the vice-chancellor to the bishop of London for the resolution of them. To which his Lordship replied, 'That to be sure, if he had not signified so much unto them already, it was his Majesty's pleasure, that besides the learned persons employed with them for the Hebrew and Greek, there should be three or four of the most eminent and grave divines of their University, assigned by the vice-chancellor, upon conference with the rest of the heads, to be overseers of the translations, as well Hebrew as Greek, for the better observation of the rules appointed by his Highness, and especially concerning the third and fourth rule: and that when they had agreed upon the persons for this purpose, he prayed them to send him word thereof.'

"This letter is inscribed, 'To the right worshipful Dr. Cowel, vice-chancellor,' and dated at Fulham, the 30th of August, 1604; and to it is added by way of postscript, 'that at the verie writing thereof, a learned epistle was delivered unto him of Mr. Broughton, which, though it was of an old date, yet he thought good to send it unto them, that Mr. Lively and the rest might have the perusal of it, if they had not before seen it.' This letter seems to be that addressed to the learned nobility of England, touching translating the Bible; or else that to king James, written on occasion of this translation being ordered by him.

"The bishop of London, at the same time that he wrote to the vice-chancellor, &c. at Cambridge, sent letters to the several bishops, with copies of the king's letter before-mentioned. A copy of one of these to the bishop of Norwich, which immediately follows the king's letter, runs thus:—

'Your lordship maie see how carefull his Majestie is for the providing of lyvings for theis learned men. I doubt not therefore but your lordship will have that due regarde of his Majestie's request herein as is fitt and meete, and that yow will take sutch order with your chancellor, register, and sutch your lordship's officers who shall have intelligence of the premisses, as also with the deane and chapter of your cathedrale church, whom his Majestie likewise requireth to be putt in mynde of his pleasure therein, not forgettinge the latter parte of his Majestie's letter towchinge the informinge of yourselfe of the fittest linguist within your dioces for to performe, and speedily to returne that which his Majestie is so carefull to have faithfully performed. I could wish your lordship would for my discharge returns me in some few lines the tyme of the receipts of theis letters, that I may discharge that dutie which his Majestie by theis his letters hath layed upon me. And soe I bidd your lordship right hartely farewell. From Fulham, this 31st of July, 1604. Your lordship's loving friend and brother,'

' RICHARD LONDON.

' Delibat. apud Ludham, 16 Augusti 1604.

' His Majestie's meaning is, that twoe lyvings should be stayed, one of your owne, and one of a lay patron's.'

" In his Majesty's letter was a clause, that R. L. and the archbishops of both provinces, should not forget to move the deans and chaplains towching the other pointes to be imparted otherwise by them unto the said deans," &c. This, in another letter to the bishop of Norwich, wrote at the same time with the other, his lordship tells him is referred to his relation. And this he said it was. ' There are manie as your lordship perceyvethe, who are to be employed in this translatinge of the Bible, and sundry of them must of necessitie have their chardges borne, which his Majestie was very ready of his most princely disposition to have borne, but some of my lords, as things now goe, did howlde it inconvenient. Whereupon it was left to me to move all my brethren, the bishopps, and likewise every severall deane and chapter, to contribute toward this worke. According therefore to my dutie, I hartely pray your lordship not onely to thinke your selfe what is meete for you to give for this purpose, but likewise to acquaint your deane and chapter not only with the said clause of his Majestie's letter, but likewise with the meaninge of it, that they may agree upon sutch a somme as they meane to contribute. I do not thinke, that a thousand marks will finishe the work to be employed as is aforesayd; whereof your lordship with youre deane and chapter having due consideration, I must require yow in his Majestie's name, accordinge to his good pleasure in that behalfe, that as soon as possibly yow can, yow send me word what shall be expected from yow and youre said deane and chapter. For I am to acquaint his Majestie with every man's liberality towards this most godly worke. And thus not doubtinge of your especial care for the accomplishment of the premisses, and desyringe your lordship to note the date to me of your receipt of this letter, I commit your lordship unto the tuicion of Almightye God. does not appear; but it seems as if they had but a very cold reception. The two Universities, were both ordered to entertain in their colleges such as came out of the country thither on this occasion, without any charge unto them &c. Accordingly, the writer of John Bois's life in MS. who was rector of Boxworth, near Cambridge, tells us, that part of the Apocrypha was allotted to him, and that all the time he was about his own part, his diet was given him at St. John's, where he abode all the week till Saturday night, and then went home to discharge his cure, and returned thence on Monday morning; and that when he had finished his own part, at the earnest request of him to whom it was assigned, he undertook a second, and then was in commons at another college. As for those who were appointed to meet at Westminster, they seem, for the most part, to be very well provided for. What then was to be done with the thousand marks which were to be raised, by way of contribution, on the bishops, and deans, and chapters? However this be, almost three years, it seems, were spent in this service, the entering on which was, perhaps, somewhat delayed by Mr. Edward Lively's death. At the end thereof, the writer of Mr. Bois's life tells us, the whole work being finished, and three copies of the whole Bible sent to London, viz. one from Cambridge, a second from Oxford, and a third from Westminster; a new choice was to be made of two out of each company, six in all, to review the whole work and polish it, and extract one out of all the three copies, to be committed to the press. For the dispatch of this business, Mr. Andrew Downes, fellow of St. John's college, and the king's Greek professor at Cambridge, and the abovesaid Mr. John Bois, were brought to London out of the Cambridge company; where, meeting their four fellow-labourers, they went daily to Stationer's-hall, and in three quarters of a year fulfilled their task. All which time they received thirty pounds each of them weekly from the company of Stationers, though before they had received nothing; which seems to confirm what was before observed, that the proposal of raising one thousand marks on the bishops, &c. was rejected by them. Last of all, Bilson, bishop of Winchester, and Dr. Myles Smith, who from the very beginning had been very active in this affair, reviewed the whole work, and prefixed arguments to the several books: and Dr. Smith, who for his indefatigable pains taken in this work was soon after the printing of it deservedly made bishop of Gloucester, was ordered to write a preface to it, the same which is now printed in the folio editions of this Bible; the first of which was, I think, at London, A. D. 1611. Much the same account of the manner of making and finishing this translation was given afterwards by the English divines at Dort, in a paper which they delivered to the synod, Nov. 20, 1618, only with this difference, 'that in this paper the translators are said to be divided into six companies, consisting of seven or eight each, or about forty-eight in all; and that out of these, twelve select men met together to review and correct the whole work.'

This translation was first printed in 1611, (so says Fuller, but Dr. Durell says 1612,) on a black type. The title-page in the Old Testament is a copper-plate, with an emblematical border, engraved by Boel. The title of the New Testament is in a border cut in wood, with heads of the Twelve Apostles, tents of the Tribes, &c. It has been a matter of doubt, and an object of no small enquiry, to ascertain the exact date of this edition. The scarcity of title-pages began the doubts, which were further strengthened by the total want of the folio, dated 1612, and the date 1613 frequently found to the letter-press title of the Old Testament, with a wooden border, in the same Bible where the date to the New Testament is 1611. We can only account for this by supposing, what is very reasonable, that the copper-plate was soon worn out, and absolutely unfit to afford half the number necessary to supply the churches throughout the kingdom. As many, therefore, as could be, were wrought off and published, probably enough to supply the sale till 1613; when a new title-page is placed to this very impression, and likewise to another folio printed on a black type of a different size. But the title-page of the New Testament being letter-press, and the border engraved on wood, would serve for as numerous an impression as the rest of the Bible, and consequently the whole number was wrought off at once to serve for the whole edition. But a new title-page being absolutely necessary to the Old, was probably dated, according to the time of its being printed, in 1613. The engraved titles are scarce: we have heard of four, namely, at the British Museum, at the Bodleian, in the possession of the Rev. Mr. Harper at the British Museum, and in the possession of Mr. Denyer. The first is much damaged, the date of the last seems to have suffered some kind of erasement, but the other two are perfectly fair, and beautiful engravings.

In 1612, a quarto edition was printed on Roman type, with an engraved title, copied from the folio, by Jasper Isaac.

At the beginning of the present century, we read in Le Long an account related seemingly with good credit, that Athias, the celebrated Jew printer at Amsterdam, printed an edition of the English Bible (probably the Old Testament only, and for the use of the Jews), during the whole impression of which he did not, for the sheets in succession, distribute the types, but kept the whole forms standing; and that of this impression Athias himself boasted he had sold more than a million of copies.

We have now seen what difficulties the translation of the Bible had to struggle with before it could be accomplished: the perseverance of its friends is entitled to our most grateful acknowledgments.

MARGINAL REFERENCES.

In 1664, John Canne published a Bible of the present translation in octavo, with many marginal references. Dr. Blayney examined these for his edition of the Oxford Bible, in 1769. John Canne was a leader of the English Brownists at Amsterdam, by whom he was chosen pastor, after the death of Dr. Ainsworth.

In 1677, a Bible was printed by Hayes, at Cambridge, with many references added to the first edition; and in 1678, a Bible also was printed at Cambridge with still more references, the labour of Dr. Scattergood, rector of Wilwick and Elverton, in Northamptonshire, and one of the compilers of the Critici Sacri. Probably the former of 1677 might likewise have been by his care. According to Le Long, this Bible was reprinted at London in octavo, 1679; at Oxford in folio, 1680; at Oxford in folio and quarto, with Usher's chronology, 1682; at London in octavo, 1683; at Cambridge in quarto, 1683; at Oxford in folio, 1684; at London in 12mo. 1684; at Oxford—1686; at Oxford in folio, 1688; and at London in 12mo. 1716: but as to the Oxford edition of 1680, there is certainly a mistake, unless there be two folio editions of that year, for the copies in the British Museum and in the Bodleian library, do not contain Dr. Scattergood's marginal references.

In 1699, a new edition of the Royal Bible in quarto, was printed at London, with a great addition of parallel texts; and a new chronological index, by Dr. Tenison, archbishop of Canterbury, and Dr. Lloyd, bishop of Worcester, which has been many times reprinted in folio and quarto.

It is not to be understood that archbishop Tenison and bishop Lloyd were concerned in printing or editing this Bible, further than sending to the printers the additional parallels and new tables; having no superintendence of the press: and this it is but justice to their memories to declare; for the first edition was so full of typographical errors, that a complaint was exhibited against the printers by the clergy of the Lower House of Convocation.

The progressive but very considerable increase of parallels from the first edition, by different editors, will appear by the following scale :

Mr. Purver's translation of the Bible was published in 1764, in two volumes folio.

Anthony Purver, one of the people called Quakers, was born at Up-Hushorne, near Andover, in Hampshire, of very poor parents. He was apprenticed to a shoemaker in the same place, and followed that business for some years; while he was apprentice, journeyman, and master, it was his constant custom to study the Latin, Greek, and Oriental languages; but he never took much pains in his English, confining his reading in that language chiefly to old authors. He kept a school some time in his native place; and about the year 1740, went and settled as a schoolmaster, at French-hay, near Bristol; he continued there, and at Fishponds, in Stapleton, about twenty years; when he removed to Andover, where he died about the year 1777, or 1778.

The exciting cause of his insatiable pursuit after the Dead Languages was, a desire of understanding the Scriptures in their original; and after he was tolerably versed in Hebrew, he formed a resolution of translating the whole Bible; which, as it seems, was at first intended to have been printed in occasional numbers: for in the year 1746, that eminent physician, the late Dr. Fothergill, wrote a letter to the Gentleman's Magazine, in which he strongly recommends him as the author of a work then publishing, which was to be continued in numbers, if it met with encouragement; being a translation of the Scriptures, under the title of "Opus sacra in Biblîa elaboratum." Dr. Fothergill, after speaking in high terms of his learning, says, "As to his personal character, he is a man of great simplicity of manners, regular conduct, and of modest reserve; he is steadily attentive to truth, hates falsehood, and has an unconquerable aversion to vice; and to crown the portrait, he is not only greatly benevolent to mankind, but has a lively sense of the Divine attributes, and a profound reverence of, and submission to the Supreme Being." Mr. Purver is not named: but for the information that this is applicable to him, we are obliged to Mr. Joseph Fry of Bristol; as well as for other circumstances relating to this extraordinary man.

The mode of publication in numbers seems to have been unsuccessful, and in all probability was soon dropped: yet it did not prevent his going on with his translation; which, after thirty years, he finished; but was unable to publish it, nor could he meet with a bookseller who would run the hazard of assisting him: at length, Dr. Fothergill stood his friend, gave him a thousand pounds for the copy, and published it at his own expense.

Mr. Purver afterwards revised the whole, and made considerable alterations and corrections for a second edition, which, however, has not yet been published: the MS. remains in the possession of his grandson, John Purver Bell.

CONCORDANCES TO THE BIBLE,

Are of two sorts; concordances of words, and concordances of parallels. The first of the former class that we know of, is that of John Marbeck, printed in 1550, by Richard Grafton; compiled, as it seems, from Cranmer's Bible. Cruden's well-known work is now the standard book. In the second kind of concordances, Cruttwell's collection of parallels, and Baxter's "Scripture Harmony," take the precedence. These concordances of parallel passages, however, have been in a great measure superseded by a recently published work, entitled "SCIENTIA BIBLICA; comprising a copious collection of parallel passages, for the illustration of the New Testament, printed in words at length." For the Hebrew Bible, Dr. Taylor's Concordance is extremely valuable; but the price being high, where it cannot be obtained, Buxtorf's may be substituted. For the Septuagint, the concordance of Trommius is unrivalled; and for the Greek New Testament, Schmidius, or Dr. Williams, will render important aid.

ADDITIONAL REMARKS.

Thus have we endeavoured to bring before the reader such a history of the Bible, as may answer most of the principal questions usually asked on the subject.—The length of the article must be justified by its importance. There are many collateral enquiries which might yet be entered into, but a hint of them is sufficient.

Let us admire the providence of God which first caused the preservation of two copies, the Samaritan and the Jewish; then TRANSLATIONS into several languages, which may be regarded as so many copies, and especially the Greek translation, because we have many helps among our classical studies for acquiring a competent intimacy with this language. Nor let us withhold the acknowledgments of our most weighty obligations to our predecessors in Britain, whose labours have transmitted their names to their religious posterity, and to the religious world at large, with immortal honour. To say that their translation is free from faults, would be to describe them rather as angels than men: nevertheless, let no one despise their performance, till he has qualified himself to undertake such another,—and then, two pages of translation, attempted by himself, will make him fully sensible of the advantages we receive from those who sustained that labour before us.—But, after acknowledging that much has been done, we must also admit that much remains to be done; and we take this opportunity of suggesting a few brief hints on the subject, which is confessedly of great importance.

It is not to be denied, that a translation of Holy Scripture, if undertaken by authority, in the present day, would have many advantages superior to those which attended king James's translation. The state of knowledge has been much improved, by the labours of learned men, in the succeeding interval of time; and, without determining whether religious knowledge be improved or injured, by what variations in opinion have been since introduced, we are certain that geographical knowledge is much more correct, as well as extensive; that the knowledge of natural history and natural philosophy, of the customs, manners, modes of thinking, and turns of expression, among the Orientals, and many other requisites, are better understood at present than they were formerly; and these are always of consequence, and occasionally are of the utmost importance for conveying the true meaning of many passages of Scripture. The principles of general science, also, are more widely diffused than they formerly were among students professedly attached to Divinity; and we beg leave to observe, with confidence, that knowledge limited to Divinity, or the principles which lead to salvation, though drawn from the Bible itself, and however indispensable, absolutely indispensable, it may be, yet is not sufficient to enable any one to understand, so far as correctly to translate the Bible, which furnishes it: because, though the chief, and to us every way the most important intention of the Bible is, to make men wise to salvation, yet there are in it, and connected with it, so many collateral circumstances, so many incidents, observations, and notices of various kinds, that if these be neglected, or ill-performed, or misunderstood, and consequently misrepresented, we not only injure Scripture by such mistakes, but we perhaps put a stumbling-block in the way of those more enlightened readers, who, when they observe these errors, may be too apt, on their account, to reject the whole work in which they are found; and by detecting blemishes, which need little beyond inspection to be detected, they may conceive that contempt for the sacred writings, which, under a more favourable and correct version, never would have entered their minds. We ought also to remark, that our language has undergone some changes in the course of two centuries, which have varied it from being precisely the same as when our translators wrote. Many words, which were then polite and elegant, are now vulgar, to say the least; and some, perhaps, which were perfectly correct or innocent at the period when those learned men employed them, we consider as gross, if not obscene. Now, if the Jews themselves, those superstitious venerationers of the very letter of Scripture, yet think it proper to substitute other words in their readings for those which they suspect of indelicacy in the text, through variation of language, or ideas attached to them, could there be any imputation on modern translators who should venture to imitate this decency? Other words, also, which were, more or less equivocal, or ambiguous, in the days of king James, are now settled to a decisive and certain meaning; if that meaning be what our translators had in view, no harm ensues; but if it be contrary to their intention, the fault lies not in the original translators, but in the later application of the language. And this is more noticeable still, in words which have changed their import (as some have), and are now used in senses contrary from what our forefathers annexed to them.

Nor can we refrain from complaining, also, of the slovenly manner in which the press has been conducted in all our public editions; what should be printed as poetry is set as prose; what should be marked as a quotation, or a speech, reads like a common narration; and this, if the nature of the original language allowed of sudden and rapid transitions without falsification or confusion (which perhaps was not so frequently as some have supposed), yet, in a translation, these are very often causes of great apparent perplexity. And this perplexity is occasionally increased by improper divisions of chapters and verses, which but too often separate immediate connections.

True, it is much more easy to notice these and other obstacles to perfection, in our public version, than it is to prevent them, or to provide against them in future translations. Whether the difficulty of entirely removing them be sufficient to justify the suspension of every attempt to correct them, we do not determine. Undoubtedly, the present version is sufficient to all purposes of piety; and our observations rather refer to the finishing of the present superstructure, than to laying new foundations for such an edifice: or rather, perhaps, to the removal of some Gothic protuberances, which deface or disfigure the appearance of the edifice, and which are cumbersome, at least, and unpleasant to beholders, if they be not dangerous to the stability of the building.

We ought not to pass over without applause the labours of those learned men who, by translating portions of Scripture, have greatly facilitated the undertaking of a version entirely new, and complete, whenever that shall be thought proper to be done. In fact, it seems to be one previous condition necessary to the success of so extensive a design, that every part of the sacred volume should have been critically examined, carefully rendered, and its true meaning given by individual study, before a general revision of the whole should be commanded and adopted; because, such versions having been submitted to the opinion of capable judges among the public, long before the text is definitely settled, and having been subject to the investigation and correction of numerous readers among the learned at large, their merits are more likely to be fairly appreciated, and to be established or rejected, than by a smaller number of judges, though such may be very competent; or on the spur of an occasion, when the impatience of the religious world may be unfavourable to sedate deliberation.

We have thrown out these hints, by way of shewing the magnitude of the subject; far from wishing to discourage even the humblest endeavours which may have the illustration of Scripture for their object, we rejoice when any exertions are made to accomplish that desirable purpose; and though all may not be eminently successful, yet as each may contain something valuable (according to the nature and course of those remarks which arise from the habits of life of the author, and his opportunities of personal information), and may consequently prove advantageous to the whole mass, and to the general body of Biblical learning, we are tempted to accommodate the words of Moses, "Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets!"

One word more—A very correct and extensive acquaintance with the English language itself, is a quality by no means to be omitted in a translator: we wish this were strictly attended to, as then the choice of words among many which appear synonymous, or which seem equally to express the import of the original, would be not only more copious, but more significant, more harmonious, and more dignified: and for want of this qualification, perhaps, rather than from actual incompetence for translation, through ignorance of the original language, many laborious efforts appear more faulty than they really are.

It gives us pleasure to notice the progress made in Biblical learning since these remarks were submitted to the public, in the former editions of this work. Several learned men have engaged in new translations of the whole Bible, or of parts of the sacred Scriptures; which are now in the course of publication. Also, much pains has been taken to obtain a correct copy of the public version; an account of which, the reader will not be displeased to see in this place; and it will conclude the present article.

Of the various editions of king James's version, that which was published at Oxford in 1769, under the care of Dr. Blayney, has been considered as the standard edition. This edition, however, now yields the palm of accuracy to the very beautiful and correct edition published by Messrs. Eyre and Strahan, his Majesty's printers, but printed by Mr. Woodfall, in 1806, and again in 1812. In collating the edition of 1806 with Dr. Blaney's, not fewer than one hundred and sixteen errors were discovered, and one of these was an omission of several words: after the expression "no more," in Rev. xviii. 22, the words "at all in thee; and no craftsman, of whatsoever craft he be, shall be found any more," being omitted. Only one erratum, we believe, has been discovered in the edition of 1806. The copy printed from was the current Cambridge edition, with which Mr. Woodfall's edition agrees page for page. It was afterwards read twice by the Oxford impression then in use; and the proofs were transmitted to the Rev. Lancelot Sharpe, by whom they were read with Dr. Blayney's 4to. edition of 1769. After the proofs returned by Mr. Sharpe for press had been corrected, the forms were placed upon the press at which they were to be worked, and another proof was taken. This was read by Mr. Woodfall's superintendant, and afterwards by Mr. Woodfall himself, with Dr. Blayney's edition, and any errors that had previously escaped, were corrected; the forms not having been removed from the press after the last proofs had been taken off. By this precaution, they avoided the danger of errors (a danger of very frequent occurrence, and of no small magnitude), arising from the removal of the forms from the proof press to the presses on which the sheets were finally worked off. Of this edition, which was ready for publication in 1806, five hundred copies were printed on imperial 4to. two hundred on royal 4to. and three thousand on medium, 4to. size. In the course of printing it from the Cambridge copy, a great number of very gross errors were discovered in the latter; and the errors in the common Oxford editions above noticed, were not so few as 1200! The London edition of 1806 being exhausted, a new impression was put to press in 1810, and was completed, with equal beauty and accuracy, in 1812. This is now out of print.

BICHRI, or Bochri, בכרי, Βοχρι: first-born, or first-fruits; from בכור becor: otherwise, in the ram, or the sheep; from ב beth, in, and כר car, a ram.

BICHRI, the father of Sheba, who rebelled against David, 2 Sam. xx. 1, 2, &c.

BIDKAR, בדקר, Βαδεκαρ: in compunction, or in sharp pain, in the wound; from ב and דקר dakar, to pierce.

BIDKAR, captain of the guards to Jehu, king of Israel. 2 Kings ix. 25.

BIGTHAN, or Bagatha, בגתן, בגתה: in the press; from ב in, and גת gath, a press. A Persian, or Median name.

BIGTHAN, an officer belonging to king Ahasuerus (or Darius, son of Hystaspes), who, having conspired against the king, was discovered by Mordecai, Esth. ii. 21. Bigthan, or Bagathan, is not very different from Bagoas, which signifies an eunuch. The Chaldee, and some copies of the LXX. imply, that Bigthan, and Teresh, his companion, conspired against the king, because they feared the future elevation of Mordecai, the queen's uncle.

BIGVAI, בגוי, in my body; from ב beth, in, and the affix י my, and גוי goy, body: otherwise, in the nation; from גוי goy: or, according to the Syriac, within.

I. BIGVAI, and his children, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 2, 14.

II. BIGVAI, one who returned from Babylon with Ezra, Ezra viii. 14.

BILDAD, בלדד, old friendship; from בלל balal, old, and דוד dod, friendship; or breast, from the same: otherwise, old motion; from balal, old, and דדה dadah, to move, stir, or walk. [From the Arabic; greatly separated.]

BILDAD, the Shuhite, one of Job's friends, descended from Shuah, son of Abraham and Keturah. Shuah's family lived in Arabia Deserta, east of the Holy Land. Job ii. 11.

BILEAM, בלעם, vide BALAAM.

BILEAM, a city of Manasseh, on the other side Jordan; given to the Levites of Kohath's family, 1 Chron. vi. 70. [Some think, Ibleam.]

BILGAH, בלגה, refreshment, or renewing; from בלג balag: otherwise, old age of the body, from בלה balah, to grow old, and גאה gavah, the body.

BILGAH, principal of the fifteenth band of priests, established by David, 1 Chron. xxiv. 14.

BILGAI, בלגי, old age of the valley, from בלה balah, to grow old, and גיא gia, a valley.

BILGAI, one of the sacerdotal family, who signed the covenant after the return from Babylon, Neh. x. 8.

BILHAH, or Bala, בלהה, or בלה, Βάλλα, or Βαλακ: who is old: otherwise, troubled, or confused; from בלל balal: otherwise, which spreads itself; from בלה balah.

BILHAH, Rachel's handmaid, given by her to her husband Jacob, that through her means she might have children. Bilhah had Dan and Naphtali, Gen. xxx. 3, 6, 8. Vide ADOPTION.

BILHAN, בלהן, Βαλαμ: old, or troubled; from בלל balal.

BILHAN, son of Jediahel, and father of Jeush, 1 Chron. vii. 10.

BILSHAN, בלשן, Βαλασαν; in the tongue; from ב beth, in, and לשן leshen, a tongue: otherwise, calumny; from לושן loshen, to backbite: otherwise, oldness of the tooth, or old ivory; from בלה belah, to be old, and שן shen, a tooth.

BILSHAN, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7.

BIMHAL, במחל, in confusion, in mixtures; from ב beth, in, and מחל mahal, to mix, to confound. [From the Arabic, in peace.]

BIMHAL, son of Japhlet, 1 Chr. vii. 33.

BIND TO, AND LOOSE, is a figurative expression derived from carrying burdens, i. e. confirming or removing a burden of the mind. It is taken in Scripture for condemning and absolving, Matth. xvi. 19: "I will give unto you the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever ye shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven." Vide FRAGMENTS, No. clxxiv.

Binding and loosing, in the language of the Jews, expressed permitting and forbidding, or judicially declaring any thing to be permitted, or forbidden. In the promotion of their doctors, they put a key into their hands, with these words: "Receive the power of binding and loosing;" whence the allusion, "Ye have taken away the key of knowledge," Luke xi. 52.

"I am not come to unloose the law, but to complete it," says our Saviour (Matth. v. 17.) i. e. as in our translation, "not to destroy the law, but to perfect it." The religion of Jesus has perfected the law of Moses, has discovered its true spirit, has unfolded its secret meanings, and has accomplished all its figures; if it has also abrogated some of its ceremonial institutions, it is only for the purpose of accommodating mankind at large, and making the essential principles of it to be better observed.

To bind, is used for putting in bonds, and in prison. "We are come to bind Samson,"—to make him our prisoner, Judg. xv. 10. "To bind the law upon one's hand for a sign;" to wear it like a bracelet on one's arm, Deut. vi. 8. This was probably meant figuratively, implying an intimate acquaintance with its precepts; but the Jews took it literally, and bound parts of the law about their wrists. Vide PHYLACTERIES. Prov. vi. 21, "Bind my precepts about thine heart, tie them about thy neck."—vii. 3, "Bind my commandments upon thy fingers, and write them upon the table of thine heart." Isai. viii. 16, "Bind up the testimony, seal up the law," is to be understood in another sense. Seal what thou hast been writing, bind it about with thread or ribband, and set thy seal upon it:—for closure and confirmation of its contents; to witness thy confidence in its veracity, and thy expectation of its completion.

It is said, Daniel was the most learned of the Magi, interpreters of dreams, &c. for shewing (i. e. explaining) hard sentences, and dissolving of doubts—(Heb. קטרין למשרא, untying of knots, vide FRAGMENTS, No. clxxiv.)—also, chap. v. 16, where loosing things which were bound, is used as expressing the explanation of things concealed.

BINEA, בנעה, in motion; from ב beth, in, and נוע nuah, to move. [Simon thinks, בנעה, for נבער a fountain, or stream: he was son of Moza, מוצא, a source, or spring-head. This name may stand as an instance of the allusions adopted in names among the Hebrews.]

BINNUI, בניי, Bavoi; from banah, to build, or bun, to understand; filiation, or in my habitation; from ב in, נאה navah, lodging, and the pronoun י i, my.

I. BINNUI, father of Hoadiah, a Levite Ezra viii. 33.

II. BINNUI, an Israelite, who separated from his wife, married contrary to the law, Ezra x. 30.

BIR, or FOWL. It has been disputed, whether birds came originally out of the earth, or out of the water; and whether, as to the use of them on fast days, they may be placed among fishes; or, whether they are really flesh-meat, as much as quadrupeds? Moses, speaking of the creation of birds, says (Gen. i. 20), "Let the waters produce living fishes, and fowls upon the earth, under the firmament of heaven." The Hebrew runs thus: "Let the waters produce creeping things that have life, and let the birds fly over the earth." This does not clearly prove, that fowls proceeded from the waters. Chap. ii. 19, seems to intimate, that birds are from the earth: "Out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air." That the use of fowl is allowable on fast days, is manifestly wrong; since fowls by their delicacy, are evidently contrary to the spirit of fasting, which is abstinence and mortification.

The opinion that birds proceeded from the water, seems to be founded on Scripture; 1. Moses relates in the same place, the creation of fish and of fowl; 2. He says nothing of fowls on the sixth day, where he relates the production of terrestrial creatures; 3. In the recapitulation of the works of the fifth day, he says, "God created fishes, which the waters brought forth abundantly after their kind, and every winged fowl according to their species;" 4. He says, that God blessed what he had created the fifth day, and said "to the fishes, Multiply, and fill the waters in the seas; and to the fowl, Multiply on the earth." The Fathers, and the generality of interpreters, therefore, have believed, that fishes and fowls had the same origin, being created the same day.

The distinction of clean and unclean birds, is made Levit. xi. 13—24, and Deut. xiv. 11, &c. We have said something of each, under their proper articles.

The number of birds prohibited by Moses is twenty, which he ranges most systematically as follows:—

Air Birds.

| Eng. Trans. | Probable species. |
|-------------|-------------------|
| Eagle. | Eagle. |
| Ossifrage. | Vulture. |
| Osprey. | Black Eagle. |
| Vulture. | Hawk. |
| Kite. | Kite. |
| Raven. | Raven. |

Land Birds.

| | |
|-------------|---------------|
| Owl. | Ostrich. |
| Night Hawk. | Night Owl. |
| Cuckoo. | Saf-saf. |
| Hawk. | Ancient Ibis. |

Water Birds.

| | |
|-------------|-------------|
| Little Owl. | Sea-gull. |
| Cormorant. | Cormorant. |
| Great Owl. | Ibis Ardea. |
| Swan. | Wild Goose. |
| Pelican. | Pelican. |
| Gier Eagle. | Aleyone. |
| Stork. | Stork. |
| Heron. | Long Neck. |
| Lapwing. | Hoopce. |

Birds were offered in sacrifice on many occasions: in the sacrifices for sin, he who had not a lamb, or a kid (Levit. v. 7, 8), "might offer two turtles, or two young pigeons, one for a sin-offering, the other for a burnt-offering; these he presented to the priest, who offered that first which was for the sin-offering, and wrung off the head from the neck, but did not divide it asunder: the other, he was to offer for a burnt-offering, according to the manner." Moses relates more at length, in Levit. i. 14, 15, 16, the manner of the sacrifice of fowls: the priest took that which was appointed for the burnt-offering, "brought it unto the altar, wrung off his head, and burnt it on the altar; the blood thereof he wrung out at the side of the altar: and he plucked away his crop with his feathers, and cast it beside the altar, on the east part, by the place of the ashes; and he clave it with the wings thereof, but did not divide it asunder; and he burnt it on the altar, on the wood that was upon the fire."

Some interpreters insist, that the head of the bird was pulled off; others, that there was only an opening made with the larger finger-nails, between the head and the throat, without separating entirely the head from the body. The text does not intimate what was done with the head, if it were separated. It is observed, when Abraham offered birds (Gen. xv. 10) for a burnt-offering, he did not divide them, but placed them entire on the other victims. In other places, where Moses speaks of the sacrifice of birds, he does not command the head to be plucked off. Vide Levit. v. 7, 8. When a man who had been smitten with a leprosy was healed, he came to the entrance of the camp of Israel, and the priest went out to inspect him, whether he were entirely cured, Levit. xiv. 5, 6. After this inspection, the leprous person came to the door of the tabernacle, and offered two living sparrows, or two birds (pure birds, those of which it was lawful to eat); he made a wisp with branches of cedar and hyssop, tied together with a thread, or scarlet ribbon; he filled an earthen pot with running water, that the blood of the bird might be mingled with it; then the priest, dipping the bunch of hyssop and cedar into the water, sprinkled with it the leper who was healed; after which he let loose the living bird to fly where it would.

In Palestine, dead bodies were sometimes left exposed to birds of prey, as appears from Scripture: but, generally, they were buried in the evening; even criminals were taken down from the gallows.

Moses, to inculcate humanity on the Israelites, orders, if they find a bird's nest, not to take the dam with the young, but to suffer the old one to fly away, and to take the young only; that, says he, "it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days."

It appears that the ancients hunted birds; Baruch (iii. 17), speaking of the kings of Babylon, says, "They had their pastime with the fowls of the air." Daniel tells Nebuchadnezzar, that "God had made the fowls of the air subject to him," Dan. ii. 38;—much as the art of hawking was formerly of great repute in England, and as it continues to be in some parts abroad.

The prophets speak often of birds of passage, of the swallow, and of the stork, that return to their habitation. God says, that he will recall his captive people like a bird from a far country.

The Lord, speaking of his people says, "Mine heritage is unto me as a speckled bird; the birds round about are against her: come ye, assemble all ye beasts of the field, come to devour," Jer. xii. 9, 10. [A speckled, or striped bird, i. e. unnaturally speckled, or striped, as if by having been dyed: it being very conformable to the nature of birds, that such an appearance should draw together the neighbouring birds (as an owl does, by day-light), and that they should molest and injure the sufferer, often fatally. CALMET, however, takes the idea directly contrary, saying,] a Chaldee word nearly related, signifies to dip, or stain: [g. may the idea import here, a bird stained, sprinkled with her own blood?] The Hebrew may be literally translated thus: "Is not mine heritage as a speckled bird, is it not with respect to me, a bird shut up? (one of the most beautiful birds for a cage.) Nevertheless, have I not given it to the beasts of prey?" Some translate the Hebrew—"Is not mine heritage become like a hyena against me? Is not all mine heritage filled with wild beasts?" This is the translation of LXX. and of Bochart (de Animal. Sacr. tom. i. lib. iii. cap. 11), who justly observes, that the original will bear the sense of a striped wild beast, or fierce hyena. [The Heb. עֵיט (oit) may signify simply, "the rusher," or, who rushes forward fiercely; so may apply either to bird, or to wild beast: in confirmation of this rendering, it is remarked, that this agrees well with the foregoing verse, wherein the heritage is compared to a yelling lion; but may it not be said, that the prophet having taken one metaphor from wild beasts, now selects another from among birds? It is notorious, that an owl by day-light, is followed and provoked by numbers, even of the smaller birds. May then this expression signify a bird streaked, wounded, and sprinkled with its own blood, surrounded by enemies, who, themselves not being able completely to devour it, call on the beasts of the field to complete their purpose? Vide HYENA.

The Hebrew word צִפּוֹר zippor, translated generally sparrow, is likewise taken for a small bird, and sometimes for a pullet. The preacher, speaking of old men, says (Eccles. xii. 4), "They rise up at the voice of the bird," i. e. at the crowing of the cock, very early. The Greek, ornis, signifies a bird, a hen; and the translator of Origen has used pullet for bird.

BIRSHA, or Bersa, בִּרְשָׁע: in evil; from בֵּת beth, in, and רָשָׁע rasha, evil, malice.

BIRSHA, king of Gomorrah, at war with Chedorlaomer, Gen. xiv. 2.

[BIRTH, is taken for the natural descent of offspring from its parent: figuratively, NEW-BIRTH imports an entire change of principles, manners, and conduct. Vide REGENERATION.]

BIRTH-RIGHT. Among the Hebrews, the first-born male child was peculiarly the Lord's: he possessed a double share of his father's inheritance; succeeded to the kingdom or priesthood; and held dominion over his brethren and sisters, Exod. xxii. 29; Deut. xxi. 17; Gen. xlix. 8. Vide FIRST-BORN.

BIRZAVITH, בִּרְזִית: son of the corner; from בר, a son, and זֵיתֵי zavah, a corner; or rather, son of the olive-tree; from זֵיתֵי zaith.

BIRZAVITH, son of Malchiel, 1 Chron. vii. 31.

BISLAM, בִּשְׁלָם: in peace, or in recompence; from ב beth, in, and שָׁלוֹם shalom, peace, or recompence: otherwise, their cookery; from בָּשָׁל bashal, to dress meat, and אֲמָ am, theirs.

BISLAM, one of the king of Persia's officers on this side the Euphrates, who wrote to king Artaxerxes, desiring him to forbid the Jews from rebuilding the temple, Ezra iv. 7.

BISHOP, in Greek, ἐπισκόπος, in Latin, episcopus, an overseer, one who has the inspection and direction of any thing. Nehemiah speaks of the overseer of the Levites at Jerusalem (Neh. xi. 22): Uzzi had the inspection of the other Levites. The Hebrew, pekid, rendered episcopus, has the same signification. The Athenians gave this name to the person who presided in their courts of justice; and the Digest gives it to those magistrates who had the inspection of the bread-market, and other things of that nature: but the most common notion of the word bishop, is that which occurs Acts xx. 28, and in Paul's epistles (Philipp. i. 1, et al.), where it signifies the pastor of a church, with others under him. Peter calls Jesus Christ, "the shepherd and bishop of our souls," 1 Peter ii. 25. Paul describes the qualities requisite in a bishop, 1 Tim. iii. 2; Tit. i. 7, &c.

BITHIAH, בִּתְיָה, Παθούσια: daughter of the Lord; from בַּת bath, a daughter, and יָה jah, the Lord.

BITHIAH, daughter of Pharaoh, and wife of Mered, 1 Chron. iv. 18.

BITHRON, בִּתְרוֹן, Παρεϊφύσσα: division; from בִּתְרוֹן bether: otherwise, in his examination; from ב beth, in, and תֹּר thur, search, examination, and יָה his: otherwise, daughter of the song; from בַּת bath, a daughter, and רָנָה ranah, a song: or, the habitation of the song, or of anger, or of good, or of liberty.

[BITHRON, the great cleft (in the mountains); i. e. where the mountains are separated, apparently by violence; and their sides are steep, as if they had been riven asunder, 2 Sam. ii. 29. Hence the hills BETHER—the craggy, or parted hills; the hills with many clefts in them, Cant. ii. 17. There is, however, a possibility, that this may refer to the AUN, or supreme power, of Beter, divisions: i. e. either he to whom sacrifices were made by division, part being appropriated to him, part to his worshippers; or, that power to whom reference was had when a solemn covenant was made, and the sacrifice being divided through the craggy vertebrae of the spine, the parties to the oath passed between the divisions of it. Vide Gen. xv. 10; Jer. xxxiv. 18, 19, and FRAGMENTS, No. cxxix. It might otherwise, perhaps, allude to the Aun, whose person had been divided, as that of Osiris was. Vide BETH-JESMOTH, BETH-ARAM, et al.]

BITHYNIA, Βιθυνία: violent precipitation; from βίη, violent, and the verb βύω, to make haste.

[BITHYNIA was a province of Asia Minor, in the northern part of that Peninsula; on the shore of the Euxine. It is famous as being one of the provinces to which the Apostle Peter addressed his first epistle; also, as having been under the government of Pliny, who describes the manners and characters of the Christians there, about A. D. 106; also, for the holding the most celebrated council of the Christian church, in the city of Nice, its metropolis, about A. D. 325. It should seem to be, with some justice, considered as a province taught by Peter; and we read, Acts xvi. 7, that when St. Paul attempted to go into Bithynia, the Spirit suffered him not. It is directly opposite to Constantinople.]

BITTER. BITTERNESS. "I will send the Chaldeans against you, that bitter nation," Hab. i. 6. "Take care, lest people who are bitter of soul (Judg. xviii. 25) amari animo (Vulgate, animo concitati) run upon thee." David, in his flight (2 Sam. xvii. 8), was accompanied with men bitter of soul, or chafed in their minds, as a bear bereaved. The energy of these expressions is sufficiently discernible; denoting vexation, anger, fury. Sometimes "bitterness of soul" signifies only grief. Thus, Hannah, the mother of Samuel, was in bitterness of soul, 1 Sam. i. 10. Elisha's landlady, whose son was dead, (2 Kings iv. 27).—"her soul was vexed, or bitter, within her."

The waters of jealousy, which women suspected of adultery were obliged to drink, are called bitter waters, Numb. v. 19. "Bitter envying" (James iii. 14), denotes mortal and permanent hatred. King Hezekiah, in his hymns, says (Isaiah xxxviii. 17), that, "in the midst of his peace, he was attacked with great bitterness," a very dangerous disease.

[BITTER HERBS, כררים, Exod. xii. 8. The Israelites were to eat the Passover with bitter herbs; but what kind of herbs or salad is intended by the Hebrew word, which literally signifies bitters, is not well known. The Jews think cichory, wild lettuce, horehound, and the like, are intended. Whatever may be implied under the term, whether bitter herbs, or bitter ingredients in general, it was designed to remind them of their bitter and severe bondage in Egypt, from which God was now about to deliver them.]

[BITTERN, קפד, kephud, a bird mentioned in two or three places of the Old Testament. It must be confessed, however, that some interpreters, among whom are Bochart, Shaw, and bishop Lowth, render the Heb. קפד, porcupine. Isaiah, prophesying the destruction of Babylon, says it shall be made "a possession for the bittern, and pools of water" (ch. xiv. 23; xxxiv. 11); and Zephaniah, prophesying against Nineveh, says, "The cormorant and the bittern shall lodge in the upper lintels thereof; their voice shall sing in the windows," ch. ii. 14. All these places agree well with a bird, and we therefore see no necessity for departing from the common opinion. The Arabic version reads "Al-houbara," which bird is, according to Dr. Shaw, "of the bigness of a capon, but of a longer habit of body. It feeds on little shrubs and insects, like the Graab el Sahara, frequenting in like manner the confines of the desert."]

BITUMEN, a fat, combustible, oily matter, found in many places, particularly above Babylon, and in Judea, in the lake Asphaltites, or the Dead Sea, vide ASPHALTITES. Noah coated over the ark with bitumen (Gen. vi. 14); the builders of the tower of Babel used bitumen for a cement (Gen. xi. 3); the little vessel wherein Moses was exposed, near the banks of the river Nile, was daubed over with bitumen, Exod. ii. 3.

BIZTHA, בזתא, contempt; from בזה bazah: otherwise, spoil; from בזז bazaz: otherwise, in the olive; from ב beth, in, and זית zaith, olive, or olive-tree; a Persian word, which we take to be the same as Bagatha, or Bagoas. [The Arabic root seems to imply loftiness, or pride.]

BIZTHA, one of Ahasuerus's chamberlains, Esth. i. 10.

BLASPHEMY. A man is guilty of blasphemy, when he speaks of God, or his attributes, injuriously; when he ascribes such qualities to him, as do not belong to him, or robs him of those which do. The law sentences blasphemers to death, Levit. xxiv. 12, 16. Whosoever heard another blaspheming, and witnessed his offence, laid his hand on the criminal's head, to express that he was to bear the whole blame and punishment of his crime. The guilty person was led out of the city, and stoned.

BLASTUS, Βλαστός: one that sprouts and brings forth.

BLASTUS, an officer of king Agrippa, who favoured the peace with Tyre and Sidon, Acts xii. 20.

[BLEMISHES were of various kinds on men, and also on animals. Blemishes, or personal deformities, excluded the priests from performing their sacred functions: blemishes on animals, excluded them from being offered on the altar, &c. Vide Lev. xxii. 20, 21, &c.; xxi. 19, 20; Deut. xv. 21.]

[BLESS, BLESSING: this action is referred 1. to God, and 2. to man. Without doubt, the inferior is blessed by the superior. When God blesses, he bestows that virtue, that efficacy, which renders his blessing effectual, and which his blessing expresses. His blessings are either temporal or spiritual; bodily or mental; but in every thing they are productive of that which they import: whereas, the blessings of men are only good wishes, personal, or official, and, as it were, a peculiar kind of prayer to the Author of all good, for the welfare of the object of them. God's blessings extend into the future life; but no gift of one man to another, even of a parent to his child, can exceed the limits of the present state.

BLESSING was an act of thanksgiving to God for his mercies; or rather, for that special mercy which at the time occasioned the act of blessing; as for food, for which thanks were rendered to God—or for any other good.

Those prophetic predictions of the ancient patriarchs, which we usually call blessings, are, much rather, hints, suggestions, as to what should be the character, disposition, or circumstances of those to whom they referred. They were, probably, grounded in some degree, on observations made respecting the temper and conduct of the party himself who immediately received them. So, if Benjamin, son of Jacob, were himself personally sharp, wolf-like, bold, predatory—his nature might be expected to descend in his posterity: and so of others. But often, the spirit of prophecy prompted the mind of the speaker (or writer, composer, perhaps) to utter sentiments, which in the event were to be fulfilled strictly, literally, or verbally; yet in a manner different from what was most prominent on the mind of the speaker. So, when Jacob says of Simeon and Levi, "I will disperse them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel;" since he intended this dispersion by way of degradation and punishment, it is not likely that he foresaw, that one tribe should furnish men of letters—writers, in the future kingdom of his descendants; that the other should be invested with the priesthood; and thereby both be allotted into various districts, and cities, throughout the land of Israel: yet the fact was so; and providence accomplished his prophecy, by dispersing and scattering these tribes after a manner which, perhaps, did not occur to the mind of the dying patriarch, at the instant when he delivered the prediction.

When Isaac foretold the different natures and properties of the countries which should be possessed by Jacob and by Esau, he did not confer on the persons of his sons any real possession; he merely, as it were, divided to them by prediction, the places of the future habitations of their posterity: and these places he described prophetically, and prophetically referred to the nations, rather than to the persons, of Jacob and Esau.

"Blessing" is sometimes put for salvation—for consecration—for a promise of future good—for the reception of a good—for a gift, or present—for praise—for alms—for adoration—for a man's blessing himself: in short, it implies a felicity, either expected, promised, or bestowed. The manner of blessing is appointed in the Mosaic ritual, by lifting up of hands. Our Lord lifted up his hands, and blessed his disciples. This action appears to have been constant on this subject. As the palm of the hand held upwards, was precatory, so the palm turned outwards, or downwards, was benedictory.]

BLIND. Blindness is sometimes taken for a real privation of sight, sometimes for dimness of sight; so the blindness of the man in the gospel, who was born blind, and that of Tobit were real: they had truly no sight. The men of Sodom, who endeavoured to find Lot's door, and could not (Gen. xix. 11), and Paul, during the first three days of his being at Damascus (Acts ix. 9), lost the use of their sight only for a time; the offices of their eyes were suspended. The LXX. well represents the situation of the inhabitants of Sodom, by saying they were struck, avorasia, q. d. avidentia, with an inability of seeing, sightless. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. clxxxix. cxc. &c.: also ELYMAS.

Moses says (Levit. xix. 14), "Thou shalt not put a stumbling-block before the blind," which may be understood literally, or figuratively; as if Moses recommended that charity and instruction should be shewn to them who want light and counsel, or to those who are in danger of going wrong; to instruct the ignorant, &c. Moses says, also (Deut. xxvii. 18), "Cursed be he who maketh the blind to wander out of his way:" which may also be taken in the same manner.

The Jebusites, to insult David, who besieged Jerusalem, mocked him, saying (2 Sam. v. 6.), "Thou shalt not come in hither, except thou take away the blind and the lame," who defend the place; as if, to make their insult greater, they had placed people of this condition on their walls: or as if they desired none but the blind and the lame to defend their city. Jerusalem, notwithstanding this, was taken, and David punished those blind and lame people who had insulted him: "He smote the lame and the blind that were haters of David's person." Job says (xxix. 16), he had been "eyes to the blind," had given good advice to those who needed it, had taken pains to set them right, who, through want of light and understanding, had gone astray. Our Saviour, almost in the same sense, says (Matt. xv. 14), "If the blind lead the blind, they will both fall into the ditch;" designing to describe the presumption of the Pharisees, who, blind as they were in the ways of God, yet pretended to lead others. He tells them (John ix. 40, 41) that he came into the world, that "they who see not might see, and that they who see might be made blind." The Pharisees, perceiving that this alluded to themselves, replied, "Are we blind also?" He answered them, "If ye were blind (naturally, or inevitably, or did you acknowledge your ignorance) ye should have no sin; but now ye say, we see, therefore your sin remaineth."

A principal character of the Messiah predicted in the prophets, is, that the blind should be enlightened by him, Isaiah xxix. 18; xxxv. 5; xlii. 16. This, therefore, Jesus Christ proposed to the observation of John's disciples, who came from their master, to inquire whether he were the person whom they expected? "Tell John," says he, "the blind see," &c. The evangelists have preserved the memory of several miraculous cures, wrought by our Saviour on the blind.

Blindness of heart in the obdurate Jews, is particularly noticed in the new Testament, Mark iv. 12. Isaiah foretold it (Isaiah vi. 9, 10): "See ye indeed; but perceive not. Make the heart of this people fat, and their ears heavy, and shut their eyes:" i. e. prophesying, tell them that they will be blind and obdurate, that they shall neither see, nor understand what is designed for their salvation. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. cxc.

BLOOD. God from the beginning forbade the eating of blood alone, or mixed with flesh, i. e. creatures suffocated, or killed without discharging their blood from them; because the life of the creature is in its blood (Lev. xvii. 11.); animal life does so depend on the blood, that no creature can live without it. According to which notion is Virgil's expression, describing the death of Rhætus, Purpuream vomit ille animam. ÆNEID ix.

From hence proceed several acceptations of the word blood :

1. For life. "God will require the blood of a man," he will punish murder in what manner soever committed. "His blood be upon us," let them impute his death to us. "The voice of Abel's blood crieth;" the murder committed on him crieth for vengeance. "The avenger of blood:" he who is to avenge the murder committed on his relation, Numb. xxxv. 24, 27. See FRAGMENTS, No. X.

2. BLOOD means relationship, or consanguinity. No one shall come near to a woman, who is near of kin to him, Lev. xviii. 6. "Haman was a stranger from the Persian blood" (Esth. xvi. 10 apoc.); he was of a foreign race.

3. BLOOD is taken for what commonly happens to women. Lev. xx. 18, Qui coierit cum muliere in fluxu menstruo,—ipsaque aperuerit fontem sanguinis sui, interficientur ambo. And, Si coierit cum ea vir tempore sanguinis menstrualis, immundus erit septem diebus, Lev. xv. 24. Si pepererit masculum, triginta tribus diebus manebit in sanguine purificationis suæ, Lev. xii. 4.

4. Flesh and blood are placed in opposition to superior nature: "Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father who is in heaven," Matt. xvi. 17. "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," Eph. vi. 12. "We wrestle not against flesh and blood," against visible enemies composed of flesh and blood, "but against principalities and powers," &c. 1 Cor. xv. 50.

5. Wine is called the pure blood of the grape: "Judah shall wash his garments in the blood of the the grape," Gen. xlix. 11; Deut. xxxii. 14.

6. The priests are established by God, to judge between leper and leper, between blood and blood; in criminal matters, and where the life of man is at stake; to determine whether the murder be casual, or voluntary; whether it deserve death, or admit of remission, &c.

7. David said, he would not drink the blood of his heroes, who had exposed their lives; to bring him water from the well of Bethlehem (1 Chron. xi. 19); that water, which had been so near costing them their lives.

8. God reserved to himself the blood of all sacrifices; he being absolute master of life and death. The blood of animals was poured upon his altar, or at the foot of his altar, according to the nature of the sacrifice; and if the temple were too remote, it was poured upon the ground, and covered with dust. This blood of the sacrifices in the Old Testament, was figurative of that blood which Jesus Christ poured forth for us, for the forgiveness of sins.

"A man of blood;" a husband of blood: a cruel and sanguinary man, a husband purchased with blood, or who is the occasion and cause of the effusion of his son's blood; thus, Zipporah called her husband Moses, when she had circumcised her son; others render it, "Thou art now a husband to me by blood," i. e. by the blood of the covenant; by circumcision. "To build one's house with blood" (Hab. ii. 12); with oppression, and the blood of the unhappy. "To wash one's feet in blood," to obtain a signal and bloody victory, Psal. lvi. 10. The Vulgate reads, to "wash his hands;" the Hebrew, "he shall wash his feet."

"I will visit the blood of Jezreel," I will avenge the blood which Jezabel hath shed there. Hos. i. 4. "The moon shall be changed into blood" (Joel ii. 31), shall appear red like blood, as it does, in some degree, during a total eclipse. I said unto thee, even when thou wast in thy blood, Live" (Ezek. xvi. 6.); I saw thee polluted with the blood of thy birth, and notwithstanding this impurity, I gave thee life. "His blood crieth from the ground: the land is drunken with blood:" blood is in any one's hands, upon any one's head, &c. These expressions are better understood by their own particular energy, than by all possible comments.

The blood of Jesus Christ is the price of our salvation; "his blood has purchased his church" Acts, xx. 28. "We are justified by his blood," Rom. v. 9. "We have redemption through his blood," Eph. i. 7; Colos. i. 14. "By his blood he hath pacified all things in heaven and earth," ver. 20. "By his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us," Heb. ix. 12.

"The woman having an issue of blood" (Luke, viii. 43) is said to have had this indisposition twelve years, and to have spent her fortune on physicians without success. She came behind our Saviour, and touched the border of his garment, and immediately her issue of blood stanch'd, &c. St. Ambrose is of opinion, that this woman was Martha; but Eusebius assures us, that she was a gentlewoman of the city of Paneas, near the source of Jordan, who, in acknowledgment of this miracle, erected a statue to our Saviour, which Eusebius affirms he had seen with his own eyes. Sozomen and Philostorgius relate, that it was in being till the emperor Julian's time. Vide CÆSAREA PHILIPPI, ad fin.

BOANERGES, Son of Thunder; a name given by our Saviour to the sons of Zebedee, James and John (Mark iii. 17), on the occasion, probably, of their request, that he would call fire from heaven, and destroy a certain village of the Samaritans, who had refused to entertain them, Luke ix. 53, 54. Boanerges is neither Hebrew nor Syriac. There is some reason to believe, that the Greek transcribers, instead of Baneregem, (בני רעם) son of thunder, or Banereg-es, (בני רעש) son of tempest, wrote Boanerges: or Boanerges may be an ill way used by the Galileans, of pronouncing Bane-reges.

BOAR. This beast was unclean. The prophet complains (Psalm lxxx. 13) that the wild boar of the forest had rooted up the Lord's vine: which is understood either of Seunacherib, or Nebuchadnezzar, or Antiochus Epiphanes, who ravaged Judæa. The Hebrew word sis, is taken generally for wild beasts, vide Psalm l. 11. The Syriac understands it in that place of the wild ass; the Chaldee of the wild cock.

BOAZ. See BOOZ.

BOCHERU, בכרר: his first-born.

BOCHERU, son of Azel, of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 38.

BOCHIM, the place of mourners, or of mulberry-trees. [or of weepings: whether willows or wills?]

[BOCHIM, a place where the Israelites assembled sometime after the death of Joshua. It appears to have been near Shiloh, where they celebrated their solemn feasts. Here the angel of the covenant appeared to them, and denounced the sinfulness of their idolatry, which caused bitter weeping among the people, whence the place had its name, Judg. ii. 10.]

BODY, the animal frame of man, as distinguished from his spiritual nature. James says, (iii. 6) the tongue pollutes the whole body; the whole of our actions: or, it influences the other members of the body. Our Saviour says (Matt. vi. 22), "If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light"—if thy intentions be upright, thy general conduct will be agreeable to that character: or, "if thine eye be single," if thou art liberal and beneficent, all thy actions will be good; at least, thou wilt avoid many sins which attend avarice. Paul speaks of a spiritual body, in opposition to the animal, 1 Cor. xv. 44. The body which we animate, and which returns to the earth, is an animal body; but that which will rise hereafter, will be spiritual, neither gross, heavy, frail, &c. nor subject to the wants which oppress the present body.

BODY is opposed to a shadow, figure: "A shadow of things to come, but the body is of Christ," Colos. ii. 17. The ceremonies of the law, the sacred festivals, &c. of the Jews, are figures and shadows, realized in Christ, and the Christian religion: e. gr. the Jewish passover is a figure of the Christian passover; the sacrifice of the paschal lamb, is a shadow of the sacrifice of Christ. The fulness of the godhead resides bodily in Jesus Christ (Colos. ii. 9); really, essentially; God dwells in the saints, as in his temple, by his Spirit, his light, his grace; but, in Jesus Christ, the fulness of the godhead dwelt not allegorically, figuratively, and cursorily, but really and essentially. The body of anything, in the style of the Hebrews, is the very reality of the thing. The "body of day," "the body of purity," "the body of death," "the body of sin," signify—broad day, innocence itself, &c. "The body of death," signifies—either our mortal body, or the body which violently engages us in sin by concupiscence, and which domineers in our members.

An assembly or community is called a body, 1 Cor. x. 17.

"Where the body is, there the eagles assemble," Matt. xxiv. 28. This is a sort of proverb used by our Saviour. In Job xxix. 30, it is said, that the eagle—viewing its prey from a distance—as soon as there is a dead body—it immediately resorts thither. Our Saviour compares the nation of the Jews to a body, by God in his wrath given up to birds and beasts of prey; wherever are Jews, there will be likewise enemies, to pillage them. Corpus, in good Latin authors, is sometimes used to signify, a carcase, or dead body. Vide EAGLE. [But, in this passage, it seems to be an allusion to the body of the Jews, preyed on by the Roman eagles: the eagle being the standard of that people.]

BOETHIUS, father of Simon; was high-priest of the Jews, from A.M. 3981, to 3999.

BOHAN, בון: a stone.

BOHAN, a Reubenite, who had a stone erected to his honour, on the frontier between Judah and Benjamin, to commemorate his exploits in the conquest of Canaan, Josh. xv. 6; xviii. 17.

BOOK, in Hebrew ספר sepher, in Greek, βιβλος, in Latin, liber. Several sorts of materials were anciently used in making books. Plates of lead or copper, barks of trees, bricks, stone, and wood, were originally employed to engrave such things and documents upon, as men desired to transmit to posterity. Josephus (Antiq. lib. i. cap. 3.) speaks of two columns, one of stone, the other of brick, on which the children of Seth wrote their inventions, and their astronomical discoveries. Porphyry mentions pillars preserved in Crete, on which were recorded the ceremonies practised by the Corybantes in their sacrifices. Hesiod's works were at first written on tablets of lead, in the temple of the Muses in Bœotia. God's laws were written on stone; and Solon's laws on wooden planks. Tablets of wood, box, and ivory; were common among the ancients; when they were of wood only, they were oftentimes coated over with wax, which received the writing inscribed on them with the point of a style, or iron pen: what was written might be effaced by the broad end of a style. Afterwards, the leaves of the palm-tree were used instead of wooden planks; also, the finest and thinnest bark of trees, such as the lime, the ash, the maple, the elm: hence, the word liber, which signifies the inner bark of trees, signifies also a book. As these barks were rolled up, to be more readily carried about, the rolls were called volumen, a volume; a name given likewise to rolls of paper, or of parchment.

PAPER, papyrus, is a kind of reed which grows in the Nile. The trunk of this plant is composed of several coatings, lying one on the other, which are taken off with a needle: they are afterwards spread on a table, so much of which is moistened, as is equal to the size which it is intended the leaves of papyrus shall be of. This first bed of leaves is covered with a layer of fine paste, or with the muddy water of the Nile warmed: then a second bed of paper leaves is laid upon this paste, and the whole is left to dry in the sun. Such was the Egyptian papyrus, whence our paper takes its name, though its composition be so very different. Varro observes, and Pliny from him, that the use of the papyrus, for writing on, was first discovered in Egypt at the time of Alexander's building Alexandria. To this time, the following verses of Lucan refer:

Nondum flamineas Memphis contexere biblos
 Noverat, in faxis tantum volucresque feræque
 Sculptaque servabant magicas animalia linguas.
 LUCAN, lib. iii.

For the manner of preparing the papyrus for use, see Pliny, Nat. Hist. lib. xiii. cap. 11, 12. Gailandinus de Papyro, and Salmasius's Comment on the Life of Firmus, in Vopiscus, who was one of the writers of the Historia Augusta.

The kings of Egypt having collected a great library at Alexandria, the kings of Pergamus proposed to imitate their example; but the Egyptian monarchs, either from envy, or some other motive, prohibited the exportation of paper (papyrus) out of their dominions, which obliged the kings of Pergamus to invent [rather, to improve and augment the manufacture of] parchment, from thence called pergamenum, or membrana, because made of the skin with which beasts and their members are covered. Of these leaves of vellum or parchment, books of two descriptions were made; one in the form of rolls composed of many leaves of vellum, sewed or glued together at the end. These were written on one side only, and required to be unrolled before they could be read. The other kind was like our present books, made of many leaves fastened to one another, and written on both sides. The Jews still use rolls in their synagogues. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. lxxiii. with the PLATES.

The ancients wrote likewise on linen. Pliny says (lib. xiii. cap. 11.), the Parthians, even in his time, wrote on their clothes; and Livy (Decad. i. lib. iv. & x.) speaks of certain books made of linen, lintei libri, on which the names of magistrates, with the history of the Roman commonwealth were written, which were preserved in the temple of the goddess Moneta.

The paper in present use is made of worn-out rags, reduced to a pulp; with the origin of it we are not acquainted. We see no book written on this paper, above five or six hundred years old; and, perhaps, the most ancient author who mentions it, is Peter the Venerable, who died A.D. 1157, who speaks of paper made of old rags, ex rasuris veterum pannorum. F. Bernard de Montfaucon has treated likewise of cotton paper, charta bombycina, which he shews to have been in use six or seven hundred years ago. The origin of this paper is not very well known; but it is certainly of cotton, and the use of it has been common since the tenth century.

Dr. Prideaux says, that this invention seems to have been brought into Europe from the East. For most of the old manuscripts in Arabic, and other Oriental languages, which we receive from thence, are written on this sort of paper, and some of them are certainly much more ancient than the times here mentioned, about this matter: but we often find them written on paper made from a paste of silk as well as of linen. It is most likely the Saracens of Spain first brought it out of the East into that country, of which Galicia, being a province, it might from thence, according to Mr. Ray, have been first brought into Germany. Connect. &c. P. i. b. vii.

[ADDITION.

As several discoveries have been made on this subject since the days of CALMET, it may not be amiss to notice some of them here.

The first is the considerable collection of MSS. written on papyrus, which have been discovered in the overwhelmed city of Herculaneum; and which, under the munificence of the Prince Regent, uncommon pains have lately been taken to restore. They are thus described by the Hon. Grey Bennet:

"The papyri are joined together, and form one roll, on each sheet of which the characters are printed, standing out in a species of bas relief, and singly to be read with the greatest ease. As there are no stops, a difficulty however is found in joining the letters, in making out the words, and in discovering the sense of the phrase. The MSS. were found in a chamber of an excavated house, in the ancient Herculaneum, to the number of about 1800, a considerable part of which are in a state to be unrolled. Herculaneum was buried for the most part under a shower of hot ashes. [August 24, A.D. 79. Senec. Nat. Q. vi.] The MSS. were, from the heat, reduced to a state of tinder, or, to speak more properly, resembling paper which had been burnt. Where the baking has not been complete, and where any part of the vegetable juice has remained, it is almost impossible to unroll them, the sheets towards the centre being so closely united. In the others, as you approach the centre, or conclusion, the MSS. become smoother, and the work proceeds with greater rapidity. At present there are about fifteen men at work, each occupied at a MS.

"The papyri are very rough on the outside. They are of different sizes, some containing only a few sheets, as a single play, others some hundreds, and a few perhaps two thousand," Archæologia, Vol. xv. Art. ix.

The papyrus reed is still known in Sicily; and a small manufacture of it is established in the neighbourhood of Syracuse, to gratify the curious. The papyrus has been also found in great plenty in Chaldea, in the fens, at the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates. Is it unlikely that the ancient Chaldean literati availed themselves of this natural production of their country, in favour of literature?

Another quarter affording ancient papyri, is Egypt; scrolls of this substance, containing inscriptions, have been found by the French, during their invasion of that country; and Denon has given plates of more than one. He says,— "I was assured of the proof of my discovery, by the possession of a manuscript, which I found in the hand of a fine mummy, that was brought me: . . . I perceived in its right hand, and resting on the left arm, a roll of papyrus, on which was a manuscript, the oldest of all the books in the known world. . . . The papyrus on which it is written, is prepared in the same way as that of the Greeks and Romans; that is to say, of two layers of the medulla of this plant glued to each other, with the fibres made to cross, to give more consistence to the leaf. The writing goes from right to left, beginning at the top of the page. . . . Above the figures is an inscription composed of seven vertical, and four horizontal lines: the writing is here different from the rest of the manuscript, of which this is a part; and the characters appear to be infinitely varied and numerous."

"Part of another Manuscript.—We may remark in this manuscript, the writing of which is large and carefully executed, that the characters of the inscription above the figures are different from those of the body of the manuscript itself. Various colours appear in the several parts of the original figure of this plate—red, blue, green, and black."]

Great objections are made to the time of Alexander the Great, as that of the first use of papyrus. Pliny hints at an assertion of Cassius Hemina, an ancient annalist, that paper books were found inclosed in the tomb of Numa, who lived above three hundred years before Alexander. It is thought, that the manufacture of papyrus ceased in Egypt about the fifth century; the more commodious cotton paper superseding it. There are ancient documents still extant, of about that date, written on papyrus. Cotton paper has been, in its turn, superseded by linen paper: and it deserves remark, that linen paper, though a feeble substance, and subject to various accidents, yet does not perish through mere age: it retains its qualities for centuries. Some of the copies of the most early printed books, and other documents, are as sound as ever.

BOOK is sometimes put for letters, memoirs, an edict, or contract; in short, the word book, in Hebrew sepher, is much more extensive than the Latin liber. The letters which Rabshakeh delivered from Sennacherib to Hezekiah, are called a book. The English, indeed, reads letter, but the LXX. reads βιβλίον, and the Hebrew text הספריים hesepherim, 2 Kings xix. 19. So is the contract which Jeremiah confirmed for the purchase of a field, Jer. xxxii. 10. Also Ahasuerus' edict in favour of the Jews, Esth. ix. 20. Job (xxxi. 35) wishes, that his judge, or his adversary would himself write his sentence, his book. The writing, likewise, which a man gave to his wife when he divorced her, was called "a book of divorce."

BOOK OF LIFE, or Book of the Living, or Book of the Lord, Psal. lxxix. 28. It is very probable, that these descriptive phrases, which are frequent in Scripture, are taken from the custom, observed generally in the courts of princes, of keeping a list of persons who are in their service, of the provinces which they govern, of the officers of their armies, of the number of their troops, and sometimes even of the names of their soldiers. Thus, when Moses desires God rather to blot him out of his book, than to reject Israel (Exod. xxxii. 32.), it is the same almost as Paul's expression, in some sort, to be "accursed" (Rom. ix. 3), separated from the company of the saints, and struck out of the Book of the Lord, for the benefit of his people. Vide ANATHEMA. When it is said, that any one is written in the Book of Life, it means that he particularly belongs to God, is enrolled among the number of his friends and servants: to be "blotted out of the Book of Life," therefore signifies, erased from the list of God's friends and servants, as those who are guilty of treachery are struck off the roll of officers belonging to a prince.

[It is probable, also, that the primitive Christian churches kept lists of their members, in which those recently admitted were enrolled: these would take a title analogous to that of "the book of life," or "the Lamb's book of life:" as this term occurs chiefly in the Revelation, it seems likely to be derived from such a custom. Something of the same nature we have, Isaiah iv. 3, where the prophet alludes to such as were "written among the living in Jerusalem;" i. e. enrolled among the citizens of that city of God; to which the Christian church was afterwards compared.] In a more exalted sense, "the Book of Life," signifies the Book of predestination to Glory, Faith, and Grace: or the register of those who through grace have persevered to eternal life.

BOOK OF JUDGMENT. Daniel, speaking of God's judgment, says, "judgment was set, and the books were opened," vii. 10. This is an allusion to what is practised, when a prince calls his servants to account. The accounts are produced, and enquired into. It is possible he might allude also to a custom of the Persians, among whom it was a constant practice every day to write down what had happened, the services done for the king, and the rewards given to those who had performed them; as we see in the history of Ahasuerus and Mordecai. When, therefore, the king sits in judgment, the books are opened, he obliges all his servants to reckon with him; he punishes those who have been failing in their duty; he compels those to pay who are indebted to him, and rewards those who have done him services. There will be, in a manner, a similar proceeding at the day of God's final judgment. For an account of the book of Jasher,—the book of the wars of the Lord—the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel, &c. vide BIBLE, p. 281, 282, supra.

THE SEALED BOOK, mentioned Isai. xxix. 11, and the book sealed with seven seals, in the Revelation (chap. v. 1, 2, 3), are the prophecies of Isaiah and of John, which were written in a book, or roll, after the manner of the ancients, and were sealed; i. e. they were unknown, enigmatical, obscure, mysterious; they had respect to times remote, and to future events, so that no knowledge could be derived from them, till after what was foretold should happen, and the seals were taken off. In old times, letters, and other writings that were to be sealed, were first wrapped round with thread or flax, and then wax and the seal were applied to them. To read them, it was necessary to cut the thread, or flax, and to break the seals. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. lxxiii. lxxiv.

THE BOOK, OR FLYING ROLL, spoken of in Zechariah (v. 1, 2), twenty cubits long, and ten wide, was one of those old rolls, composed of many skins, or parchments, glued or sewed together at the end. Though some of the (rolls) volumes were very long, yet none, probably, was ever made of such a size as this. This contained the curses and calamities which should befall the Jews. The extreme length and breadth of it, shews the excessive number and enormity of their sins, and the extent of their punishment.

We read, Gen. i. 1, the "book of the Generation of Adam," i. e. the history of his life; and elsewhere, "the book of the Generation of Noah," or of Jesus Christ, i. e. their history.

Isaiah, describing the effects of God's wrath, says, "The heavens shall be folded up like a book," [scroll,] Isa. xxxiv. 4. He alludes to the way among the ancients, of rolling up books, when they purposed to close them. A volume of several feet in length, was suddenly rolled up into a very small compass. Thus the heavens should shrink into themselves, and disappear, as it were, from the eyes of God, when his wrath should be kindled. These ways of speaking are figurative, and very energetic.

It is related in the books of the Maccabees, that the Jews, when suffering persecution from Antiochus Epiphanes, laid open the book of the law, wherein the Gentiles endeavoured to find delineated figures of idols, 1 Mac. iii. 48. Some believe, that the Jews laid open before the Lord the sacred books, wherein the Gentiles had in vain sought for something whereby to support their idolatry; others think, they laid open the sacred writings, wherein the Gentiles were desirous to paint figures of their idols:—otherwise, the Hebrews laid open their sacred books, wherein the Gentiles had sought diligently whether they could not find figures of some of the deities adored by the Jews; for the Gentiles were very uneasy on this subject; some believing that the Jews worshipped an ass, or a living man, or Babelus, or a something which they would not own. With some small variation in the Greek text, it might be translated thus: "They laid open the book of the law, at the same time that the Gentiles consulted the images of their false gods." We read, Psalm xl. 7, "In the volume, or head of the book, it is written of me, I delight to do thy will, O my God." St. Paul applies this passage to the incarnation of Christ, Heb. x. 7. Some of the ancient Fathers explained this, "in the head of the book," of the book of Genesis, which imports, that in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth; i. e. God created the universe by his Son, his word, his wisdom, which, in this sense, is the beginning of all things. Others, as Chrysostom, explain it of St. John's gospel, which begins with, in principio erat verbum, in the beginning was the Word. The Hebrew reads, "In the volume of the book it is written of me;" i. e. in the body of the sacred writings in general. The Greek will bear the same sense: kephalis, which is rendered caput, or beginning, signifies likewise a roll, a volume. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. lxxiv.

[Books eaten. "Insomuch that the Turks said frequently and justly of them, that other nations had their learning in their books, but the Tartars HAD EATEN THEIR BOOKS, and had their wisdom in their breasts, from whence they could draw it out as they had occasion, as divine oracles." Busbequius, Trav. p. 245. Eng. Tr. This may lead us to the true idea of the prophets, when they mention the eating of books presented to them: i. e. that the knowledge they had received should be communicated to others, from time to time, as wanted: they were treasures (not for themselves, but for others) of wisdom and knowledge.]

BOOKS, sacred, or canonical, vide BIBLE, CANON, and the names of the several books.

[BOOTHs, slight constructions of huts. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. ccvi.]

BOOTY, spoil. Moses appoints in the law (Numb. xxxi. 27), that booty taken from the enemy, "should be divided equally between those who were in the battle, and the rest of the people;" i. e. into two parts, the first for those who had been in the action, the other for the people who continued in the camp. He adds, "Ye shall likewise separate the Lord's share, which ye shall take out of the whole booty belonging to the men of war; and of every five hundred men, oxen, asses, or sheep, ye shall take one, and give it to the high-priest, because these are the Lord's first-fruits. As to the other moiety which shall belong to the children of Israel, who did not fight; out of every fifty men, oxen, asses, or sheep, or other animals whatsoever, ye shall take one, and give it to the Levites, who have the charge of the tabernacle of the Lord." So that the share of Eleazar and of the priest, was much larger in proportion than that of any one of the twelve thousand soldiers who had been in action, and than that of the Levites. And what was practised on this occasion became a law for ever after. An instance of this appears in what happened under David, after the defeat of the Amalekites, who had plundered Ziklag. [The captives given to the high-priest, no doubt, became slaves: were they slaves of the high-priest, personally, or of the temple?—If to the temple, were they not like the Gibeonites, the Nethinim, and others engaged in menial offices, as hewers of wood, and drawers of water? Did their descendants also occupy the same stations?]

The Rabbins pretend, [vide Selden, de Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. vi. cap. 16.] that under the kings of Israel, another rule was followed in distributing the spoil. First, every thing was given to the king, which had belonged to the conquered king; his tent, his slaves, his cattle, his spoils, his treasure. After this, the remainder of the booty, being divided into two equal parts, the king had one moiety, and the soldiers had the other. This last part was distributed equally between the soldiers who had been in the action, and those who continued behind to guard the camp. They assert, that these rules had been established ever since the time of Abraham. It is difficult, indeed, to prove this; but we know that Abraham offered to the Lord the tenth of what he had taken from the five kings, and this tithe he made a present to Melchizedek.

BOOZ, בִּעַז: in strength, or in the goat; from בֵּית, in, and עֶז, strength; or a goat.

I, BOOZ, one of our Saviour's ancestors according to the flesh, son of Salmon and Rahab, a Canaanitess of Jericho, whom Salmon, of the tribe of Judah, married. Some say, there were three of this name, the son, grandson, and great-grandson of Salmon; the last Booz was husband of Ruth, and father of Obed. They pretend that Scripture cannot be reconciled with itself any other way, since it reckons 366 years between Salmon's marriage, and the birth of David, and yet mentions only three persons between Salmon and David, viz. Booz, Obed, and Jesse. But though it be difficult to fill so great a space with four persons from father to son, succeeding one another, and though it be uncommon to see four persons in the same family successively, living very long, and having children when far advanced in age, yet there is nothing absolutely impossible in it: particularly at that time, when many persons lived above a hundred years. Suppose Salmon, at the age of a hundred and twenty, might beget Booz; Booz, at a hundred, might beget Obed, who, at something more or less, might have Jesse; and Jesse, when a hundred years old, might have David: this, indeed, is only supposition. However, it is sufficient to shew, that there is no contradiction or impossibility in the Scripture account."

Some Rabbins maintain, that Ibzan, judge of Israel (Judges xii. 8), is the same as Booz. The foundation of this opinion is that Ibzan was of Bethlehem, and that there is some relation between the names: but Ibzan having governed Israel from A. M. 2823, to 2830, he cannot be the same as Booz, who could not be born later than A. M. 2620, his father Salmon having married Ruth in 2558. Now, supposing him to be born in 2620, he must have lived 210 years: which appears incredible.

[Though CALMET has stated a solution of the difficulty arising from the great age of Boaz, &c. yet, we prefer that of Dr. Allix: vide Whitby on Matt. i. 4.

The Targum on Ruth says, that Salmon is styled Salmon the Just: his works and the works of his children were very excellent: Boaz was a righteous person, by whose righteousness the people of Israel were delivered from the hands of their enemies, &c. There were but 366 years from the first of Joshua to the birth of David—for from the Exodus to the Temple were 480 years; add to 366 the forty years wandering in the wilderness, the life of David seventy years, and four years of Solomon—the total is 480 years. He therefore supposes that Salmon might beget Boaz when he was 96 years old; Boaz begat Obed when he was 90 years old; Obed at 90 begat Jesse; and Jesse at 85 begat David.

We know that long life often descends in a family; old Parr had a son who lived to be very old: and, what is no less remarkable, old men of such families have had children very late in life, as after the age of a hundred years; of which old Parr himself is one example.]

II. BOOZ, or rather BOAZ, the name of one of those brazen pillars which Solomon erected in the porch of the temple, 1 Kings vii. 21. The other, called Jachin, was on the right hand of the entrance, Booz was on the left. בועז Booz signifies strength, firmness. They were together thirty-five cubits high; as, in 2 Chron. iii. 15; i. e. each separately was seventeen cubits and a half: 1 Kings vii. 15, and Jeremiah. lii. 21, say eighteen cubits, in round numbers. The thickness of these columns was, says Jeremiah, four fingers, for they were hollow; the circumference of them was twelve cubits, or four cubits diameter: the chapter of each was in all five cubits high. These chapters, in different parts of Scripture, are said to be of different heights, of three, four, or five cubits; because they were composed of different ornaments or members, which were sometimes considered as omitted, sometimes as included. The body of the chapter was of three cubits, the ornaments wherewith it was joined to the shaft of the pillar, were of one cubit: these make four cubits; the row which was at the top of the chapter was also of one cubit; in all five cubits.

BORITH, ברית, ḥaḥa: from ברר barar, to purge.

BORITH, or BERITH, rendered fuller's sope, Mal. iii. 2, is thought to be the herb kali. [But we should not forget, that the East produces a kind of fat earth, used in scowering cloth; like our fuller's-earth.]

BOSCATH, See BASCATH.

[BOSOM, the front of the upper part of the body—the breast. The Orientals generally wore long, wide, and loose garments; and when about to carry any thing away that their hands would not contain, they used for the purpose a fold in the bosom of their robe. To this custom our Lord alludes—"Good measure shall men give into your bosom," Luke vi. 38. To have one "in our bosom," implies kindness, secrecy, intimacy, Gen. xvi. 5; 2 Sam. xii. 8. Christ is in the bosom of the Father, that is, possesses the closest intimacy, and most perfect knowledge of the Father, John i. 18. Our Saviour is said to carry his lambs in his bosom, which beautifully represents his tender care and watchfulness over them, Isa. xl. 11.]

BOSPHORUS. The prophet Obadiah says, "And the captivity of this host of the children of Israel, shall possess that of the Canaanites even unto Zarephath, and the captivity of Jerusalem, which is in Sepharad, or Bosphorus, shall possess the cities of the south," ver. 20. There are three places of this name, whither the Hebrews might have been carried. 1. The Cimmerian Bosphorus, which joined the lake Mæotis to the Euxine Sea. 2. The Thracian Bosphorus, that of Constantinople, or the arm of the sea between Chalcedon and Constantinople. 3. The Bosphorus, or arm which separates Spain from Africa; now called the straits of Gibraltar; each of these straits is called in Greek, Bosphorus, or rather Bosporus, because an ox may swim over them.

Interpreters are much divided concerning the straits of which Obadiah speaks. The Jew whom Jerom consulted on such difficulties as occurred to him in the Hebrew, told him, that the Bosphorus mentioned by the prophet, was the Cimmerian Bosphorus, whither the emperor, Adrian, had banished many of those Jews, whom he had taken prisoners during the war in Palestine; which, notwithstanding, is a circumstance of which we have no account in history. Others believe, with more reason, that the captives taken notice of by Obadiah; were such as Nebuchadnezzar had sent away as far as the Palus Mæotis, about which the country is generally thought to be one of the most frightful in the world; and hither the great persecutors of the Christians frequently sent the confessors of our religion. Lastly, others, and those in good number, understand the Hebrew as meaning Spain, and translate thus: "The captives of Jerusalem which are at Sepharad [that is to say, in Spain] shall possess the cities of the south." Profane historians, as Megasthenes and Strabo (lib. xv.), assert, that Nebuchadnezzar extended his conquests as far as Africa and Iberia, beyond the pillars:—which we apprehend to be those called Hercules' pillars. Now, in this expedition against Spain, some say that he transported many of the Jews thither. Thus they reconcile the version, which reads Bosphorus, with the opinion of the Jews, and of such authors as have followed them, in interpreting Sepharad to mean Spain. But we may question whether Sepharad signifies Spain. Some suppose France to be denoted by it. The old Greek interpreters have kept the Hebrew term, without changing it in their translation. In Jerom's time, the Hebrews explained it by Bosphorus. The Septuagint read Ephrata, instead of Sepharad. We believe some country beyond the Euphrates to be meant by Sepharad, such as that of the Sapires, or Saspies, towards Media, or the city of Hippara, in Mesopotamia. Vide OBADIAH, SPAIN, ZEPHARAD.

BOSRAH, Vide BEZER.

BOSSSES, the thickest and strongest parts of a buckler, Job. xv. 20.

BOTTLE. The bottles used in the East are kegs made of goats' skin, with the hair on the inside, well pitched and sewed together, wherein oil and other liquors are preserved. The mouth of such a bottle is through one of the animal's paws, or the neck. There is frequent mention of bottles in Scripture, and as they are very different from those with which we are acquainted, it may be profitable to offer a few remarks on them in this place.

When Abraham dismissed Hagar, he gave her and her son bread, and water in a bottle, for their journey. The Gibeonites, the more effectually to deceive Joshua and the elders of Israel, showed them their old bottles, telling them, that they had brought them new from home; thereby to convince them, that they came from a very remote country. Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, opened a bottle full of milk, and gave Sisera drink. The Psalmist, designing to exalt the power of God, says, that he holdeth the waters of the sea, shut up, as it were, in a bottle; and, speaking of the passage through the Red Sea, he says, in like manner, that he shut up the waters, as in a bottle. He locked them up, drew them back, bound them up. In another place, he compares himself to a bottle exposed to the frost, or, to the smoke; i. e. a bottle dried, blackened, shrivelled. Our Saviour says, "men do not put new wine into old bottles, else the bottles break, and the wine runneth out." His apostles were, as it were, old bottles before the descent of the Holy Spirit upon them; they were not capable either of comprehending, or of practising, all that perfection which Jesus Christ came to teach mankind. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. lviii.

BOW, a kind of weapon well known. The Israelites had many very expert archers among their troops. When there is mention in Scripture of bending the bow, the verb tread under foot is generally used; because it was their custom to put their feet upon the bow, to bend it. David thanks God for giving him the strength of a brazen bow in his arms, Psal. xvii. 25. Their bows were commonly of wood. When they designed to say, God will destroy the power of such, or such a people, they expressed it, God will break their bow, Hosea i. 5. "They are like a deceitful bow," vii. 16. signifies one that is not well strung, which does not carry straight to the mark. God is represented in Scripture with his bow and arrows, as warriors and conquerors are described: "Thy bow was made quite naked, according to the oaths of the tribes," Hab. iii. 9. Thou wilt awaken thy bow, thou wilt bend it, and put it in a condition to be drawn, &c.—The Persians, in Scripture called Elamites, were the most expert archers in the world. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. ccxxi. and PLATE, No. 175.

BOWELS, the inward parts of a human body. The bowels are, according to the Jews, the seat of mercy, tenderness, and compassion. Joseph's bowels were moved at the sight of his brother Benjamin; he felt himself softened, and affected. The true mother of the child, which Solomon commanded to be divided, felt her bowels move, and consented that her son should be given to the woman who was not his real mother. The same affection is attributed to deity: "God, through the bowels of his mercy, hath visited us," by sending the Messiah to us, Luke i. 78.

Job, describing a merciless, hard-hearted, rich man, says, "his bowels are loaded with fat." Solomon says, "the bowels [Eng. tran. tender mercies] of the wicked are cruel," Prov. xii. 10. And St. Paul reproaches, as it were, the Corinthians in a friendly manner, saying, "Ye are not straitened in us, but ye are straitened in your own bowels," 2 Cor. vi. 12. The Hebrews sometimes place wisdom and understanding also in the bowels. "Who hath put wisdom in the inner parts?" says Job, xxxviii. 36. The Psalmist says, "Renew a right spirit in my bowels"—within me, Psal. li. 10. And Isaiah (xix. 8), "The spirit of the Egyptians shall fail—shall be annihilated—[in the bowels, or] in the midst thereof, and I will destroy the counsel thereof." It shall fall into disorder, mistake, and uncertainty. Jeremiah also says, "I will engrave my law in their bowels," or inner parts. And Habakkuk (ii. 19), "There is no spirit in the entrails—in the midst of the idol," it has neither soul, spirit, nor understanding.

[BOX TREE, תאשור tashur; so called from its flourishing, or perpetual viridity—an evergreen. Isaiah says, "I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah-tree, and the myrtle, and the oil-tree; I will set in the desert the fir-tree, and the pine, and the box-tree together," ch. xli. 19. The nature of the box-tree might lead us to look for evergreens among the foregoing trees, and perhaps by tracing this idea we might attain to something like satisfaction respecting them, which at present we cannot. A plantation of evergreens in the wilderness is not unlikely to be the import of this passage. The contrast between a perpetual verdure, and sometimes universal brownness, not enlivened by variety of tints, must be very great: nevertheless, we must be careful not to group unnaturally associated vegetation.]

BOZEZ, or BOSES, בִּצֵץ: mud-bog; from בִּצֵץ bitzatz: otherwise, in him the flower; from ב beth, in, and צֵץ tzitz, a flower.

[The Arabic root imports splendour, sparkling, extreme whiteness; whence the name of this rock most probably signifies "the glittering rock:" a rock not only of splendid whiteness, but in which were mingled a number of shining particles.]

BOZEZ, the name of a rock which Jonathan climbed up to attack the Philistines, 1 Sam. xiv. 4.

BOZKATH, בִּצְקָת: mass, paste, puffed-up; from בָּצַק batsek: otherwise in distress; from ב beth, in, and צָק tsuk, to be pressed: otherwise, in effusion; from יָצַק jatsak.

BOZKATH, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 39.

BOZRA, vide BEZER, [and BAZRAH, for allusion to certain Mosiac customs.]

[BRACELETS, ornamental chains, made of wire: or clasps, made of various metals, always meant to adorn the part on which they were worn. Vide PLATES, No. 60, 61. FRAGMENTS, No. lx. also PERISCELIDES, for a similar decoration to the legs.]

BRANCH. The prophets give this name to the Messiah: "Behold the man, whose name is the Branch," says Zechariah, chap. vi. 12. also chap. iii. 8, "Behold, I will bring forth my servant the Branch." The Vulgate translates Oriens. Jesus Christ is the Branch of the house of David: He is likewise Oriens, the Sun of Righteousness, which is risen in order to enlighten us, and to deliver us out of the shadow of death. The Messiah is likewise called by this name in Isaiah iv. 2; Jer. xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15; as a kind of prophecy of his miraculous birth of a virgin. Vide ALMAH.

[BRASS is frequently mentioned in the English Bible, but there is little doubt that copper is intended; brass being a mixed metal, for the manufacture of which we are indebted to the Germans. The ancients knew nothing of the art. Vide COPPER.]

BREAD. In Scripture, bread is taken for food in general; "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." "I will fetch a morsel of bread," says Abraham, Gen. xviii. 5. "If God give me bread to eat," says Jacob at Bethel, Gen. xxviii. 20. "Call him that he may eat bread," invite him to come and eat with us, &c. Exod. ii. 20. Manna is called bread from heaven, Exod. xvi. 15.

The ancient Hebrews had several ways of baking bread: they often baked it under the ashes. Abraham served the three angels, whom he received into his tent, with loaves baked upon the hearth (Gen. xviii. 6): Hebrew, huggoth, signifies loaves, or little cakes, much like our broad thin cakes, which are baked under the ashes, or upon round copper-plates, or in pans or stoves made on purpose. [Muffins or crumpets.]

The Hebrews, at their departure out of Egypt, made some of these unleavened loaves for their journey, Exod. xii. 39. Elijah, when fleeing from Jezebel, found at his head a cake, which had been baked on the coals, and a cruse of water, 1 Kings xix. 6. The same Elijah desired the widow of Sarepta to make a little bread (cake) for him, and to bake it under the ashes, 1 Kings xvii. 13. The Hebrew call this kind of cake huggoth: and Hosea (vii. 8.) compares Ephraim to one of these huggoth, which was not turned, but was baked on one side only. Busbequius (Constantinop. p. 36) says, that in Bulgaria this sort of loaves is still very common. They are there called hugaces. As soon as they see a guest coming, the women immediately prepare these unleavened loaves, which are baked under the ashes, and sold to strangers, there being no bakers in this country. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. cix.

The Arabians, says D'Arvieux (Contumes des Arabes, cap. xiv.), and other Eastern people, among whom wood is scarce, often bake their bread between two fires made of cow-dung, which burns slowly, and bakes the bread very leisurely. The crumb of it is very good, if it be eat the same day; but the crust is black, and burnt, and retains a smell of the fuel used in baking it. This explains Ezek. iv. 9, 10, 12, 15, which is extremely shocking to the generality of readers. The Lord commands this prophet to make a paste composed of wheat, barley, beans, lentils, millet, and fitches, and of this to make a loaf, to bake it under the ashes, and to cover it with human excrements in the sight of all the people. The prophet expressing extreme reluctance to this, God permitted him to cover it with cow-dung, instead of human dung. We are not to imagine that it was God's design to make the prophet eat man's dung; he only enjoined him to bake his bread under such excrements; but, afterwards, he allowed him to bake it under cow-dung, as the Arabians do. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. cvi.

The Hebrews, and other Eastern people, have at this day a kind of oven, called taanour, which is like a large pitcher, of grey stone, open at top, in which they make a fire. When it is well heated, they mingle flour in water; this paste they apply to the outside of the pitcher; it is baked in an instant, and being dried, is taken off in thin fine pieces, like our wafers. The Orientals believe Eve's oven to have been of this kind; that it was left to Noah, and that the boiling water which ran over from it, occasioned the Deluge. Strange extravagancies! [metaphorical of the extensive spread and effects of her sin.]

A third sort of bread used among the people of the East, is baked in a great pitcher half full of certain little flints, which are white and glistering, on which they cast the paste in the form of little flat cakes. The bread is white, and smells well, but is good only for the day on which it is baked, unless there be leaven mingled with it to preserve it longer. This is the most common way in Palestine. Vide the PLATE, No. 33.

Moses enjoined the Israelites, on their arrival in the promised land, "to offer up a cake of the first of their dough, for a heave-offering in their generations," Numb. xv. 20. These first-fruits of bread, or dough, were given to the priest or Levite, who dwelt in the place where the bread was baked; and if no priest or Levite dwelt there; that part of the dough designed for the Lord, or his minister, was thrown into the fire, or the oven. The quantity of bread to be given for first-fruits was not settled by the law; but custom and tradition had determined it, says Jerom, to be between the fortieth part of the whole mass, at most, and the sixtieth part of the mass at least. Philo remarks, that something was set apart for the priest, whenever they kneaded, but he does not say how much. De præm. Sacerd.

Leo of Modena (Cerem. des Juifs, Part ii. cap. 9.) tells us, that the modern custom of the Jews is, when the bread is kneaded, and a piece of dough made as big as forty eggs, to take a small part from it, and make a cake, which is instead of the first-fruits appointed by the law. It had been a custom to give this cake to the priest; but, at present, it is thrown into the fire, to be consumed. This is one of the three precepts which should be observed by the women, as they generally make the bread. The prayer to be recited by them, when they throw this little portion of dough into the oven, or the fire, is as follows: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, the King of the world, who hast sanctified us by thy precepts, and hast commanded us to separate a cake of our dough."

It appears, from several places of Scripture, that there stood constantly near the altar a basket full of bread to be offered with the ordinary sacrifices, Exod. xxix. 32; Numb. vi. 15.

Moses forbids the priests "to receive from the hands of strangers bread, or any thing else that they proposed to give; because all these gifts are corrupted," Lev. xxii. 25. There are different opinions concerning the meaning of this law. Some, as Tostatus, Cajetan, and others, pretend, that under the name of bread, we should understand all sorts of sacrifices and offerings, because the victims that were slain are in Scripture sometimes called the bread of God. Others imagine, that God forbids the receiving sacrifices of any kind, or any real offering immediately from the hands of infidel people; but he permits the reception of money wherewith to purchase offerings and victims. Lastly, others explain it literally, of offerings of flour, bread, or cakes; that none of these were to be received in the temple from the hands of idolaters, or infidels.

God threatens to break the staff of bread, i. e. to send famine among the Israelites, Ezek. iv. 16.

"Man doth not live by bread only, but by every [word] which proceedeth out of the mouth of God," Matt. iv. 4. God can sustain us, not only with bread, or ordinary food, but with any thing else, if he think fit to communicate a nourishing virtue to it. Thus he fed the Israelites in the wilderness with manna; and thus five thousand men were fed with five loaves, distributed by the hands of Jesus Christ and his apostles.

"Bread and water" are used for sustenance in general, Deut. ix. 9, 18. God complains of the Moabites and Ammonites, that they did not meet Israel with bread and water. Nabal, in answer to David's message, says, "Shall I take my bread and my water, and give them to men whom I know not?" Obadiah, the governor of king Ahab's house, fed a hundred prophets of the Lord with bread and water, 1 Kings xviii. 13. "Bread of affliction, and water of affliction" (1 Kings xxii. 27), are the same as a little bread and a little water, or prison-bread and prison water. [Prison-allowance.]

As the Hebrews generally made their bread very thin, and in the form of little flat cakes, or wafers, they did not cut it with a knife, but brake it; which gave rise to that expression so usual in Scripture, of breaking bread, to signify eating, sitting down to table, making a meal. In the institution of the Eucharist, our Saviour brake the bread which he had consecrated; whence, to break bread, and breaking of bread, are used for celebrating the Eucharist.

The Psalmist speaks of "the bread of tears;" Psalm xlii. 3; lxxx. 5, and cxxvii. 2. Meaning continual sorrows and tears, instead of food; or which makes us loose the desire of eating and drinking. [Or, we mingle our food with tears.]

Bread of wickedness, bread of deceit, is bread acquired by criminal and fraudulent practices.

[BREAD, DAILY. To teach an entire dependence on the care of our heavenly Father, we are instructed to pray day by day for our daily bread, Matt. vi. 11. The Greek ἐπιούσιον; here rendered "daily," is translated by Jerom supersubstantialium, and by the elegant Castalio, victum nostrum alimentarium: but with more force and propriety by others, "both spiritual and corporeal food." The adjective is certainly "spiritual," and as applied to ἀρὸν means a grant or request of food, equally for the mind as for the body.]

[I. BREASTPLATE, a piece of defensive armour to protect the heart. The breastplate of God is righteousness, which renders his whole conduct unassailable by any accusation. Christians are exhorted to take to themselves "the breastplate of righteousness" (Eph. vi. 14), and "the breastplate of faith and love," 1 Thess. v. 8. Being clothed with these graces, they will be able to resist their enemies, and quench all thier fiery darts of the wicked one: a striking and beautiful simile.]

II. BREASTPLATE, a part of the vestments anciently worn by the Jewish high priest. The Hebrew Exod. xxv. 7; xxviii. 28. has חֹשֶׁן Choshen. LXX. Δόρυον, the oracle, or λογεῖον. Exod. xxviii. 15, 29, 30. חֹשֶׁן דָּבָר Choshen davar, the oracle of judgment. Sometimes the LXX. also translate חֹשֶׁן by ποδήρης tunica, talaris, and by πεπρωμένον, pectorale, and Jerom by Rationale, or Rationale judicii. The literal signification of Choshen is not well known. It is generally derived from the Arabic Casan, which signifies rough, rugged, thick, as this pectoral was, with the rows of stones, and embossed flowers, &c. which adorned it. It was a piece of embroidery about ten inches square, Exod. xxviii. 15, [וַיִּרְרֵן is the half cubit, Ezek. xliii. 13, 17.] of very rich work, set with four rows of precious stones, on each of which was engraven the name of a tribe of Israel. It was double, or made of two pieces, a front and a lining, forming a kind of purse, or bag, in which, according to the Rabbins, the Urim and Thummim were inclosed, and was fastened at the four corners; those on the top, to each shoulder, and a golden hook or ring, at the end of a wreathed chain: those below, to the girdle of the ephod, by two strings or ribbands, which had also two rings and hooks. This ornament was never to be severed from the priestly garments; and it was called "the memorial," being designed to remind the priest how dear those tribes should be to him, whose names he bore upon his heart. It was also named "the breastplate of judgment," probably, because by it was discovered the judgment and the will of God; or, because the high-priest who wore it was the fountain of justice, and put it on when he exercised his judicial capacity in matters of great consequence, which concerned the whole nation. Vide EPHOD, URIM and THUMMIM, and PLATE, No. 113.

[BRIDE, a newly married female. In the typical language of Scripture the love of the Redeemer to the church is energetically alluded to in the expressions "the Bride, the Lamb's wife," Rev. xxi. 9. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. cccxliv. &c.]

[BRIMSTONE, a well-known inflammable substance. God destroyed the cities of the plain by raining upon them fire and brimstone (Gen. xix. 24); and the impenitent are threatened with the same punishment, Ps. xl. 6; Rev. xxi. 8.]

BROOK, Torrents; in Greek Χεῖμαρρος; in Hebrew, נַחַל nachal. A brook is distinguished from a river, for a river flows at all times, but a brook at some times only; as, after great rains, or the melting of snows. As the Hebrew nachal signifies a valley, as well as a brook, one is often used for the other; as the Brook of Gerar, for the Valley of Gerar. But this ambiguity is of little consequence, since generally there are brooks in vallies; but it deserves notice, because sometimes that is attributed to the valley which belongs only to the brook; for example, to the Valley of Kedron, which should be understood of the Brook Kedron.

[It is somewhat unfortunate, that in the English language, the word torrent, should signify a powerful stream, rather than a current which runs only after rain, which kind of stream being very common in Arabia, and frequently alluded to in the book of Job, deprives our translation not only of emphasis and of poetry, but of correctness, if not of meaning, in some places. Vide Job xx. 17.]

The distinction between a brook and a river is not always marked in Scripture, and one is often taken for the other, by giving great rivers, such as the Euphrates, the Nile, the Jordan, and others, which flow during the whole year (such as the Jabok and the Arnon), the name of brooks.

BROTHER. This word is taken in Scripture for any relation, a man of the same country, or of the same nation, for our neighbour, for a man in general.

[It is probable that James, Josés, and Judas (Matt. xxvii. 56.), though called brethren of Jesus, were not strictly his natural brothers; but (according to the usage of the Hebrews in extending names of affection from the proper kin to which they accurately applied, to more distant relatives) at the nearest cousins. James and Josés were sons of Mary (certainly not the Virgin, Matt. xxvii. 56). James and Judas were sons of Alpheus (Luke vi. 15, 16), and Alpheus is most probably Cleophas, husband of Mary, sister of the Virgin, John xix. 25.

Brother is one of the same nation (Rom. ix. 3, &c.);—one of the same faith (vide the First Epistle of St. John);—one of the same nature, Heb. ii. 17. Thus we see a regular gradation in the application of the word brother in Scripture, and we apprehend that most, perhaps all, languages employ some equivalent extension of it. We say in English, a brother of the same trade—a brother of the same colour—"brother black," &c. Of the same disposition—"brother miser." Of the same vice—"brother thief," &c. And to express many other ideas of similarity, we often attach meanings no less extensive to this word, than are denoted by it when it occurs in its loosest sense in holy writ.]

BROTHER is used sometimes for one who resembles another in any quality, either good or evil; "He who is slothful in his work, is brother to him who is a great waster." Job complains, "I am a brother to dragons [serpents], and a companion to ostriches." I imitate them in their doleful cries, and in their flying from mankind. Ecclesiasticus says, "He that sheddeth blood, and he who defraudeth the labourer of his hire, are brothers." The disposition that leads to these crimes, as well as the crimes themselves, have a strong connection and resemblance. Brother is likewise understood for friend, or husband; as sister is for wife, Cant. iv. 9; Job xvii. 14.

By the law, the brother of a man who died without children, was obliged to marry the widow of the deceased, to raise up children to him, that his name and memory might not be extinct. Vide LEVIT, WIDOW, and FRAGMENTS, No. ci.

BUBASTUS, or Phibaste, פִּיבַּסְטָה, Βουβαστος: the mouth of confusion.

BUBASTUS, a famous city of Egypt. Ezekiel (xxx. 17.) calls it Pibezeth. [Mouth, or oracle, of Beseth, or Baal.] It stood on the eastern shore of the eastern arm of the Nile.

[BUCKLER, vide ARMS, used by the Hebrews. It was a defensive piece of armour, of the nature of a shield. It is spoken figuratively of God, 2 Sam. xxii. 31; Psalm xviii. 2, 30; Prov. ii. 7; and of the truth of God, Psalm xci. 4.]

To BUILD. Besides the proper and literal signification of this word, it is used with reference to children and a numerous posterity. Sarah desires Abraham to take Hagar to wife, that by her she may be builded up, i. e. have children to support her family, Gen. xvi. 2. The midwives who refused obedience to Pharaoh's orders, when he commanded them to put to death all the male children of the Hebrews, were rewarded for it; God built them houses—gave them a numerous posterity. [If that be the true rendering of the place; but some think it signifies that the houses of the Israelites were established by the numbers of children which the midwives saved. The LXX. read, "they (the midwives) made themselves houses," more extensive than mere families; and Josephus says, they were Egyptian women: if so, the phrase expresses the accumulation of wealth, or great fortunes, Exod. i. 21.

The prophet Nathan promises David, from God, to build his house for him, i. e. to give him children and successors, 2 Sam. vii. 27. Scripture, speaking of the formation of the first woman, says, God built her with the rib of Adam, Gen. ii. 22.

BUKKI, or Bocci, בִּקִּי: empty, or dissipation; from בָּקַק bakak.

I. BUKKI, son of Jogti, of Dan, Numbers xxxiv. 22.

II. BUKKI, high-priest of the Jews, son of Abishua, and father of Uzzi, 1 Chron. vi. 5.

BUKKIAH, בִּקְיָהוּ, Βουκκίας: dissipation of the Lord; from בָּקַי bukki, as above, and יָה jah, the Lord.

BUKKIAH, a Levite, who played on music before the ark, 1 Chron. xxv. 4.

BUL, בֹּרֵל, βουλ: old age, perishing; from בָּלָה balah.

BUL, the eighth month in the Hebrew calendar, afterwards called Marchesvan; answering to our October, O. S. It is the second month of the civil year, and the eighth month of the ecclesiastical year. It has twenty-nine days. Vide Jewish Calendar, Diet. vol. ii. ad fin. We only find the name Bul in 1 Kings vi. 38, under the reign of Solomon.

BULL, BULLOCK. This animal was reputed clean, and was generally used in sacrifice. The Septuagint and Vulgate often use the word ox; comprehending under the word rather the species, than the sex or quality of the animal. The ancient Hebrews, in general, never mutilated any creature; and where in the text we read ox, we are to understand a bull, Lev. xxii. 24.

The beauty of Joseph is compared to that of a bullock. The Egyptians had particular veneration for this animal; they paid divine honours to it; and the Jews are thought to have imitated them in their worship of the golden calves. Jacob reproaches his sons, Simeon and Levi, for having dug down the wall of the Sichemites; but the LXX. translate the Hebrew, "for hamstringing a bull." Many of the ancient fathers explained this passage of Jesus Christ, and referred it to his being put to death by the Jews. The Hebrew signifies either a wall or a bull.

Bull, in a figurative and allegorical sense, is taken for powerful, fierce, insolent enemies. "Fat bulls (bulls of Bashan) surrounded me on every side," says the psalmist, Psalm xxii. 12; and lxviii. 30. "Rebuke the beast of the reeds, the multitude of the bulls;" Lord, smite in thy wrath these animals which feed in large pastures, these herds of bulls. And Isaiah says (chap. xxxiv. 7.), "The Lord shall cause his victims to be slain in the land of Edom, a terrible slaughter will he make, he will kill the unicorns, and the bulls," meaning those proud and cruel princes who oppressed the weak.

BUNAH, בונה, Bouva: one that builds, or that understands, or that adopts; from בנה banah, or בן ban.

BUNAH, son of Jerahmeel, 1 Chron. ii. 25.

BURIAL. The Hebrews were, at all times, very careful in the burial of their dead; to be deprived of burial, was thought one of the greatest dishonours, or unhappinesses, that could befall any man; being denied to none, not even to enemies; but it was withheld from self-murderers, till after sunset; and the souls of such persons were believed to be plunged into hell. This concern for burial proceeded from a persuasion of the soul's immortality. Scripture threatens the wicked with being deprived of burial, as if this were among the greatest calamities that could happen. "If a man beget a hundred children, and live many years, so that the days of his years be many, and his soul be not filled with good, and also that he have no burial, I say, that an untimely birth is better than he," Eccles. vi. 3. Jeremiah (viii. 2.) threatens the kings, priests, and false prophets, who had adored idols, that their bones should be cast out of their graves, and be thrown like dung upon the earth. The same prophet foretold that Jehoiakim, king of Judah, who built his house by unrighteousness, and who abandoned himself to avarice, violence, and all manner of vice, among other severe punishments, should be buried with "the burial of an ass;" that he should be cast out of the gates of Jerusalem into the common sewer, ch. xxii. 18, 19. It is observed (2 Macc. v. 10.), that Jason, who had denied the rites of burial to many Jews, was himself treated in the same manner; that he died in a foreign land, and was thrown like carrion upon the earth, not being laid even in a stranger's grave. Good men made it part of their devotion to inter the dead, as we see by the instance of Tobit.

There was nothing determined particularly in the law as to the place of burying the dead. There were graves in town and country, by the highways, in gardens, on mountains: those belonging to the kings of Judah were in Jerusalem, and the king's gardens. Ezekiel intimates that they were dug under the mountain upon which the temple stood; since God says, that in future his holy mountain should not be polluted with the dead bodies of their kings. The sepulchre which Joseph of Arimathea had provided for himself, and wherein he placed our Saviour's body, was in his garden; that of Rachel was adjacent to the highway from Jerusalem to Bethlehem. That of the Maccabees was at Modin, upon an eminence, whence it was visible at a great distance both by sea and land. The kings of Israel had their burying-places in Samaria. Samuel was interred in his own house; Moses, Aaron, Eleazar, and Joshua, were buried in mountains; Saul, and Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, were buried under the shade of trees. It is affirmed, that the sepulchres of the inhabitants of Jerusalem were in the valley of Kedron. Here likewise was the burying-place for foreigners.

The Jews call what we term a church-yard or cemetery, "the house of the living," to shew their belief of the immortality of the soul, and of the resurrection of the body; and when they come thither bearing a corpse, they address themselves to those who lie there, as if they were still alive, saying, "Blessed be the Lord who hath created you, fed you, brought you up, and at last, in his justice, taken you out of the world. He knows the number of you all, and will in time revive you. Blessed be the Lord who causeth death, and restoreth life." Buxtorf. Synag. Jud. cap. xxxv. Their respect for sepulchres is so great, that they build synagogues and oratories near those of great men and prophets: they go and pray near them. The Rabbins teach, that it is not lawful to demolish tombs, or to disturb the repose of the dead, by burying another corpse in the same grave, even after a long time; nor to carry an aqueduct across the common place of burial; or a highway; nor to go and gather wood there, nor to suffer cattle to feed there.

When the Jews come with a funeral to a burying-place, they repeat the blessing directed to the dead, as above-mentioned; the body is put down upon the ground, and if it be a person of consideration, a kind of funeral oration and encomium is made over him; then they walk round the grave, reciting a pretty long prayer, which they call "the righteousness of judgment;" because therein they return thanks to God for having pronounced an equitable judgment concerning the life and person of the deceased. It begins with those words (Deut. xxii. 4.): "He is the rock, his work is perfect," &c. then a little sack full of earth is put under the dead person's head, and the coffin is nailed down and closed. If it be a man, ten persons take ten turns about him, and say a prayer for his soul; the nearest relation tears a corner of his clothes, the dead body is let down into the grave, with his face towards heaven: and they cry to him, "Go in peace," or rather, according to the Talmudists, "Go to peace." The nearest relations first throw earth on the body; after that, all present do the same, with their hands or with shovels. This done, they retire, walking backwards; and before they leave the burying-ground, they pluck bits of grass three times, and cast them behind their backs, saying, "They shall flourish like grass of the earth," Psalm lxxii. 16.

We do not observe, in all antiquity, any instance of an epitaph inscribed on the tomb of a Hebrew; for that which is reported of Adoniram's found in Spain, and some others of like authority, do not deserve notice. If a monument were erected in memory of a king, a hero, a prophet, or a warrior, the tomb itself spoke sufficiently, and the memory of the person was perpetuated, together with his history, &c. among the people. King Josiah, when destroying the tombs of the false prophets of Baal, and of the priests who had belonged to the golden calf, took notice of a sepulchral stone among them, which was known to be the tomb erected for the man of God, who had declared to Jeroboam, that a king, by name Josiah, should burn the bones of the false prophets upon the altar at Bethel. There was, therefore, no epitaph upon it. The tombs belonging to the kings which were in caves dug in a rock, were certainly not adorned with epitaphs. [Nevertheless, they might have inscriptions, distinguishing the party they contained: and if the hieroglyphics on the tombs mentioned in FRAGMENT, No. ccxi. be so ancient as we have hinted, they may be regarded as proofs that monumental inscriptions were not unusual in (perhaps Jewish) antiquity.] See also FRAGMENTS, No. cccxcviii. cccxcix.

The form of epitaphs used by the Jews is as follows: "This stone is placed at the head of N. the son of N. who was buried on such a day, in the year N. May he rest in the garden of Eden, with all the righteous who have been there from the beginning. Amen, amen, selah." Or, "Let his soul be buried in the garden of Eden, Amen, amen, amen, selah." Or, "This monument, or this pillar, is erected near the head of the most illustrious, most holy, and most pure virgin Rebekah, daughter of Samuel the Levite, who died in good reputation, such a day of the month N. in the year N. May her soul be buried in the garden of Eden. Amen, amen, amen, selah." But these forms are neither ancient nor uniform. Benjamin of Tudela says, that when he travelled through Palestine he observed this inscription on Abraham's tomb, "Here is the sepulchre of Abraham, our blessed father." But this had been but lately made.

BURNING-BUSH, wherein the Lord appeared to Moses, at the foot of mount Horeb, &c. Vide MOSES.

As to the person who appeared in the bush, Scripture, in several places, calls him by the name of God, Exod. iii. 2, 6, 13, 14, &c. He calls himself the Lord God, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; the God who was to deliver his people from their bondage in Egypt; moreover, Moses, blessing Joseph, says, "Let the blessing of him who dwelt in the bush come on the head of Joseph." Dent. xxxiii. 16. But, in the places of Exodus, which we are examining, instead of "the Lord appeared to him," the Hebrew and the Septuagint import, "the angel of the Lord appeared to him." Stephen, in the Acts (vii. 30.), reads it in the same manner; Jerom, Austin, and Gregory the Great, teach the same thing. It was an angel, agent, messenger, who, representing the Lord, spoke in his name. The ancients generally held the Son of God to be the person who appeared in the bush.

BUSHEL, a Jewish measure, containing about a pint less than a peck, Matt. v. 15.

BUTTER, is taken in Scripture, as it is generally in the East, for cream, or liquid butter. Children were fed with butter and honey (Isaiah vii. 15, 22.); with milk-diet, with cream and with honey, which was very common in Palestine. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. clxxxiii. Some think, by the name butyrum, in Scripture, we are to understand cheese: but the Hebrew has a particular name to signify cheese; and butter, or thick cream, is a much more natural and likely production from milk than cheese is.

BUZ, בוז, בזל: despised, or plundered.

I. BUZ, son of Nahor and Milcah, and brother of Huz, Gen. xxii. 21. Elihu, one of Job's friends, was descended from Buz, son of Nahor. Scripture calls him an Aramean, or Syrian; Job xxxii. 2: "Elihu the Busite, of the kindred of Ram." Ram is put for Aram. Jeremiah (chap. xxv. 23.) threatens the Buzites with God's wrath. They dwelt in Arabia Deserta.

II. BUZ, son of Abdiel, and father of Jahdo, of Judah, 1 Chron. v. 14.

BUZI, בוזי, Βουζι: my contempt.

BUZI, a priest, father of the prophet Ezekiel, Ezek. i. 3.

BYBLOS, a city of Phœnicia, between Sidon and Orthosia, famous for its worship of Adonis, who was believed to have been wounded by a boar in Mount Libanus, above Byblos. The river Adonis passes by Byblos; its waters are at some seasons as red as blood. At such a time the inhabitants of Byblos lamented Adonis, pretending their river was then coloured with his blood. Lucian de Dea Syria. Vide ADONIS.

Some are of opinion, that the Giblyi, whose dexterity in cutting wood and building vessels is commended (Ezek. xxvii. 9), were the inhabitants of Byblos, in Hebrew called Gebal. It was seated at the foot of Libanus, on the Mediterranean, almost opposite to where some cedars are still remaining. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. ccxvii. ccxvi.

BYSSUS. By this word we generally understand that fine Egyptian linen, of which the priests' tunics were made. But we must distinguish carefully three kinds of commodities, which are generally confounded, and comprehended under the name of linen. 1. The Hebrew בדר bad, which signifies linen. 2. שש Shesh, which signifies cotton. 3. בוצ butz, which is commonly called bussus, and is the silk growing from a certain shell-fish, called pinna.

We do not find the name butz in the text of Moses, though the Greek and Latin use the word byssus, to signify the fine linen of certain habits belonging to the priests. The word butz occurs only in 1 Chron. xv. 27; Ezek. xxvii. 16; Esth. i. 6. In the Chronicles, we see David dressed in a mantle of butz, with the singers and Levites. Solomon used butz in the veils of the temple, and sanctuary. Ahasuerus's tents were upheld by cords of butz, and Mordecai was clothed with a mantle of purple and butz, when king Ahasuerus honoured him with the first employment in his kingdom. Lastly, it is observed, that there was a manufacture of butz in the city of Beersheba, in Palestine. This butz must have been different from common linen, since in the same place where it is said, David wore a mantle of byssus, we read likewise, that he had on a linen ephod. Vide COTTON.

C

CAB, a Hebrew measure, the sixth part of a seah, or satum; and the eighteenth part of an ephah. A cab contained three pints 1-3d of our wine-measure; or two pints 5-6ths of our corn-measure—ARBUTHNOT'S Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures.

CABBALA, קבלה signifies TRADITION. The Cabbalist Rabbins study principally the combinations of particular words, letters, and numbers; pretending to discover by this means what is to come, and to see clearly the sense of certain difficult passages in Scripture. They have many names, which they call sacred; these they use in invoking spirits, from whom they imagine they receive great information: they tell us, that the secrets of the Cabbala were discovered to Moses on mount Sinai, and have been delivered down from father to son without interruption, and without the use of letters; for to write them is not lawful. Vide Basnage's Cont. of Josephus, tom. vi. lib. ix. cap. 7. and TRADITION in the Dictionary. The artificial Cabbala consists in searching for abstruse and mysterious significations of a word, or words, in Scripture, from whence are borrowed, or rather forced, explanations, by combining the letters which compose it. This Cabbala is of three kinds: the Gemetry, the Notaricon, and the Themurah, or change.

CABNALA GEMATRY, consists in taking the letters of a Hebrew word for arithmetical numbers, and explaining every word by the arithmetical value of the letters which compose it—e. gr. the Hebrew letters of יבא שילח Jabo-Shiloh (Gen. xlix. 10.), Shiloh shall come, when reckoned arithmetically, make up the same number as those of the word משיח Messiah; whence they infer, that Shiloh signifies the Messiah.

CABBALA NOTARICON, consists in taking each letter of a word for an entire diction: e. gr. Bereshith, the first word of Genesis, composed of B.R.A.Sh.I.T. of this they make Bara-Rakia-Arez-Shamaim-Iam-Tehomoth. "He created the firmament, the earth, the heavens, the sea, and the deep." This Cabbala is varied by taking, on the contrary, the first letters of a sentence to form one diction:—as, Atah-Gibbor-Leholam-Adonai. "Thou art strong for ever, O Lord." They unite the first letters of this sentence, A.G.L.A. and make AGLA, which may signify "I will reveal," or "a drop of dew."

CABBALA THEMURAH, or change, consists in transpositions of letters, placing one for another, or one before another, much after the manner of anagrams.

CABBALISTS. This name is given to the Rabbinical doctors among the Jews: they receive not only the text of Scripture, but also the explanations of the Talmud, and the Jewish traditions; they study, also, to discover mysterious and concealed meanings in the words, the letters, and their arrangements, in Scripture; for, they hold the opinion, that every word, letter, or accent in the law, includes some mystery.

CABBON, כַּבּוֹן: which extinguishes, or which is extinguished; from כָּבַה cabah: otherwise, as intelligent; from the adverb כַּ as, and בָּן ban, intelligent: or as building; from בָּנָה banah, to build. [A chain, say some, i. e. to its inhabitants: as the Talmud uses the word, to bind, to attach; Syriac, to surround. This city is thought to be also called Macbena, 1 Chron. ii. 49. Possibly, this name Cabbon, might be understood of the deceased, extinguished, or extinct Aun, or generative power: i. e. of that power suspended for a time; but to be afterwards revived with increased sprightliness and vigour; implying a person now dead, but whose revival was expected. Vide ADONIS, TAMMUZ, &c.]

CABBON, a city in Judah, Josh. xv. 40.

[CABUL, כַּבּוּל trodden down, or as if building: otherwise, as if flowing, or as if growing old. Vide CHABALON.

As the Arabic root, and the Syriac, implies to bind, and the Hebrew chabul, likewise imports "to accept as a gift," the probability is, that this name should be favourably interpreted; "taken as a kindness," accepted as a present; and the understood office of a present in the East is, to bind the party who receives it, in favour of him who has offered it: so that it partly answers in its nature to what we understand by a retaining fee.

I. CABUL, a city of Asher, Josh. xix. 27.

II. CABUL, a district of Galilee, given to Hiram by Solomon, 1 Kings ix. 13. Vide CHABALON.

Speaking of this region in Galilee, Josephus says (Ant. lib. viii. cap. 5.), that in the Phœnician tongue, the name signifies displeasing: others say, clogging, binding, or adhesive, from the plenty of potter's clay of which earthen ware was made, and which this country yielded. "The Clays."

III. CABUL, in Cabulistan. "KABUL," says Ibn Haukul, "is a town with a very strong castle, accessible only by one road: this is in the hands of the Mussulmans; but the town belongs to the infidel Indians. They say a king is not properly qualified to govern, until he has been inaugurated at Kabul, however distant he may have been from it. It is a pass into Hindostan; situated in a warm climate, but does not produce date trees."

[This particular of inauguration, seems to confer an importance and antiquity on this town, which is favourable to some parts of the Braminical character of it.]

CAD, or Cadus, in Hebrew, signifies a pitcher; but in Luke, a particular measure: "How much owest thou to my lord?—a hundred measures of oil." The Greek reads a hundred baths. The bath or ephah, contained full ten gallons.

CADUMIM, קְדֻמִּים: the ancients, the first, or Orientals, or waters of the East: or, from Cademoth, or Kademoth, and מִיִּם mim, the Eastern waters.

CADUMIM. A brook of this name is mentioned, Judges v. 21. Many think it ran east, from the foot of mount Tabor, into the sea of Tiberias: but we have no evidence of any such brook in that place. Others think it to be the brook Kishon. We know there was a city in these parts, called Cadmon, mentioned, Judith vii. 3, in Syriac, whence the brook Cadumim, or the Kishon, might be named.

CÆSAR, Καῖσαρ: a Latin word; from cædo, I cut, because the subject of it was cut out of his mother's womb at the time of her delivery; or, from caesaries, a head of hair: otherwise, one that has blue eyes; which in Latin are called cæsius, or glaucoſ oculos.

CÆSAR. This name was assumed by, or conferred upon, all the Roman emperors after Julius Cæsar. In the New Testament, the reigning emperor is generally called Cæsar, omitting any other name which might belong to him. Jesus Christ calls the emperor Tiberius, simply Cæsar, Matt. xxii. 21. And Paul thus mentions Nero; "I appeal to Cæsar;" i. e. to Nero, the emperor then reigning.

[Probably this title rather denoted the political power than the person of the emperor: Festus, being a Roman officer, seems to use a different phraseology, Acts xxv. 25.]

I. CÆSAREA, in Palestine, formerly called Strato's Tower, was built by Herod the Great, in honour of Augustus. It was situated on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean, and had a fine harbour: it is reckoned to be 36 miles south of Acre; 30 north of Jaffa; and 62 north west of Jerusalem. Vespasian, after the Jewish war, settled here a Roman colony: its inhabitants were partly Jews, and partly Greeks, i. e. idolaters. Hence arose very frequent contentions between them. Cæsarea is often mentioned in the New Testament. Here king Agrippa was smitten by the Lord, for neglecting to give God the glory, when flattered by the people. Cornelius the Centurion, who was baptized by Peter, resided here, Acts x. 1. Also Philip the Deacon, with his four maiden daughters, Acts viii. 40. At Cæsarea, the prophet Agabus foretold to the apostle Paul, that he would be bound at Jerusalem, Acts xxi. 10, 11. Paul continued two years prisoner at Cæsarea, till he could be conveniently conducted to Rome, because he had appealed to Nero. Whenever Cæsarea is named, as a city of Palestine, without the addition of Philippi, we suppose this Cæsarea to be meant, Vide PLATE, No. 40.

II. CÆSAREA PHILIPPI, (before called Paneas) was situated at the foot of mount Paneus, near the springs of Jordan. It has been supposed, that its ancient name was Dan, or Laish; and that it was called Paneas, by the Phœnicians only: nevertheless, Eusebius distinguishes Dan from Paneas, as if they were near to each other, but yet different places. Cæsarea was a day's journey from Sidon; a day and a half from Damascus. Philip the Tetrarch built it, or, at least, embellished and enlarged it, and named it Cæsarea, in honour of the emperor Tiberius; but afterwards, in compliment to Nero, it was called Neronias. The woman who had been troubled with an issue of blood, and was healed by our Saviour (Matt. ix. 20; Luke vii. 43), is said to have been of Cæsarea Philippi, and to have returned thither after her cure. Report also said, she erected there a statue to her benefactor, [probably a small one, and of brass.] Julian, the Apostate, displaced this figure, and set up his own instead: but the Christian inhabitants placed it honourably in their church. That of Julian was consumed by lightning. [This town is now called Baniyas: it is small, and according to Buckhardt, contains about 150 houses, inhabited mostly by Turks.] Vide PLATE, No. 40.

CAIAPHAS, Καϊαφας: he that seeks with diligence; from שׁוֹפֵט chaphas: otherwise, vomit; from קָוָה koa, to vomit; and from פֶּה phe, a mouth: or rather, from cephas, a rock.

CAIAPHAS, high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Simon, son of Camith; and after possessing this dignity nine years, from A.M. 4029 to 4038, he was succeeded by Jonathan, son of Ananas, or Annas. Caiaphas was high-priest, A. M. 4037, which was the year of Jesus Christ's death. He married a daughter of Annas, who also is called high-priest in the gospel, because he had long enjoyed that dignity.

When the priests deliberated on the seizure and death of Jesus Christ, Caiaphas told them, there was no room for debate on that matter, "that it was expedient for one man to die, instead of all the people,—that the whole nation might not perish," John xi. 49, 50. This sentiment was a kind of prophecy, which God suffered to proceed from the mouth of the high-priest on this occasion, importing, though not by his intension, that the death of Jesus would be the salvation of the world.

When Judas had betrayed Jesus, he was first taken before Annas, who sent him to his son-in-law, Caiaphas, who possibly lived in the same house, John xviii. 24. The priests and doctors of the law there assembled to judge Jesus, and to condemn him. [Vide FRAGMENTS, No. cxxxvii.] The depositions of certain false witnesses being insufficient to justify a sentence of death against him, and Jesus continuing silent, Caiaphas, as high-priest, said to him, "I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou art the Christ, the Son of God!" To this adjuration, so solemnly made by the superior judge, Jesus answered, "Thou hast said; nevertheless I say unto you, hereafter shall ye see the son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." On hearing these words, Caiaphas rent his clothes, saying, "What farther need we witnesses? Behold now you have heard his blasphemy. What think ye?" They answered, "He is worthy of death." And, as the power of life and death was not at this time in their hands, but was reserved by the Romans, they conducted him to Pilate, that he might confirm their sentence, and order his execution; which he ultimately did.

Two years after (i. e. A.D. 38), Vitellus, governor of Syria, coming to Jerusalem at the passover, was received very magnificently by the people. As an acknowledgment for this honour, he restored the custody of the high-priest's ornaments to the priests, he remitted certain duties raised on the fruits of the earth, and deposed the high-priest Caiaphas. Josephus seems to include this deposition among the favours done by Vitellus. What was the end of Caiaphas, and when he died, we cannot tell. His house is still shewn in Jerusalem!

CAIN, קַיִן: possession, or possessed; from קָנָה kanah, to enjoy, to possess.

CAIN, the eldest son of Adam and Eve; born towards the end of the first year of the world. Some believe that Eve at the same time gave birth to a daughter; it might be so: but Scripture says nothing of it. His brother Abel was born about a year after him. Cain applied to agriculture, and his brother Abel to feeding of flocks, Gen. iv. 2, &c. Cain offered the first-fruits of his grounds to the Lord, but Abel offered the fat of his flock; God shewed that Abel's offerings were agreeable to him; not so Cain's; which so enraged him, that his countenance was entirely changed; whereupon the Lord said unto him, "Why is thy countenance so dejected? If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted?" Vide ABEL.

But Cain, unrestrained by this admonition, and suffering evil passions to mislead him, killed his brother Abel: the Lord inquired into this murder, and for it punished Cain:—who became an exile, and a vagabond. Nevertheless, he received an assurance, that he himself should not be murdered; of which God gave to Cain a token; for so may the words be taken, though commonly they are considered as expressing a token of guilt, strongly marked on his person.

Cain quitted the presence of the Lord, and retired to the land of Nod, east of Eden, where he had a son, whom he named Enoch, and in memory of whom he built a city of the same name.

Several questions are proposed relating to Cain—as, What was his pretence or motive for killing his brother Abel? What instrument he used? Whose resentment and revenge he apprehended? To what country he retired? What was the mark which God fixed upon him, or appointed to him? and what death he died?

[There has also been much controversy on the proper rendering of the sentence, Gen. iv. 7: If thou doest not well—"sin"—a sin-offering "lieth"—croucheth—"at the door."—Perhaps the true import of it is to this effect: "If thou hast done well, thou shalt have praise—if not—lay a sin-offering at the door," by way of sacrifice: at the door—either of the garden of Paradise, (vide chap. iii. 24) or—at the door of a place for worship. The word signifies crouching as a beast—q. d. "imitate the offering of Abel;—make an atonement by blood." This rendering takes the word—lay, crouch—actively instead of passively: literally, "at the opening, the sin-offering crouching"—shall be your atonement. The offering of fruits, &c. made by Cain, had no blood, which was necessary to a sin-offering; he is, therefore, directed to lay an offering that had blood: moreover, a collection of vegetables offered nothing on which the fire could feed; whereas, by means of the fat of an animal-offering, the altar was partaker with the offerer: the fire fed on the sacrifice. See Lev. iii. 16; iv. 26, et al.]

Josephus says, that Cain having settled at Nod, instead of being reformed by his punishment and exile, became more wicked and violent, and headed a band of thieves, whom he taught to enrich themselves at the expence of others. He quite changed the simplicity and honesty of the world into fraud and deceit; inventing weights and measures. He was the first who set bounds to fields, and who built and fortified a city.

CAINS, or CAINITES, heretics, of the second century, who believed Cain to have been produced by some greater power than Abel; for which reason Cain prevailed over Abel. On the same principle they honoured those persons who are recorded in Scripture as the worst of mankind: such as, the inhabitants of Sodom; Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; and particularly the traitor Judas; who, said they, knowing that the salvation of men was to be procured by the death of Jesus Christ, delivered him to his enemies to be executed, notwithstanding the resistance of certain powers, who, being ill-wishers to our happiness, would have prevented him. The Cainites adopted whatever was most impure and ignominious among the Gnostics, and other heretics. Vide Epiphanius, Heresy 38; Tertul. de Præscrip. cap. 47, &c.

CAINAN, קַיִן: possessor, or purchaser; from קָנָה kanah: otherwise, one that laments; from קֵן kun: or the nest, from קֵן kinen.

I. CAINAN, son of Enos, born A.M. 325, when Enos was ninety years of age, Gen. v. 9. At the age of seventy, Cainan begat Mahalaleel: he died, aged 910, A.M. 1235, ante A.D. 2769.

II. CAINAN, son of Arphaxad, and father of Salah. This person is neither in the Hebrew nor in the Vulgate of Gen. xi. 12, 13, 14: but is named, Luke iii. 36, between Salah and Arphaxad—"Who was the son of Salah, the son of Cainan, the son of Arphaxad."

The LXX. in Gen. x. 24, xi. 12, admit him. Some have suggested, that the Jews suppressed the name Cainan out of their copies, designing to render the LXX. and Luke suspected. Others, that Moses omitted Cainan, being desirous to reckon ten generations only from Adam to Noah, and from Noah to Abraham. Others, that Arphaxad was father of both Cainan and Salah; of Salah naturally, of Cainan legally. Others, that Cainan and Salah were the same person, under two names; this they allege in support of that opinion which maintains Cainan to be really son of Arphaxad, and father of Salah.

They who assert, that Cainan was surreptitiously inserted into the LXX. and from thence was taken by Luke, observe, that the authority of the Hebrew, Vulgate, Chaldee, and Syriac, is superior to that of the LXX.; that Luke having only copied the LXX. his text in this place rests on their authority; that the changes which appear in their years of the patriarchs, destroy their authority, wherever they contradict the Hebrew; and that the editions of the LXX. do not agree with each other: but some affirm, that the name Cainan is an insertion into the text of the LXX.; and that the most ancient Fathers did not read it there: and, indeed, neither Josephus nor Philo knew any thing of a Cainan, son of Arphaxad; and the early Fathers generally reckon only ten generations from Noah to Abraham: whereas there would be eleven, if they had included Cainan. Many learned men believe, that this name was not originally in the text of Luke, but is an addition by inadvertent transcribers, who remarking it in some copies of the LXX. added it from thence.

CAIPHA, or Caiapha, or Hepha, מֵתְיָהוּ הֵיפְחָא, a town situated at the foot of mount Carmel, north, on the Gulf of Ptolemais; its ancient name was Syeaminos, or Porphyreon. Syeaminos was derived probably from the sycamore trees which grew here, as Porphyreon might be from catching here the fish used in dyeing purple. Perhaps Cepha, or Caipha, was derived from its rocks; in Syriac, Cepha; but the Hebrews write Hepha, not Kepha. This city was separated from Acco, or Ptolemais, by a large and beautiful harbour. From this town to Cepha, by sea direct, is not more than fifteen miles; but by land the distance is double.

CAIUS, or Gaius, Γαῖος: according to the ancient Latin, this word signified lord, as caia signified lady; for g is often used for c.

CAIUS CALIGULA, emperor of Rome, succeeded Tiberius, A. D. 37: he reigned three years, nine months, and twenty-eight days. It does not appear that he molested the Christians. He procured himself to be adored among the Heathen: but, having commanded Petronius, governor of Syria, to place his statue in the temple at Jerusalem, for the purpose of adoration, the Jews so vigorously opposed it, that, fearing a sedition, the governor suspended his orders, and wrote an account of the matter to Caius. Agrippa coming at this time to Rome, prevented, by his interest with Caius, any serious consequences; and obtained that this statue should not be set up. Vide AGRIPPA.

Determined, however, to carry his purpose into effect, Caius had another statue made at Rome, designing to have it carried privately to Egypt, when he went thither, in the beginning of the year following; and so to have it placed without noise in the temple at Jerusalem, before the Jews were aware of it.

The Jews of Alexandria, at this time, suffered much persecution from the Heathen of that city, who were supported by Flaccus, the governor. Philo, the Jew, being sent, with other deputies, to the emperor, to demand justice against them, presented a memorial to him, containing a short account of their sufferings. Caius at first received them very civilly, and it was believed they would gain their cause: but Philo, whom age and experience had rendered more diffident, was apprehensive that this prince was already engaged by the Alexandrians.

Some time after, Caius dismissed them, saying, "These people do not seem to me to be so wicked, as they are foolish and unfortunate, in not believing me to be a god." We learn from Philo and Josephus, that, in his reign, the Jews of Alexandria were continually oppressed. He was killed by Chereas, one of his guards, while coming out of the theatre, A. D. 41, in the fourth year of his reign; and was succeeded by Claudius. Vide AGRIPPA, HEROD, and HERODIAS.

CAKES. The Hebrews had several sorts of these, which they offered in the temple, made of meal, of wheat, or of barley; kneaded sometimes with oil, sometimes with honey; sometimes only rubbed over with oil when baked, or fried with oil in a frying-pan. At Aaron's consecration, "they offered unleavened bread, and cakes unleavened, tempered with oil; and wafers unleavened, anointed with oil; the whole made of fine wheaten flour." Exod. xxix. 1, 2.

The Hebrew calls מִנְחָה mincha, all offerings made of grain, flour, paste, bread, or cakes. These offerings were made either alone, or with other things. Sometimes fine flower was offered, as Lev. ii. 1; or, cakes, or other things baked, as verse 4; or, cakes baked in a frying-pan, as verse 5; or, in a frying-pan with holes, or on a gridiron, as verse 7. Ears of corn were sometimes offered, in order to be roasted, and the corn to be got out from them.

These offerings were instituted principally in favour of the poor. This, however, is understood of voluntary offerings, not appointed by the law; for, as to certain sacrifices, the law, instead of two lambs and an ewe, permits the poor to offer only one lamb, and two young pigeons.

For offering, these cakes were salted, but unleavened; for nothing not salted, or having leaven in it, might be offered to God; but leavened or common loaves might be given to the priests, as presents, for food. If, therefore, the cakes which were offered, were baked in an oven, and sprinkled or kneaded with oil, the whole was presented to the priest, who waved the offering before the Lord, then took so much of it as was to be burned on the altar, threw that into the fire, and kept the rest himself, Lev. ii. 4. If the offering were a cake kneaded with oil, and dressed in a frying-pan, it was broken, and oil was poured on it; then it was presented to the priest, who took a handful of it, which he threw on the altar-fire, and the rest was his own. [It should be observed, that oil in the East answers the purpose of butter among us in Europe.]

Cakes or loaves, offered with sacrifices of beasts, as was customary (for the great sacrifices were always accompanied by offerings of cakes, and libations of wine and oil), were kneaded with oil. The wine and oil were not poured on the head of the animal about to be sacrificed (as among the Greeks and Romans), but on the fire wherein the victim was consumed, Numb. xviii. 1, 2, 3, &c. The law regulated the quantity of meal, wine, and oil, for each kind of victim. To the sacrifice of a bullock were added three assa-rions of flour, kneaded with half a hin of oil, and as much wine : to a ram were appointed two asarons, or two-tenths of an ephah of flour, with one-third of a hin of oil, and as much wine : to a goat or ewe, a lamb or a kid, one-tenth deal of flour kneaded with one-fourth part of a hin of oil, and another of wine.

CALAH, or Cale, כַּלָּח, Καλάχ : favourable, opportunity : otherwise, as the verdure, or green fruit ; from לַח lach, and the adverb כִּי ci, as : otherwise, humidity ; from לַח lach, or חֶלֶח lachach : otherwise, a table, a floor ; from חֶלֶח luach.

[CALAH, כַּלָּח, old. Thought by some to have been built in the old age of its founder : others say, it really was an old city. The Arabic root signifies austere, harsh ; and, with a small transposition, penurious, sterile, dry ; which has induced others to think it stood in a dry, unfertile district, and might properly be translated Aridity.]

CALAH, a city of Assyria, built by Asher, or by Nimrod ; for some suppose the phrase (Gen. x. 11, 12.), wherein the founding of this city is mentioned, to be ambiguous : but whoever founded it, it was distant from Nineveh ; and the city Resen lay between Cale and Nineveh. Chale is, perhaps, the capital of the Chalacene province, near the springs of the river Lycus ; or Chala, the capital of the Chalenitis, separated by mount Zagrus from Media.

[Bochart thinks this is the same city as is called Halah, 2 Kings xvii. 6.

Cellarius understands Holwan, a famous town in the ages of the Caliphs, in the Syriac spoken dialect called Hhulon, but in the Syriac documents written Hhalach ; as Asseman says, (Bib. Or. tom. iii. P. ii. p. 418.) ; but the different initial letter in the Hebrew militates against this mutation ; since c is too strong a sound to be easily changed.

Ephraim the Syrian, understands Hatra, a city in the region of the Zab, which falls into the Tigris : or perhaps he intends the city called Chatracharta by Ptolemy, which imports, "Chatra, the city : " but then, this city was east of the springs of the Lycus, or Zab. Such are the remarks of Michaelis. If the reader will turn to FRAGMENTS, No. DXXVIII. he will there find this city called by the Arab geographer, Aklah, which certainly differs somewhat from the Hebrew Calach, and from the Syriac Hhalach : yet this last word not only approaches it, as it stands, but, by transposition of the syllables, forms the name Ach-lah. The appellation is evidently varied according to the pronunciation of the speaker, or perhaps, to that of different ages. Holwan would suit the geographical intention of the text completely, in reference to its connection with the other cities mentioned in the same passage ; and this also is the opinion of Cellarius.]

CALAMUS, in Hebrew קָנָה kana, a measuring reed, or cane. Ezekiel (xl. 3.), and John (Rev. xi. 1.), speak of this reed. Ezekiel says, it was in length six cubits, and a hand-breadth ; or rather, six cubits and six hand-breadths ; that is, six Hebrew cubits, each larger by a hand-breadth than the Babylonish cubit. Vide CUBIT.

CALAMUS AROMATICUS, or Odoratus (Eng. Tr. Sweet Calamus), an aromatic reed. It is mentioned among the drugs of which the sacred perfumes were compounded, Exod. xxx. 23. It is a knotty root, of a reddish colour, and containing a soft white pith. The true odoriferous calamus comes from India. The prophets speak of it as a foreign commodity, of great value, Isa. xliii. 24. Theophrastus and Pliny mention a sweet calamus, which grows in Syria, beyond Libanus, in a lake : probably the lake Semechon. These reeds have no smell while green, but when dry only. [But this was too near Judea, to enhance its value as a foreign commodity. It is better supposed that it came from Saba, where it grew, as it is reported by Strabo (lib. xvi.), and by Dioscorus Siculus (lib. iii. Edit. Rhodoman.). Pliny also (Nat. Hist. lib. xii. 48.) speaks of it as being a native of Arabia ; and it is enumerated among the fragrant productions of that country by Dionysius, in his Periegesis. Saba was far to the south, in the Arabian peninsula.]

CALAMUS SCRIPTORIUS, a reed answering the purpose of a pen to write with. The ancients used styles, to write on tablets covered with wax ; but reeds to write on parchment, or papyrus. The Psalmist says (xlv. 1.) "My tongue is the pen of a ready writer." The Hebrew signifies rather a style. The third book of Maccabees says, that the writers employed in making a list of the Jews in Egypt, produced their reeds quite worn out. Baruch wrote his prophecies with ink (Jer. xxxvi. 4.) ; and, consequently, with reeds ; for it does not appear that quills were then used to write with. In 3 John 13, the apostle says, he did not design to write with pen (reed) and ink. This usage was common among the ancients.

The Arabians, Persians, Turks, Greeks, and Armenians, to this day, write with reeds, or rushes. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LXXIV. 8, 9.

CALCOL, כַּלְכַּל : who nourishes, consumes, and sustains the whole ; from כָּלָל calal, and כָּל cal, the whole.

I. CALCOL, fourth son of Mahol, famous for his wisdom, 1 Kings iv. 31.

II. CALCOL, son of Zerah, 1 Chron. ii. 6.

CALEB, or Kaleb, כִּלְב : a dog, or a crow, or a basket : otherwise, as the heart :

from the adverb כִּי ci, as, and לֵבָבִי lebab, the heart.

I. CALEB, son of Jephunneh, of Judah, was sent with Joshua, and others of Israel, to view the land of Canaan, Numb. xiii. They brought back some of its finest fruits as specimens of its productions; but some of the spies discouraged the people, who openly declared against the expedition. Joshua and Caleb encouraged them: but the people would have stoned them, had not the glory of the Lord appeared; and sentenced the whole multitude to die in the desert, except Joshua and Caleb, xiv. 1—10.

When Joshua had invaded and conquered great part of Canaan, Caleb with his tribe came to Gilgal, and asked for a particular possession. Joshua bestowed many blessings on him, and granted his request, Josh. xiv. 6—15.

Caleb, therefore, with his tribe, marched against Kirjath-arba (afterwards Hebron), took it, and killed three giants of the race of Anak; from thence he went to Debir, otherwise Kirjath-sepher. This place being extremely strong, Caleb promised to whoever took it his daughter Achsah to wife: it was taken by Othniel, son of Kenaz, Josh. xv. 13—19. Caleb is thought to have survived Joshua.

[II. CALEB, son of Hur. His sons were Shobal, Salma, and Hephre. His posterity peopled the whole country about Bethlehem, Kirjath-jearim, Beth Gader, &c. 1 Chron. ii. 50—55.]

III. CALEB, the name of a district in Judah, wherein were the cities of Kirjath-sepher and Hebron, belonging to the family of Caleb, 1 Sam. xxx. 14.

IV. CALEB, or Chelubi, son of Hesron, married first Azuba, and afterwards Ephrath, 1 Chron. ii. 9, 18, 24.

CALENDS, vide KALENDS.

[I. CALF, the young of a cow, of which there is frequent mention in Scripture, because calves were commonly used for sacrifices. A "calf of the herd" is probably so distinguished from a sucking calf. The fatted calf was a calf fatted particularly for some feast, Luke xv. 23.]

In Hos. xiv. 2, the expression, "we will render the calves of our lips," signifies sacrifices of praise, prayer, &c. The LXX. read "the fruit of our lips," instead of "the bulls of our lips;" as does the Syriac; and the apostle, Heb. xiii. 15.]

II. CALF, Golden, which the Israelites worshipped at the foot of mount Sinai, Exod. xxxii. 4. [Vide Addition to the article AARON.]

When the people saw that Moses delayed to come down from the mount, they assembled around Aaron, and said to him, "Up, make us gods which shall go before us." Aaron demanded their ear-rings; which were melted, and cast into the figure of a calf. When this was about to be consecrated, Moses, being divinely informed of it, came down from the mount, and calling on all who detested this sin, the sons of Levi armed themselves, and slew of the people, who were utterly unprovided to resist an enemy, about twenty-three thousand men: but the Hebrew, Samaritan, Chaldee, LXX. and the greater part of the old Greek and Latin Fathers, instead of 23,000, read 8000.

[There are some hints in the account of the golden calf, which are usually overlooked: as, 1. Aaron calls the calf in the plural, "gods" — "These are thy gods—they who brought thee out of Egypt." So the people say, "Make us gods," yet only one image was made.]

2. Observe, the second commandment forbids the making "TO THYSELF" any graven image; yet, in the instances of the cherubim, graven images were made; though not "to thyself" i. e. to any private individual, nor for the purpose of visible worship, but for interior emblems, in the most holy place, never seen by the people.

3. Observe, Aaron did not make this calf with his own hands, most probably; but committed it to some sculptor, who wrought not openly in the midst of the camp, but in his workshop. The Jews report, that the image was made into the form of a calf by some evil spirits who accompanied the Israelites from Egypt; and if they mean evil human spirits, they are right enough.] The sacred writers in succeeding ages plainly speak of the golden calf as a very great sin; vide Psalm cvi. 19, 20; Acts vii. 41; Deut ix. 16—21.

[4. Aaron, though greatly misled, must have meant by this worship, something more than the mere worship of the Egyptian calf, Apis; for in what sense had Apis "brought Israel out of the land of Egypt?" He would rather have kept them there, than have liberated them from thence. Jeroboam uses the very same language, 1 Kings xii. 28. It is strange, that so long after the Exodus, he should so strongly allude to that event, if Apis, an Egyptian deity, had been the object of his calves. Were his idols exposed to public view, so that whereas the cherubim at Jerusalem were unseen by worshippers, those at Dan, or at Bethel, were open to the inspection of all comers?]—Nevertheless, it is usually thought, that the Hebrews, on this occasion, imitated the worship of the god Apis, whom they had seen adored in Egypt, under the figure of a living bull; or of a bull made by art; or of a man with a bull's head; for several of the Fathers, speaking of the golden calf, express themselves as if this figure had only the head of a calf, or bull. Aureum caput bovis, says Lactantius; bibulum caput, says Tertullian; X x 2 and, conflatum est bibulum caput. Vide APIS, and FRAGMENTS, No. CVIII; also PLATE xlv. Nos. 8; 14; and 87.

The LXX. say, in Exod. xxxii. 4, that Aaron described the calf with a graving tool, but that the PEOPLE MADE AND CAST IT. Some Jews are of opinion, that a wooden calf was formed, which was covered with golden plates.

The Chaldee paraphrast says, "Aaron received the ear-rings, tied them up in purses, and made the golden calf of them." Bochart maintains, that this is the best translation, and that the Hebrew charet signifies a purse, and not a graving-tool. Vide AARON, and FRAGMENTS, No. I. with the hints on the CHERUB, passim.

Monceau, in his Aaron purgatus, has endeavoured to shew, that the golden calf made by Aaron resembled the cherubim, on which, as he supposes, the Lord sat when he appeared to Moses, on mount Sinai. These cherubim, by his account, were winged oxen, such as Moses afterwards made to the mercy-seat. He adds, that Aaron's sin consisted not so much in making the golden calf, as in giving the people an opportunity of a superstitious and idolatrous worship, and of transferring to a figure the worship due to God alone. He is of opinion, also, that the golden calves made by Jeroboam, after the separation of the ten tribes, were cherubim, and that neither Jeroboam nor the ten tribes forsook the worship of the Lord, but only made a schism, by separating from their brethren, who at Jerusalem worshipped the same God seated on the cherubim, whom the other tribes adored as seated on the golden calves, at Dan and Bethel.

CALVES, Golden, of Jeroboam, son of Nebat. This prince having been acknowledged king by Israel, to separate the ten tribes the more effectually from the house of David, he provided for them new gods, which they might worship in their own country, without going to the temple at Jerusalem, 1 Kings xii. 26, 27, 28. "He made two calves of gold, and said, Behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt! And he set the one in Bethel, and the other put he in Dan, at the two extremities of his kingdom. And this thing became a sin; for the people went to worship before these calves to Dan and to Bethel."

We have observed, that Monceau thought these golden calves of Jeroboam were imitations of the cherubim, and that they occasioned rather a schismatic than an idolatrous worship; and it is admitted that all Israel did not renounce the worship of the Lord, by adopting that of the golden calves, and by ceasing to go up to Jerusalem. God did not altogether abandon Israel; but sent them prophets, and preserved a great number of faithful worshippers. Elijah complains bitterly to God, that "The children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets," 1 Kings xix. 10. The God of Israel, therefore, had his prophets, his altars, and his worshippers, in Ahab's kingdom. Elijah, having assembled the people on mount Carmel, bids them choose the Lord or Baal: "If the Lord be God, follow him; but if Baal, then follow him," 1 Kings xviii. 21.

It is certain Jeroboam's golden calves were not images of Baal (see 1 Kings xvi. 31, 32; 2 Kings x. 28, 31.); neither does Elijah say, "Choose between these calves (as emblems of Apis), and Jehevah." Nevertheless, most commentators think Jeroboam designed, by his golden calves, to imitate the worship of Apis, which he had seen in Egypt, 1 Kings xi. 40. Scripture reproaches him frequently with having made Israel to sin; and when describing a bad prince, it says, he imitated the sin of Jeroboam. "Jeroboam drew Israel from following the Lord, and made them sin a great sin," 2 Kings xvii. 21. The prophet Ahijah tells this prince's wife, "Thou hast gone and made thee other gods and molten images, to provoke me to anger, and hast cast me behind thy back," 1 Kings xiv. 9. The prophets often exclaimed bitterly against the worship of these golden calves!

[We confess there were saints and prophets in Israel; but they did not worship the golden calves; either they went privately to the temple of Jerusalem, as Tobit tells us he did (chap. i. 5.); or they worshipped God in their own houses, probably under the direction of some prophet, as the woman of Shunam (2 Kings iv. 23.), who also seems to have attended on public prophetic exhortations, &c. on various occasions.]

The LXX. and the Greek Fathers, generally read (feminine) golden cows, instead of golden calves.

Josephus speaks of the temple of the golden calf as still in being in his time, somewhere towards Dan (not Daphne, as the printed copies read). He has omitted the history of the sin.

The glory of Israel was their God, their law, and their ark; but the adorers of the golden calves considered those idols as their glory: "The priests thereof rejoiced on it, for the glory thereof," Hosea x. 5. The prophets say to them in railery, "Ye who worship calves, come and sacrifice men," Hosea xiii. 2. Can there be any greater madness?—Ye adore calves, and sacrifice men to Moloch and Saturn. The LXX. give this passage another meaning, "They say, we want calves, sacrifice men." We have no more calves to sacrifice, let them bring men for that purpose: but the Hebrew may be interpreted, "Let them who would sacrifice, come and kiss, or adore, the calves," as the English translation.

Hosea foretold the destruction and captivity of the calves of Samaria: "Thy calf, O Samaria, hath cast thee off, mine anger is kindled against them. The calf of Samaria shall become as contemptible as spiders' webs, Hosea viii. 5, 6. The Assyrians, having taken Samaria, carried off the golden calves, with their worshippers. The Hebrew word, translated spiders' webs, is difficult. The LXX. translate, is deceitful, or misatien; Symmachus, is inconstant, or gone astray; the Rabbins, is as it were dust, sawdust; the generality of interpreters, is broken to pieces. Jerom was informed, by his Hebrew master, that it signified spiders' webs [gossamer], which float in the air, and are soon dispersed.

CALL, To, frequently signifies to be; but, perhaps, includes the idea of admitted to be, acknowledged to be, well known to be, the thing called; since men do not usually call a thing otherwise than what they conclude it is. "He shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the everlasting Father," &c. He shall possess all these qualities; he shall be truly the Wonderful, the Mighty God, &c. Isaiah ix. 6. "He shall be called the son of the Most High," Luke i. 35. He shall be truly so. So of John the Baptist, "Thou shalt be called the prophet of the Highest:"—Thou shalt be acknowledged under that character.

To CALL, in the sense of a vocation, to an employment; to the Christian religion. Paul says, he was called to the apostleship, Rom. i. 1. Jesus Christ says, "Many are called, but few are chosen, Matt. xx. 16.—We are exhorted "to live in a manner worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called." "Let every man abide in the calling wherewith he is called," Eph. iv. 1.

To CALL any thing by its name; to affix a name to it, is an act of authority: the father names his son; the master names his servant; "God calleth the stars by their names," Psalm cxlvii. 4.

To CALL on the name of God; to call him to our assistance, to entreat him in our necessities. "Enos began to call on the name of the Lord," Gen. iv. 26. Others translate, "The name of God was profaned," i. e. by giving it to idols. Vide ENOS. To CALL on God, sometimes signifies all the acts of religion, the whole public worship of God. "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord"—whosoever shall believe, trust, love, pray, &c. as he ought to do,—shall be saved," Rom. x. 13. God, in some sort, receives it as an honour that we should call on him; he is, in some sort, jealous of our adorations; he requires that we should call on no other God beside himself. "Call on me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee; and thou shalt glorify me," Psalm l. 15.

CALLISTHENES, Καλλισθένης: handsome; strength; from καλός, handsome, or great, and σθένος, strength, power.

CALLISTHENES, an officer of the king of Syria, who set fire to the temple-gates: he was put to death at the festival celebrated at Jerusalem, for the victories obtained over Antiochus's generals, by Judas Maccabeus, 2 Macc. viii. 38.

CALNEH, or Chalanne, כַּלְנֶה: our consumption, or all we; from כָּלָל calal, and the pronoun נֶחְ נוּ, ours: or, as murmuring; from לָן lun, to murmur, and the adverb כִּי ci, as: otherwise, he that abides, or sojourns.

CALNEH, a city in the land of Shinaar, built by Nimrod, and formerly the seat of his empire, Gen. x. 10. We believe it to be the Calno of Isaiah x. 9; and the Canneh of Ezek. xxvii. 23. It must have been situated in Mesopotamia, since these prophets join it with Haran, Eden, Assyria, and Chilmad, which traded with Tyre.

[The closed habitation, i. e. a town well secured on all sides.

The Greek and Vulgate read Chalanne. In Isa. x. 9, Jerom says, the Hebrew had Chalanno. It is written Calneh, Amos vi. 2. It is thought to be Ctesiphon, a noble city on the Tigris, in a district called Chalontitis, which agrees with the name Calneh. This is the opinion of the Jerusalem Targum, and of Jonathan; of Jerom, and of Eusebius; of Ephraim the Syrian, also; and of Abulpharagius. The Greek translators have added in Isaiah x. 9, "Chalene, where the tower was built." Vide the following article.]

CALNO, כַּלְנוּ: our consummation, from כָּלָה calah, or כָּלָל calal, whole, and נוּ no, ours.

[His consummation, or fulness: or his whole self.

CALNO, a city of Babylonia, Isaiah x. 9. Called also Calano.

Probably, the same as Calneh (Gen. x. 10.), built by Nimrod; and the Calneh of Amos vi. 2. called Canne, Ezek. xxvii. 23. It may imply, "the finished city," or city well closed, and secured with walls and other protections and necessities; well kept, as the Arabic root implies. But, we suspect, as it stands the last city in order of those built by Nimrod, that this circumstance is denoted in its name, Calah, "the completion," נֶחְ נוּ "of settled habitations;" as if it were, "last built town." Or it might be the town at the extremity, last district, of his dominions: "Border-town."]

CALPHI, קלפֿי: voice of the mouth; from קול kol, a voice, and פֿה pe, a mouth. Josephus calls him Casphe, which may be derived from the Hebrew כֶּסֶף casaph, silver.

CALPHI, father of Judas. This last commanded part of the troops of Jonathan Maccabæus: and kept his ground, with three others, in a battle which Jonathan fought against the Syrians, in the plain of Nasor, near the lake of Genesareth, 1 Macc. xi. 70. ante A. D. 183.

CALVARY, or Golgotha, i. e. The place of a Skull. A little hill north of mount Sion, so called, probably, by reason of its similitude to the figure of a skull. Many of the ancients were of opinion, that this mountain was called Calvary, because the head of the first man (Adam) was buried there; and that our Saviour was crucified in the same place, that his blood running down on this first of mankind, he might thereby be restored to life, and receive the favour of a resurrection [as they supposed, among those raised at the death of Jesus].

Mount Calvary was near Jerusalem [vide the MAP OF JERUSALEM, PLATES, No. 90.], and was the place, in all probability, where criminals were commonly executed. When Barchochebas revolted against the Romans, Adrian, having taken Jerusalem, entirely destroyed that city, and settled a Roman colony there, calling it Ælia Capitolina. This new city was not built exactly on the ruins of the old, but to the north; so that mount Calvary, which before had been out of the city of Jerusalem, became almost the centre of the city of Ælia. Mount Sion, where the temple had stood, was either cultivated as a field, or covered with brambles and ruins.

Adrian profaned mount Calvary, and particularly the place where Jesus had been crucified, and his body buried: but the empress Helena, mother to Constantine the Great, erected there a stately church (which is still in being); so that the sepulchre of Christ, and Calvary, are more honoured by Christians, than Jerusalem had ever been by the sons of the synagogue. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXXVIII. et al.

CAMBYSES, son of Cyrus, succeeded his father, A. M. 3475, ante A. D. 529. He was violent, passionate, and cruel. When he came to the crown, the Samaritans, who in the reign of Cyrus had ventured to attack the Jews only indirectly, now opposed them openly, and wrote to Cambyses, whom they call Ahasuerus (Ezra iv. 6.), to solicit orders, prohibiting the Jews from proceeding in rebuilding their temple. What motives they urged, we cannot tell; but it is certain that Cambyses suspended the works, during the remaining seven years and five months of his life.

In the second year of his reign, he prepared to make war against Egypt. After five years' continuance in that country, he was obliged to leave it, in order to return to Babylon, where the Magus, Pathizites, had placed his own brother Smerdis on the throne, pretending he was Smerdis the brother of Cambyses. Cambyses was at Ecbatane in Palestine, at the foot of mount Carmel, when this news was brought him. In transports of rage, he mounted his horse with precipitation; and his sword, accidentally falling out of its scabbard, wounded him in the thigh. Twenty days after this accident, when near the point of death, he called the principal men of Persia about him, and told them, he had formerly put to death his brother Smerdis, and that he who now reigned under that name was an impostor. He died at Ecbatane, as an oracle had foretold; not at Ecbatane in Media, as he had imagined, but at Ecbatane in Syria.

[What Ezekiel says (chap. xxxviii. xxxix.), of the wars of Gog and Magog against Israel, and the judgments of God against the enemies of his people, CALMET thinks may be referred to the time of Cambyses. Also, what the prophets say of the misfortunes of the Israelites, after their return from captivity. See Joel ii. 30, 31; iii. 2, 3, 4, 5, 15, 16; Isa. xli. 15, 16; Micah iv. 11, 12, 13. Some authors refer the history of Judith to the time of Cambyses.]

CAMEL, an animal common in the East, in Arabia, Judea, &c. Called גמל gamal in Scripture. Moses ranks it among unclean creatures, Deut. xiv. 7. We may distinguish three sorts of camels. Some are large and full of flesh, fit only to carry burdens (it is said 1000 pounds weight). Others, which have two hunches on the back like a natural saddle, are fit either to carry burdens, or to be ridden. A third kind, leaner and smaller, are called dromedaries, because of their swiftness: these are generally used by men of quality to ride on.

The Arabians, Persians, and others, eat the flesh of camels, and it is served up at the best tables of the country. These animals keep water long in their stomach, for their refreshment: nature having given them a very large ventricle, round about which are many bags inclosed within the coats, wherein, it is very probable, these animals keep water in reserve. It is confidently said, they will continue ten or twelve days without eating or drinking. [But what is said of these bags in the stomach of camels, and their reserving water in them, has been contradicted by some anatomists, who, perhaps, dissecting subjects long used to the constant supply of water which they had enjoyed in England, might find some diminution in the powers of the ventricles, or the structure of the stomach.]

When a camel is born, the breeders tie his four feet under his belly, and a carpet over his back. Thus they teach him the habit of bending his knees to rest himself; or when being loaded, or unloaded. The camel has a large solid foot, but not a hard one. In the spring of the year all his hair falls off in less than three days' time, and his skin remains quite naked. At this time the flies are extremely troublesome to him. He is dressed with a switch, instead of a curry-comb; and beat as one would beat a carpet, to clear it of dust. On a journey, his master goes before him piping, singing, and whistling; and the louder he sings, the better the camel follows. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXII. Also the NAT. HIST. and PLATE, No. vi.

[Our Lord's words (Matt. xix. 24.), "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven," have given rise to much discussion. Theophylact, with many ancient, and some modern commentators, read κάμιλον, or at least interpret κάμηλον, a cable, as does Whitby. But Euthymius, and some ancient versions, with Grotius, Erasmus, Drusius, Lightfoot, Michaëlis, Rosenmüller, and Kuinoel, contend that the κάμηλον is to be retained. Campbell has well defended the common reading; and the Rabbinical citations adduced by Lightfoot, Schoetgen, and others, prove that there was a similar proverb in use among the Jews: "Perhaps thou art one of the Pampeditians, who can make an elephant pass through the eye of a needle;" that is, says the Aruch, who speak things impossible. But the very proverb itself is found in the Koran: "The impious shall find the gates of heaven shut; nor shall he enter there, till a camel shall pass through the eye of a needle." The design of our Lord was evidently to hint to the rich their danger, in order that they may exert themselves to surmount the peculiar temptations by which they are assailed; and learn not to trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God.

In Matt. xxiii. 24, is another proverbial expression, which also has been much misunderstood: "Ye strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel." Dr. A. Clarke has shewn, that here is an error of the press in the English translation, in which at has been substituted for out. The expression alludes to the Jewish custom of filtering wine, for fear of swallowing any insect forbidden by the law as unclean; and is applied to those who are superstitiously anxious in avoiding smaller faults, yet do not scruple to commit the greater sins. To make the antithesis as strong as may be, two things are selected as opposite as possible; the smallest insect, and the largest animal.]

CAMEL'S HAIR. Vide III. HAIR.

CAMELO-PARDUS, or Camelo-Pardalus, an animal like a camel in some respects, i. e. in form; and like a panther in other respects, i. e. in colours, or spots. The Hebrews were allowed it as food by Moses, Deut. xiv. 5, 6.

The Camelo-Pardalus is the giraffe, an animal found in the East Indies, beyond the Ganges; also in Africa, though rarely in the north of that continent. Bochart is of opinion that Moses did not intend the Giraffe, or camelo-pardus, because the residence of these animals is in countries too remote. Moreover, the camel being unclean, it is not likely the giraffe should be allowed. He thinks the Hebrew zamor, signifies a wild goat. Others translate it an elk. Vide CHAMOIS, and FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXXXVIII.

CAMON, קמון: his resurrection; from קם kum, resurrection, and the pronoun ך an, his.

[The name denotes strong consistence; or, a place which is firm and stable. Perhaps, it implies what we call a strong soil, if taken from the nature of the country: but if it commemorates a person, it may denote the "firm aun," or "resurrection of aun:" i. e. of the generator.]

I. CAMON, a city on this side Jordan, in the great plain, six miles from Legio, inclining north. Perhaps Cadmon.

II. CAMON, a city beyond Jordan, in the country of Gilead. Probably the Camon mentioned by Polybius, taken by king Antiochus. Jair, judge of Israel, was buried in Camon, belonging to Manasseh, on the other side Jordan, Judg. x. 5.

CAMPFIRE. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCCCXLV.

CANA, קנה: zeal, or jealousy; from קנא kinna: otherwise, possession; from קנה: otherwise, lamentation; from קן kun: otherwise, the nest; from קנן kinen: otherwise, cane, or staff.

[1. Cana, the greater, in Asher, Josh. xiv. 14. xix. 28.

2. Cana, the lesser, in Zebulun, John ii. 1, 11; iv. 46. Cana of Galilee; see below.

3. Cana, a brook in the confines of Ephraim and Manasseh, Josh. xvi. 8; xvii. 9.

It is very probable that this name describes the nature of the place to which it is applied; "Reed-town"—"Reed-brook:" especially, as it is said actually to abound in reeds, at present; as Groebenius, a noble Prussian, has observed of the second Cana (Itinerar. cap. 33.); and says, he was eye-witness of this particular. q. Whether these were of the species of reed used for writing with, which abounded in some of the marshes of Syria?]

CANA, in Galilee, a little town, where Jesus is, by some, thought to have performed his first miracle, John ii. 12, &c. It is said to lie between Sephoris and Nazareth, six miles west from Sephoris. In the same district we meet with Sepher-Cana, four miles from Nazareth, northward. Josephus mentions a town called Cana, but we should take this to be Kenath.

[CANA (in Galilee), says D'Arvieux, was formerly a city, but is now a village almost deserted. Here is a church built by Helena, in the place where the marriage feast (John ii. 1.) was held. It is a building of wrought stones, now very old, and is divided by a great court. That to the right was the church, forty paces long, and twenty wide: the roof supported by a row of columns. This is still entire, but used as a mosque, when the village was fully inhabited. To the left, apparently, was the residence of the ecclesiastics, &c. On the door of the court are sculptured vases, like those of antiquity, alluding to those which held the water changed into wine.]

CANAAN, כַּנְעַן merchant, trader: otherwise, he that humbles and subdues, from כָּנַע cana; otherwise, he that answers thus, or, that afflicts; from כָּאֵן cen, thus, and אָנָה ana, to answer, or to afflict.

[Some think it denotes "a deep humiliation;" that is, either of his mother while pregnant, or of the enemy, or of strangers. That the Canaanites were dealers and traffickers is certain; but other nations were no less so: and as this word seems to imply, to lay low, to lay on the ground (as traffickers who remove from place to place deposit their wares to display them), we rather think Canaan, at his birth, was, by some incident, himself "laid on the ground," and derived his name from such an occurrence. This might easily happen, either in a tent, while such was the residence of his mother; or on a journey, if he were born while she was travelling. Comp. Gen. xxv. 16. In this acceptance, his name would import "the groundling." Otherwise, this name must have been given to him after his mode of trafficking had been remarked, and had become descriptive of his person and character. "Groundling," as a name of character, would be derogatory in our acceptance: but there is no need for supposing this intention in the eastern acceptance: more probably, the direct contrary.]

I. CANAAN, son of Ham. The Hebrews believe that Canaan having first discovered Noah's nakedness, told his father Ham: and that Noah, when he awoke, having understood what had passed, cursed Canaan, the first reporter of his exposure. Others are of opinion, that Noah, knowing nothing more displeasing to Ham, than cursing of Canaan, resolved to punish him in his son, Gen. ix. 25. Some, instead of "cursed be Canaan," read, "cursed be Ham;" and others, "cursed be the father of Canaan." Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XIX.

The posterity of Canaan was numerous. His eldest son Sidon founded the city of Sidon, and was father of the Sidonians and Phœnicians. Canaan had ten other sons, fathers of as many tribes, dwelling in Palestine and Syria, viz. the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, Girgasites, Hivites, Arkites, Simites, Arvadites, Zemarites, Hamathites. It is believed that Canaan lived and died in Palestine, which from him was called the land of Canaan. His tomb, twenty-five feet in length, was shewn in a cave on the mountain of Leopards, not far from Jerusalem.

[II. CANAAN, land of. This country has, at different times, been called by various names; derived either from its inhabitants, or from the extraordinary circumstances attached to it. (1.) The land of Canaan, from Canaan, son of Ham, who settled here after the confusion of Babel, and divided the country among his eleven children, each of whom became the head of a numerous tribe, and ultimately became a distinct nation, Gen. x. 15. &c. (2.) The land of Promise (Heb. xi. 9.), from the promise given to Abraham that his posterity should possess it (Gen. xii. 7; xiii. 15.); who being termed Hebrews, this region was thence called the land of the Hebrews, Gen. xl. 15. (3.) The land of Israel, from the Israelites, or posterity of Jacob, having settled themselves there. This name is of frequent occurrence in the Old Testament. In its larger acceptance, it comprehended all that tract of ground on each side of the Jordan, which God gave for an inheritance to the children of Israel. (4.) The land of Judah. Under this appellation was at first comprised only that part of the region which was allotted to the tribe of Judah; but in subsequent times, when this tribe excelled the others in dignity, it was applied to the whole land. After the separation of the ten tribes, that portion of the land which belonged to Judah and Benjamin, who formed a separate kingdom, was distinguished by the appellation of "the land of Judah," or of Judea; which latter name the whole country retained during the existence of the second temple, and under the dominion of the Romans. (5.) The Holy Land. This name does not appear to have been used by the Hebrews themselves, till after the Babylonish captivity, when it is applied to the land by the prophet Zechariah (ii. 12.).

The land of Canaan was supposed by the Jews to be peculiarly holy, inasmuch as it furnished holy offerings for the temple: but not all parts of it indiscriminately. They supposed also, that neither the Shechinah, nor the sacred spirit, dwelt on any person, even a prophet, out of this land. In Canaan, say the Rabbins (Sheviith, cap. ix. hal. 2.) are three countries, Judea, the region beyond Jordan, and Galilee. This division designedly excludes Samaria, which, as a country, was considered as unclean by reason of its inhabitants. Its land, waters, dwellings, and paths, were clean. Hieros. Avod. Zara, fol. 44. 4. (6.) Palestine, by which name the whole land appears to have been called in the time of Moses (Exod. xv. 14.), is derived from the Philistines, a people who migrated from Egypt, and having expelled the aboriginal inhabitants, settled on the borders of the Mediterranean, where they became so considerable, as to give their name to the whole country, though they in fact possessed only a small part of it. By heathen writers, the Holy land has been variously termed, Syrian Palestine, Syria, and Phœnicia. Vide Reland. Palest. cap. i.

The boundaries of this country are, the Mediterranean sea on the west; Lebanon and Syria on the north; Arabia Deserta, and the land of the Ammonites, Moabites, and Midianites, on the east; the river of Egypt, or of the Wilderness, the Desert of Zin, the southern shore of the Dead Sea, and the river Arnon on the south; and Egypt on the south-west. Near mount Lebanon stood the city of Dan, and near the southern extremity of the land, Beersheba; hence the expression "from Dan to Beersheba," to denote the whole length of the land of Canaan. Its extreme length was about 170 miles, and its width about 80. By the Abrahamic covenant, recorded in Gen. xv. 18, the original grant of land to the Israelites, was "from the river of Egypt to the Euphrates." The boundaries of it are most accurately described by Moses in Numb. xxxiv. 1—16.

The land of Canaan has been variously divided. Under Joshua it was apportioned out to the twelve tribes; under Solomon it was divided into twelve provinces (1 Kings iv. 7—19.); and upon the accession of Rehoboam to the throne, it was divided into the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah. After this period, the land fell into the hands of the Babylonians, the Greeks, the Syrians, and the Romans. During the time of our Saviour it was under the dominion of the last-mentioned people, and was divided into five provinces, viz. Galilee, Samaria, Judæa, Peræa, and Idumæa, for a description of which see their respective articles. Peræa was again divided into seven cantons, viz. Abilene, Trachonitis, Ituræa, Gaulonitis, Batanæa, Peræa, and Decapolis, which see.

The Israelites do not appear to have restricted themselves to this country: and in the time of the kings, their power extended over distant districts. On their return from Babylon, they did not regain the whole land; not even the whole of what was marked by the boundary line of Moses: the district south of Gaza, and of a line drawn from Gaza to Kadesh-Barnea, was excluded from the national territory.

The Idumeans, also, during the Babylonish captivity, had encroached, and settled themselves in many towns on the south of Judah; so that Idumæa was considered as divided into the greater and the lesser; or the upper and the lower: but, these being subdued by Hyrcanus, (Joseph. Ant. lib. xiii. cap. 17.), the inhabitants embraced Judaism, and were afterwards reckoned as Jews. Palestine, says Pomponius Mela, was divided into five countries: Idumæa, Judea, Samaria, Galilee, and beyond Jordan.

Moses draws a line from Sidon to Lasha, and from Sidon to Gaza: in like manner, the Rabbins draw a line "from the mountains of Amara, to the river of Egypt; whatever is within that line belongs to the land of Israel; but, whatever is without that line, is without the land;" their meaning is, that the islands in the Mediterranean, as Arvad, Tyre, &c. never were occupied by the Hebrew nation. These appear to have been strongly fortified, and not only inhabited by a hardy race of people, but capable of being supplied by sea, with reinforcements, and necessities of all kinds, so that they resisted the power of the Israelites: and the conquest of them is particularly boasted of by a subsequent invader. Vide 2 Kings xviii. 34; xix. 18; and FRAGMENTS, No. DXXXVIII.

The surface of the land of Canaan is beautifully diversified with mountains and plains, rivers and vallies, and must have presented a delightful appearance when the Jewish nation was in its prosperity, and the whole land under the special providence of God. The principal mountains are, Lebanon, Carmel, Tabor, the mountains of Israel, Gilead, and Hermon; the mount of Olives, Calvary, Sion, and Moriah. Of the valleys, those of Hinnom, Jehoshaphat, Siddim, Rephaim, and of Mamre, are the most considerable. The plain of the Mediterranean, of Esdraelon, and the region round about Jordan, are celebrated as the scenes of many important events. The chief rivers, &c. of Canaan are the Jordan, the Arnon, the Sihor, the Jabbok, the Bezor or river of Egypt, the Kishon, the Kedron, the lake Asphaltites or the Dead Sea, and the lake of Tiberias or the sea of Galilee. For a description of these, see their respective articles.

The land of Canaan is situated in the fifth climate, between the 31st and 34th degrees of north latitude: hence it will naturally be ex pected, that the heat during the summer should be intense. The surface of the land, however, being so greatly diversified with mountains and plains, renders the climate unequal and variable. On the south, it is sheltered by lofty mountains, which separate it from the sandy deserts of Arabia. Breezes from the Mediterranean cool it on the west side. Mount Lebanon keeps off the north wind, while mount Hermon intercepts the north-east. During the summer season, in the interior of the country, particularly in the plains of Esdraelon and Jericho, the heat is intense. Generally speaking, however, the atmosphere is mild; the summers are commonly dry, the days extremely hot, but the nights sometimes intensely cold.

The soil of Canaan was of the richest description; a fine mould, without stones, and almost without a pebble. Dr. Shaw informs us, that it rarely requires more than one pair of beeves to plough it.

Moses speaks of Canaan as of the finest country in the world—a land flowing with milk and honey. Profane authors also speak of it much in the same manner. Hecateus (apud Joseph. contr. Ap. p. 1049.) who had been brought up with Alexander the Great, and who wrote in the time of Ptolemy I. mentions this country as very fruitful and well-peopled, an excellent province, that bore all kinds of good fruit. Pliny gives a similar description of it; and says Jerusalem was not only the most famous city of Judea, but of the whole east. He describes the course of the Jordan, as of a delicious river; he speaks advantageously of the lake of Gennesareth, of the balm of Judea, its palm-trees, &c. Tacitus (Hist. lib. xv. cap. 6.), Ammianus Marcellinus, and most of the ancients, who have mentioned Canaan, have spoken of it with equal commendations. The Mahometans speak of it extravagantly. They tell us, that besides the two principal cities of the country, Jerusalem and Jericho, this province had a thousand villages, each of which had many fine gardens. That the grapes were so large, that five men could hardly carry a cluster of them, and that five men might hide themselves in the shell of one pomegranate! That this country was anciently inhabited by giants of the race of Amalek.

Notwithstanding these testimonies of the ancients, we find people very incredulous as to the fruitfulness of the Holy Land. Travellers who now visit it, generally speak little to its advantage. The country, they say, appears to be dry and barren, ill watered, and has but few cultivated plains. Strabo (lib. xvi.) among the ancients, speaks of it with contempt. He says, that this province is so barren, that it moves no body's envy, that there is no need of fighting for it, in order to obtain it, and that Jerusalem stands on a dry and barren spot. Jerom was an eye-witness of it, and very well acquainted with those qualities which Scripture ascribes to it. He says that Canaan is full of mountains, that dryness and drought are very common, that they had only rain-water, which they caught, and preserved in cisterns, which supplied the absence of fountains. Yet Jerom, speaking of the fertility of Canaan, says no country could dispute with it in fruitfulness. Modern travellers who notice the present sterility, do not deny that it still preserves traces of its ancient fecundity in some places, which produce all sorts of fruits almost without culture. In other places the herbs grow with great profusion, and to an extraordinary height. If some mountains, and some plains, are barren, it is because they are but little cultivated, for want of inhabitants. How many other countries, heretofore renowned for fertility, are now reduced to barren and dreadful wildernesses! For an account of the seasons and productions of Canaan, vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CCCCLIV.—CCCCLXVIII.]

CANAANITES, people descended from Canaan. Their first habitation was in the land of Canaan, where they multiplied extremely. Trade and war were their principal occupations; by these they gained great riches, and settled colonies over almost all the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean. When the measure of their idolatries and abominations was completed, God delivered their country into the hands of the Israelites, who conquered it under Joshua. He destroyed great numbers, and obliged the rest to fly, some into Africa, others into Greece.

Procopius says, they first retreated into Egypt; but gradually advanced into Africa, where they built many cities, and spread themselves over those vast regions, which reach to the Straits, preserving their old language, with little alteration. This author adds, that in the ancient city of Tingis (Tangiers), founded by them, were two great pillars of white stone, near a large fountain, inscribed in Phœnician characters, "We are people preserved by flight from that robber Jesus (Joshua), the son of Nave, who pursued us." In Athanasius's time, the Africans continued to say, they were descended from the Canaanites; and when asked their origin, they answered Canani. It is agreed, that the Punic tongue was nearly the same as the Canaanitish and Hebrew. [And this seems to be confirmed beyond question, by several ancient inscriptions found at Malta, which are in Phœnician characters; but may be read by means of the Hebrew.]

The colonies which Cadmus carried to Thebes, in Boeotia, and his brother Cilex into Cilicia, were from the stock of Canaan. Sicily, Sardinia, Malta, Cyprus, Corfu, Majorca and Minorca, Gades and Ebusus, are thought to have been peopled by Canaanites. Bochart, in his Canaan, has set this matter in a good light.

[Not only the Hebrews gave this name to the Canaanites, but the Canaanites themselves adopted it: as appears from inscriptions on Phœnician coins, in Phœnician letters (first read by Dr. Swinton of Oxford), on one of which, in Gent. Mag. Dec. 1760, we have "Laodicea, mother in Canaan;" wherein we also remark, that this city claims the dignity of (AM) metropolis, or mother, like certain others which we read of in Scripture. This removes an error of Bochart, who imagined that the Canaanites were ashamed of the name of their ancestor, by reason of his unfilial conduct (Gen. ix. 22, 25.); but, the latter verse certainly was not originally intended to punish particularly the conduct of Canaan, but that of his father Ham; accordingly some copies of LXX. read, "cursed be Ham;" and the Arabic reads, "cursed be the father of Canaan."

We read in the life of Abraham (Gen. xii. 6; xiii. 7.), that the Canaanites were then in the land, which is explained in FRAGMENTS, No. DCLIII. It appears also, that Esau took to wife two Canaanitish women (Gen. xxxvi. 2.); which implies that the parents and relations of these women were Canaanites, as Anah and Zibeon (verses 24, 25.), though of Hittite, or Hivite families. We must, therefore, make a distinction between the ancient Canaanites, who first inhabited this country, and those Canaanites who were destroyed, or expelled, by Joshua; the latter, being in fact, recent interlopers, and of the same eastern origin as the Egyptian kings, of that newly introduced race which "knew not Joseph." It is probable, that there was a considerable indisposition in the minds of the descendants of the old Canaanites towards their recent masters, which was no disadvantage to the arms of Joshua. Rahab, most likely, was not the only one of the old race who was desirous of seeing the country revert to those to whom it had been originally allotted.]

CANDACE, Κανδάκη: who possesses contrition; from קָנָה kanah, to possess, to enjoy, and דָּכָא dacah, to crush: according to the Syriac and Hebrew, pure possession; [this word being foreign, its etymology should not be sought in the Hebrew.]

CANDACE, an Ethiopian queen, whose eunuch, having been at Jerusalem to worship, was met, and being converted, was baptized, by Philip the Deacon, near Bethsufa, as he was returning to his own country. Acts viii. 27.

Vide PHILIP. It is said queen Candace was converted by her eunuch. [It is thought that Candace, or Chendaqui, was the general name for the queens of Ethiopia; as Pharaoh was of the kings of Egypt; or Cæsar of those of Rome.]

"There is a tradition at Chendi, that a woman whose name was Hendaqué, once governed all that country; whence we might imagine that this was part of the kingdom of Candace; for writing this name in Greek letters, it will come to no other than Hendaqué, the native or mistress of Chendi, or Chandi. However this may be, Chendi was once a town of great resort. The caravans of Sennaar, Egypt, Suakem, and Kordofan, all were in use to rendezvous here, especially since the Arabs have cut off the road by Dongola, and the desert of Bahiouda, Bruce's Travels, vol. iv. p. 529.]

CANDLESTICK of gold, with seven branches. (Vide TEMPLE, and FRAGMENTS, No. CXXXIII.)

CANE. Vide CALAMUS AROMATICUS.

[CANKER-WORM. Our translators have rendered the Hebrew יֵלֶק ilek, canker-worm, in Joel i. 4; ii. 25; Nah. iii. 15; and caterpillar, in Psalms cv. 34; Jer. li. 27. Being frequently mentioned with the locust, it is thought by some to be a species of that insect. In Nahum it is said to have wings, and to fly; to encamp in the hedges by day, and commit its depredations by night. The LXX. interpret it, the bruchus, or hedge-chaffer.]

CANNEH, כֶּנֶף, Xavaán: a base; from כָּן cen: otherwise, rectitude; from כָּן con, or כָּן cen.

CANNEH, Ezck. xxvii. 23, probably Calneh (Gen. x. 10.), which see.

CANON. This Greek term signifies the rule. It is used in ecclesiastical language, to signify a rule concerning faith, discipline, or manners; also to distinguish those books of Scripture which are received as inspired, and indisputable, from profane, apocryphal, or disputed books. Vide BIBLE.

The Hebrews admit twenty-two books into their canon, or, at most, twenty-four, supposing Ruth to be separated from the Judges, and the Lamentations from Jeremiah. They believe generally, that the canon of Scripture was not closed, nor the number of inspired books fixed, till Ezra, with the consent of the general council of the nation, collected all the books which were acknowledged as sacred and inspired, composed one body of them, and regulated what we call the second canon of Scripture; since which time the Jews have not admitted any book as canonical; this we learn from Josephus. Dr. Prideaux, with great appearance of reason, says, it is more likely that the two books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, as well as Malachi, were afterwards added, in the time of Simon the Just, and that it was not till then that the Jewish canon of the holy Scriptures was fully completed. Vide CONNECT. Part i. Book 5.

Genebrard and Serranus are of opinion, that, after Ezra, the Jews of the great synagogue admitted into their canon books which were composed after this time, such as Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Tobit, Judith, and Maccabees; nevertheless, they did not obtain authority equal to that of the old ones. But this is not without difficulty; for first, the books of Tobit and Judith might be written before the captivity; secondly, if the Jews thought them inspired, why did they not receive them into the canon as of equal authority with the rest?

It may be, perhaps, suspected, that the Jews, who retained the Hebrew tongue, might exclude these books from the canon, because they were not written [extant] in Hebrew, the sacred language: but they received Daniel and Ezra, wherein are large passages written in Chaldee: now Ecclesiasticus, Tobit, Judith, and at least the first book of Maccabees, were originally written in this language, yet they do not appear to have been received into the canon.

If particular churches have sometimes deliberated whether they should admit certain writings among the sacred books; if some doctors and councils have not included them in their catalogues of the Scriptures; and if others have rejected them; such conduct is proof of the great circumspection which was used in receiving into its canon only what really was deemed to be authentic and inspired. This very hesitation should convince us, that if at last those books were received, that determination was founded on good reasons. Time was necessary to examine, to be well assured, and to fix the doubts of particular churches.

CANTHARA, Simon, son of Simon Boethus, was advanced to the dignity of high priest, by favour of Agrippa the Great. He succeeded Theophilus, son of Jonathan; and enjoyed this dignity about two years, at two several times. After the death of Agrippa, Herod, king of Chalcis, deprived him of his office, to confer it on Joseph, son of Camith.

I. CANTICLES, or Songs. The Hebrews frequently composed songs on important occasions; Moses composed one after the passage of the Red Sea, in honour of that miracle, Exod. xv. David composed a mournful song on the death of Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 17.); another on the death of Abner, iii. 33. Jeremiah wrote his Lamentations, a song, or series of songs, wherein he deplores the ruin of Jerusalem: he wrote others on the death of Josiah, king of Judah, 2 Chron. xxxv. 25. Deborah and Barak made a triumphant hymn after the defeat of Sisera (Judg. v.); and Judith after the defeat of Holofernes, Judith xvi.

Hannah, the mother of Samuel, also king Hezekiah, returned thanks to God in solemn hymns, and spiritual songs, 1 Sam. ii.; Isa. xxxviii. 9. The Canticles, composed by the Virgin Mary, by Zachariah, and by old Simeon, are of the same nature. In 1 Kings iv. 32, we read that Solomon composed 1005 songs; but we have only remaining, his Song of Songs. [Josephus construes it five thousand odes: but the generality of interpreters explain it by five thousand pieces in verse; or, by five thousand verses.]

II. CANTICLES, the Book of, in Hebrew, שִׁיר הַשִּׁירִים shir hashirim, the song of songs. It is believed, that Solomon composed it on occasion of his marriage with the king of Egypt's daughter; but according to most commentators, it is a continued allegory, wherein a divine and spiritual marriage between the Redeemer and his church is expressed.

Seven nights and seven days are distinctly marked in this song (because weddings among the Hebrews were celebrated seven days); and it relates poetically the transactions of these seven days. The Hebrews, apprehending it might be understood grossly, forbade the reading it by any person before the age of thirty.

The church, as well as the synagogue, received this book generally as canonical. If it be objected, that neither Christ nor his apostles have cited it, and that the name of God is not found in it, we answer, that there are several other sacred books which our Saviour has not quoted; and that in an allegory, wherein the Son of God is concealed under the figure of a husband, it is not necessary that he should be expressed by his proper name: it would then cease to be an allegory. Vide in the FRAGMENTS, Nos. cccxlv. ccccliii. an attempt to establish a new arrangement of the Canticles.

CAPERNAUM, Καπερναούμ: field of repentance, or city of comfort; from כפר cepher, a village, or city; and נחם nacham, repentance: otherwise, propitiation of the penitent, from the same: otherwise, town of pleasure, handsome city; from נעוּם naum, handsome, and כפר cepher, a field.

[Rather, the village of Naum: or, taking the word Naum as descriptive, "the pleasant village." Josephus (de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 35.) relates, that an excellent spring, which watered the country of Gennesar, was called Capernaum, by the people around it. It is probable, that this was a pleasant spot, and that from the same character, the town Capernaum also derived its appellation. William of Tyre (lib. x. cap. 26.), mentions another Capernaum, on the coast of the Mediterranean sea, not very far from Dor.]

CAPERNAUM, a city celebrated in the gospels, where our Saviour principally abode, during the three years of his preaching. It lay west on the borders of the lake of Genesareth, Matt. iv. 13; Mark ii. 1; John vi. 17. We do not exactly know its situation: but it appears to have been not far from Bethsaida. It existed in the seventh and eighth centuries, as appears by the travels of Adamnanus, and St. Willibaldus. Our Saviour preached frequently, and wrought many miracles here; but the inhabitants were little the better; wherewith he reproaches them, Matt. xi. 23. At Capernaum, Jesus Christ called Matthew, Matt. ix. 9.

CAPHAR, כַּפָּר, in Hebrew, signifies a field, or village; for which reason we often find it in composition with other words, as a proper name, and sometimes annexed to the name of a city; because what had been a village, when augmented, becomes a city.

CAPHAR-SALAMA, or Caphar-Sarama; the same, perhaps, as Caphar-Scmelia: not far from Jerusalem, 1 Macc. vii. 31. Afterwards called Antipatris.

[Probably "village of tranquillity," i. e. of peaceful, or safe retirement.]

CAPHAR-SOREK. In Jerom's time there was a town of this name, north of Eleutheropolis, near Saraa. It is thought to have been named from the brook, or valley of Sorek, where Delilah lived, Judg. xvi. 4.

CAPHTOR, or Caphtorim, כַּפְתֹּרִים: spheres, buckles, hands, palms, doves, or those that seek and enquire; from כָּף caph, a sphere, &c. and תֹּר thur, to enquire, or a turtle-dove.

CAPHTOR, whence came the Caphtorim (Deut. ii. 23.): otherwise called Cretim, Cherethim, or Philistines. The generality of interpreters believe, that Caphtoris signifies Cappadocia; and that the Philistines and Cherethim came from thence: but others think they were originally from the isle of Crete. The reasons for which are these: the Philistines were strangers in Palestine; this the Scripture observes expressly: and the LXX. always translate this name ἀλλοφύλοι, strangers. Their proper name is Cherethim, as appears, Ezek. xxv. 16, "I will stretch out mine hand upon the Philistines, and I will cut off the Cherethim:" also Zeph. ii. 5, "Wo unto the inhabitants of the sea coast, the Cherethites:" and 1 Sam. xxx. 14, 15, "The Amalekites made an irruption into the country of the Cherethites;" that is, of the Philistines, as the sequel proves. Afterwards, the kings of Judah had foreign guards, called Cherethites and Pelethites, who were Philistines.

The LXX. by the name of Cherethites, understood the Cretans, and by Chereth, Crete. Scripture says, the Philistines came from the isle of Caphtor. Now, we see no island in the Mediterranean, to which the marks whereby the Scripture describes Caphtor and the Cherethim, agree better than to the isle of Crete. The name Cherethim, is the same with Cretenses. We know a river there called Kairat; we know of the goddess Ceres; of the Curetes, who brought up Jupiter on mount Ida; and of Curetis, the name of the island. The Cretans are among the most ancient and celebrated people, which inhabited the islands of the Mediterranean. They pretended to have been produced originally out of their own soil: this island was well peopled in the time of the Trojan war; Homer calls it the "island with a hundred cities." The city of Gaza, in Palestine, went by the name of Minoa, because Minos, king of Crete, coming into that country, had called this city by his own name.

Herodotus acknowledges, that the Cretans were originally barbarians, and not derived from Greece. Homer says, that a different language was spoken in Crete: that there were Greeks there, true Cretans, or ancient Cretans, Pelasgians, &c. The ancient Cretans are the Cherethites, the Pelasgians are the Philistines, or Pelethites of Scripture. Their language was that of the Canaanites, or Phœnicians; that is, Hebrew: they were descended from Ham, by Mizraim, Gen. x. 6. 13, 14.

The manners, arms, religion, and gods, of the Cretans and Philistines were nearly the same. The arms of both were bows and arrows: Dagon, the god of the Philistines, was the Dictinnus of the Cretans. Stephen, the geographer, says, that Marnas of Gaza, is the Jupiter of the Cretans. The god Belzebub, or, the god fly, was, in all probability, honoured in memory of the bees which fed Jupiter on mount Ida.

It may be objected against this opinion, that in Abraham's time, the Philistines were settled in Palestine, and that the isle of Crete could not then be well peopled, much less could it send colonies into Palestine. We answer, that Abraham's time (A. M. 2090, or thereabouts) was 434 years after the deluge, and about 320 from the dispersion at Babel. Mizraim, grandfather of the Philistines and Caphtorim, had a numerous family: he was a son of Ham, and peopled Egypt betimes; and the passage from Egypt to Crete is neither long nor difficult. Aptera, a city of Crete, has a sensible relation to Caphtor; this name was given it by king Apterus. Vide PHILISTINES.

ADDITION.

[There is great difficulty in properly analysing this appellation; some think it imports, "islands, every way surrounded by water." Henius (Ob. S. lib. ii. cap. 6.) refers it to one of the islands in the Nile. Vitringa thinks it denotes the pomegranate, quince, or other round fruit; and that the congenial name Carpatus, given to an island, expresses its form. Accordingly, Abel (in Histor. Monarch. lib. i. cap. 4.) thinks it is the same as Ril, or Rihib, the Pear, which was the Delta of Egypt. Hiller, in his Onomast. thinks it is compounded of Cap and Taur, "the side of the Bull." Under these uncertainties, we have thought it might be derived from Tur, the turtle-dove; and that it denoted the Hindoo nations, which worshipped CAPOTISWARA and CAPOTISI, the dove, male and female: but if it be referred to the side or wing of the Dove, the allusion is to the same effect. Capot כַּפּוֹת is the Hindoo name for a dove, and Tur תֹּר is the Hebrew name for a dove: possibly, these two names eventually became united.

That the dove was a standard, the insignia of a nation, perhaps derived from the Hindoos, mentioned above, vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXIX.

Rambam says, "Caphtor is what is called by the Arabians Damiata." The Targums of Jerusalem and Jonathan, on Gen. x. 14. for Caphtorim read Cappadokia: the Arabic reads Damiatenos. Also, the LXX. Deut. ii. 23. for Caphtorim read Cappadokia. Damiata is said to be the ancient Pelusium; which word signifies Muddy: so Sin (Ezek. xxx. 15, 16.) is thought to mean "Muddy;" also Tanis which in Chaldee, is Mud. Pithom and Raamses (Exod. i. 11.), in the Targums of Jerusalem and Jonathan, are Tanis and Pelusium.

We read, Gen. x. 14, that "the Philistines came out of Casluhim:" but we shall see reason to think from the effect of the following remarks, that they came out of Caphtorim; for so the prophets quoted expressly affirm. It is probable, that the Philistines had several transmigrations; first from their own country, the original Caphtor, and secondly from Egypt: where they had settled before they were established in Canaan. We learn from Deut. i. 23. that "the Caphtorim came forth out of Caphtor:" and this coming forth out of—appears to imply, emigration from a considerable distance: it is, however, decisive, for the existence of a country called Caphtor: and this we must endeavour to ascertain. In Amos ix. 7. we find the Lord instancing his power over the nations, saying (1.) Have I not brought up Israel out of the land of Egypt? this distance we know very well. (2.) Have I not brought the Philistines from Caphtor? now this should hardly be the same place as the Egypt just mentioned, or at no greater distance than that is. (3.) Have I not brought the Syrians from Kir? Kir, we know, was the northern extremity of the Assyrian empire: by parity of reason, therefore, Caphtor should be at a like distance, though not in the same direction. In Jer. xlvii. 4, the Philistines are described as "the remnant of the country of Caphtor;" meaning the descendants of an ancient emigration from Caphtor. These passages, then, imply a distant situation from the original country, Caphtor.

There is no variation in the copies; nor in the versions, to assist us; but in the Pentateuch, the name is written defectively: whereas it is fully written in Jeremiah and Amos, Captur. This may lead us to a country which will assist in determining this question. Observe, that the Pethor, from whence Balaam is said to have been brought (Deut. xxiii. 4.), is spelled in the original Patur; which differs from Ca-patur, Captur, only by the first letter. It appears, also, that Balaam was originally of Mesopotamia, Aram Naharaim (or of the rivers), and this Mesopotamia we have found occasion to refer to the rivers of Paradise, and the country of Kedem.

We must therefore inspect this Eastern region in search of Patura and Ca-patura: and we have a district whose name much resembles the latter in the Caspaturus of the Greeks, which is placed in Major Rennel's Map of the Satrapies of Darius Hystaspes, immediately east of the Indus, extending into Cashmere: where we find it spelt Cas-patyrus. It is marked in our own Map of Asia (outlined), somewhat further N. E. In short, it seems probable, that the Caphtorim emigrated from India, where a primary nation of the Philistines settled on the Red Sea, and in Egypt; a colony from whence occupied the southern coast of Judea, the islands of Crete, Cyprus, and others in the Mediterranean sea.

Michaelis is for transposing the parenthesis, Gen. x. 14. "the Caphtorim, out of whom came Philistim;" which certainly harmonizes well with the places quoted above. There is a possibility, however, that the Philistines came, at several times, from all the three places mentioned in this verse (1.) from Paturusim—the people, or places named Paturas; from which origin perhaps was, in other countries, adopted the name Patara, a city in Lycia, where Apollo was worshipped, and his Raven, and where that deity had an oracle: the same, we suppose, in respect to Patra, a town in Achaia. (2.) From Casluhim; and (3.) from Caphtor. It is, no doubt, credible, that this people might have towns, or districts, thus named, in that part of Egypt adjoining the Nile eastward: but, we strongly doubt, whether these were their original and primary stations. Vide CAPPADOCIA, CAS-LUHIM, and CHERETHIM.]

CAPITATION of the Jews. Moses ordained, (Exod. xxx. 18.) that every Israelite should pay half a shekel for his soul, or person, as a redemption, "that there might be no plague among the people, when they were numbered." Many interpreters are of opinion, that this payment was designed to take place as often as the people were numbered; and that this payment of the half shekel per head being evaded when David numbered his subjects, God punished the neglect with a pestilence, 2 Sam. xxiv. 1. But the generality maintain, that Moses laid this tax on all the people, payable yearly, for the maintenance of the tabernacle, for the sacrifices, wood, oil, wine, flour, habits, and subsistence of the priests and Levites. In our Saviour's time, this tribute was punctually paid. Vide DIDRACHMA.

The Israelites, when lately returned from Babylon, paid one third part of a shekel to the temple; in all probability, being disabled at that time, by poverty, from doing more, Nehem. x. 32.

The elders levied it in all provinces where any Jews were settled; and had procurators who carried it to Jerusalem. Cicero [pro Flacc.] remarks, that Flaccus would not suffer that contribution to be conveyed thither, which had been collected among the Jews in Italy; and Titus, speaking to the Jews, reproaches them with ingratitude, for employing this tax against their benefactors, and in carrying on war against the Romans, which the emperors of Rome had, by a particular indulgence, permitted them to levy among themselves, and in their own manner.

After the destruction of the temple by the Romans, the Jews were compelled to pay to the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus the half-shekel, which had been before paid to the temple of Jerusalem.

The Rabbins observe, that the Jews in general, and even the priests, except women, children under thirteen years of age, and slaves, were liable to pay the half-shekel. The collectors demanded it in the beginning of Nisan, but used no compulsion till the passover: at that period, they either constrained those to pay who had not paid, or took security from them. The half-shekel was in value about eighteen pence.

CAPITOLINA, the name of Jerusalem after Adrian rebuilt it. Vide ADRIAN, and the PLATES, No. xcii.

CAPPADOCIANS, Καππαδόκες: in Hebrew Caphthorim: this name is not originally either Greek or Hebrew. Vide CAPHTOR.

[CAPPADOCIA, a region of Asia, adjoining Pontus, Armenia, &c. Acts ii. 9; 1. Peter i. 1. It is situate between the Halys, the Euphrates, and the Euxine.

Ptolemy (lib. v. cap. 6.) mentions this people, and derives their name from a river, Cappadox. They were formerly called Leuco Syri, or, "White Syrians:" not that they had been inhabitants of Palestine Syria. They probably were the same as the "White Indians:" or emigrants from the banks of the Indus; and this appellation adds a presumptive proof that there was a Syria not less easterly than that river. Pliny mentions Cappadocia (lib. vi. cap. 3.), as do Strabo (lib. xii.) Pomponius Mela (lib. i.). This province was divided into two parts; the greater, next to the Pontic sea; the lesser, next to Lycaonia. Justinian divided it into three parts. In the time of Strabo it was divided into ten prefectures. In the Notitia Imperii Orientalis, it is divided into the first and second Cappadocia.

This country was placed first in the proverb which cautioned against the three K's: Kappadocia, Kilicia, and Krete. To this alludes an old epigram mentioned by Constantinus Porphyrogenitus: intended to describe rather the inhabitants, than the reptiles of this country.

The wretch, ill-fated, starts in wild affright:—

"I feel the Cappadocian Viper's fangs," he cried,

"In human gore, accustomed to delight,

"Shoot Venom through my heart!" He said, and died.

We suspect, that the Cappadocians did not all speak pure Greek, but a mixed dialect, in which they agreed with their neighbours, the Lycaonians. Yet it should be observed that this country has produced excellent and learned men, as Strabo the geographer, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Basil the Great, and Gregory Nazianzen.]

CAPTIVITY. God generally punished the sins and infidelities of the Jews by captivities or servitudes. The first captivity is that of Egypt, from which Moses delivered them; and should be considered rather as a permission of providence, than as a punishment for sin.

Six captivities are reckoned during the government by Judges: (1) under Chushan-Rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, which continued about eight years; (2) under Eglon, king of Moab, from which they were delivered by Ehud; (3) under the Philistines, out of which they were rescued by Shamgar; (4) under Jabin, king of Hazor, from which they were delivered by Deborah and Barak; (5) under the Midianites, from which Gideon freed them; (6) under the Ammonites and Philistines, during the judicatures of Jephthah, Ibzan, Elon, Abdon, Eli, Samson, and Samuel.

But the greatest and most remarkable captivities of the Hebrews, were those of Israel and Judah, under their regal government.

CAPTIVITIES OF ISRAEL.

(1.) Tiglath-Pilezer took several cities, and carried away captives, principally from the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, A. M. 3264. (2.) Salmaneser took and destroyed Samaria, after a siege of three years, A. M. 3283; he transplanted the tribes which had been spared by Tiglath-pilezer, to provinces beyond the Euphrates: it is usually believed, that there was no general return of the ten tribes from this captivity.

Nevertheless, when we examine carefully the writings of the prophets, we find the return of, at least a great part of Israel from the captivity, pointed out clearly. So Hosea xi. 11, "They shall tremble as a bird out of Egypt, and as a dove out of the land of Assyria, and I will place them in their houses, saith the Lord," &c. and Amos ix. 14, "I will bring again my people Israel from their captivity." Obadiah 18, 20, "The captivity of this host of the children of Israel shall possess that of the Canaanites," &c. To the same purpose other prophets: Isaiah xi. 12, "The Lord shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah." Ezekiel received an order from God, to take two pieces of wood, and write on one, "for Judah and for Israel:" on the other, "for Joseph and for Israel;" and to join these two pieces of wood, that they might become one, to symbolize the re-union of Judah and Israel, Ezek. xxxvii. 16. Jeremiah is equally express, "Judah shall walk with Israel, and they shall come together out of the North, to the land which I have given for an inheritance to their fathers," Jer. xxxi. 7, 8, 9, 16, 17, 20; xlix. 2, &c.; Micah ii. 12; Zech. ix. 13; x. 6, 10.

In the historical books of Scripture, we see Israelites of the ten tribes, as well as of Judah and Benjamin, return from the captivity. Tobit assures his son, that his brethren of the ten tribes, dispersed from the land of Israel, should return thither, Tobit xiii. 12, 17; xiv. 6. Among those who returned with Zerubbabel, are reckoned some of Ephraim and Manasseh, who settled at Jerusalem, among the tribe of Judah. When Ezra numbered those returned from the captivity, he only enquired whether they were of the race of Israel: and at the first passover, then celebrated in the temple, was a sacrifice of "twelve he-goats for the whole house of Israel, according to the number of the tribes," Ezra vi. 16, 17; viii. 35. Under the Maccabees, and in our Saviour's time, we see Palestine peopled by Israelites of all the tribes indifferently. The Samaritan chronicle asserts, that in the 35th year of the pontificate of Abdelus, 3000 Israelites, by permission of king Sauredius, returned from captivity, under the conduct of Adus, son of Simeon.

CAPTIVITIES OF JUDAH.

These are generally reckoned four: (1) A. M. 3398, under king Jehoiakim, when Daniel and others, were carried to Babylon; (2) A. M. 3401, in the seventh year of Jehoiakim, when Nebuchadnezzar carried 3023 Jews to Babylon; (3) A. M. 3406, under Jehoiachin, when this prince, with part of his people, was sent to Babylon; (4) A. M. 3416, under Zedekiah. From this period begins the seventy years of captivity foretold by the prophet Jeremiah.

The Jews were removed to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, who, designing to make that city the capital of the East, transplanted thither very great numbers of people subdued by him in different countries. The Jews had judges and elders there, who governed them, and decided matters in dispute juridically according to their laws. Of this we see a proof in the story of Susanna, in Babylon, who was condemned by elders of her own nation.

Cyrus, in the first year of his reign at Babylon, A. M. 3457, permitted the Jews to return to their own country, Ezra i. 1; but they did not obtain leave to rebuild the temple; and the completion of those prophecies, which foretold the termination of their captivity after seventy years, was not till A. M. 3486, when Darius Hystaspes, by an edict, allowed them to rebuild the temple. A. M. 3537, Artaxerxes Longimanus sent Nehemiah to Jerusalem. The Jews assert, that only the bran, the refuse of their nation, returned from the captivity; the principal of them continued where they had been settled, in and near Babylon, where indeed they became very numerous.

[It may, however, be doubted, whether the bran, the refuse of Judah, ever was really carried away to Babylon: it is most probable, the policy of Nebuchadnezzar would carry away only those whom he could usefully employ; and that the refuse of the people would not have been worth the removal. It seems also to be probable, that the same inferior classes were left in Israel; and these were under the influence, if not under the direct authority, of king Josiah, and other kings of Judah; so that both countries were on an equality in this respect.]

Since the destruction of the temple by the Romans, the Hebrews affirm, they have always had their heads, or princes, both in the east and west, under the name of PRINCES OF THE CAPTIVITY. The prince of the captivity of the East, say they, governed the Jews of Babylon, Chaldaea, Assyria, and Persia. The prince of the captivity of the west, governed those of Judaea, Egypt, Italy, and the Roman empire. The Jews make a great difference between the patriarchs of Judaea, and the princes of the captivity at Babylon. The first they call Rabban, the other Rabbana; these, say they, are descended from David in a direct line by the males, whereas the patriarchs descended from him by the females. They say, moreover, that the house of David continues in vigour, because there are illustrious persons of this family at Bagdad, among whom the princes of the Jewish nation are now chosen, as they have been from time immemorial.

As to the princes of the captivity of Babylon, or the East, we know neither their origin, nor their succession; it appears only, that they arose about the end of the second century. While the temple subsisted, the eastern Jews, as well as the western, continued subject to the high-priest at Jerusalem. No historian has mentioned these supposed princes of the captivity, before the destruction of the temple. The first of those princes was Huna, at the close of the second century; and from Huna to the completion of the Talmud, that is, 800 years, they scarcely produce three. The Jews affirm, that among these princes of the captivity of Babylon, who were all of the tribe of Judah, and race of David, was the sceptre of Judah, foretold by the patriarch Jacob; and that in Judaea, among the patriarchs spoken of above, was the lawgiver, Gen. xlix. 10.

CARAITES, קראים: readers; from קרא kara, to read. [q. Literals, LITERATI?]

CARAITES, a sect of the Jews, given to the study of Scripture, and adhering closely to the letter of it. This distinguishes the Caraites from the Rabbins, who admit traditions.

The Caraites are said to glory in a descent from Ezra, and to prove the succession of their doctrine by a catalogue of all who have either taught, or opposed Caraim. Some boast of still greater antiquity; as the Jews in Poland, and Lithuania, who pretend to be descended from the ten tribes led captive by Salmaneser. It is believed, that the Caraites appeared about the eighth century, or, at least, that their sect was then restored by Ananus, at the time when the Talmudists endeavoured to equal their traditions with the most sacred truths of religion; this, many Jews, zealous for the law, opposed; and were therefore called Caraites, as adhering only to the text of Scripture.

The Rabbinites charge the Caraites with most of the errors of the Sadducees; but the Caraites repel these accusations; and maintain the purity of their faith, and their particular sense of these articles. Some good Caraites may be consulted with advantage, by enquirers into Scripture; but few are printed; the most part are in MS. and concealed in great libraries. They expect the Messiah, whom, with the rest of the Jews, they consider as a temporal king; they forbid all computation of the time of his appearance: they reject all books, not in the old canon of the Jews; and they require an implicit faith in holy Scripture, without examination whether any article of the law be true or false: they have neither phylacteries nor parchments on the doors of their houses, nor frontlets on their foreheads. They call the Jews bridled asses, when they see them in their synagogues with parchments on their foreheads: the passages wherein these phylacteries are mentioned, and which are understood literally by Rabbinical Jews, they explain figuratively. There are Caraites at Constantinople, in Syria, Palestine, and beyond the Euphrates. For the history and opinions of the Caraites, vide a very copious and entertaining account in Basnage, Hist. des Juifs. lib. ii. cap. 16, 17.

We have another history of their origin from Dr. Prideaux. The compilation of the Talmud appearing in the beginning of the sixth century, people of sense were so shocked with the trifles, the ridiculous and incredible fables which filled it, and to see at the same time men daring to assert all this as coming from God, that many resolved to establish their faith only on the word of God, the Scriptures. This refusal to admit the Talmud as a rule of faith, did not, however, for a long time, produce any schism. But, about A. D. 750, Ananus, a Babylonish Jew of the race of David, and his son Saul, declared openly for the written word of God alone, exclusive of traditions. Their declaration produced a schism: those who supported the Talmud and traditions being almost all Rabbins, or their disciples, were called Rabbinites: the others were called Caraites, or Scripturists. from Cara, which, in the Babylonish language, signifies scripture.

The Caraites pass for the most learned of the Jewish doctors: there are few in the west; the greater part are in Poland, Muscovy, and the east. About the middle of the seventeenth century, an account was taken of their number: there were 2000 in Poland; at Caffa, in Crim Tartary, 1200; at Cairo, 300; at Damascus, 200; at Jerusalem, 30; in Babylon, 100; in Persia, 600; in all 4430: a very small number, compared with the mass of the nation, which is Rabbinist.

The Rabbinites have so great an aversion for the Caraites, that they will form no alliances, nor even hold conversation with them; they treat them as mamzerim, or bastards, because they observe none of the constitutions of the Rabbins in their marriages, divorces, and purifications of their wives: even if a Caraites would turn Rabbinit, the Rabbinit Jews would not receive him.

CARBUNCLE, in Latin, carbunculus; in Greek, ἀνθράξ; in Hebrew, נֶפֶךְ nophec: is a precious stone, like a large ruby, or garnet, of a dark deep red colour, something like bull's blood; said to glitter even in the night, and to sparkle much more than the ruby: but Braunius observes, after Boëtius de Boot, that the anthrax was the ruby.

CARCAS, כֶּרֶס, Καρχαῖς: covering of a lamb: from כֶּסֶה casah, to cover: or, the lamb of the throne: from כֶּר car, a lamb, and כֶּסֶה ciesa, a throne; this word is Persian, and its etymology is not in the Hebrew.

CARCAS, an eunuch belonging to Ahasuerus, Eth. i. 10.

CARCHEMISH, כֶּרְמִישׁ, Καρχαμῖς: a lamb, as taken away, withdrawn, or carried off, from כֶּר car, a lamb, the adverb כֵּן ce, as, and מִשׁ mosh: it is said, this name in Chaldee signifies lead.

[A lamb which bleats, or palpitates: from the Hebrew and Syriac, the city of bleating.

Simon thinks "the distant fortress," from the Chaldee. This name, though varied, yet is thought to retain its old import: it is now called Circus, or Circusium, understanding, fortress: and we see no reason why it should not take name from a lamb, as we have "Lamb-town," Lambton, among ourselves: "LAMB-FORT." It was, says Ammianus Marcellinus, a fortress extremely secure: Ibn Haukal only says, "Karkisa is on the banks of the river Khabour: it abounds in fine prospects, cultivated lands and gardens."

CARCHEMISH, a town on the Euphrates, belonging to Assyria. Necho, king of Egypt, took it, and placed a garrison in it, which was taken and put to the sword by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon; in the fourth year of Jehoia-chin, king of Judah, 2 Chron. xxxv. 20; 2 Kings xxiii. 29. Isaiah speaks of Carchemish, and seems to say that Tiglath-pilezer conquered it; perhaps, from the Egyptians. Profane authors say nothing of this town, or of these wars. Probably, Carchemish is Circusium, or Circesium, situated in the angle formed by the conjunction of the Chaboras, or Chebar, and the Euphrates.

CAREAH, קָרַח karach: bald, frozen; from קָרַח karach.

CAREAH, father of Johanan, 2 Kings xxv. 23.

CARIA, Καρία, kapla: capital; from καπε the head.

[CARIA, a country of Asia Minor, to which the Romans wrote in favour of the Jews, 1 Mac. xv. 23. It was called Phœnicia, because a Phœnician colony settled there. It afterwards received the name of Caria from Car, a king, who first invented the auguries of birds. Its chief town was Halicarnassus.]

CARMEL, כֶּרְמֶל: a circumcised lamb; from כֶּר car, a lamb, and מִלּוּל mul, circumcision: otherwise, scarlet, from the Hebrew word of four radicals, כֶּרְמֶל carmel: otherwise, harvest, full ears of corn, vineyard of God, excellent vineyard.

["The green fields," or verdant pastures, says Simon; and Parkhurst to the same effect.]

I. CARMEL, a city of Judah, on a mountain of the same name, in the south of Palestine. Here Nabal the Carmelite, Abigail's husband, dwelt. Jerom says, that in his time the Romans had a garrison at Carmel. On this mountain, Saul, returning from his expedition against Amalek, erected a trophy, 1 Sam. xv. 12.

[Called Carmel from the green meadows near it: rather, from green plantations, shrubberies, of a more bushy nature and appearance, in its neighbourhood, Josh. xv. 55; 1 Sam. xxv. 2.]

II. CARMEL, a mountain about 10 miles south of Ptolemais, on the shore of the Mediterranean. It is a range of mountains running north-west, and ending in the promontory or cape, which forms the bay of Accho. At the foot of this mountain, north, runs the brook Kishon, and a little farther north, the river Belus. Josephus makes Carmel a part of Galilee; but it rather belonged to Manasseh, and to the south of Asher. Carmel signifies the vineyard; and Jerom informs us, that this mountain had good pastures: here an ancient deity was worshipped, called likewise Carmel; but Tacitus says, there was neither statue nor temple belonging to it [Hist. ii.]; only an altar, and religious worship. Jamblichus tells us, that Pythagoras went often to this mountain, and remained alone in the temple (or sacred precinct). Toward the sea, is a cave, where some suppose the prophet Elijah desired Ahab to bring Baal's false prophets, and where fire from heaven descended on his burnt sacrifice, 1 Kings xviii. 21—40.

[It is the character of this mountain, which, principally, inclines us to think, that shrubs and trees are the verdure to which its name alludes, rather than meadows. Vide infra.

Pliny (lib. v. cap. 19.) mentions "the promontory Carmel, and on this mountain a town of the same name, formerly called Ecbatana. [Vide CAMBYSES.] The river Pagida, or Belus, mingling glassy sand with its small shore, flows from the lake Cendevia, at the foot of Carmel." Strabo says (lib. xvi.) that "there was a wood adjacent to Carmel, which, as well as Carmel itself, was a receptacle for robbers." It is probable that this "wood" was really on the sides of Carmel itself; which would agree with our derivation of this name, as proposed above.

Mount Carmel, says D'Arvieux, is on the borders of the Mediterranean sea, one of its principal points advances considerably into the sea, and forms a cape or promontory, the most elevated of any on the coast. The lesser mountains of this groupe are cultivable lands, of a good soil, deep, and extraordinarily fertile, capable of producing in a very uncommon degree. There were formerly many more vineyards than at present. The Christians who inhabit part of these villages, only cultivate as many vines as may furnish what wine and dried grapes they want, for their own consumption. They neglect the cultivation of fruit trees, which here would reach great excellence, as may easily be inferred from those here gathered, though chiefly from wild stocks. They have delicious melons, and water-melons. Those mounts which appear most dry and arid are covered with oaks and other trees. We find also olives, but under no management. The air of these mountains is very good, and how sultry soever it may be on the border of the sea, these regions are refreshed every morning by a cool sea breeze. On the mountains feed an infinity of beeves, sheep, goats, hares, rabbits, partridges, antelopes, and other species of animals; all excellent in their kinds, because they here find excellent pasture and corn. Tom. ii. p. 286.

Mount Carmel, says Volney (Trav. vol. ii. p. 228.), is a flattened cone, and very rocky; it is about two thousand feet high. We still find among brambles, wild vines and olive-trees, which prove that industry has formerly been employed even on this ungrateful soil; on the summit is a chapel dedicated to the prophet Elias, which affords an extensive prospect over the sea and land. To the south, the country presents a chain of rugged hills, on the tops of which are a great number of oak and fir-trees, the retreat of wild boars and lynxes. As we turn towards the east, at six leagues distance, we perceive Nasra, or Nasareth, so celebrated in the gospels.]

III. CARMEL. This name is sometimes given in a looser sense to places planted with vines and fruit-trees, and remarkable for fertility. It is said likewise, that purple has this name, because, at the foot of mount Carmel north, a shell-fish was caught, which was used in dyeing purple. [But purple, scarlet, or deep crimson, is rather CARMIL, than Carmel.]

CARMI, כרמי, my vineyard; from כרם kerem, and the affix י, my; otherwise, the knowledge of the waters; from נכר niccar, to know; otherwise, the lamb of the waters; from כר car, a lamb, and מים majim, waters.

I. CARMI, fourth son of Reuben, head of the family of the Carmites, Numb. xxvi. 6.

II. CARMI, father of Achan, Josh. vii. 1, 18.

III. CARMI, surnamed Othniel, Judith vi. 10.

CARNAIM, קרנים: this word is joined to Astaroth; horns, from כרן keren, a horn.

CARNAIM, or Astaroth-Carnaim (Gen. xiv. 5), i. e. the Horned Astaroth, a city beyond Jordan, in Gilead: called Carnion, 2 Macc. xii. 21. Vide ASTAROTH-CARNAIM, and FRAGMENTS, No. CCXIII. CCLXVIII. &c. "Of ASHTAROTH." Also the PLATES, No. cxli.

[The word rendered horns, also signifies splendour, rays of light, or glory; and it is very likely that this image of Ashtaroth was surmounted by horns of rays, whether on, or over its head. Various divinities of the heathen had horns; as Jupiter Ammon, the Moon (i. e. her cusps), and even Bacchus: but some of these were locks of hair to which the form of horns was purposely and artificially given; hence we read of Bacchus's "hiding his horns, and shewing a virgin's face."

Further, on this subject, Pausanias tells us (Eliacs, xxiv.) that "the Eleans had a temple, in which were marble statues of the sun and moon. That of the moon had horns on its head; but the head of the sun was surrounded by rays." Mr. Taylor's note on this passage is (vol. iii. p. 329.), "These horns were doubtless those of a bull. For the moon, in the Orphic hymn to her, is called bull-horned; and Porphyry (de Anuro Nymph.) informs us, that the ancient priests of Ceres called the moon, who is the queen of generation, a bull." The coincidence of these sentiments with some already stated, cannot escape the reader's notice. The rays on the sun's head, as well as the horns on the moon's head, are not only of the same import, but are derived from the same Hebrew word keren.] Vide the PLATES, No. xix.

[CARNAL, fleshly, sensual. Wicked or unconverted men are in Scripture represented as being under the domination of a "carnal mind, which is enmity against God," and which must issue in death, Rom. viii. 6, 7. Worldly enjoyments are said to be carnal, because they only minister to the wants and desires of the animal part of man, Rom. xv. 27; 1 Cor. ix. 11. The ceremonial parts of the Mosaic dispensation were carnal; they related immediately to the bodies of men, and to those of beasts, Heb. vii. 16; ix. 10. The weapons of a Christian's warfare are not carnal; they are not of human invention; nor are they directed by human wisdom, 2 Cor. x. 4.]

[CARNION, the horn, from the Hebrew karn, or kern, a horn. The name of a fortress, 2 Macc. xii. 21. It appears, that a temple of Atargatis (i. e. Derceto), was near this fortress, and that the fortress itself stood on a hill of difficult ascent. Some suppose this to be the same as CARNAIM, and its temple to be of Ashtaroth Carnaim.]

CARPUS, Καρπός, fruit, or fruitful.

CARPUS, a disciple of St. Paul, who dwelt at Troas. The apostle, A. D. 65, landing at Troas, lodged with Carpus, and left a cloke at his house (2 Tim. xiv. 18); or, as others explain it, a bag to put books in, or other writings; and parchments, or books written on vellum; supposed to have been copies of the Scriptures. The Greeks tell us, Carpus was one of the seventy disciples: that he propagated the truth in several places; wrought many miracles; was Paul's assistant and employed by him in carrying his letters; was bishop of Beroëa, and died in peace. The Latins commemorate him October 19, the Greeks May 26.

CARSHENA, כרשנא: a lamb of a year: from כר car, a lamb, and שנא shena, a year; otherwise, a lamb that sleeps; from ישן jashan, to sleep: otherwise, a lamb that changes; from שנה shanah, to change. 'This is a Persian name, and its etymology is not in the Hebrew.

CARSHENA, a principal officer of Ahasuerus, Esth. i. 14.

CART, for threshing corn, a machine still used in the East, Amos ii. 18. marg. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XLVIII.

CARTHAGE, or Carthaginians: in Hebrew, תרשיש Tarshish. A word, whose true signification is unknown. Carthage, or Cartada, may be derived from קרתה cartha, a city, and דרתה chadeta, new. Vide Bochart.

CARTHAGE, a celebrated city on the coast of Africa, a colony from Tyre. Ezekiel says, the Carthaginians traded to Tyre: but the Hebrew reads Tarshish, which rather signifies Tarsus, in Cilicia, [or Tartessus, in Spain] formerly famous for trade. Vide TARSISH.

CASIPHIA, כספיה: money, or covetousness; from כסף casaph, silver. [or silver mines.]

[The resemblance of this name to that of the Caspian Sea, has led most geographers to consider it as denoting a place adjacent to that sea; either on the Caspian mountain, at, or near, the Caspian gates, or elsewhere. Accordingly, Hiller thought it to be compounded of two radical words, denoting "a place covered in." Nicholas Lyra, however, took it for a place in Babylonia, where many of the captive Levites remained.

It is certain, that, not far from the Caspian Sea, in the neighbourhood of Derbent, are silver mines, which appears to be the most probable import of this name. They are thus described by Ibn Haukal, and his testimony is almost the only one on this subject, as travellers are not suffered to extend their excursions to examine them. The description represents them as unusually pleasant for a district which produces metals.

"The mountains at the silver mines are near the border of Jireft, and extend to the pass of Derban; from that to the silver mountains is a journey of two merhileh. There are pleasant and fertile vallies, with small towns, and many delightful vallies."

"Among the hills of silver, and as far as Derban to Jireft, and likewise from before the hill of Barcm to Jireft, and the place called Mesihan and Derman, there runs a considerable river, with such a rapid stream, that it is not to be crossed without difficulty: it turns about twenty mills." Ibn Haukal. Sir W. OUSELEY'S Trans. p. 141, 142.]

CASIPHIA. Ezra says, that when returning to Judæa, he sent to Iddo, who dwelt at Casiphia: perhaps mount Caspian, near the Caspian Sea, between Media and Hyrcania, where were many captives, Ezra viii. 17. Vide CASPIAN.

I. CASIUS, a mountain which separated Syria from Egypt, situated between the city of Pelusium, and the lake Sirbonis. Jupiter Casius, represented with a pomegranate in his hand, was adored here. Casius seems to be derived from the Hebrew קץ kez, or cass, extremity, bound, or limit; q. the boundary of Palestine? [or of Egypt?]

[Mount Cassius, in Ptolemy, is written Kassion, and Kassiotis, with a double s; the same in Dion Cassius; who remarks, that Pompey was slain at Mount Cassius, on that very day of the year whereon he had formerly triumphed over Mithridates and the Pirates: and when, from an oracle, he had a suspicion of the Cassian nation, no Cassian laid wait for him, but he was slain and buried at the mountain of this name. Dion Cass. lib. xlii. Lightfoot conjectures, Cassiotis may be intended Exod. xvii. 16, "The hand of the Lord is against Cas-jeh, the seat of the Amalekite power, (a troop of which had attacked Israel), from generation to generation." Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCCLXXXV.

CATIEH. "In this station are several patches of date-trees; and wells where the water is good; and fit for both man and beast." Maj. H.

"The appearance of the desert was here much improved; we met with several plants and flowers on our way, together with a few date-trees: and in approaching Theah (distant from Catieh about a mile and a half), found a greater proportion of green shrubs than we had encountered in any other part of the desert. In several of the hollows there was a sufficient degree of moisture to promote vegetation: and in these spots there is no doubt but that good water might be procured with little trouble. The numbers and varieties of birds which are flying about them, were a strong evidence of the truth of this observation.

"It appeared that a village had once stood on the site of our encampment; fragments of red bricks, &c. being scattered over the surface of the sands." Dr. Wittman's Trav. in Syria, &c. p. 285.]

IL. CASIUS, a mountain of Syria, near Solucia; perhaps, described by Moses as הַר הָהָרִים, the mountain of mountains, Numb. xxxvi. 8: in English Tr. mount Hor; or, the very high mountain. This was the northern boundary of the Land of Promise, as the other Casius was the southern boundary.

CASLUHIM, כַּסְלִיחַיִם: the cover of tables; from כַּסָּה casah, and לִיחַ luach, a table, or floor. This word is foreign to the Hebrew tongue.

CASLUHIM, a son of Mizraim. There is great diversity of opinion concerning the place of his abode, and the nation of which he was founder. The paraphrast, Jonathan, explains Casluhim, of the inhabitants of the Pentapolis, or Cyrenaica, in Africa; the Jerusalem paraphrast, of the inhabitants of Pentaschænos, in Lower Egypt. The Arabic renders it, the inhabitants of Saïs, in the Thebaïs. Bochart, and others, understand it of the Colchians. Herodotus says, that the people of Colchos were circumcised like the Egyptians, that they were of a tawny complexion, their hair black and curled, their language and way of living the same as that of the Egyptians; also, that Sesostri, king of Egypt, left a colony of his troops in Colchis. He confesses, notwithstanding, that the Egyptians had no remembrance of the Colchians being their countrymen.

But if we allow all that Herodotus says, it would not prove the Colchians and the Casluhim to be the same people. Nor, if it were certain, that Sesostri left a colony of Egyptians at Colchos, would it follow, that he had left there the nation of the Casluhim:—Did not Colchis bear this name before Sesostri? Did it begin to be so called only after the coming of these supposed Casluhim?—Moses says, the Philistines and the Caphtorim descended from the Casluhim (Gen. x. 14.), and the prophets Jeremiah and Amos inform us (Jer. xlvii. 4; Amos ix. 7.) that the Philistines came from Caphtor. To reconcile Moses with these prophets, it may be said, that the Caphtorim sprang immediately from the Casluhim, and the Philistines from the Caphtorim.

[This people possibly derived their name from a person, or a place named Casluh: but if it was derived from the object of their worship, or their expectations, then it implies, "the HOPERS," those who strongly hope for, and expect benefit, either from their deity, or from subsequent settlements: this latter idea strongly marks the character of Emigrants, which this people probably were: and to this agrees the term used respecting them, they came out, that is, from a distant country, Gen. x. 14; 1 Chron. i. 12. Vide CAPHTOR, most of the ideas in which article may be adapted to the present.

The LXX. in Gen. x. 14, read Casmonieim, which, in Psalm lxviii. 32, is attributed to Egypt.

The old Latin version reads Casloim; but the Complutensian Greek, reads Caslonieim; and so another Greek version. Josephus reads Chesloimon. Saadias reads, "the islands of Upper Egypt:" the Chronicles of the Arabic interpreter read Alexandria.

All these places were in Egypt, from whence we admit that this people came, and settled in Canaan; but without admitting that Egypt was their original country.]

CASPHAN, or Casphin, Κάσπιν: which is of silver, or desire, from כָּסֶפֶת caseph: or, in Syriac, shame, bashfulness. Otherwise.

CASPHOR, Κασφὸρ: of silver; from כָּסֶפֶת caseph, to desire, and הָר har, a mountain: but its true root is Heshbon.

[CASPHOR, a city beyond Jordan. Vide HESHBON.]

I. CASPIAN MOUNTAINS. This term is not expressly in the Bible, unless Ezra intended it when he says, "I sent them to Iddo, the chief of those who dwelt at Casiphia," Ezra viii. 17. Ezra, departing into Palestine, desired to have some Nethinim to serve in the temple. He sent, therefore, to Iddo, the head of these Nethinim, who, probably, worked at the mines of the Caspian mountains, between Media and Hyrcania. In these mountains many place the Caspian Gates, a very narrow strait leading out of Media into Albania, west of the Caspian Sea. According to others, the Caspian Gates are in mount Taurus, and are the communication between Assyria and Media. The Eastern people are of opinion, that Alexander the Great built a very long wall, to shut up the passage into Persia against the northern nations, called by them Gog and Magog. A city near it, is called Derbend, which, in Persian, signifies, the passage stopped, or the barrier. The Turks call it Demircapi, iron gates. The wall, said to be built by Alexander, is called by the Arabians, Alexander's Bank, or Gog and Magog's Rampart.

The province wherein is the city of Derbend, and Alexander's wall, is called Schirvan; formerly it was called the Throne of Gold: because the king of Persia permitted the governor of this province to sit, while administering justice, on a throne of gold, in consideration of the importance of this post. Jerom (in Chron.) says, Artaxerxes Ochus transplanted a great number of Jews into Hyrcania, near the Caspian Sea; and Orosius tells us, that they were very much increased in his time, and were in hopes of returning to Judæa; and the author of the history says, that Alexander the Great shut up a great number of Jews within the Caspian Gates.

II. CASPIAN SEA, is a large lake, which has no communication with any ocean. It is called a sea, by reason of its extent. The Hebrews call all great lakes, seas; as that of Sodom, and that of Genesareth. The waters of the Caspian Sea are salt and bitter, like those of other seas, excepting on the coast of Hyrcania, where they are neither sweet nor salt. This sea abounds with fish: several great rivers, as the Wolga, the Araxes, the Jaik, the Chesel, and the Gihon, fall into the Caspian Sea, and yet it never seems to increase or to diminish; and in this, eminently, perhaps, what Solomon says, is verified: "All the rivers run into the sea, yet the sea is not full"—[because the evaporation of its waters equals the body of water brought in by these rivers.]

CASPIS, a city in Arabia, inhabited by people of various nations, who menaced Judas Macabeus and his troops; which provoked him to attack it, and take it with great slaughter, 2 Mac. xii. 13—16.

CASSIA, or Keziah, קָצִיעַ: surface: otherwise, corner; from קָצַץ catsa: otherwise, cassia, an aromatic plant (Psalm xlv. 8); different from the casia, קִידָּה kidda, or kadda, Exod. xxx. 24.

I. CASSIA, a spice mentioned by Moses as an ingredient in the composition of the holy oil, used in the consecration of the sacred vessels of the tabernacle, Exod. xxx. 24. The Hebrew calls it קִידָּה kidda, the bark; the LXX. iris. This cassia is said to be the bark of a tree, very like cinnamon, and grows in the Indies.

[II. CASSIA. The cassia mentioned Psalm

xlv. 8, is probably an extract, or essential oil, from the above fragrant bark.]

CASSIUS, surnamed Longinus, was quæstor to Crassus, in Syria, while he was engaged in his famous expedition against the Parthians. Crassus being defeated and slain, Cassius assembled the remains of the Roman army, and drove the Parthians out of Syria, which they had over-run as far as Antioch. From thence he went to Tyre; after regulating affairs there, he proceeded to Judæa, and besieged Tarichæa, on the lake of Genesareth, where Philolaus had shut himself up with the remains of Aristobulus's faction. Cassius took the town, and made slaves of all whom he found in it; he ordered Philolaus to be executed, by the advice of Antipater, as the most certain means of destroying Aristobulus's faction. He afterwards obliged Alexander, son of Aristobulus, to sue for peace.

After the murder of Julius Cæsar, by Brutus and Cassius, the latter went into Syria, where he was greatly esteemed, and soon found himself at the head of eight legions. He secured Phœnicia and Judæa without much trouble. While he was there, four legions passing through Palestine, sent by Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, to assist Dolabella, who was of the opposite party, Cassius surrounded them with his troops; engaged them to come over to him; and hereby increased his army to twelve legions.

To support these troops, he was obliged to levy large sums on the province. Judæa was taxed at 700 talents. Antipater had the care of seeing this sum levied speedily, by his two sons Phasael and Herod. Herod was the first who brought his part of the money, which procured him the favour of Cassius.

The cities of Gophna, Emmaus, Lydda, Thamna, and others, not having furnished their contingents in time, Cassius ordered the inhabitants to be sold to the highest bidder, to raise the sums required of them; and Malichus expected that he should be made to answer with his head for the delay in acquitting himself of his commission: Hircanus rescued him from this danger, by sending 100 talents to Cassius out of his own purse. Cassius was defeated, with Brutus, at Philippi, in Macedonia; and killed himself, ante A. D. 40.

CASTOR and POLLUX. We read, Acts xxviii. 11, that the vessel which carried Paul, had the sign of Castor and Pollux. These deities, according to the fable, were brothers, sons of Jupiter and Leda, sprung from the same egg, and were represented, each with half an egg-shell in his hand. The vessel which Paul sailed in was called DioscURI, or Castor and Pollux, because their images were either painted or carved on the prow. There was besides some other deity on the stern; and these were considered as the patrons and tutelary gods of the vessel. [For the sign—and the tutela, vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCXIV. and the PLATES, No. cxxxix.]

[CASTOR and POLLUX “were sea-gods, and invoked by sailors; nay, the lights which were sometimes hung out on their ships were called Castor and Pollux. An inscription in Gruter (1016), proves, that seamen implored Castor and Pollux in dangers at sea. The sense of it is this: “C. Valerius Agillus, and his associates, having made a vow to Castor and Pollux, and arrived safe through the many perils of shipwreck, willingly performed what they had vowed.” MONT. Antiq. Supp. vol. i. Vide Jonah i. 16.]

CATECHISM, to Catechise; Greek terms, signifying instruction, to instruct.—Catechist, he who instructs: Catechumen, the person under instruction, under a course of instruction, in order to be admitted a member of the Christian church. Paul requires “those who receive instructions from [have been, or are, catechumens of] others, to communicate unto them in all good things,” as an acknowledgment of services and favours received from them, Gal. vi. 6.

[CATERPILLAR, חֲסִיל, the consumer; from חָסַל chesel, to consume, eat up.

CATERPILLAR. In several passages of Scripture, this insect is distinguished from the locust, properly so called; and in Joel i. 4, is mentioned as “eating up” what the other species had left. It may therefore be called the consumer, by way of eminence. But the ancient interpreters are far from being agreed what particular insect is intended. The LXX. Aquila, the Vulgate, and Jerom, understand it of “the chafer,” which is a great devourer of leaves. Michaëlis, from the Syriac, supposes it to be the mole cricket, which, in its grub state, is very destructive to corn, and other vegetables, by feeding on their roots. Vide LOCUST.]

I. CATHOLIC. This term is Greek; signifying universal, or general. The Church of Christ is called catholic, because it extends throughout the world, and during all time. We call some truths catholic, because they are generally received, and are of general influence: so the catholic, i. e. the general church.

II. CATHOLIC, general, or canonical, Epistles. They are seven in number, viz. one of James, two of Peter, three of John, and one of Jude. They are called catholic, because directed to Christian converts generally, and not to any particular church. There is some difference in the order wherein these epistles stand in our Bibles, from that wherein they stood among the Greeks. Among the ancients, some received all the seven; others three only, and rejected the second of Peter, the second and third of John, and Jude. The principal design of these epistles is to warn the reader against the heresies of the times, and to establish Christian converts, against efforts made to seduce them to Judaism, or to a mixture of legal notions with Christianity, or of idolatrous principles and practices with the Gospel: such, having former influence, and deep antiquity, and general reception, to plead in their favour, were very prevalent among many professors in countries recently converted.

CATTAH, a city of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 15.

CATULUS, governor of Libya Pentapolitana, destroyed a number of Jews of his province, who assembled in a desert, being seduced by the promises of one Jonathan, a weaver, of performing all sorts of miracles in their presence. Catulus, who had exceeded all bounds in his punishment of the guilty, was afflicted with such terrible pains of body, and such extreme horrors of mind, as entirely deprived him of rest. Joseph. de Bello, lib. vii. 28.

CAVES. There were abundance of caves, or grottos, and other subterraneous places in Palestine, used as dwellings. Vide ROCK.

CEDAR-TREE. This tree is greatly celebrated in the Scriptures. A few are still standing on mount Libanus, above Byblos and Tripoli, east; but none elsewhere in these mountains. In former times there must have been a great abundance of them, since they were used in so many extensive buildings. These trees are remarkably thick and tall: some among them are from thirty-five to forty feet in girth. The cedar-tree shoots out branches at ten or twelve feet from the ground; they are large and distant; its leaves are something like those of rosemary; it is always green; and distils a kind of gum, to which different effects are attributed. Cedar-wood is reputed incorruptible: it is beautiful, solid, and inclining to a red-brown colour. It bears a small cone, like that of the pine.

The cedar grows not only on mount Libanus, but in Africa, in Cyprus, and in Crete or Candia. Cedar was used in making statues designed for duration. The temple of Jerusalem, and king Solomon's palace, were built with cedar. The roof of the temple of Diana, at Ephesus, was of cedar, according to Pliny. Josephus says, that Solomon multiplied cedars in Judaea, till this tree was as common as sycamores; which are very general there.

The cedar loves cold and mountainous places; if the top is cut, it dies. The branches which it shoots, lessening as they rise, give it the form of a pyramid. Le Bruyn, in his journey to the Holy Land, says, the leaves of the tree point upwards, and the fruit hangs downwards: it grows like cones of the pine-tree, but is longer, harder, and fuller, and not easily separated from the stalk. It contains a seed, like that of the cypress-tree, and yields a glutinous thick sort of resin, transparent, and of a strong smell, which does not run, but falls drop by drop. This author tells us, that having measured two cedars on mount Lebanon, he found one to be fifty palms in girth; the other forty-seven. Naturalists distinguish several sorts of cedars; but we confine ourselves to that of Lebanon, of which only Scripture speaks.

This wood was used not only for beams, for planks which covered edifices, and for ceilings to apartments, but likewise in the substance of the walls, 1 Kings vi. 36; vii. 12; Ezra vi. 3, 4.

Moses orders, in the purification of a leper, that cedar, together with hyssop, should be used in making a wisp, wherewith the leper was to be sprinkled, Lev. xiv. 4.

CEDRON. Vide KEDRON.

CENCHREA, Κενκρεά, millet, small pulse.

CENCHREA, a sea-port on the east of the Isthmus of Corinth, in the Archipelago. Cenchrea was esteemed a kind of subsidiary port to that city. Paul being ready to embark for Jerusalem, had his hair cut off at Cenchrea, in fulfilment of a vow, Acts xviii. 18.

CENDEBEUS, Κενδεβαῖος: zealous of trouble; from Κῆμα kinna, zeal: otherwise, who possesses trouble: from Κᾶνα kana, to possess, and דבא dabah, trouble, grief.

CENDEBEUS, general of the troops of Antiochus Sidetes, having quarrelled with Simon, high-priest and prince of the Jews, took from him the government of the coasts along the Mediterranean, and gave it to Cendebeus, with orders to fortify Cedron, and to waste Judaea. John Maccabeus informed his father Simon of what was passing, who sent his two sons, John and Judas, with troops, to oppose Cendebeus, which they did effectually, 1 Macc. xv. 38; A. M. 3866; ante A. D. 138.

[CENSER. We have but a very imperfect knowledge of the form and nature of the ancient Hebrew censer. The censers of Aaron, and of Korah and his company (Lev. x. 1; Numb. xvi. 6.), appear to have been of brass, or copper. From the circumstance of some of these having been beaten into thin plates, for a covering to the altar, we infer that they were not cast, nor of great thickness, nor made of small pieces: they were thin, and their plates were of considerable surface. Under Solomon we read of golden censers, 1 Kings vii. 50; 2 Chron. iv. 22. In these vessels the priests carried fire and incense to burn before the Lord in the sanctuary. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. DCLXXXIX.]

CENTURION, an officer commanding a hundred soldiers; similar to a captain in modern times. In the Old Testament, "chief of a hundred men."

CEPHA, or Cephas, Κῆφα; rock; from the Chaldee, קִיפָּה kīphā, a stone; or from כֵּיפָּה keīphā, in Syriac, a rock, or stone.

I. CEPHA, or Keipha. Jesus Christ named Peter Cephas; which by the Greeks was rendered Petros, and by the Latins Petrus, both signifying stone, or rock. Vide PETER.

II. CEPHAS. St. Paul (Gal. i. 18; ii. 9, 10.) says, that being come to Jerusalem, he conferred with the apostles; that especially "James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars of the church, gave to me and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship. But when Cephas was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face. I said unto Cephas, before them all, 'If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?'" &c.

There have been difficulties raised on these words, whether this Cephas is Peter the apostle. The most plausible arguments against this Cephas being Peter, are these:—

First, Clemens Alexandrinus, in the Hypotyposes, distinguishes Peter from Cephas. Chrysostom, Jerom, Gregory the Great, Ecumenius, and the author of the comment on the Epistle to the Galatians, under the name of St. Anselm, shew that it had been doubted whether Cephas were Peter. Dorotheus of Tyre, and the author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, speak of a Cephas among the seventy-two disciples; the person (they say) whom Paul resisted.

The following reasons are added: (1.) if Paul resisted Peter to his face, it must be said, that this apostle was fallen into error, since at Antioch he taught, by his example, contrary to what he had sanctioned at the council of Jerusalem: but we may not lightly thus accuse this holy apostle; (2.) Paul, in this very Epistle to the Galatians, calls Peter twice by his name, Peter, and speaks of him with suitable respect: how then, in the same Epistle, in the same discourse, should he call him Cephas, and value himself on having resisted him to the face? (3.) The text intimates, that Paul looked on Cephas as inferior to Barnabas. "Cephas," says he, "withdrawing from eating with the Gentiles, the other Jews imitated his duplicity, inasmuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation." What wonder could it be for Barnabas to imitate the apostle Peter? But to have followed the example of Cephas, a vulgar man, and of no reputation, might indeed have reasonably given Paul much uneasiness. (4.) Another proof that Cephas was not Peter, is Paul's reproving him in public, and with authority. F. Hardouin, who has written expressly to maintain the opinion which distinguishes Cephas from Peter, believes the Cephas mentioned 1 Cor. i. 12, &c. to whom Christ appeared, who preached at Corinth, and who led about with him a sister, a wife, to be the same Cephas whom Paul resisted at Antioch. It is observed, likewise, as a consequent reason, (5.) that the Vulgate has departed from the Greek text and the ancients, who read Petrus instead of Cephas, in verses 8, 11, 14.

Lastly, endeavours are used to shew that Peter was at Jerusalem when Paul resisted Cephas, at Antioch; and that the journey of Paul and Silas to Jerusalem, which was followed by the council at Jerusalem, did not happen till some months after this event; although in the same year, A. D. 49.

In opposition to this opinion, Jerom remarks, that no one would ever have thought of distinguishing Peter from Cephas, had they not been forced to it by the reproaches of Porphyry, and other enemies of Christianity, who pretended to take advantage of this dispute between two principal apostles, to accuse one of error, the other of pride, both of falsehood, and Christians in general of credulity. The ancient Fathers, in reply to such objections, had recourse to different systems of argument. Some said, this dispute between the two apostles was a feint, concerted for people's instruction, particularly the Jews. Others distinguished Peter from Cephas; but this idea continued almost unknown, till some men of learning revived it in these later ages.

The ancients who are alleged in favour of this distinction, either proposed it with doubts, —or have expressly confuted it,—or are in themselves entitled to little consideration. The book of Hypotyposes, whether Clemens Alexandrinus's or any other Clemens's, is now not in being: Photius, who had seen it, speaks of it as abounding with faults, errors, fables, and impious opinions. Chrysostom, who has not concealed the force of those arguments against the common opinion, nevertheless concludes, that all demonstrates that this passage is to be understood of Peter. Jerom, after canvassing the matter, concludes with saying, that he knows no Cephas beside him, who, in the Gospel, and Paul's Epistles, is called sometimes Peter, sometimes Cephas; and if any, to answer Porphyry, would allow of a second Cephas, several passages of Scripture must be erased, which that enemy of our religion attacks, only because he does not understand them.

Gregory the Great confutes the opinion which distinguishes Peter from Cephas. Œcumenius does not adopt it; neither does the author of the comment under the name of St. Anselm. The chronological order invented by F. Hardouin, to shew that Peter was not at Antioch at this time, is purely arbitrary. The other arguments cannot be valid against a fact clearly stated.

If Cephas, whom Paul mentions in so many places, were a man of little consideration in the church, why is the apostle so concerned to cite him, and to use his authority and approbation, Gal. ii. 9? Why so careful to caution against the impression of his example? Why does he lay so much stress on the appearance of our Saviour to Cephas, in proof of his resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 5? How comes this Cephas to have been so neglected by the evangelists, as not to have been mentioned by them? We know the respect due to Peter; but, should this prevent our owning that Peter denied Jesus Christ? And if we cannot acquit him of that accumulated guilt, why should we deny that he was liable to reproof at Antioch? [Much more deserving notice is the remark of those who observe, that had there been any collusion, any fallacy in the religion which both these apostles, these two principal leaders, professed to establish, this contradiction between them had been a fair opportunity for the truth to have appeared, and for detection of their imposture; whereas the whole charge amounts—not to the relinquishing of any truth, whether of the Old Testament, or of the New Testament dispensation, but merely to a difference of opinion on a subject which both of them agreed was temporary, and which both of them knew and acknowledged that providence would speedily abrogate, as to its influence in forming any distinction among Christian believers.]

[CEPHIRA, young lion, or propitiation, or anointed: otherwise, a city, or town, or frozen: in the Syriac, denial.

CEPHIRA, a city, Nehem. vii. 29. Called also CAPHARA.]

CERASTES, Κέρασες, the horned; from κέρας, a horn: a serpent so called, because it has horns on its forehead. This serpent hides itself in the sand, is of a sandy colour, crawls slanting on its side, and seems to hiss when in motion. The word occurs only in Gen. xlix. 17: "Dan shall be a serpent in the way, a cerastes [in the English text adder, in the margin arrow-snake, that is. the dart-snake, or jaculus] in the path. The Hebrew שֵׁשִׁיפֹן shephiphon, is by some interpreted asp, by others basilisk; but Bochart is of opinion that we should keep it cerastes. Vide the ARRANGEMENT OF NATURAL HISTORY, FRAGMENTS, vol. ii. and PLATES, No. cxxxii.

CEREMONIES, from the Latin, ceremonia, which signifies the external rites and manner wherein the ministers of religion should perform their sacred functions. The true worship of God, the essential worship which he requires, is that of the heart and mind;—worship in spirit and in truth. Notwithstanding this, ceremonies and external worship make a part, and a necessary and essential part, of religion; considering mankind as united in one holy society, and forming one sacred body. Without this their religious services would be confusion, and their worship would degenerate into superstition, while each followed his own fancy or inclination, to the loss of that union and good understanding which ought to be the soul of society, especially of religious society.

Under the old covenant, God first delivered the great precepts of his law. He prescribed no ceremonies till afterwards; the multitude of external observances was intended to check that inclination which the Hebrews had discovered for idolatry, and to burden them with the yoke of ceremonies (Acts xv. 10.), that they might be induced to desire, with more ardour, the coming of their great deliverer. In the new covenant, few ceremonies are enjoined; they are considered as accessaries only to Christianity; not that this religion, how holy and spiritual soever, could be entirely without them; but they are employed as means only, not as the end; and in condescension to the weakness of the worshippers, who are men, and not angels.

The term ceremony often occurs in the Vulgate of the Old Testament. That translation does not always use the same word to express the Hebrew; and, indeed, the Hebrews have no one word which exactly corresponds to the Latin, ceremonia. The words of Moses signify—worship, service, ordinances, statutes, precepts; all of which are sometimes translated ceremonia.

It has been questioned whether the ceremonies of the Jews were imitations of those among the Egyptians, or those among the Egyptians were copied from the Jews? The striking conformity between the laws, the observances, and the ceremonies of these two people, has divided the opinions of learned men. Under the first Roman emperors, the Jewish and Egyptian superstitions were commonly confounded, and were equally odious to strangers. Sir John Marsham and Dr. Spencer have attempted to prove, that Moses, in many things, imitated the Egyptians; and this opinion has had many followers.

Indeed there is great resemblance between certain ceremonies, which were common to both people; while in other particulars there are differences which appear to be even studied. Besides, there seems to have been a very great strangeness reciprocally between the two people; and this, notwithstanding the propensity of the Israelites to imitate the worship of the Egyptians. These so opposite inclinations, must necessarily have produced many laws and ceremonies among the two nations, some entirely opposite, and many absolutely alike.

After all, when we accurately examine the laws and ceremonies of each people, we distinguish certain ceremonies wherein Moses, from condescension to the customs, prejudices, humours, inclinations, and even hardness of the Hebrews' hearts, permitted, or prohibited, certain practices, which were permitted, or prohibited, among the Egyptians; e. gr. he might conform to them in the habits and ornaments of the priests, in the choice of some sacrifices, their colour, sex, age, and the manner of offering them: he might borrow something from the forms of their temples, and their altars: many of the judicial laws of the Hebrews, seem to be copied from those of the Egyptians. The reason is obvious; the Israelites, having continued long in Egypt, were first formed into a people there, and were obliged to follow the laws of that nation where they dwelt. Moses, like a prudent and discreet legislator, preserved many profitable, or even indifferent things, to which the people had been long accustomed, suppressing what was contrary to justice, morality, and religion.

Hence so many regulations and ceremonies, the motives of which we are scarcely able to discover; and so many others which seem of no importance. Nevertheless, these were wise and serious as to their design, which was to alienate the Hebrews from the opinions, customs, and superstitions of the Egyptians; and to keep them at such a distance, as might secure them from idolatry, and cure them of their inclination to imitate the worship and abominations which prevailed in Egypt. We do not enter here into a detail of the particular ceremonies, laws, and sacrifices of the Hebrews: but some examples appear in the course of this Work.

ADDITIONAL REMARKS.

[It should be remembered, that the origin of many religious rites, dates before the establishment either of the Egyptian or Jewish polity:

now it was by no means fit that so many of these as were truly patriarchal, should be rejected under the Mosaic dispensation, merely because they had also descended to the Egyptians, and had been, or still were, used by them. Why should Moses, for instance, refuse to adopt the rite of sacrifice, because this rite was common among Heathen nations? was it not ALSO a traditional mode of worship derived from the earliest ages, and the most sacred sources? was it not transmitted to the Hebrews from their ancestors also? was it not practised by all whose memory they venerated? Why should he omit to notice the new moons? such had been the custom—the patriarchal custom—from time immemorial! In short, it should appear that, in fact, God had given to man certain ordinances; and his posterity throughout the world retained more or less of them [vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXLII.]; so much of them as the Egyptians had retained, though intermingled among others not so authorized, Moses adopted: so far he was the instrument of reforming the religious worship of his time: and to these institutions, thus sifted from the chaff of human additions, he added others congenial in their nature, particularly adapted to the temper, circumstances, and future situation of the Jewish people. These additions are truly the Mosaic, and were intended to preserve that people distinct and separate from all others. How well they have answered this purpose, appears not only from the evidences of it in their history, but from what in their present dispersed state they daily offer to our eyes: are they not now a distinct people, still preserved as memorials confirming historic truth, while nations infinitely more powerful, and which long triumphed over them, are extinct—mingled among those who have conquered them, and are no longer nations?—This leads us to reflect, that the design of these rites, was not merely to keep the Jews from idolatry, but, that after they were no longer exposed to that temptation, they should be thereby preserved as a standing evidence of the truth of prophecy, of the providence of God displayed toward them, and especially of the verity of Jesus Christ, of his apostles, and of the Christian religion in general; and so they will continue, so long as such testimony continues to be needful.]

CESTIUS GALLUS, a Roman governor of Syria, under whose government the Jews began their rebellion. Florus, the preceding governor, had wearied out their patience by his injuries and cruelties: and was desirous to see them in rebellion and war; knowing, that, were his conduct examined, he could not possibly escape capital punishment. Vide FLORUS. Cestius Gallus, coming to Jerusalem at the passover (A.D. 66.), the Jews made great complaints against Florus: but, as soon as Cestius was returned, Florus again began to oppress them.

While Cestius was at Jerusalem, seeing the province much disposed to revolt, he was desirous of ascertaining the number of Jews who came up to the passover; thereby to inform Nero that this nation was not so contemptible as he thought it to be. He desired the priests to reckon the lambs sacrificed from three to five o'clock in the evening. None but Jews sacrificed any, and none of the Jews ate of them, unless purified. A lamb sometimes served twenty persons, never fewer than ten. The lambs killed, were 255,000; which, allowing ten persons to each, made 2,550,000 persons.

Shortly after the return of Cestius, the Jews took up arms: hearing of this, he advanced with a powerful army towards Palestine: he first sent Cestennius Gallus into Galilee, who reduced it; he then took Lydda and Joppa, and encamped near Gibeon, two leagues from Jerusalem. The Jews neglected the feast of tabernacles then celebrating, and fell upon Cestius with so much impetuosity, that they gave the Roman army a great shock, and almost broke it. Cestius continued three days in this place, encompassed by the Jews, and in danger of great loss, whenever he attempted to move: but Agrippa having sent to the Jews proposals of peace and pardon, on condition they would lay down their arms, a division arose among them; Cestius, taking his opportunity, attacked them, threw them into disorder, and pursued them to Jerusalem.

He remained three days encamped in a place called Scopos [the look-out, or sentry-box], nearly a mile from the city, without attacking it, as if he had believed it would surrender without further bloodshed. On the fourth day (October 30), he advanced in order of battle, which so terrified the seditious, that they shut themselves up within the last enclosure of the city, and in the temple; abandoning the rest, which he set fire to: had he then given an assault, he would probably have taken the city, and finished the war: but he was diverted from it by some of his officers, who, as Josephus believes, were corrupted by Florus.

The five following days, he sought for some weak place in the walls which he might force, but found none, the seditious keeping a good guard every where. On the sixth day (November 5) he ordered a vigorous assault on one of the temple gates; which so frightened the seditious, that they were ready to forsake the city; and the people who desired peace, were disposed to open their gates to the Romans: but Cestius, ignorant of this advantage, suddenly suspended his assault, left the city, and returned to the camp at Scopus. The seditious pursued him, and killed many of his troops.

The next day he left Scopus, for his first camp at Gibeon: but the Jews, attacking him in flank and rear, killed many of his soldiers, and took a great part of his baggage. He halted two days at Gibeon, not knowing on what to resolve: on the third day (November 8), observing that the number of Jews was increasing, he began his march, abandoning his baggage, and killing the beasts of burden, except those which carried the machines and javelins. The Jews pursued but faintly, till they came to a very narrow descent, where they attacked the Romans on all sides. The combat lasted till night: the Romans lost 4,000 foot, and about 400 horse. Night gave the Romans an opportunity of retiring to Bethoron.

But Cestius, seeing himself surrounded by the Jews, broke up in the night, and left 400 men in Bethoron, with orders to get on the platforms of the houses, and to pass the word as sentinels do in the night; the next morning the Jews fell upon these men, cut them to pieces, and pursued Cestius: but he had marched so speedily, that they could not overtake him. He left them his machines, which were afterwards of great use to them, during the siege of Jerusalem. He survived his defeat but a little while: he died the next year, A.D. 67.

CHABALON, or Cabul, כבול, Χοβάλ: which is bound; from כבל cebel: otherwise, which grows old, and which decays; from בלה balah.

CHABALON, 1 Kings ix. 19. Hiram, king of Tyre, called the twenty cities which Solomon presented to him, in acknowledgment for his great services in building the temple, the land of Cabul. The LXX. read "He called them from the frontier;" as if they had read Gabul instead of Cabul. Others think, Cabul may signify, "a trifle."

Josephus says, the cities of Cabul were in the neighbourhood of Tyre. Others place them beyond Jordan, in the Decapolis. Grotius is of opinion, that the cities which Pharaoh had conquered from the Philistines, and yielded to Solomon, were among the cities of Cabul. Most commentators are persuaded, that the city of Cabul (Josh. xix. 27.) was one; and, probably, on this occasion, Hiram gave this name to the other cities which Solomon had ceded to him. Cabul was probably the same as Chabalon, or Chabul, which Josephus places near Ptolemais, south of Tyre. Vide CABUL.

CHADCHOD; כדוד, jasper, or precious stone; or a pitcher, or vessel, Ezek. xvi. 16.

CHÆREAS, Χαίρας: who rejoices; Gr. CHÆREAS, brother of Timotheus and Apollonides, governor of Gazara: he and his brothers were killed in a marsh, where, after the taking of Gazara, they had endeavoured to conceal themselves, 2 Macc. x. 32, 37.

[CHAFF, the refuse of winnowed corn. The ungodly are represented as the chaff: a simile most forcible and appropriate. Whatever defence they may afford to the saints, who are the wheat, they are in themselves worthless and inconstant, easily driven about with false doctrines, and will ultimately be driven away by the blast of God's wrath, Psalm i. 4; Matt. iii. 12, &c. False doctrines are called chaff; they are unproductive, and cannot abide the trial of the word and Spirit of God, Jer. xliii. 28.]

[CHALCEDONY, χαλκηδών, a precious stone, in colour like a carbuncle, Rev. xxi. 19. It is said to have derived its name from Chalcedon, a city of Bithynia, opposite to Byzantium. Some have also supposed this to be the stone called נפך, Ex. xxviii. 18, and translated in the English Bible, emerald.]

CHALDÆA, כשדים, Χαλδαία: as demons, or as robbers, or breasts, or fields, from שד shed, or שדר shaded, or שדד shadah, and the adverb כי ki, as.

CHALDÆA, a country in Asia, near the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates, the capital of which was Babylon. Vide BABYLON. Chaldæa is not in the Hebrew text, but Chasdim; whether the Chaldæans derived themselves from Chased, son of Nahor, Abraham's brother, or from any other more ancient. Chaldæa was originally of small extent; but the empire being afterwards very much enlarged, the name is generally taken in a more extensive sense, and includes Babylonia.

CHALDÆANS. This name is taken (1.) for the people of Chaldæa, and the subjects of that empire generally: (2.) for philosophers, naturalists, or sooth-sayers, whose principal employment was the study of mathematics and astrology; by which they pretended to foreknow the destiny of men born under certain constellations. They boasted of having astronomical observations among them for 472,000 years; Cicero says, 470,000; Epigenes, cited in Pliny, says 720,000: but 1903 years is the longest date which has the appearance of truth. Vide BABYLON and ASSYRIA. Also FRAGMENTS, No. DCCC.

[CHAM: Egypt; but, whether from the patriarch Ham may be doubted, although the Eng. Tr. has "land of Ham:" it denotes heat, heated, black, or sun-burnt, Psalm cv. 28, 27 ; cvi. 22.

The heathen writers called this country Chemia, and the native Copti at this day call it Chemi, which appellations certainly have no reference to the patriarch Ham. It should rather be derived from the effect of the sun on the country, or on the natives, rendering them swarthy ; of a deep dusky hue : and thus the name sun-burnt applies descriptively as well to the country as to its inhabitants ; and aptly characterises both.]

CHAMANIM. Thus the Hebrew calls what the Greeks name pyraia, or pyrateria ; and Jerom, in Lev. xxvi. 30, has translated simulachra, in Isaiah xxvii. 9, delubra. Chamanim were, according to Rabbi Solomon, idols exposed to the sun, on the tops of houses. Abenezra says, they were portable chapels or temples, in the form of chariots, in honour of the sun.

Pyraia were temples consecrated to the sun, wherein a perpetual fire was kept up. They were built on eminences ; and were large open enclosures, where the sun was worshipped. Herodotus (lib. i.) and Strabo (lib. xv.) speak of them ; and the Guebres, or worshippers of fire in Persia and the Indies, have them at this day. Strabo says, that in his time there were many of these temples in Cappadocia, consecrated to the goddess Anaita, and the god Homanus. Anaita is probably the moon, and Homanus the sun. The word chamanim [Eng. Tr. "images"] is derived from chaman, which signifies to warm, to burn [possibly idols of burnt clay]. Vide PLATES, No. lxxiv.

CHAMARIM. This word is translated, priests of the idols, or priests clothed in black, because chamar signifies blackness. Jerom, in 2 Kings xxiii. 5, renders aruspices : in Hosea x. 5, and Zephaniah i. 4, aditui, wardens of the temple. The best commentators understand by this word the priests of false gods, in particular the worshippers of fire, because they were, it is said, dressed in black : we find among the priests of Isis those called melanephori, i. e. wearers of black. But we know not, whether this was by reason of their dressing wholly in black, or because they wore a certain black shining veil in the processions of this goddess. Camar, in Arabic, signifies the moon : Isis is the same deity. Grotius thinks the Roman priests called camilli, came from the Hebrew, chamarim. Those among the Heathen who sacrificed to the infernal gods, were dressed in black :

Vidi egomet nigra succinctam vadere palla
Canidiam pedibus nudis, passoque capillo.
Horat. lib. i. Satyr. 8. ver. 23.

CHAMELEON, חָמָל, קמאלעון, from חמל, the ground, and לעון, a lion ; as if it were a creeping lion. The Hebrew חָמָל, some say, may signify a toad. Vide infra.

CHAMELEON. Moses forbids the Hebrews to eat the flesh of this creature, it being unclean, Levit. xi. 30. The chameleon is a kind of lizard. It has four feet ; on each foot three claws. Its tail is long and flattish, whereby it holds to the branches of trees, &c. Its nose is long, but obtuse : its back sharp, its skin plated, and jagged like a saw from the neck to the last joint of the tail ; on its head is a crest like a comb. It has no length of neck.

Some have asserted that the chameleon lives only on air ; for which reason, Tertullian calls it a living skin : but, in fact, it feeds on flies, and other insects ; these it catches with its tongue, which is very long, round, and knobbed at the end ; it is hollow, and open, having a kind of spike, which the creature darts (and retracts instantly) on its prey, which stick upon it as upon glue. It assumes the colour of many things which are around it ; becoming whitish when placed on any thing white, and brownish when placed on any thing brown. Its natural colour, when at rest and in the shade, is blueish grey ; but some of the smaller kinds are yellow, others are green. When exposed to the sun, this grey changes into a darker grey, inclining to a dun colour ; and parts which have little light on them, assume different hues, which form spots. Sometimes it seems to be speckled with dark spots, inclining to green ; if put on to a black hat it appears violet colour ; but it does not assume the colour of every stuff which covers it ; and usually it changes colour only in parts.

We question whether the Hebrew חֶכֶךְ hec-coch be truly a chameleon ; [perhaps, the chameleon may be described by the last words of the verse, הַרְתַּנְשֶׁמֶת, he tenshemet, rendered, in our translation, the mole ; but, by its place, and its associates, should be some kind of lizard.] Bochart is of opinion, that hec-coch signifies a large lizard, found in Arabia, which attacks serpents in their holes, and kills them. The Arabians call it ahuarlo. Vide the NATURAL HISTORY ARRANGEMENT, FRAGMENTS, vol. ii. ad fin.

[CHAMOIS. Our translators have evidently erred in inserting the Chamois in Deut. xiv. 5. The Hebrew word is zamor, which the LXX. render "cameleopardalis ;" this is adopted by the Vulgate and the Arabic, the latter rendering "ziraife." The ziraife, or giraffe, however, being a native of the torrid zone, and of southern Africa, it is equally unlikely that it should be abundant in Judaea, and be used as an article of food, as that the chamois which inhabits the chilly regions of mountains only, and seeks their most retired heights, to shelter it from the warmth of summer, preferring those cool retreats where snow and ice prevail, should be known among the population of Israel. We must yet wait for authorities to justify a conclusive opinion on this animal. We think the class of antelopes bids fairest to contain it.]

CHAOS: this term expresses that CONFUSION which overspread matter when newly produced, before God, by his almighty word, had put it into its subsequent order and condition. Moses uses the terms tohu and bohū (חֵלֶם בְּרוֹן) to express this chaos, which the LXX. translate ἄσπετος καὶ ἀκαταστάτος, invisible—[rather, unightly] and disorderly; Symmachus, a mass without motion, and in disorder; Aquila and Theodotion, a void and nothing. Ovid well describes the chaos as,

———Rudis indigestaque moles,
Nec quidquam nisi pondus iners, congestaque eodem
Non bene junctarum discordia semina rerum.
Metam. lib. i.

CHARACA, Εἰς χάρακα: covering, coat, or cloak: from כֶּרֶק kerēc: in Greek, a valley.

[CHARACA, a city of Gad, whence Judas Maccabeus drove Timotheus, 2 Macc. xii. 17.]

CHARIOTS of War. Scripture speaks of two sorts of chariots, one for princes and generals to ride in, the other to break the enemy's battalions, by rushing in among them, being armed with iron, which made terrible havoc. The most ancient chariots of war we find mentioned, are Pharaoh's, which were overthrown in the Red Sea, Exod. xiv. 7. The Canaanites, whom Joshua engaged at the waters of Merom, had horsemen, and a multitude of chariots, Josh. xi. 4. Sisera, general of Jabin, king of Hazor, had 900 chariots of iron. Judah could not get possession of the lands belonging to their lot, because the ancient inhabitants of the country were strong in chariots of iron, Judg. i. 19. The Philistines, in their war against Saul, had 30,000 chariots, and 6000 horsemen, 1 Sam. xiii. 5. David having taken 1000 chariots of war from Hadadezer, king of Assyria, hamstringed the horses, and burned 900 chariots, reserving only 100, 2 Sam. viii. 4.

It does not appear that the kings of the Hebrews used chariots in war. Solomon had a considerable number, but we do not know of any military expedition wherein they were employed, 1 Kings x. 26. As Judæa was a mountainous country, chariots were of no use. In 2 Maccabees xiii. 2, there is mention of chariots armed with scythes, which the king of Syria led against Judæa.

CHEBAR, or Chobar: force, strength: otherwise, as the son; from בֶּרֶךְ, a son; or, as pure, or as what; from בָּרַר burar, and the adverb כֵּן ke, as.

CHEBAR, a river of Assyria, which falls into the Euphrates, in the upper part of Mesopotamia, Ezek. i. 1.

[As this is the name of a river, it is probably derived from some character of that river: hence some think it denotes full, strong; perhaps, very violent, "full stream." Vide Fuller's Miscel. Sac. lib. iv. c. 2.]

CHEDORLAOMER, כְּדֹרְלֶאֱמֶר, Χεδωρλαομερ: as a generation of servitude; from the adverb כֵּן ke, as, דֹּר dor, a generation, and עֹמֶר amar, burden, servitude: otherwise, the roundness of the sheaf; from כִּדּוֹר kidor, a ball, or sphere, and עֹמֶר omar, a sheaf.

CHEDORLAOMER, king of the Elymæans, or Elamites, i. e. either the Persians, or a people bordering on them, was one of four kings who confederated against the five kings of the Pentapolis of Sodom, who had revolted from his power, A. M. 2092; ante A. D. 1912.

The four confederate kings marched towards Canaan; and, in their progress attacked the countries beyond Jordan; that, by overwhelming the nations bordering on Sodom and Gomorrah, these cities, having no assistance to expect, might not be able to escape their vengeance. Vide the course of these invaders marked on the MAP of CANAAN, adapted to the book of GENESIS; PLATES, No. cxciv.

The five revolted kings took the field with their army; but were put to flight, leaving their cities to the pillage of the conquerors; who, loaded with spoil and captives, returned by the way of Damascus; but they were overtaken by Abraham, and he recovered Lot, with much of the people belonging to the kings of the Valley, now the Dead Sea.

CHELAL, כֵּלֶל, Καλήλ: completion, or the whole: otherwise, as a night; from לַיִל lail, night, and the adverb כֵּן ke, as: according to the Syriac, a crown: otherwise, perfect crown.

CHELAL, an Israelite, who returned from Babylon, and put away his foreign wife, Ezra x. 30.

CELLUH, כִּלְוִהוּ, Χολκία: all himself: or, his perfection, his destruction, his hindrance; from כִּלְוִהוּ, or כָּלָה cala, and וְ his.

CELLUH, an Israelite who put away his strange wife on the return from Babylon, Ezra x. 35.

CHELMON, Κημωνδς: preparative, or casting up an army; from חַיִל chail, army, or provision, and מְנַחֵם manah, to prepare, to number: otherwise, his dream; from כָּלָם calam, to dream.

CHELMON, a city opposite to Esdraelou; near to which part of Holofernes's army encamped before he besieged Bethulia. Perhaps the Salmon of Psalm lxviii. 14; Judg. ix. 48; or Cedmon, or Belmon, or Cyamon, as the Greek of Judith vii. 3; or Cammon, noticed by Eusebius, seven miles from Legio, north.

CHELUB, כֶּלֶב: dog, or basket; from כֶּלֶב keleb, or Caleb.

CHELUB, father of Ezri, 1 Chron. xxvii. 26.

CHELUBAI, כְּלֻבַּי, Καλωβι: from Caleb, or keleb.

CHELUBAI, son of Hezron, 1 Chron. ii. 9.

CHEMOSH, or Chamos, כְּמוֹשׁ: as handling, or stroking, or as withdrawing, or taking away, from כֶּ ke, as, and מוֹשׁ mush, to withdraw.

CHEMOSH, an idol of the Moabites (Numb. xxi. 29.): from a root which in Arabic signifies to hasten. For which reason many believe Chamos to be the sun, whose precipitate course might well procure it the name of swift. Others confound Chamos with Ammon:

Quamvis Ethiopum populis, Arabumque beatiss
Gentibus, atque Indis unus sit Jupiter Ammon.
Lucan. Pharsal. lib. ix.

Macrobius shows, that Ammon was the sun, and that his horns denoted his rays. We are of opinion, that the god Homanus, and Apollo Chomeus, mentioned by Strabo (lib. xv.), and Ammianus Marcellinus (lib. xxii.), were probably the same as Chamos, or the sun. These deities were worshipped in many parts of the East. Some, from the resemblance of the Hebrew Chamos, with the Greek Comos, believed Chamos might signify Bacchus. Jerom, and others, take Chamos and Peor for the same divinity: but Baal-Peor was Tammuz, or Adonis.

They who derive Chamos from the Hebrew כָּמוֹס camos, to hide, suppose it signifies the hidden god, or Pluto; in this sense it might be Tammuz, or Adonis; but the name of the god Chamos, is never written in this manner in Scripture.

CHENAANAH, כְּנַעֲנָה, vide CANAAN.

I. CHENAANAH, fourth son of Bilhan, 1 Chron. vii. 10.

II. CHENAANAH, father of the false prophet Zedekiah, 1 Kings xxii. 11.

CHENANI, כְּנִי: my preparation; from כֶּן ken, preparation; otherwise, a base; from כֶּן ken, and the pronoun i, my.

CHENANI, a Levite, Neh. ix. 4.

CHENANIAH, כְּנַעֲנִיָּה: preparation, or disposition, or strength, or rectitude of the Lord; from כֶּן ken, or כֶּן ken, and יָהּ jah, the Lord.

CHENANIAH, a master of the temple music. He conducted the music at the removal of the ark from Obed-edom, 1 Chron. xv. 22.

CHEPHIRAH, כְּפִירָה: little lioness, precipitation, hardened, village; from כָּפַר caphar.

I. CHEPHIRAH, a city of the Gibeonites, given to Benjamin, Josh. ix. 17; xviii. 26. It appears to have been a village of the Hivites, and to have retained its name, to whatever size it might afterwards have attained.

II. CHEPHIRAH, son of Kirjath-arim, Ezra ii. 25.

CHERAN, כֶּרֶן: as singing, or as crying, from רָנָן ranan, crying; or singing; and the adverb כֶּ ke, as: otherwise, their lamb, from כָּר car, a lamb: otherwise, their knowledge.

CHERAN, youngest son of Dishon, son of Seir, the Horite, Gen. xxxvi. 26.

CHEREM, חֶרֶם: anathema. The Hebrews distinguish three sorts of excommunication: first, נִדְּוִי niddui, separation, the lesser excommunication; secondly, חֶרֶם cherem, the greater excommunication, or anathema; thirdly, שְׁמַתָּה shammathah, which incurs the death of the party. Cherem deprives the excommunicated person of most of the advantages of civil society. He can maintain no commerce; he can neither buy nor sell, except such things as are absolutely necessary to life; he can neither resort to the schools, nor enter the synagogue. No one may eat or drink with him. The sentence of cherem was to be pronounced by ten persons, or at least in the presence and with the acquiescence of ten persons; but the excommunicated person might be absolved by three judges, or even by one, if he were a doctor of the law. Vide Bartolocci, Bibl. Rabbin. t. c. n. iii. Selden, d. Synedrion, lib. i. Basnage, Hist. of Jews, tom. v. lib. vii. chap. xx. Edit. Paris, &c.

Cherem and shammathah, in the ancient signification of the words, implied a sentence of death, and total destruction, to be inflicted either by the people, when victorious, or by a decree of the senate. God ordains that he who sacrifices to strange gods, shall be cherem, punished with death; or, as the Spanish Jews have translated it,—sera desiroido; shall be destroyed. Histoire des Juifs, lib. vi. chap. 21. Vide ANATHEMA, and EXCOMMUNICATION.

CHERETHIM, כְּרֶתִי, Χερεθι: who cuts, who tears away and exterminates; from כָּרַת carath.

CHERETHIM, or Cretim. These terms denote the Philistines; so we read, "I will stretch out mine hand upon the Philistines, and will cut off the Cherethim, and destroy the remnant of the sea-coast," Ezek. xxv. 16. And Zephaniah, exclaiming against the Philistines, says, "Woe unto the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, the nation of the Cherethites," chap. ii. 5. It is also said, 1 Sam. xxx. 14, that the Amalekites made an invasion on the south of the Cherethites, that is, of the Philistines. It has been a question, from whence the Philistines, or Cherethites, came? Scripture says, from the isle of Caphtor (Jer. xlvii. 4; Amos ix. 7.), which we have supposed was the isle of Crete. The LXX. translate Cherethim, Cretenses, and Chereth, Crete. Others bring them from Cappadocia. Vide CAPHTOR.

[The Philistines appear to be called by this name, in 1 Sam. xxx. 14; Ezek. xxv. 16; Zeph. ii. 5, the reasons of which the reader may see under the articles CAPHTOR and PHILISTINE. We may add, that all the versions agree in this, and that they uniformly understand Cretans by this name. But whether these were properly natives of the island of Crete, in the Mediterranean, or whether they were some branch of the Caphtorim, named Ciratas, or Cretes, may exercise the opinions of the ingenious. Perhaps both ideas are true; the Cretans being a colony from a part of Egypt, which itself was colonized from the original Caphtor, by a detachment of Cretes.

It appears from the passages cited, that the Cherethites inhabited the same district as the Philistines; that they were a remnant, separated by a considerable interval, from their original country; and, that their situation led them to form connections in the islands of the Mediterranean, to which they had uninterrupted access by sea. Vide CRETE.

We must, however, intreat the reader to observe, that "the Pallis remaining in India, have different names: those in the mountains north-east of Benares, are called in Sanscrit Ciratas:" so that it is by no means impossible that certain families of the tribe of Ciratas had accompanied the Pallis (Philistines) originally, and still retained this appellation; whence they were called in Hebrew Ceritim, or Cherithites.

David, and some of his successors, had guards called Cherethites and Pelethites, 2 Sam. viii. 18.

It appears that the office of these Cherethites was of the same nature as that of the Capigis, among the Turks and other Orientals; who are bearers of the sultan's orders for punishing any one, by decapitation, or otherwise; an office which is very honourable in the East, though considered as degrading among us. It appears, that Herod made use of such a one in beheading John the Baptist; as the agent sent, was not an ordinary soldier of the king's guard, but a person whose official duty it was to execute that particular command: accordingly, Ephraim the Syrian renders chiefs and soldiers, for Cherethites and Pelethites. The guards of David, it is thought, were so named from a place called Cereth, or Crete; but where that place was situated, it is difficult to determine. Many suggestions have been proposed, but with little success. Of a like nature, probably, were the "foot-men" of Saul, 1 Sam. xxii. 17.]

CHERITH, כְּרִית, Kaphth: incision; from כָּרַת carath, to cut, to pierce, to exterminate.

[Simon renders "dried up," exsiccated, "so called, because it was dried up in summer;" which is not far from the idea above; but, if that learned writer had considered that Elijah was sent to this brook as to the place where he might meet with water, when all other waters had failed, he would have seen the absolute contradiction to this character implied in his derivation of the name. We therefore prefer the idea of short, soon terminated, the brook which has but a little way to run, before it issues in a river, perhaps in the Jordan. It probably rose in some hill, or dropped from some cleft of a rock, near the river, into which, without much winding, it speedily fell. This agrees with the notion of a colony of ravens (or rather rooks), being settled in the neighbourhood; and with the absolute privacy which such a sequestered spot was likely to afford.]

CHERITH, a brook beyond Jordan, which falls into that river, below Bethsan, 1 Kings xvii. 3. Vide ELIJAH.

CHERUB, כְּרֻב, in the Chaldee, this word signifies, as a child; from the adverb כֵּן ke, as, and רַבִּיא rabia, a young man, a child: otherwise, as multiplying, or as combating; from רַבָּב rabab: or abundance, or multitude of knowledge; from רַב rab, a multitude, and נָכַר nacar, to know: otherwise, in Hebrew, רַבָּה rabah signifies to grow great, to nourish, to bring up; in Syriac, to labour.

I. CHERUB, an Israelite, who returned from Babylon, but was unable to prove his genealogy, Ezra ii. 59.

II. CHERUB, Cherubim, כְּרֻבִים. This term in Hebrew, is sometimes taken for a calf, or an ox. Ezekiel (i. 10.) mentions the face of a cherub, as synonymous with the face of an ox. The word cherub, in Syriac and Chaldee, signifies, to till, or plough, which is the work of oxen. Cherub also signifies, strong and powerful; possessing, as it were, the strength of an ox. Grotius says, the cherubim were figures like a calf. Bochart thinks they were nearly the figure of an ox; and Spencer thinks the same. Josephus says, the cherubim were extraordinary creatures, of a figure unknown to mankind. Clemens of Alexandria believes, that the Egyptians imitated the cherubim of the Hebrews in their sphynxes and hieroglyphical animals.

The descriptions which Scripture gives of cherubim differ; but all agree in representing a figure, composed of various creatures: a man, an ox, an eagle, and a lion. Such were the cherubim described by Ezekiel i. 5, et seq. x. 2. Solomon's must have been nearly the same, 1 Kings vi. 23. Neither those of Exod. xxv. 18—20, nor those of Gen. iii. 14, are clearly described. Ezekiel (xxviii. 14.) compares the king of Tyre to "the cherub that covered the ark of the covenant upon the holy mountain;"—glittering with gold and glory. The two cherubim covering the mercy-seat, had their wings extended on both sides, and their faces turned towards the mercy-seat. Vide CALF, and FRAGMENTS, Nos. CLII. and CCLXXXIII.

CHESALON, כֶּסֶלֹן: confidence, temerity, sides; from כֶּסֶל kesel: otherwise, throne of his habitation; from כִּסֵּא kissa, a throne, and לֶן lan, or lon.

[Strong dependence, or hope; of the parents, say some. This city is thought to be otherwise called Har-jearim. Possibly, the "aun of confidence," or dependence; i. e. in whom confidence is placed: or who confidently expected deliverance.]

CHESALON, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 10.

CHESD, כֶּשֶׁד, as a demon; from the adverb כֵּן ke, as, and שֶׁד shed, a demon; otherwise, as a destroyer: as a breast or nipple, from שֶׁד shad, or שֶׁדֶד shadad: otherwise, as a field; from שֶׁדֶד shadch.

CHESED, father of the Casedim, or Chasdim. Thus the Hebrews call the Chaldaeans. Chesed was son of Nahor and Milcah, Gen. xxii. 22. But there is great probability, that the Chasdim, or Chaldaeans, came from some other Chesed.

CHESIL, כֶּסֶלִי, Βαυλ: Orion, a star; otherwise, folly: otherwise, the sides, or flanks; from כֶּסֶל casal.

I. CHESIL, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 30. Eusebius calls it Xil; and places it in the south of Judah.

[II. CHESIL, a constellation. Vide ORION.]

[CHESNUT-TREE, עֵרְמוֹן, Gen. xxx. 37: Ezek. xxxi. 8. In these places the LXX. and Jerom translate, "plane-tree;" and most of the modern interpreters follow their authority. The Hebrew is derived from a root which signifies nakedness; and it is often observed of the plane-tree, that the bark peels off from the trunk, leaving it naked.]

CHESULLOTH, or Chesulloth-Tabor, כֶּסֶלֹת-חֶבֶר, Ἀχαιελοθ: rashness of the navel; from כֶּסֶל kesel: otherwise, the sides of Tabor.

CHESULLOTH, or Chesulloth-Tabor, a city on the side of mount Tabor, Josh. xix. 18. Eusebius and Jerom call it Casalus, or Eralus, and place it ten miles from Diocæsarea, east.

[The "confidence (being strongly walled) of Tabor." This town is called Tabor only, in verse 22. There is at this day, a village called by the Arabs Tabor, at the foot of the mountain of that name, as appears by Della Valle, Part I. Epist. 13. Mocquet calls it Thebora; Vide also Neitzschitzius, p. 233. It is, however, probable, that this was a fortification higher up the mountain, perhaps on the top of it; whence it might be called the confidence of Tabor: but some think the words may be taken in the sense of bowels, or internal parts, or middle parts of Mount Tabor. Vide TABOR. Possibly, Aznath may mean the palisadoes; Chesulloth the interior of those defences, q. the rampart of Tabor.]

CHEZIB, Gen. xxxviii. 5. Instead of "Judah's wife ceased to have children, after the birth of Shelah," the Hebrew reads, "she was at Chesib when she bare him." Chezib is the name of a place, Josh. xv. 44; and Micah i. 14. Eng. Trans. Achzib. Chesib was a desert place, near Adullam, in Eusebius's time.

CHIDON, כִּידוֹן: a lance, dart, misfortune: otherwise, as judging; from the adverb כֵּן ke, as, and דוּן dun, to judge.

[If this name, Chidon, imports a great misfortune, then it may well be explained by Nachon, which is rendered a crush, or crushed, from the death of Uzza: but, if these names belonged to this place anciently, and that given in consequence of the death of Uzza was simply Perez Uzza, "the breach of Uzza," then we may derive these former appellations from other principles. Possibly Chidon may denote the "faillen aun," and Nachon the "smitten aun:" under which derivation the import of these words is sufficiently similar.]

CHIDON. The threshing-floor of Chidon, where Uzzah was suddenly struck dead, 1 Chron. xiii. 9. In 2 Sam. vi. 6, this threshing-floor is called "the threshing-floor of Nachon." We do not know whether the names of Nachon and Chidon are the names of men, or of places. [But if nachon may signify prepared—the floor prepared—then this floor might have belonged to Chidon as its owner. Vide NACHON, and UZZAH.]

CHILD. The descendants of a man, how remote soever, are called his sons, or children: as, the children of Edom, of Moab, of Israel. In Scripture, disciples are often called children, or sons. Solomon, in his proverbs, thus addresses his disciple: "Hear, my son." The children of the devil, the sons of Belial, are those who follow the maxims of the world and the devil. The expression, "children of the wedding," "children of light," "children of darkness," signifies, those invited to the wedding,—those who follow light,—those who remain in darkness; as the children of the kingdom describes those who belong to the kingdom.

Persons who are almost at the age of maturity city are called children; so Joseph is called [a child, or LAD], though he was at least sixteen. Isaac was above twenty when Abraham gave him this appellation. Benjamin, above thirty, is so called. The Hebrews, as well as the Greeks and Latins, called their servants and slaves, children: as we often say, my lads, though addressing men. Men of full age are often named children: "the child shall die a hundred years old:" there shall be no more untimely deaths, Isaiah lxxv. 20. Vide YOUTH.

CHILDREN (Sons) of God. By this name the holy angels are sometimes described: "Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord," Job. i. 6; ii. 1: and Psalm lxxxix. 6, "Who among the sons of the mighty can be likened unto the Lord?" Good men, in opposition to wicked men, are likewise thus called; as the family of Seth, in opposition to the descendants of Cain, "The sons of God saw the daughters of men," Gen. vi. 2.

Judges, magistrates, and priests, are likewise termed children of God: "I said, ye are gods, and all of you are children of the Most High" (Psalm lxxxii. 6): he speaks to judges, to supreme magistrates. To the priests he says, "Give unto the Lord, O ye children of the Mighty, give unto the Lord glory and strength," Psalm xxix. 1. This is in distinction from the sons of men, from men in general.

Israelites are called sons of God, in opposition to the Gentiles, Hosea i. 10; vide John xi. 52. Sometimes the elect, the blessed, have this name given them: "How is he numbered among the children of God, and his lot is among the saints!" Wisd. v. 5.

In the New Testament, believers are called children of God, by virtue of their adoption: "To them gave he power—honour—dignity—[we had almost said A PATENT] to become the sons of God," John i. 12. St. Paul, in several places, extols the advantages of being adopted sons of God," Rom. viii. 14; Gal. iii. 26.

Children (Sons) of Men. This name is given to the family of Cain, before the Deluge; particularly to the giants, violent men, who had corrupted their ways. Afterwards, the impious and wicked Israelites are so called: "O ye sons of men, how long will ye love vanity?" Psalm iv. 2. "The sons of men, whose teeth are spears and arrows," lvii. 4. But, very often, by the sons of men, mankind at large are understood: "What is man, that thou art mindful of him; or the son of man, that thou visitest him?" viii. 4. And, "His eyelids try the children of men," xi. 4.

Children (Sons) of Belial, sons of refractoriness, vide BELIAL.

Children sacrificed to Moloch, vide MOLOCH.

CHILEAB, כִּלְעָב: totality of the father; from כָּלָא kela, the whole, to gather together, and אב ab, a father: otherwise, consummation, or perfection of the father; from כָּלָא or כָּלָה cala, to consume, or press.

CHILEAB, son of David and Abigail, 2 Sam. iii. 3.

CHILION, כִּלְיִן: finished, complete, perfect; from כָּלָה chalah, to finish, or from כֶּלֶא chela, the whole.

CHILION, son of Elimelech and Naomi, of Bethlehem, in Judah, who, during a famine, retired with his father and his mother from the land of Israel into the land of Moab, where he married a Moabite woman, named Orpah; and where he died, Ruth i.

CHILMAD, כִּלְמַד: as teaching, or learning; from the adverb כֵּן ke, as, and לָמַד lamed, to teach: otherwise, all measuring; from כָּל col, all, and מָדַד madad, to measure, or to cover. This is the name of a city of Asia, whose true etymology cannot be had from the Hebrew.

[Simon renders, "the division, or wall, of Media." We have in countries adjacent to Media, repeated mention of walls, extending from mountain to mountain, and closing the way against the approach of enemies; such is that called "Alexander's wall," said to be not far from Derbent; another instance is the great wall of China. We have in our own country the remains of two walls built by the Romans, when in Britain; and from them several places are named, as "Wall's-end," &c.]

CHIMHAM, כִּמְחָם, Ἀχμαμ: as they; from the adverb כֵּן ke, and the pronoun הֵם hem, they: otherwise, as a trouble; from חָמָה hamah, trouble.

I. CHIMHAM, son of Barzillai, the Gileadite. He followed David to Jerusalem, after the war with Absalom; and David enriched him, in consideration of his father Barzillai, whose generous assistance he had experienced, 2 Sam. xix. 37, 38.

II. CHIMHAM, a place near Bethlehem, Jer. xli. 17.

CHISLON, כִּסְלֹן: confidence, or rashness, or flanks; from כֶּסֶל kesel: otherwise, the throne of his dwelling; from כִּסֵּא kissa, throne, and לֹן lun.

CHISLON, the father of Elidad, of the tribe of Benjamin; one deputed to allot the land of Canaan, Numb. xxxiv. 21.

[CHITTIM, bruiser, or bruise of the sea, or diadem, or gold, or a tincture: otherwise, from the Syriac, and Hebrew, the gathering heaps of the sea, Gen. x. 4; 1 Chron. i. 7. Perhaps this may be the best taken simply, as implying BRA-

VOES : persons threatening, or in the habit of giving bruises, blows, and thumps.]

CHITTIM. Isaiah, speaking of the destruction of Tyre, by Nebuchadnezzar, says, "Howl, ye ships of Tarshish, for it is laid waste; it is revealed from the land of Chittim," Isa. xxiii. 1. If Chittim signify Macedonia, how is it said, that the destruction of Tyre, occasioned by Nebuchadnezzar, should come from Chittim? Might not this passage be more properly interpreted, as relating to the destruction of this city by Alexander the Great? Basnage, by Chittim, understands the Cuthæans, inhabitants of the Suziana, near Babylon, who marched under Nebuchadnezzar, and assisted at the siege of Tyre. But in what place of Scripture are the Cuthæans named Chittim? Bochart supposes the Romans to be meant by Chittim; but the Romans were not concerned in that siege of Tyre, which is here mentioned by Isaiah.

We are of opinion, that in this place, as elsewhere, the Macedonians are intended by the word Chittim; and we translate the Hebrew of Isaiah thus: "Howl, ye ships of Tarshish, because Tyre is destroyed within; it is open on the side where people enter who come from Chittim." They came from Macedonia to Tyre by sea. The city was thought impregnable on this side, being built on a rock surrounded by the sea. Notwithstanding, the prophet foretels, that, being exposed, it would be taken and laid waste on this side; moreover, that it should be ravaged from within, by its own inhabitants: division would arise among the citizens, or the soldiers who were appointed to defend it, Isaiah xxiii. 1, et seq. Vide MACEDONIA, and MEDIA.

Isaiah adds (verse 12.): "Thou daughter of Zidon, arise, pass over to Chittim, there, also, shalt thou have no rest." Seek for refuge in Macedonia, in a remote and maritime country; yet, even thither, God will pursue you; his hand will not suffer you to rest.

Jeremiah (ii. 10.) reproaching the Israelites with inconstancy in religion, says, "Pass over the isles of Chittim, and see; and send unto Kedar and consider diligently, and see if there be such a thing: hath a nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods?" The prophet speaks of the isles of Chittim, of the country of Macedonia, under the name of an island, after the manner of the Hebrews, who give this name to peninsulas and maritime countries.

[We do not see sufficient reason for restraining the word Chittim to Macedonia, which was not particularly a maritime country: why not include all Greece? at least the islands of the Archipelago, and perhaps up the Bosphorus, from whence vessels might navigate to Tyre, as they do now to Egypt, and other places. The Greek colonies, scattered about the Mediterranean, might also be included; consequently, Sicily, Sardinia, and much of Italy. Vide the MAPS of the Settlements of the Nations, among the PLATES.]

[It is proper that we should examine more than one place, or region of this name, as we find that the description given of one, in Scripture, will not always suit what is requisite in behalf of the other.

1. Chittim mentioned by Moses, Numbers xxiv. 24.

2. Chittim mentioned by Daniel, xi. 30.

3. Cutha near Sidon, 2 Kings xvii. 24.

4. Chethim in the isle of Cyprus: from whence, says Josephus, the Hebrews called all islands Chethim, though he restrains that title, principally, to a city called (Cilius) Kitios: now Lamica.

In Ezek. xxvii. 6, some of the Arabs translate the word cheteim "the isles of India:" the Chaldee, "the province of Apulia;" meaning the region of Elephants, and probably intending Pul in Egypt. The Syriac version reads Chethoje, which has some resemblance to Cataya: by which we are directed towards India.

Cutha, 2 Kings xvii. 24, is written at full length Cuthah, therefore is not any Chittim of which we are in search.

A district near Sidon is called Cutha, and for what is rendered, 1 Chron. i. 13, "Canaan begat Sidon," the Chaldee has "Canaan begat Chuthanium, who built Sidon, and was the first-born of Canaan." Michaelis also mentions an Arab emir, who acknowledged the existence of a town named Cuthim, about three miles from Sidon. The inhabitants of Shechem also, in Alexander's time, and in that of Antiochus Epiphanes, called themselves Sidonians, yet these are the Cuthæans imported by Tiglath Pileser, as above referred to.

Zechariah (xiv. 21.) says, "there shall be no more Canaanites in the house of the Lord." Who can these Canaanites be? might they be some remains of ancient Canaanitish families, as of Araunah (2 Sam. xxiv. 23), for instance, who still retained both property and influence in their original possessions? At the time of Zechariah, long after the expulsion of that people by Joshua, could any remain, whose appearance in the house of the Lord, was a circumstance of ordinary recurrence?]

[CHIOS, an opening. An island in the Archipelago, between Lesbos and Samos, on the coast of Asia Minor, now called Scio. Paul passed this way as he sailed southward from Mitylene to Samos, Acts xx. 15. This name, in the Syriac language, denotes the gum called mastic; and many describe this island as the place of its growth. But Chios is said to be named Coar, after the nymph Chione.]
